And why may not the first of these, the sense of want and weakness, interweave itself in the very fibres of our being? Look at a blind man when he least thinks about his blindness, and you will see that every attitude is cautious, every movement guarded; even his sleeping face tells you that the habit of watchfulness, the sense of danger, is still alive. "His loss of sight is always there."

Look at one upon whom some heavy blow has just fallen suddenly, and even when Nature, drugged with woe, softly laps him in merciful oblivion, still an occasional sob will shake him, and an occasional tear steal down his face. The darkness of one, the misfortune of the other, is with him even when he forgets it. Yes! and be sure that when we have rightly and fully learned the lesson of our countless wants—when we have felt our blindness and our ruin—the effects will pass into our very being, will check our reckless self-reliance, will make us gentle to others even without having to pause to actually think of our own sins, and will give a certain child-like meekness and docility to the whole temper and tendency of our lives. And God will mark and requite this ceaseless confession of want, of weakness, exhaling like a perfume from the whole existence of a really humble heart.

The second thing in prayer is acknowledgment of God's power to supply this need. And who shall deny that this part also can go far beyond our feeling of it? In truth, no pious mind can ever exercise itself about any common thing except by means of this belief in God. Tell me, did you ever think of what you have lost—heaven! and of what you have earned—hell! and tremble to remember that God is holy, and that you are a sinner under His wrath and vengeance? And have you now regained your composure, and can you do your common duties in calmness and collectedness of heart? I say then, either of two things has happened. Either your heart has been hardened against the warnings of the Spirit of God, or else it has been composed by learning that God is love, and that your atoning Saviour, having washed you in His blood, wraps around you an all-sufficient righteousness. Surely if, without presumption, we venture at all into a world where every allurement tempts, and over which are spread the wings of fallen angels, of powerful cunning and innumerable foes, our doing so must be through faith in the guardianship of a stronger than they. Just as a good man is truthful from principle, even when he does not stop to think that lies are sins, so his very repose, even if he does not remind himself of it, will be really founded upon the Psalmist's principle—"I will lay me down in peace, and sleep; for it is thou Lord only that makest me to dwell in safety."

Thus his whole life confesses his wants, and leans on God for their supply. And do not these two things imply the third? do they not make up the most powerful of all prayers? The ashy pallor of the face of one who has swooned from weariness and hunger—does that make no appeal, because the lips are motionless? And if mine be the door where he pauses, if the starving wretch has fainted upon my steps, do I not find a special appeal to myself in the fact of his having tottered there?

Even so, Christian, when you are commanded to continue instant in prayer, the meaning is this—make your life one unbroken appeal to God, by living humbly and by living trustfully, and by living upon the steps of the palace of the king.

Whoever can say, like Paul, "The life that I now live in the flesh, I live by the faith of the Son of God," that man's every breath is acknowledged as a prayer by God, that man prays without ceasing. And whoever adds to such a blessed frame the further blessedness of such a Christian love as counts the welfare of another equally dear to him with his own, he (like Paul again) maketh intercession for that other without ceasing, night and day.

II. No one who has any such habit of prayer will dream that it absolves him from regular seasons of deliberate approach to the mercy seat. No one reaches this rare height of Christian excellence who has not learned well the lesson of obedience, even to commandments wherein he can see no use. And the commandment to pray with shut doors and stated specified petitions is as clear as anything in the Word of Life. That alone is quite enough.

But, in fact, we can see the reason of so directing us. We compare unceasing prayerfulness to the perpetual remorse of a disgraced man, to the constant firmness of one who has an aim in life, and to the undying sorrow of a bereaved and faithful heart, all of which mix with their whole life. Well! but do you fancy these will endure unless there are seasons when they rise to the surface and come to the fore-front? How long would remorse last without seasons of agonised regret, self-reproach, and shame? How long would the heroic purpose live, unfed with careful plans and high and ardent aspirings? How long would lost love itself overshadow the life of one who did not, in many a lonesome hour, call back to memory the looks and tones of the departed? No longer will vague feelings of want and of reliance linger in that man's bosom who never reckons his wants upon his knees, never counts up some of the offences of the day, nor asks pardon from his God for his Redeemer's sake.

All thanks and blessing be to Him who lets us come before Him with our wants and cares and sorrows! All honour and praise be to Him who, with bleeding hands, tore down the veil that shut us out from the presence of the glory of the Lord!

See to it that you come with no plea but His merit. His suffering, and His priestly intercession. And see to it that through Him you do come, and that with boldness, thinking no care of yours too little to mention to your Father, none too heavy to be uplifted by a Divine Right Hand.

SCRIPTURE LESSONS FOR SCHOOL AND HOME.

SCRIPTURE STORIES. First Series. No. 25. Paul Before Felix.

Chapter to be read—Acts xxiv.

INTRODUCTION. We have now traced St. Paul to Cæsarea. He had left Jerusalem for ever. Whom had the city rejected and cast out before him? What warning did Christ utter? (Luke xiii. 34, 35.) Now left to its fate, was soon destroyed by Romans. Meanwhile Paul is a prisoner, waiting for his accusers. How glad he would be of the delay; not now have to make a defence unprepared, as at Jerusalem.

I. The Accusation. (Read 1—9.) Picture the scene: the judgment hall (xxiii. 35) or Prætorium, the residence of the governor, similar to the hall to which Christ was taken. The judge not the high priest but the Roman magistrate, who would be attended by officers, soldiers, &c. The whole appearance of the court more military than ecclesiastical, as at last trial at Jerusalem. Who are the accusers? Tertullus, a trained Roman advocate, instructed by high priest and elders, who are present to watch the case. How does the advocate begin? (ver. 2.) Hoping by flattery to win the ear of the magistrate. What are the three charges? (1) Disloyalty to the Roman empire. Let children see that he names this without attempting to prove it, and compare passages in Epistles, to show how St. Paul always taught obedience and respect to those in authority. (See Rom. xiii. 1—7; Titus iii. 1, &c.) (2) Schism—i.e., that he was a ringleader of a new sect. But how would this affect the Romans, unless Christians were disturbers of the peace, which they were not? (3) Sacrilege. In what way? Before had accused of profaning Temple, now only allege that Paul was attempting to; he knew he could not prove that he had done so.

II. The Defence. (Read 10—21.) Why was St. Paul glad of Felix for judge? because acquainted with customs of Jewish religion, so takes up the three points:—(1) Disloyalty. How long had he been prisoner here? Add to these five days one for the journey, and only six days left of his visit to Jerusalem. Even in those days had not publicly taught or disputed anywhere (ver. 12). How contrary to his usual custom! Yes, but Jews, having hopelessly rejected Christ, were now for a time left to own ways. (2) Schism, i.e., making a sect or following for himself. How does he answer? that he believed in same God, same hope of Messiah, same resurrection as they did; and because believe in law and prophets, has been led to believe in Christ. (3) Sacrilege. What was one object of visit to Jerusalem? (ver. 11.) Besides coming to worship at Feast of Pentecost, came also to bring alms (see 1 Cor. xvi. 1) and offerings such as Moses' law required. Did this look like sacrilege? Then, as cannot prove these things, what does he suggest the elders should do? Did they hear him say anything wrong, unless a hope of the resurrection is an offence?

PRACTICAL LESSONS. Let the children notice, as before, the quiet dignity of St. Paul, as opposed to the noisy blustering of his enemies. What was the secret of it all? (a) Communion with Christ. The midnight visit would be fresh in his thoughts, and uphold him. How fervent his prayers would be after such a revelation! (b) A conscience at rest. (See ver. 16.) Trains himself to keep conscience clear. Had many temptations and trials, but overcame in strength greater than his own.

III. A RESPITE. (Read 22—27.) What did Felix determine? But Lysias never did come. What might he be afraid of? (xxii. 29.) So kept him in custody: for how long? (ver. 27.) Picture the apostle now in detention, probably in some private house, in charge of a centurion; friends allowed to visit and minister to his wants. Is there any change in his life? We shall see. One day Felix brings home a new wife; who is she, and what is her religion? With woman's curiosity, wants to hear the preacher of the new sect; so the prisoner comes in. Does he flatter the governor and his bride? does he plead for himself? No, appeals to their consciences, and warns of judgment. How did Felix take it? what did he say?

PRACTICAL LESSON. The danger of only hearing without acting. We are always hearing about God and Christ from parents, teachers, pastors, &c., in tracts, sermons, classes, &c., often are unpleasant, put away thought; delay. Show awful danger of delay; are nearing pit, being carried down stream, &c., yet delay to lay hold of safety. What is it? No other way — repentance towards God, faith in Jesus Christ. Who will begin to-day?

Questions to be answered.

1. What accusations were made by Tertullus?
2. How were they answered?
3. What was the secret of Paul's quiet calm?
4. When did he and Felix meet again?
5. What did St. Paul preach about there, and with what effect?
6. What does it teach us?

STILL AND DEEP.

BY F. M. F. SKENE, AUTHOR OF "TRIED," "ONE LIFE ONLY," ETC.

CHAPTER XI.

THE ancient cockatoo was undoubtedly very dear to poor Mrs. Parry, as much from the associations connected with him as from his private virtues; but she turned a deaf ear to all his grumbling statements, that "cockie" did not approve of railway travelling, in order that she might bestow her entire attention on Mary Trevelyan, to whom all her warmest affections had long since been given.

The gleam of brightness which Bertrand's question as to the white rose had called forth soon passed from Mary's sweet face when she found herself being borne away from him to enter on her new strange life, knowing that even her kind old nurse would, in a very few hours, disappear altogether from her sight. There were two stout gentlemen at the other end of the carriage, one of whom was intent over a Conservative newspaper, and the other equally engrossed by a well-known organ of Liberal opinions, of which fact they had mutually become aware when, having entered the train as strangers to each other, they took a general survey of their position. The result was that they made no attempt at conversation, but simply glared upon one another when the process of turning the pages brought them face to face. Their presence, however, prevented the other occupants of the carriage from talking otherwise than in whispers, which was not of much avail in the rattling noise of the train, so after nurse Parry had assured her darling again and again that she should not submit to be parted from her long, and that if the Wyndhams were not kind to her she was "to come right away off to her old nurse that minute," they gradually subsided into silence, and Mary lay back with a passive sense of being borne away into unknown regions by that power of destiny which we are so utterly helpless to resist.

It was a long, somewhat tiresome journey, which had but one moment of painful excitement, when they reached the point where Mrs. Parry was to leave her in order to return on the route to London. Bertrand had discovered, by a skilful study of Bradshaw, that it would save the good woman many hours' travelling if she left Mary at the station immediately preceding that nearest to Chiverley itself; even Mrs. Parry was obliged to confess that no harm was likely to happen to her charge in the short interval between the two stations, so she reluctantly consented to leave her at the first, and it was, perhaps, fortunate for them both that the time allowed for the stoppage of the train barely sufficed to land Mrs. Parry and the cockatoo and the multifarious packages in safety on the platform, so that one hurried embrace was all that could pass between her and her "precious treasure," as she called her nursling, in that last sad moment. Another instant, and Mary was speeding on alone, cut off finally, for the time at least, from all associations with the happy life of her youth. It was evening, but still daylight, when at last the train drew up at the little country station to which she was bound. It was a mere wooden shed, guarded by a single porter, and with a rustic gate leading out into what appeared to be a purely rural district. Mary looked round anxiously when she stepped from the carriage, having heard from Mr. Wyndham that she would be met at this point, although she did not know by whom.

One individual only was on the platform besides the solitary porter, this was a tall grey-haired man in the dress of a clergyman, who stooped very much, and had a careworn subdued expression of face, which did not light up into the smallest animation as the train came in. He moved with a slow languid step towards Mary, who was the only passenger that alighted at the little desolate place, and, lifting his hat, said, "Miss Trevelyan, no doubt. I am Mr. Wyndham."

"It is very kind of you to have come to meet me," she said.

"I have brought the basket-carriage to take you to Chiverley," he answered, in the same slow indifferent manner. "There is no other conveyance that could have taken you. I suppose you have luggage; it must be left to come by the carrier's cart," and he moved away to make arrangements with the porter, who was hastily disinterring Mary's boxes from the heap of luggage in the van in order to let the impatient guard carry on the train. While Mr. Wyndham was absent on this mission, Mary moved towards the little gate, through which egress was given to the road, and suddenly stopped, struck more than she had ever been in her life before by the appearance of a figure which suddenly presented itself before her eyes. An old shabby basket-carriage was standing near the gate, with a depressed-looking pony harnessed to it, and standing by the animal, with one hand on his shaggy mane, was the most beautiful young woman she had ever beheld. We have used the term beautiful, because the impression of beauty was distinctly that which was conveyed by the whole aspect of the singularly attractive person on whom Mary Trevelyan's eyes had now fallen for the first time in her life, but it would have been hard to have said in what the fascination of the bright piquant face consisted. It was evident that she was not in her first youth by any means. She had all the appearance of being seven or eight-and-twenty, and from the lightness and grace of her figure she probably looked younger than she really was; her features were not symmetrical, nor were her eyes remarkably large, but they were almost startling in their singular brightness, and full of a vivid light which seemed to flash from them whenever they moved. They had the power of giving intensity and meaning to their expression which, as Mary came to know later, never failed of its effect on those towards whom they were turned. Her complexion was dazzlingly fair, contrasting strongly with the lovely rose-tint on her cheek. Her hair, which was all drawn back from her face and left to fall in waving masses from the band of blue ribbon by which it was loosely tied together, was distinctly blonde, but with all sorts of capricious shades of gold and bronze running through it to give it colour and warmth, and there was a witchery impossible to describe in the curve of her softly smiling lips, in the gleam of her brightly glancing eyes, and the play of expression on her mobile face. She was not tall, but perfectly proportioned, with the daintiest little hands and feet and a lithe pliant figure, which looked peculiarly slight and delicate from the airy grace of her movements. She wore a hat coquettishly looped up on one side so as to display the exquisite contour of her cheek and the rings of burnished gold, into which the unrestrained naturally curling hair had formed itself round her slender throat; her short summer dress, freely displaying the miniature boots she wore on her pretty feet, was made of simple materials, but with such admirable taste that it enhanced in no small degree the singular attractiveness of her appearance. If she had been painted on an artist's canvas as she appeared before Mary at that moment, with every line faithfully rendered, it is probable that any one seeing the picture would have said there was nothing in her actual face or form to warrant the statement which, however, might be made with perfect truth, that she was one of the most fascinating-looking women it is possible to conceive; but no man ever met Laura Wyndham's speaking gaze, and saw the flash of her smile light up her bewitching face without being subjugated more or less by the charm she possessed, and which could not be described even by those who felt it.

For at least five minutes, while Mr. Wyndham was wearily instructing the porter what to do with the luggage, Mary Trevelyan stood and looked at this strangely beautiful vision in a sort of bewildered admiration, and it was not till the clergyman's slow approach roused her from her reverie, that she perceived how completely she herself had been scanned from head to foot by the far keener scrutiny of the bright piercing eyes that darted their glances full on her face.

The porter now came up and took her ticket—a duty which he was very seldom called upon to perform at this retired station, and then Mr. Wyndham held the gate open for her, and she passed through towards the carriage.

(Drawn by W. SMALL.)

"'My daughter!' he continued, waving his hand towards the pretty figure at the pony's head."—p. 442.

"My daughter," he continued, waving his hand towards the pretty figure at the pony's head, and, with a light rapid step, Laura Wyndham came towards her, and held out her hand.

"I am very glad to see you, Miss Trevelyan; but it is hardly possible, for your own sake, to bid you welcome to Chiverley, considering what a doleful place it is."

Mr. Wyndham cast a deprecating glance at his daughter; but meeting the full gaze of her bright eyes in return, he apparently checked some expostulation he was about to utter, and turning to Mary he helped her into the little carriage, while Laura sprang lightly as a bird on to the step, and poised herself on a little seat at the back.

"I am afraid I have taken your place," said Mary, with her gentle courtesy. "I am so sorry; you will not be comfortable there."

"Oh dear yes! This elegant wooden seat is intended for the use of a foot-boy; but we do not possess so magnificent an appendage, therefore I may as well profit by the luxuries provided for him, and it has the advantage of enabling me to keep the station in sight as long as possible, which is decidedly desirable, as it is the only token we have that we are living in a peopled country at all."

Her light scoffing tone was very foreign to Mary's natural disposition, yet she was conscious that there was a certain charm in the outspoken recklessness of Laura's manner. They had started by this time, the pony going at a slow jog-trot, flinging his head from side to side all the way, as if he too were perfectly reckless and indifferent to all the vicissitudes of life. Mr. Wyndham held the reins, and gave them an occasional shake, of which the pony took not the slightest notice, while he himself sat silent, in a stooping posture, with his head bent down; once he seemed to make an effort to be polite, and, pointing to a little hamlet further on, through which the road would apparently lead them, told Mary it was Chiverley village.

"You have a population then," she said, with a smile, to Laura, who returned the glance, saying, "Yes, a population of aborigines, who might very well rank with the ancestral gorillas, from whom they are clearly descended."

"Laura, my dear," said Mr. Wyndham, timidly, "I fear you will prejudice Miss Trevelyan against Chiverley before she has even seen it."

"Perhaps you will try, then, whether your own private views respecting your cure of souls will prove more enlivening," said Laura, and, composedly turning her back on her father, she appeared to ignore his existence for the remainder of the drive.

"My daughter finds Chiverley very dull," said Mr. Wyndham, in a depressed tone, "and I am afraid you may feel the same, Miss Trevelyan."

"I like living in the country," she answered, "I have always been accustomed to it;" and very little more was said while they drove on through a tract of country which seemed certainly rather bleak and deserted, till they reached the village. It consisted of two or three rows of dilapidated-looking cottages, with untidy children, miserably clad, playing round the doors; there was no sign of church or schoolhouse in it. A sharp turn up a steep lane led them to a gate, leading into grounds that would have been pretty, shaded as they were by fine old trees, if they had not been in a state of complete neglect, and at a little distance within them, on a height, stood a substantial stone house, which Mr. Wyndham informed Mary was Chiverley Rectory, and her future home.

CHAPTER XII.

It was almost dark by the time Mr. Wyndham's pony-carriage stopped at the door of Chiverley Rectory, and the lamps were lit in the little hall and in the sitting-room, of which the door stood wide open. Laura Wyndham jumped down unaided, before her father had assisted Mary to alight, and, entering the house with her light quick step, she bounded away up the stairs, as if she had no concern whatever with the new guest or with the arrangements of any person but herself. Mr. Wyndham left the depressed pony standing unguarded at the door, while he led Mary into a small shabbily-furnished drawing-room, where an indolent-looking elderly lady was reclining in an easy chair, and introduced her as Mrs. Wyndham. She was not an attractive person certainly, either in appearance or manners, with heavy eyes and a faded meaningless face, which was only redeemed from being really unpleasant by its look of easy good-humour. She was carelessly and badly dressed, but she looked like a lady, and, having slowly reared herself out of her chair to greet Miss Trevelyan and asked her to sit down, she let herself sink back into it again, as if the exertion had been too much for her. A small table stood by her side, on which was a cup of tea and a plate of eatables of some kind, the consumption of which she resumed while she carelessly asked Mary a few questions as to her journey.

"I thought you would have waited tea for Miss Trevelyan, my dear," said Mr. Wyndham, uneasily.

"So I did," she answered; "do you not see it ready on the table there, and I told the young men they need not come in for it till nine o'clock, but I could not wait myself, that was quite impossible—where is Laura?" she continued, calling out to Mr. Wyndham as he was turning to leave the room with the air of a man who had accomplished an oppressive duty.

"Gone up-stairs I believe."

"Well, I do think she might have waited to take Miss Trevelyan to her room; but it is always the way, she pleased herself of course. Call Sally as you pass the kitchen stair, Mr. Wyndham; she must do it." He went out meekly to execute the order, and Mrs. Wyndham occupied herself with her tea till a red-cheeked country girl appeared, whom she desired to conduct the lady to her room.

"You will find tea ready when you have changed your dress," she added to Mary, and the visitor, feeling somewhat disconsolate at her reception, followed the servant along the passage and up the stairs to a small plainly-furnished bed-room, where her boxes had already been deposited. Her first impulse was to walk to the window, and she saw that it presented a wide landscape of moorland and hill, over which her thoughts flew fast to the distant train that was even then bearing her one love down to Dover, from whence he would soon place the sea between herself and him. A choking sensation in her throat warned her that she must not indulge in these reflections now if she wished to meet her new friends cheerfully, and, with the quiet strength which was one of her chief characteristics, she drove back all sad recollections or forebodings, and prepared to join the family of which she was to form a part henceforward.

No one came to conduct her down, and she made her way by herself to the sitting-room, in the course of a few minutes. She found the whole party assembled; Mrs. Wyndham retained her former place, and having finished her own meal, she sat, with half-shut eyes, watching the rest of the family engaged on theirs. Laura was placed at the head of the table pouring out the tea, and now that she had removed her hat, and the lamp-light fell on her bright animated face and the pretty disorder of her fair curling hair, she looked certainly one of the most charming visions it was possible to conceive. She seemed in gay spirits, talking in a caressing melodious tone to two young men who sat on each side of her, and darting the eloquent glances of her sparkling eyes from the one to the other with apparently very impartial coquetry.

Mr. Wyndham was seated at the other end of the table, taking his tea with as melancholy an air as if it were the last meal before his execution; but he rose to place a chair for Mary as she came in, and named the two young men to her as his pupils and the inmates of his house—Charles Davenant and John Pemberton.

The first-named seemed about one-and-twenty, rather under-sized, but with a well-knit, vigorous frame—a round good-humoured face, merry hazel eyes, and hair of a sufficiently ruddy tint to be called red by his enemies, if he had any, which seemed extremely unlikely. The other was a complete contrast to him, very tall and strongly-built, with a somewhat ungainly figure, large features, very black hair, which hung down over his low broad forehead, and bushy eyebrows, from under which his dark eyes looked out with somewhat of the wistful gaze we see in those of a Newfoundland dog; he was evidently at least two or three years older than his companion.

Mary Trevelyan became conscious, as she took her place quietly at the table, that she was the object of very keen scrutiny on the part of Mr. Davenant, who looked long at her sweet white face and deep grey eyes, with a gaze which was certainly not one of disapproval; but John Pemberton never so much as glanced towards her. With his whole soul in his eyes, he was entirely absorbed in watching Laura, whose every movement he followed with the same sort of adoring gaze with which the fire-worshipper traces the dazzling course of the sun through the Eastern heavens. Laura continued her conversation with them both so soon as the new-comer was seated, and supplied with tea; but it was with no small astonishment that Mary heard the familiar and endearing terms in which she addressed the young men, "dear Charlie" and "dearest John" being introduced into every sentence she spoke. Laura instantly detected Miss Trevelyan's look of surprise, and replied to it just as composedly as if her guest had spoken aloud.

"I am Charlie and John's adopted sister, Miss Trevelyan, and of course I treat them in every respect as my brothers."

"Yes, there are all sorts of curious relationships amongst us here, which it will take you some time to understand," said Charlie, looking across the table to Mary with a comical smile.

"Don't be mischievous, sir," said Laura, flashing round her brilliant eyes upon him. "Come, you have to tell me all you have been doing to-day while our miserable pony was dragging us at a snail's pace to and from the station."

"Where I suppose you dazzled that unfortunate porter into complete oblivion of his duties. The man always seems in a perfect maze when you are there; he watches you flitting about the platform as if you were some wonderful bird with beautiful plumage, who is just going to take wings and fly away. You will cause an accident to the train some of these days, Lurline, and then you will have men's lives as well as their souls to answer for."

"You don't know what you are saying, Charlie," said Laura, but without a shade of annoyance in her voice; and Pemberton broke in hastily, "You wished to know where we had been; we went to get those ferns from the other side of the river which you said you wished for."

"Yes, a six miles walk, and a bog at the end of it, in which John went up to his waist that he might reach a particular plant he thought you would fancy," said Charlie. "Oh, and by the way, Lurline, we came across a curious instance of that very dominion of yours over the souls of men of which I have been speaking. You must know," he continued, courteously addressing Mary, "that Laura has a passion for flowers, and as it is not possible to obtain any new plants in these parts, except by begging and stealing, she goes into every cottage where she sees a scarlet geranium or a fuchsia, and so sweetly admires it and laments the impoverished state of the rectory garden, that she invariably comes away with the plant, eagerly bestowed as a gift by the charmed natives."

"It is a very good plan," said Laura, composedly; "but what is the instance you spoke of, Charlie?"

"You know that sulky old curmudgeon, Stephen Howlett, who lives in a lonely hut over the river?"

"Oh yes! and he actually has a red camellia which his son brought him as a present before he started on his last voyage, and the old monster will not give it to me."

"But he will," said Charlie, laughing; "that is just the point. He called us as we were passing at some distance, and told us that 'he had been worrited nohow' ever since Miss Lorelei had been there, because he had refused his plant to her. 'I never thought to part with it,' he said; 'but, pretty dear, her can have it, and you had best make off with it, young gentlemen, for fears I changes my mind.'"

"Oh, that is charming!" exclaimed Laura; "I am so glad!"

"Surely you will not take it!" said Mary, with a tone of surprise in her low voice.

"Why not? It will be better seen in our greenhouse than in Stephen's hut."

"It is in the hall," said Pemberton, quietly.

"Yes," said Charlie; "John actually carried it home all the way this hot day, hugging it to his bosom affectionately, as if it had been a baby."

"Dearest John, how sweet of you!" said Laura, with a winning smile, which made the honest fellow quiver with delight.

"Surely you have finished your tea, good people!" said Mrs. Wyndham, with a yawn. "I am tired to death; and I am sure that Mary must be the same; do let us have prayers and get to bed."

Laura shrugged her shoulders. "To bed at ten! primitive simplicity, indeed!" she said.

But Mrs. Wyndham had already rung the bell, and the servants came in—Sally and another country girl of the same type, followed by an awkward slouching youth, who acted as groom and gardener, and who, with the two women, constituted the whole establishment. They trooped out again as soon as their master had read a few prayers in a monotonous tone of voice, and then the family dispersed to bed.

When Mary went to bid her hostess good-night, Mrs. Wyndham looked for a few minutes kindly into the gentle face, and passed her hand over the sleeve of Mary's black dress, with an evident recollection of the cause of her deep mourning.

"I hope you will be happy here, my dear," she said; "but you must manage to find your own amusements and occupations; I am too much out of health to exert myself in any way, and my stepdaughter is always absorbed in her own concerns; if it suits her own self to make a friend of you she will, but not otherwise."

It was not a very cheering prospect, Mary thought, as she went up-stairs, but it did not trouble her, for her whole heart was so exclusively given up to one affection, that it made very little difference to her where she was or how she was treated, so long as she dwelt where the sound of Bertrand's voice could not reach her ear, nor the smile of his blue eyes make sunshine on her path. It was a warm summer night; she sat down by the open window, because she always felt nearer to her one love when she could look out to the skies that were arching over his head as well as her own; and she had just begun to comb out the long waving masses of her dusky hair, when there came a sharp quick knock at the door, followed at once by the entrance of Laura Wyndham, who took a chair, set it down opposite to Mary, and, planting her dainty little slippered feet on a stool, said, "I have come to talk to you; of course you do not want to go to bed yet."

(To be continued.)

CHRISTIAN TOLERANCE.

"For he that is not against us is on our part."—St. Mark ix. 40.
"He that is not with me is against me."—St. Matt. xii. 30.

THESE two verses express the tolerance and the intolerance of the Gospel of Jesus Christ. According to the first, we should justly consider Christianity to be a tolerant religion; and many admirers of excessive toleration have based their arguments in favour of such upon these striking words. "He that is not against us is on our part," they say, clearly indicates that active zeal is not necessary in order that we should show ourselves to be on Christ's side; that He himself admits that we are His supporters if only we are not engaged in active hostility against His cause. On the other hand, those who could tolerate no opinion or system of religious thought different from their own, found in Christ's statement, "He that is not with me is against me," an argument in support of their own intolerance. Thus it is that two extremely opposite views of the tolerative spirit of Christianity have found apparently opposite declarations to support them. I believe that every earnest student of Scripture must feel that the only satisfactory method of really arriving at the meaning of any part of our Lord's teaching, is to put ourselves as far as possible into the position of those to whom the words were addressed. However our Lord's teaching was intended, as undoubtedly it was, for the permanent enlightenment and instruction of the Church, we may be confident that its primary object was to instruct, in clear and simple language, those whom he addressed upon topics of which they as yet knew absolutely nothing.

Let us, therefore, set ourselves to examine under what circumstances Christ made the two apparently dissimilar statements which I have proposed for our consideration in this paper. I commence with that which expresses the intolerance of the religion of Christ—"He that is not with me is against me." Jesus of Nazareth had just performed a splendid miracle: a man who was at once both blind and dumb had suddenly the power given him to see and speak. Performed within sight of a crowd, the object of the miraculous cure living, there to be questioned by any who chose to interrogate Him, there was no gainsaying the fact. The only chance left to His enemies, therefore, was to explain it away. They must admit the cure, but the motive power which accomplished it they might be able to impugn. Thus they sought to persuade the people that Christ had cast out devils by the aid of Beelzebub, the chief of devils. To this Christ replies, "How can such a thing be? It is a contradiction in terms. Can Satan cast out Satan?" And then, having put them to shameful silence, He utters the great moral truth, "He that is not with me is against me." What those words meant then, and what, therefore, those words must mean now, I think there can be, when viewed in the light of surrounding circumstances, but little difficulty in understanding. They declare that in the kingdom of Christ there can be no neutrality, no half-heartedness, no innocent indifference. There are but two kingdoms—Christ's and Satan's—and if you belong not to the one, you must by necessity be a member of the other. Some people think that you may be inwardly indifferent to Christ, and so as you do not express that indifference in any overt act of opposition, you cannot be said to be against Christ. But let us remember that the only difference between an inward passive opposition and an outward active opposition is that the one is visible to man and the other is concealed. Therefore, when we come to deal with a matter in which God is concerned, this difference at once ceases, as the thought of the heart is as known to Him as the act of the life, and so the two becomes identical. Besides, let us refine and explain the matter away as you will, it is almost impossible for man to be really indifferent in regard to any matter. Man is not made to be indifferent. Everything which a man sees or hears must excite some kind of sentiment in him. Now, above and beyond all other objects, religion of any kind is calculated to excite some kind of emotion and sentiment in man, and it must be one of adhesion or opposition. The absence of the one implies the existence of the other. This, then, is the intolerance of the Gospel; it will accept no divided allegiance; it will allow no Laodicea where the lukewarm for Christ or Satan, for truth or falsehood, may abide in safety.

If, then, we look around us at the world and the Church of Christ, and look within us at our own lives, in public and in private, and examine the impulses and feelings of our own hearts, shall we not find many a man on whose lips there is the word of adoration and of praise, and who may be the enemy of Christ after all? There are few, indeed, who would be willing to confess themselves against Christ, but He tells us himself that all are against Him who are not acting earnestly, perseveringly, and lovingly for him. From this, which some seem to think a harsh intolerant view of Christ's religion, many turn aside to obtain some consolation from the more tolerant aspect of Christianity presented in the other passage which we have placed at the head of this paper. Here, it is thought, is some palliation and encouragement, inasmuch as those who are not against Christ are admitted by Him to be on His part. Judging from the immediate circumstances in connection with which these words were spoken, can we for a moment suppose them at all capable of such an interpretation as is often put upon them now? The circumstances were these: The disciples had come across some man who was casting out devils by the power of the name of Jesus. He was not one of the disciples regularly in attendance on our Lord, and consequently these disciples were indignant that any other than one of themselves should perform miracles or wonders in the name of Jesus. They therefore rebuked him for his presumption. They found fault with and silenced one who was doing good works in the name of Jesus. Self-confident in having done well, they make no secret of the matter. They go to their master, and boast of their zeal for His cause: "Master, we saw one casting out devils in thy name, and he followeth not us, and we forbade him because he followeth not us." These men knew nothing of the tolerance of Christianity, so their Lord had to explain it to them. "He that is not against me is on our part."

Now let us at the outset observe that there is nothing said here about being for or against Christ

Himself; it is all in the plural us. It refers to the corporate body—the Church of Christ, composed then of disciples, consisting now of the faithful in Christ Jesus wherever they are found. Here was a man doing works of great mercy, performing those blessed deeds in the name of Jesus alone, a true disciple of Christ, but doing good after his own fashion. The intolerant spirit in the disciples cannot brook this. It is particularly to be noticed what a strange complaint they made to Christ. "He was casting out devils indeed in Thy name, but (observe his terrible sin) he followeth not us." There was more zeal there for the dignity of their own position than for the honour of their Master. The Christ who will admit no toleration of lukewarmness as regards devotion to Himself, will, on the other hand, allow no intolerance on the part of some who bear His name towards others who bear it likewise. The charge the disciples brought against this worker in Jesus' name was, after all, to his honour, for what was the previous history of the disciples themselves, as contained in this very chapter? What would this man have been doing if he had been following with them instead of doing deeds of mercy in Jesus' name? They had been up on the top of Tabor; Christ had been transfigured before three of them; the body of His humanity had been lit up with a sudden burst of heavenly glory; the two departed heroes, Moses and Elias, representatives of the law and the prophets of the old dispensation, had appeared in glory conversing with the Son of God! Must not such a scene have called back to them all that was splendid in the history of the past, and all that was great in the promise of the future? Must not something of the glory of that scene have remained in their hearts, as the gold lingers upon the cloud after the sun has passed below, and stirred their souls with a wild enthusiasm for their Master? Fresh from such an ordination as that, one would have thought they might have absolved a world from its suffering, but their very first effort, owing to their want of faith, is a failure. They seek to cast out a devil, and they cannot; and when the father brings forward the dumb child, and tells Jesus how His disciples had failed to cast it out, as it were wearied with their want of spirituality and faith, He says, "O faithless generation, how long shall I be with you? how long shall I suffer you?" And then, with Jesus, they set out upon a journey to Capernaum, and what is the conversation with which men, fresh from such a scene of splendour and from a rebuke so full of indignation and love, beguile the tedium of the way? A dispute as to which of them should be greatest! And Christ has to tell them that he who is most a servant, he who does most work for Christ and for His poor lowly ones, he alone shall be greatest. Fresh from such scenes and such teachings, these men come upon one working for Christ. He was doing what they had failed to do; he was, indeed, not following with them; he had no share in the failure to exorcise the dumb spirit; he had taken no part in the discussion as to who should be greatest; he had received no rebuke from the great Master's lips. Does it not strike us now what spirit it was that made the objection, and what it was that our Lord rebuked by His answer? The need for teaching such tolerance has not yet passed away, any more than the necessity for reiterating the other statement as regards the intolerance of the Gospel of Christ. There is a deal of spurious toleration and of unchristian intolerance in the present day. Men are extremely tolerant just where Christ would not be tolerant, and they are extremely intolerant where He would have them exercise the widest and largest toleration possible. There is a man, for instance, who, in the name of Jesus, has cast out of himself the devils of lust and pride, and who, by the same name, is seeking to cast these demons out of others. He is a peculiar man; he has certain oddities; he goes awkwardly through society; he is rather wild and extravagant in his religious belief; he is an extreme man, and to polite refined society extreme men are most objectionable. For such a man there is no toleration. He is in the wrong in many instances, no doubt, but his chiefest crime is his following not us. Therefore, for such a one some of us have no toleration to spare. Is not that the way too often with Christians, and is it not only a repetition of the old error for which the disciples were rebuked? Or, there is another man who differs very widely from some others in his religious opinions. Those others, perhaps, hold their religious opinions for no better reason than simply they happen to have been taught them when young. They hold them carelessly, faithlessly, coldly. And yet that man, in Christ's name, has cast out of himself all the prejudices and formalities with which he was imbued, and through toil and suffering has struggled towards the light, and striven, with every effort of his heart and soul, to find out the truth, at any painful cost, of dissevering old associations or renouncing old opinions, and drifting even for a while upon the bleak waves of doubt, the mad storm howling through the rigging, his sails and cordage torn, and no gleam of light to tell him he is nearing that towards which he struggles with such pain and sorrow and toil. For such a one too many Christians have no tolerance at all. Yet, depend upon it, it is for just such a one our Master would have had the largest, most loving, most patient toleration possible. Such may, indeed, not win the approbation of the baffled and rebuked disciple, but if only his work, of whatever kind it is, be done in Christ's name and strength, and for Christ's honour and God's glory, it shall have the generous approval of the Lord. The great thing to make sure of is that we are ourselves following Christ. We may be of the company of the disciples, and yet spend our time in vain disputes regarding superiority, and be unable to cast out a single evil spirit that has laid hold of us. We may be following with the disciples, and yet all the while keeping the bag, and ready to barter Christ for thirty pieces of the silver it contains. What we want is not to be only with the disciples, but with Christ Himself.

The one thing which is to make us tolerant of others' opinions or practices is, if they are in sincerity and truth following Christ, working miracles of truth and love in His name, following Him after their own fashion, roughly, ruggedly, but yet following Him. That is to secure our tolerance. And, before concluding this brief paper, let us ask, so that there be no mistake, what is this following with Christ? We may follow Him by tolerating not even for a moment anything which is against Him, and reserving all our toleration for whatever is done in the Master's name and done for the Master's sake. Should it not be the earnest desire of our lives to strive not to be against Him who has done so much for us? Is there nothing in the memory of His life to stir us to energy? Does our hearts not kindle with an enthusiasm not of this world at the thought of following with Christ? or do we seem to be ashamed either of the leader or of the cause? I have seen the old soldier's withered cheek glow with a flush of rekindled life as he tells how he followed some great leader to victory. The Frenchman's failing eye lights up with a noble pride as he recounts how he went with the Corsican through the carnage and the roar of battle. And shall not Christian men and women feel their hearts throb with a prouder enthusiasm and their eye kindle with a brighter glory as they recall the bloodless victories won as they followed the red-cross banner of their Lord? In the whole range of human thought there is no more solemn truth than this—"He who is not with me is against me."

BRAVEST OF ALL.

A STORY FOR BOYS. IN THREE PARTS.

PART I.

OUTSIDE the gates of the old collegiate school of Winchbrook stood some ten or twelve boys who had just left their desks, and who were all eager to spend the remainder of their Saturday half-holiday to the best possible advantage without more delay than was positively necessary.

The afternoon was clear, cold, and sunny—just sufficiently crisp with the frost of January to make exercise not only a pleasure, but a delight to any healthy boy who had been hard at work over his books all the morning.

"Come round to the mill-pond!" exclaimed David Maxwell, with his usual burst of enthusiasm whenever a new thought entered his busy brain. "I think it is frozen pretty thickly, and if so, we might have a slide. Suppose we leave our books with old Gates at the lodge, and call for them as we come back?" and he looked inquiringly about him as he spoke, to see how his proposition was received.

Even if there was nothing in the prospect of visiting the mill-pond to captivate the boys, they would have felt almost compelled to follow David Maxwell, because, when he set his heart on doing a thing, he never rested until it was accomplished, and he threw so much energy into his pleasures, that he was generally the first to propose and the first to execute any game that was on foot.

Most of the boys assented, but two or three hung back irresolutely.

"Come along! it will not be wasting time, even if we do nothing when we get there," said one, and the majority were moving in the direction of the gate lodge, where they purposed leaving their books, when David Maxwell turned sharply round to the only dissentient, and said, "Are you going home, Nicholson?" His voice expressed disappointment and surprise, and the lad addressed as Nicholson grew crimson, as he replied, "Yes, I must go home."

"Are you afraid to go on the ice?"

"No, but I promised to get home as quickly after school as possible."

"That need not prevent your coming with us; you will still be going towards home. The longest way round is the shortest way home, you know. There will be no need for you to stop longer than you like; you needn't stop at all for that matter—only do come round with us!"

"I must not go, David," answered Bob Nicholson, with such evident embarrassment of manner, that David Maxwell put his own construction on the refusal, and said, with some annoyance, "Please yourself! I believe, if the truth was known, you're afraid to come, though," and David turned away with a gesture of contempt for any one not joining the expedition to the mill-pond.

Bob Nicholson tried to utter some words, as he stood looking at the group of boys who were clustering round the lodge, delivering up their books, but there was a sudden rising of grief and anger in his heart, which made it impossible for him to give utterance to the thoughts in his mind. No boy of fourteen, who possesses the least sense of self-respect, likes to be thought a coward, and Bob Nicholson felt keenly the hasty remark of his companion, whose good opinion he esteemed, as did most of the scholars.

For a moment he was tempted to follow his companions, and prove, by his deeds, that he could be as brave as the best of them, but, even whilst he hesitated, a bright look came into his eyes, and saying to himself, "Never mind; let him think what he pleases!" he walked slowly, and almost sadly, down the road which led to his home.

As he came to a bend of the road he turned round to catch a last glimpse of his friends, but they had all disappeared, and he was left to his own reflections on the unfairness of being thought a coward because he was doing what he had promised to do, and what he knew was right to be done.

Then, as if a sudden thought came into his mind, he set off at full speed, and with the swiftness of a deer, ran until he reached his father's house, which was an old-fashioned square dwelling, standing in a tolerably large garden. To open the gate, and dash up the path was the work of a few seconds, but when he got as far as the hall-door he paused, and his manner became strangely subdued.

He knocked very gently, and, the door being opened, he walked on tip-toe into the hall and up the stairs. Without pausing, he went into a room which had the blinds drawn down to keep the strong sunlight out, and where stood two beds at opposite ends of the room. One bed was his own, and was of course empty now; but the other belonged to one who was very dear to him, and it was occupied at present.

Bob went over very softly, and stooped down to look at the white face which lay upon the pillow, motionless and sad. He had often looked at it of late, and always with a dread at his heart that the day might soon come when, to his softly-whispered inquiries there would be no response. His voice now was gentle and low, as he said, "I've come back to you, Ned."

The sufferer turned himself wearily round towards the light, and looked up at Bob with a faint smile of pleasure. "I knew you would not be late, Bob; I've been expecting you ever so long!" he said, as he put out a thin white hand over the coverlet to touch his brother's. There was a strong contrast between the strong brown hand of the elder brother and the delicate wasted hand of the invalid, and Bob seemed to feel the great difference as he took the outstretched hand in his, patting it gently the while with the other.

"Is it a fine day, Bob?" asked the little sufferer.

"It's a glorious day! David Maxwell and most of the other boys have gone round to the mill-pond in hope of having a slide."

"I thought it must be freezing, I feel so cold here," sighed Ned, as he closed his eyes wearily, for the changes of weather were only noticed with pleasure when they brought ease to his aching body or warmth to his chill blood.

A bright fire was burning in the room, and Mrs. Nicholson was sitting by it knitting. She noticed the tone in which Bob spoke of the party that had gone to the mill-pond, and she said, "I want you to call at Doctor Bolton's for some medicine for Ned; perhaps you could do that and visit the mill-pond as well, Robert."

A bright look of pleasure beamed in Bob's face as he said, "I think I might do that. Ned wouldn't mind my being away for a couple of hours—would you, Ned?"

"No, Bob; but you won't be longer than you can help?"

"I need not go at all if you feel lonely, Ned; the medicine can wait."

"I would rather you went," his brother said, with some anxiety lest Bob should lose the pleasure of the afternoon; and with a promise to be back early Bob left him, creeping out of the house almost noiselessly, and then dashing down the road which led in the direction of the pond, with an eagerness in his flight which told how heartily he enjoyed the prospect of meeting his companions, from whom he had been obliged to part, in order that he might fulfil his promise to the sick lad at home.

"THE QUIVER" BIBLE CLASS.

176. Of what king, only eight years old, is it stated in the Bible "he did that which was evil in the sight of the Lord?"

177. What passage in St. Paul's writings tells us that Timothy was once in prison?

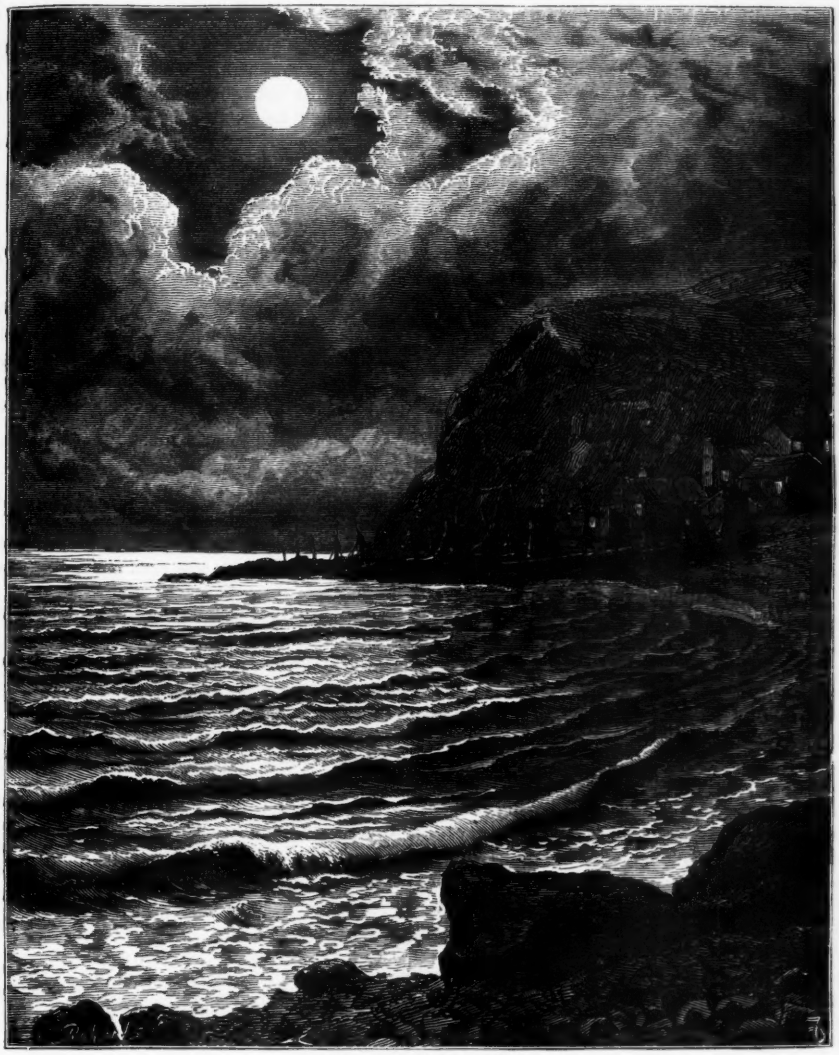
178. By what means did Michal, the daughter of Saul, deceive her father as to the absence of David?

179. Quote a passage which shows that the Oriental manner of washing hands, by pouring water on them, was practised in ancient times.

180. In mentioning the various sins which had brought down God's displeasure upon the Jews, what sin do the prophets and rulers say especially caused this?

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS ON PAGE 416.

163. At Antioch in Pisidia (Acts xiii. 14—51).



164. Nebuzar-adan (Jer. xxxix. 11—14).

165. Agabus (Acts xi. 28).

166. By not being able to pronounce the h in the word "Shibboleth" (Judges xii. 6).

167. "And of the children of Issachar which were men that had understanding of the times, to know what Israel ought to do" (1 Chron. xii. 32).

168. "I will bring him to Babylon to the land of the Chaldeans: yet shall he not see it, though he shall die there" (Ezekiel xiii. 3).

(Drawn by F. CARLESS.)

AT REST.

SWEET is the silent night when day is done;
Sweet is the starlight, sweeter than the sun;
And sweet in death the dreamless slumber deep:
"For so He giveth His beloved sleep."

Our eyes wax weary when the daylight dies;
And sweet is slumber to our weary eyes;
And softly do the shadows round us creep:
"For so He giveth His beloved sleep."

The landscape, lovely with the light of spring,
No blessedness to broken hearts can bring,
In which the anguish only wakes to weep:
Wherefore, "He giveth His beloved sleep."

The vain delight, with canker at the core,
The sharp distress, shall visit them no more;
To joy or grief no more their pulses leap:
"For so He giveth His beloved sleep."

In place of pain He giveth perfect ease;
A restful haven after raging seas,
Where angry waves and winds no longer sweep:
"For so He giveth His beloved sleep."

Sweet is their sleep beneath the summer skies;
Sweet is their sleep when storms of winter rise;
And sweet the watch which guardian angels keep:
"For so He giveth His beloved sleep."

But He who gives them sleep shall give them grace
To rise in rapture and behold His face,
When that last trumpet echoes loud and deep:
Till then, "He giveth His beloved sleep."

J. R. Eastwood.

THE BRIDGE BETWEEN.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE TROUBLES OF CHATTY AND MOLLY," "THE DINGY HOUSE AT KENSINGTON," "QUEEN MADGE," "AGAINST HERSELF," ETC., ETC., ETC.

CHAPTER XIV.—COLONEL WADE'S WILL.

THE next morning Dorothy and Tom and Sally and Will were all sent for. Their grandfather was dying, and wished to see his daughter's children once before he departed. So, with grave face, and soft steps, they crept into his sick-room, and stood around his death-bed, and took their first and last look of the grandfather of whom they had often heard but never seen; and when the evening came, Colonel Wade was dead. Tom and Will and Sally went back to Hampstead, but Dorothy stayed with Netta, who was fretting, and afraid to be alone. It seemed so strange for those sisters, together for the first time in their lives for three consecutive days. Netta made Dorothy wait upon her, and Dorothy, who could not sorrow much for a relative she had only seen once, and was secretly happy in her own life, was only too ready to do her sister's bidding.

"I don't know what I shall do!" sobbed the Beauty. "No one will ever be like grandpapa to me; and now I shall have to come to that shabby house at Hampstead, unless grandpapa has left me some money!"

"But, Netta, surely you are more grieved to lose grandpapa than your home!"

"Yes, of course I am; but I shall so hate always being there; and it will ruin all my prospects, unless I let my friends visit me there, and then I shall be so ashamed!"

"Netta, you ought to be ashamed of yourself!" said Dolly, indignantly. "You ought only to think of grandpapa."

"So I do; but he is dead, and I live after him, and I must think of my life. If he has left me some money, of course it will alter things, then I could go and live somewhere."

"And not come home to us?" Dorothy didn't want her, but she was indignant.

When Colonel Wade's will was opened, it was found that he had left his grandchildren, Robert and Netta Woodward, each £1,000, to his daughter Mrs. Woodward, £2,000 (which no one ever expected) and his household furniture, and the residue of his property to his sons. So the Woodwards were suddenly rich (as it seemed to them), and their shabbiness could vanish for ever.

CHAPTER XV.—A FAMILY FIGHT.

"It has saved us from ruin," Mr. Woodward said, when he heard of his father-in-law's legacy. "The paper was going to the dogs. Now that we can put this money into it it will take out a new lease of life."

"We are not likely to lose it?" his wife asked, anxiously.

"Oh no," he answered hopefully, and so the money was invested. Netta's money was settled so that she could only touch the interest, but Mrs. Woodward had absolute control over hers, and so, as confident in her husband as he was in himself, she placed it all at his disposal.

After the funeral and all the necessary arrangements were over, Dorothy returned to Hampstead again, and Netta with her; for when the Beauty found that her parents' circumstances were improved, and that all the belongings of her old home were to be used in making the shabby house smart, she ceased to demur.

"I shall invite all my friends to come and see me," she said; "and, of course, I shall marry soon; I dare say Sir George Finch would have proposed before this but for poor grandpapa's illness. I shall miss a great deal, of course, and shall have to dress myself, and all that, instead of having a maid."

"Dorothy must wait on you, dear," her mother said; but Dorothy's eyes flashed. She would do anything in reason, she thought, but she did not intend to be her sister's servant.

They hardly knew the old house when it was covered with Colonel Wade's carpets, and decorated with his furniture. It seemed another place altogether, all but the study, and that Mr. Woodward refused to have touched, so the cosy room and the faded chintz were left undisturbed.

"The garden must be done up," said Nettc, "then the place will be much more presentable. I should like all that tall staring grass and rubbish at the end taken away, and the grass plot in the centre might have some more beds about it."

"It will spoil the place. I would not have the underwood cut away for the world!" said Dorothy.

"Your sister knows much better about these things than you do, Dorothy," Mrs. Woodward said, reprovingly.

"But it would never be the same if once a horrid gardener came and fiddled about in it. I should never care about reading there."

"You read too much, Dorothy, and get all sorts of notions into your head; why don't you do something more feminine, some pretty fancy work, for instance?" but the tears were in Dorothy's eyes, and she could not answer. Tom did for her.

"Now you look here, Netta," he said, "if you think you are going to interfere here and make the place hot for Dolly, you'll find out your mistake. You may do fancy work yourself, but she isn't the sort of girl to make holes in a bit of rag and sew away at them, and call it embroidering."

"Much better than reading love-stories, Tom, dear," said the Beauty, in her softest tones; "they only put stupid notions into one's head, and make her think she's in love with Mr. Fuller, or he with her, which is so absurd."

"I believe he is much more in love with Netta," said Mrs. Woodward.

"In love with Netta!" exclaimed Tom, scornfully. "In love with a kangaroo, more likely!" For one minute the colour rushed to the Beauty's face, but she said nothing.

Dorothy carried the day with regard to the garden.

"Your sister may make the house look as gimcracky as she likes," Mr. Woodward said, when she appealed to him, "but she shan't poach on the study or the garden. What has become of Fuller, Dorothy?"

"I suppose he has heard of our trouble, and has not liked to come yet," she answered. "I dare say he will soon."

CHAPTER XVI.—IN THE TWILIGHT.

Mr. Woodward became part proprietor as well as editor, on the strength of the money he invested in the paper. Another servant was added to the establishment at Hampstead, and Netta invited her friends to call, and persuaded her mamma to be at home one day a week, and fixed the dinner-hour at a later and more fashionable one than previously, and tried to polish up the family generally.

"We will have some musical parties in time, and Dorothy might learn to accompany me, or to play one or two nice pieces."

"I hate pieces one has to learn!" said Dorothy, rebellious.

"So do I," said Tom. "I hate people who go twiddle, twiddle, twiddling all over the piano, and making it sound as if it were a monster rattling its teeth."

"Tom!"

"So I do. Just as I hate people who think it so fine to get up to a certain note, and scream then. What is the use of it? It is not pretty, and it is not meritorious—— "

"What is not?" asked Adrian Fuller, suddenly appearing in the doorway.

"Tom is so absurd, Mr. Fuller, and will talk about things he cannot understand. We were saying that some day, when we are happier, you know"—and she glanced down at her black dress and up at him, with a grave expression on her sweet face, for it was very sweet—"we might have some music."

"You were talking of parties," said Tom, bluntly, "only you didn't like to own it so soon after a funeral."

"Tom, you uncouth rascal, when will you learn manners?" asked Mr. Fuller, laughing.

"I thought you were never coming again," Dorothy said, her heart beating, and her voice choked with shyness, for she felt that since that evening before Colonel Wade's death, she and Adrian Fuller had been on a different footing, but he answered quite unconstrainedly, "I did not like to come before, knowing you were in trouble. I have brought you 'Schiller,' Miss Netta."

"What for?" asked Dorothy.

"Why, to read, of course, you silly child."

"Let's come into the garden," said Tom, who seldom spent an evening off the river, and was impatient of any roof but the sky above his head.

"I don't think I can read it," said Netta, turning over the leaves of the book. "I shall want a dictionary."

"Yes, let's go into the garden," assented Dorothy. "Won't you come, Mr. Fuller?" but he was answering Netta.

"I'll bring you a dictionary to-morrow," he said, "and to night you must use me as one. Yes, I'll come, Dorothy. Miss Netta, shall I get you a shawl?"

"No," she answered, gently, "I am not very strong just now. I shall go into the study, and read."

"'Schiller?' Then let me come and be dictionary." She looked up at him for a moment. He was very handsome she thought. She did not wonder Dorothy liked him, and there was something sympathetic in his manner. She wished Sir George Finch had been more like him; and she wondered if she should ever care much for any one. Perhaps circumstances had been a little hard on her. She had been taught to think of herself and care for herself; even her grandfather, who had indulged her in every way, had yet been a selfish man, and unconsciously she knew it, and he had taught her to be selfish too. She had been brought up to think money and position everything, and she did think them everything, and yet for one moment, as she looked up at the artist, she understood her sister Dorothy for the first time in her life. "But it would never do for her to marry into poverty," she thought, "especially if Mr. Blakesley will have her."

"Don't you want to go with the others?" she asked; her voice was low, and graver than usual.

"No," he said.

"Tom, we will go into the garden together." said Dorothy; and she took her brother's hand, and they went out. "I wish I had something to care for very very much," she said, as they went down the pathway—that moss-grown pathway which Netta's influence was never to make neat and tidy. "I don't mean a human being, but something that never changed, and one could be quite certain of, you know."

"Why don't you keep a boat?"

"How can you be so absurd, Tom; I haven't any money."

"I'll treat you."

"Oh no, Tom dear, a girl couldn't keep a boat. She might as well keep a white elephant;" and she laughed, with a touch of the old fun which used to be one of the secrets of her popularity with the boys.

"Then keep a cat or a parrot!" But she was looking back at the house, and saw that Netta and Adrian Fuller had entered the study, and were sitting by the window reading the German poet.

They came sauntering out into the garden an hour later, Netta with a shawl wrapped round her, and speaking in low tones to her companion. Dorothy did not hear what they were saying till they stopped in front of her.

"We are talking about the artist-folk, Dorothy," her sister said. "Why is it, I wonder, that, as a rule, they have such beautiful wives? One seldom sees an artist with an ugly one."

"I can understand it," Adrian Fuller answered. "They have a greater love of beauty than the majority of other men; don't you remember Keats' celebrated line— "'A thing of beauty is a joy for ever?'"

"But human beauty soon fades," Dorothy said, gently. "There are a hundred things that have many summers—the simplest trees live and bloom, and are young with every year that comes; but human beings have only one youth, and then their beauty goes for ever." Netta shivered a little, and turned away with a touch of something vibrating through her that was almost feeling.

"It must be dreadful to outlive one's beauty in the eyes of those we love," she said.

"Love blinds our eyes," he answered; "besides, it is something to create a picture for the memory of others, as beauty does."

"Must your wife be beautiful?" she asked. She drew her shawl round her, and waited for his answer; and Dorothy stood still, her hands folded almost like one waiting to hear her fate.

He looked at the two girls before him for a moment—at Dorothy, with her black dress hard and grim, and her pale face set and grave, and at Netta, with the white clinging drapery she loved hiding her sombre attire, and twisted round about her graceful figure, and with the golden brown hair forming something that looked in the dim light almost like a halo round her shapely head.

"Yes," he answered, "above all things she must be beautiful!" (To be continued.)

THE SEVEN LAST WORDS OF THE LORD JESUS.

BY THE REV. T. M. MORRIS, IPSWICH.

VI.—THE WORD OF VICTORY.

"When Jesus therefore had received the vinegar, he said, It is finished."—St. John xix. 30.

WE have now come to the consideration of the sixth word uttered by Christ from the cross—the word of victory—of all single words ever spoken the most significant. These three last utterances seemed to have followed one another in swift succession. We remarked, in respect of the previous word spoken by Christ, that it was not to be regarded as an indication of any new heightening of His agony, but rather as a proof that the worst had been endured, and that, as triumphant, he was just entering upon the festal rest of victory.

Here we have the word that announces victory—a word declarative not of the mere fact of termination, but of completion—perfection. All that Christ came to do and to suffer, has been done and endured—suffering, life, work—all is finished. The work which had been given Him to do, and to the doing of which he makes such frequent reference, is now brought to a conclusion. The full meaning of this word, "It is finished," we cannot fathom; eternity itself will be required to unfold its significance. It declares that all things were actually or potentially accomplished. Christ, the great Captain of our salvation, feels that He has now gloriously triumphed over all His foes and ours, and has wrought deliverance for His people. He reviews His life, and compares it with all that had been spoken concerning it; the life is complete, answering perfectly to the will of God and the predictions of His prophets; it is the one perfect finished life which has been lived in this world. Hanging there upon the tree, about to pour out His soul unto death, to commit His spirit to the hands of His Heavenly Father, all the sufferings of life, now culminating in a cruel and shameful death, pass before Him; and, as he reviews the course which He has pursued from the stable of Bethlehem to the cross of Calvary, He can think of no humiliation to which He has not been ready to submit, no suffering which He has not been ready to endure, in doing that work which He came to accomplish. The waves and the billows have rolled over Him, and that bitter cup which had been given Him to drink is drained to the very dregs. All is finished—He can think of nothing more to be done or endured. And the work itself that He came to perform presents itself to the view of the dying Saviour as a finished work—the head of the great adversary is crushed; the power of hell is broken; the law is magnified and made honourable; the claims of justice are satisfied; the gates of the kingdom of heaven are thrown open; the sacrifice is offered, the atonement is made; the conflicting claims of justice and mercy are harmonised; and God can declare His righteousness in the very act of forgiveness. Of this work, on which all our hopes depend, Christ can say "It is finished." Though the actual crisis of death was not yet passed; though the burial, the resurrection, the ascension, and the "all things" extending on to the end of time, were waiting their accomplishment, Christ regarded them all as completely and certainly involved in what was already done, that looking forward to the future, as well as backward upon the past, of all things gathered into a glorious unity, He can say "It is finished"—all is done, all is secured, all is finished, if not actually, yet potentially, virtually.

We are here presented with a subject of contemplation with which we are quite incompetent adequately to deal. Such knowledge is too wonderful for us; it is high, we cannot attain unto it, and the instinct of our hearts prompts us to say, "Come, let us worship and bow down, let us kneel before the Lord our Saviour."

As we listen to this word, we feel that its vast significance stretches far beyond the reach of human thought—beyond the sublimest flight of the imagination. "It is much too little to say that 'the whole history of the Passion, the entire scope of the life of Jesus Christ, yea, even the whole Bible' is included in it; we must add all the whole history of the world, and of the kingdom of God. Till the last day? Oh no, it stretches farther than that! there is nothing lying beyond the reach of this word, not even in eternity, for it speaks of a real τέλος. Here is the centre of the history of the world and the kingdom; this is the expressed idea and substance of time and eternity.

We might, in connection with a subject like this, allow ourselves the luxury of unfettered meditation, being sure that by whatever road our thoughts might choose to travel it would be a pleasant and not unprofitable one. But it will, perhaps, be better for us to confine our thoughts within narrower compass, and consider only two or three of the main ideas expressed by this word, and the more important of the practical lessons taught by it.

I. Then let us consider What this word declares. This word, "It is finished," declares the termination of Christ's life—the conclusion, the completion of that life which had been visibly lived on earth and among men by the manifested Deity—the model life of the world, the only specimen of perfected and finished life the world had ever witnessed. We may conclude this fact to be unique—that which distinguishes our world from all other worlds, our race from all other races—that here the incarnate God lived and died. Other worlds may have wonders and splendour which ours cannot emulate, but no wonder like the great mystery of godliness, no splendour like the brightness of the Father's glory. It is this which awakens the astonishment of angels, who

> "See in the face
> Of Adam's race
> The nature God doth share."

But in what way are we to regard this life which is now brought to a close and declared to be finished? The life which Christ lived on earth He lived for us. He was made of a woman, made under the law, that He might redeem us who were under the law, and give unto us the adoption of children. He was made under the law that He might obey it, and by the obedience He rendered make manifest its purity and perfectness, and work out a practical righteousness for His people. All human life presents a twofold aspect—has its manward and its God-ward side. So was it with the life of Christ, for though He was Lord of all, He took upon Himself the form of a servant and a Son. He gives us a summary of human obligation under two heads—our duty to God and to our neighbour. We are to love the Lord our God with all our heart and soul and strength, and our neighbour as ourself. This is the whole duty of man, and Christ not only tells us, but shows us in what the perfection of human life consists. Look at His life in these respects. What love had He for His Father! what reverence for His will! His entire life may be regarded as one practical endeavour to do the will of His Father, and to finish the work which had been given Him to do. And if we regard that life on its man-ward side, what do we see? What, but the faithful and practical carrying out of His own great law of love? He was ever going about doing good, denying Himself that He might serve others; feeding the hungry, healing the sick, raising the dead. And in the death of Christ we meet with the highest expression of that love which in so many different ways had declared itself during life—for greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friends. This life, in which He has fulfilled all righteousness, is brought by the will of Christ Himself to a close, and if it can be said, what has never been said truthfully of any other life, It is finished—finished, not merely in the sense of its being terminated, brought to a conclusion, but in the sense of its being completed. It is the one life answering perfectly to the mind and will of God—the one life presenting upon review no defect to be supplied, no blemish to be mourned over; it is the one "finished" life.

This word declares that Christ's work—His work of redemption—is now finished. His work is finished, because His life and sufferings are. The work of human redemption only becomes intelligible when viewed in relation to, and is dependent on, the life sufferings of Christ.

That the work of redemption could be only accomplished by the life, sufferings, and death of Christ, we may safely and confidently conclude from the circumstance that it was thus accomplished.

Looking upon any human work, we can have no certainty that it might not have been effected in some more simple and less costly way. In the history of applied science we see man gradually feeling his way towards greater and greater simplicity of method, and, consequently, towards increased effectiveness; we see cumbersome and complex arrangements giving place to others simpler and truer.

But when we turn from the works of man to a contemplation of the works of God, we find something altogether different; and in respect of any work of God we are sure not only that it is well done, but that it is perfectly done—that it cannot be better done. We meet with perfect adaptation of the means employed to the end to be secured, and so we have the largest results with the least possible expenditure. We can point to nothing which has been done by God which could have been more simply done. We may apply this principle very confidently in judging of the Gospel scheme of salvation. From the mere fact of God's having delivered up His only and well-beloved Son to suffer and to die, we may conclude that no less costly sacrifice would have sufficed, and we cannot conceive of any more costly sacrifice being offered.

The necessity, the "needs be" of those sufferings and of that death, is constantly insisted on by Christ Himself. This, then, we regard as the great idea which is expressed by this word, that of the work of redemption which had been entrusted to Him by the Father to be wrought out by us, He could regard and speak of it as absolutely complete and finished; for everything which was to follow was regarded as summed up and included in this central fact: "By the one offering He perfected for ever them that are sanctified;" and to the completion of this work Christ refers when He says to His Father, "I have glorified Thee on the earth, I have finished the work which thou gavest me to do." All is now finished. Sin is made an end of, death destroyed, hell is conquered, the power of Satan is broken, God is honoured, man is saved. It is finished!—all is finished! All the purposes of God are actually or virtually accomplished; all the prophecies and predictions having reference to the life, sufferings, and death of the Messiah, are now fulfilled. The Old Testament dispensation, with its types and shadows, its law of carnal commandments contained in ordinances, and which was in every particular a figure of good things to come, this has now answered its purpose, and is ready to pass away and give place to something greater and better than itself. No further need for sacrifice now that the one sacrifice has been offered once for all; and the symbolical priesthood may well retire before the presence of Him who is made a priest, not according to the law of a carnal commandment, but according to the power of an endless life—a priest for ever after the order of Melchisedec. Yes, all is done—perfectly done; and the day of Christ has indeed come, to which, for ages and generations, so many events pointed, and for which patriarchs and prophets, kings and priests, waited and longed.

II. Let us notice now what practical lessons this word teaches.

It teaches us something as to the exclusive ground of our faith. Of the work which Christ came to perform, and on which our hopes for time and eternity exclusively repose, He declares absolutely and emphatically that it is finished. By this we are to understand not merely that Christ has come to the end of His work, but that He has brought His work—the work that He came to do—to a successful termination: the work itself is done—is finished.

What a good foundation have we here to build upon! When we look to ourselves and to our doings, we meet with nothing but incompleteness, imperfection; there is nothing to which we can point which in itself is fit to be presented unto God. If the ground of our acceptance were to be found in our obedience, what would become of us? How pleasant, then, is it for us to be able to look away from our miserably defective and imperfect doings to the absolutely perfect work of Christ! Here have we what we could never have wrought out for ourselves—a complete and perfect righteousness, in which an omniscient and infinitely holy God can discover no defect. Should not this work of Christ, which He with His dying breath declared to be finished, satisfy us? May we not rest here in perfect peace? We must rest simply on this work of Christ for our justification before God, or not at all. If Christ have actually done the work and declared it to be finished, what greater indignity can we offer to Him than to act as though His work were not a finished work? Yet thus do some treat the work of Christ; they would add to it, or take away from it; exaggerate here, attenuate there; but Christ will not be a Saviour upon such terms. He will be accepted as altogether our Saviour, or not at all.

From the perfection of Christ's work for us, we may safely conclude that He will finish His work in us. He who hath begun a good work in us will not leave it incomplete; He will prosper that which concerneth us and not forsake the work of His own hands.

Herein, however, have we no encouragement for indolence or indifference. Some would say, "If Christ have done all, what is there for us to do? May we not fold our hands in idleness and sit still?" It is not so. This very word which sets before us the exclusive ground of our faith, sets before us also, in the finished life and work of Christ, a pattern for our imitation. We are not to earn life by working for it, but in the energy of a life freely given we are with all freedom and diligence to serve God. Let it be our aim, when life shall come to a close, not only to be found resting on the finished work of Christ, but found there as faithful servants, who, having finished the work which has been given them to do, have nothing more to do than, at their Master's bidding, cease from their labours and enter into rest.

SCRIPTURE LESSONS FOR SCHOOL AND HOME.

SCRIPTURE STORIES. First Series. No. 26. Paul and Festus.

Chapter to be read—Acts xxv.

INTRODUCTION. We left St. Paul bound at Cæsarea, by whose orders? How long was he a prisoner there? Now a new governor sent to the province. Perhaps he may be more fair than the last, for were the charges against him proved? Then what should have been done to him? Why was he not set free? (xxiv. 27.) Hence, show the character of Felix. What did he do when Paul preached to him? trembled, but did not repent. Now, to please the Jews, wrongs a prisoner. Perhaps the new governor will be different.

I. Paul Accused. (Read xxv. 1—12.) Where did Festus go after three days? Who immediately go to him? How long had high priest been cherishing angry feelings against Paul? Might have thought that the two years' patient imprisonment would have calmed down his malice; but not so. Let children see how unforgiving malice and anger is; here was no great cause of offence, and the person offending was far away, still the high priest and chief of Jews full of rage against Paul. Notice their plan—that he should be brought back to Jerusalem, and an ambush laid to kill him on the road. What was the office of the high priest? To offer the most solemn sacrifices for the sins of himself and the people. Yet this same man is found plotting the death of an innocent man! What answer did Festus make? (ver. 4—5.) So, after ten days, he goes to Cæsarea. Again, the prisoner brought forth, wearing a chain. Signs of two years' imprisonment upon him. Looks feeble and careworn, but still full of vigour in his self-defence. Now the same charges made against him as before. What were they? Can they be proved now, after two years of getting up evidence? Hear his simple and manly answer (ver. 8.) What ought Festus to have done? Surely, if he found him guilty, to punish him; if innocent, to release him. What did he do? Offer him to go back to Jerusalem to be judged. Why would the Jews like that? but would St. Paul like it? Would be putting his head into a lion's mouth. So he does a very wise thing. As a Roman citizen he appeals to the Roman emperor. See the dignity of his answer: he is not afraid of death, he had often faced it. Remind of his being stoned and left for dead at Lystra (xix. 19), and all his persecutions (2 Cor. xi. 25); but if innocent he ought to be set free. As he cannot have a fair trial from the governor, he appeals to the governor's master. Festus, after conferring with his council (not the Jewish Council) is obliged to grant his request.

XUM

PRACTICAL LESSONS. (1) The benefit of good government. Let the children contrast these rulers with their own. What have we found them doing? (a) Keeping a prisoner untried for two years. This impossible in England, where must be tried as soon as possible. (b) Hearing a case and not giving sentence. This also impossible. If an English jury are disagreed as to a prisoner's guilt, he must be released. (c) Conspiring against a prisoner's life. In this happy country the worst man has every possible loophole of escape allowed him, and such a conspiracy, were it possible, would load a judge with disgrace. Still, after all, mistakes may occur. Innocent persons have suffered, even in happy England. But can look up to another court. Who presides over that as the great judge? How does He judge? (Ps. ix. 8; x. 17, 18.) And who is our advocate (1 John ii. 1), always making intercession? (Heb. vii. 25.) Yes; and now God is the righteous judge. The wicked may prosper for a time, and the righteous suffer, but all will yet come right, and the future happiness is secure.

II. FESTUS AND AGRIPPA. (Read 13—27.) Paul again sent back to custody. Still in bonds, waiting till it pleases Festus to send him to Cæsar. Where did the emperor live? So has prospect of long journey to Rome. Now he is to have some other visitors, who are they? Herod Agrippa, the son of the Herod who put James to death, and his wife, Bernice. So, one day, during the king's stay at Cæsarea, Festus tells the tale of the Jewish prisoner. See what he says: he had expected accusations of plots and treason against the government, but what was the only real charge Paul's accusers made against him? (ver. 19.) How lightly he speaks of Christ's resurrection! How little could realise what it was to Paul and all Christians! Then he glosses over his own conduct in not giving a decision, by stating doubts as to his power to try such a case. Agrippa's curiosity being excited, what would he wish to do? So arrangements are made for Paul to be brought before him. This interview will form the subject for next lesson.

PRACTICAL LESSON. How does the resurrection of Christ affect us? As Paul was prepared to meet his earthly judge, so must all be to meet a heavenly one. Only one way, conscience clear of offence, because sins washed in cleansing blood of Christ, and heart cleansed by His Spirit. Then can calmly await resurrection and judgment.

Questions to be answered.

1. Who was Paul's next judge, and what do you know of him?
2. What plot did the high priest lay against Paul?
3. What was the result of his trial by Festus?
4. What practical lessons may we learn?
5. Before whom was Paul next brought?
6. What lesson may we learn from Festus' description of the resurrection?

STILL AND DEEP.

BY F. M. F. SKENE, AUTHOR OF "TRIED," "ONE LIFE ONLY," ETC.

CHAPTER XIII.

THE moonlight gleamed on Laura's face, on the clear shining eyes, the red arch lips, the rippling curls tossed back, unbound and falling to her waist, while the fairness of her complexion was enhanced by the scarlet colour of the loose dressing-gown she had thrown round her shoulders.

"Well, Mary Trevelyan, I have come to tell you that I pity you very much," said Laura, leaning back in her chair with her arms folded.

"Why so?" asked Mary, half laughing at the quaint address.

"Because you have come to Chiverley, the most dull, hopeless, detestable place in the whole wide world. I wish I could sink it in the depths of the sea. I hate it, I hate it!"

She spoke with a vehemence which almost frightened gentle Mary.

"But is it not your home? you have lived here always, have you not? It seems a pretty country and a nice place," said Mary, "and you have got the poor people in the village to interest you, and schools, no doubt, for the children; if there are no other resident gentry near, you must have the entire care of them, and I should think it gave you plenty to do."

Laura made an expressive little grimace. "Bah! that is not at all my line, if it is yours. There are but two things which I can even feel that I like in this odious place—flowers and music, and there is not much good in cultivating flowers which no one sees, or in singing songs with nobody to admire them but John and Charlie, who have heard all I know a hundred times already."

"I am glad you sing," said Mary. "Music is almost a passion with me; but I do not quite understand about the village, are you not obliged to visit the people as the clergyman's daughter?"

"Who is there to oblige me?" asked Laura. "Duty," thought Mary, as she looked at Laura with her soft dark eyes, but she did not say the word aloud, for she was much too meek and gentle ever to reprove others, or to feel that it could be her place to do so.

(Drawn by W. SMALL.)

"'You are hardly her guest,' said Charlie."—p. 460.

Laura went on. "Wait till you have tried the life a few weeks, and you will understand it, you are not so badly off as I am, you are only here for one year, I believe."

"Yes; dear Mr. Lisle only made arrangements for the first year after his death."

"And where are you to go when you leave us?"

"I have not the slightest idea, I have no relations, you know."

"But have you no one to help or advise you?" asked Laura.

"No one excepting——" Mary stopped, for an indefinable sensation of shrinking dread made it unspeakably repugnant to her to utter the one beloved name to Laura Wyndham.

"Excepting who?" said Laura, impatiently.

Then in a low tremulous tone Mary answered, "Bertrand."

"Bertrand, Mr. Lisle's only son? I have heard that he had one; tell me about him, Mary," she continued, eagerly, "I want to know everything. Where is he? what is his profession?"

"He is travelling back to his post at this moment, after having attended his father's death-bed and funeral; he is chargé d'affaires in one of the Continental towns."

"In the diplomatic service? Oh, that is charming for him! Then he will always be in the way of the very best society, and the gayest brightest life the world has to offer. How I envy him! How I should like to know him! Is there any chance of it, Mary? Could you not write and ask him to come and advise you about the future?"

"He does intend to come here," said Mary.

"Oh, when?" exclaimed Laura, her eyes dancing with excitement; "soon?"

"In the spring—when the violets come," she added, so low that Laura did not hear the last sentence.

"In the spring? that is a long time hence, six months at least; still the weeks will pass; it is something new to look forward to." Laura was silent for a few minutes, then she said, looking keenly at Mary, "I suppose you are very fond of him?"

Even in the moonlight the vivid colour that mounted to Mary's temples could be distinguished.

"I have known him all my life, and he has always been kind to me," she answered.

"Yes, and you look upon him quite as a brother, of course," and the sparkling eyes were bent with intense scrutiny on the pure still face.

"He is not my brother," said Mary, very quietly.

"No, not in blood, I know; but you were like a daughter to Mr. Lisle, and you lived in Bertrand's home. You must have adopted each other as brother and sister, I am sure?"

"I should never wish to establish an unreal relationship with any one," said Mary. "I think that in such matters one must follow God's appointment, and that alone; any attempt to interfere with it I feel sure would be both unwise and dangerous."

"Well, I don't agree with you at all," said Laura; "I have acted on a totally different principle all my life, so you are hitting me pretty hard in saying that."

"I did not mean to do so; I beg your pardon," said gentle Mary.

"Oh I am not offended, neither am I converted; I shall go on just the same in that respect. However, I hope you will hold Mr. Bertrand Lisle to his promise of coming; he will bring us a breath of life from the outside world, and I shall look forward to it immensely."

Mary did not speak, and after a minute's silence Laura rose.

"I suppose you are growing sleepy? Well, I will go and leave you to repose. I advise you to sleep as late as you can in the morning; the days are decidedly too long at Chiverley."

Mary rose to bid her good-night, and Laura put her pretty bright face against hers, and kissed her.

"We had better be friends, anyhow, Mary Trevelyan, since we are thrown together in this forlorn place. Do you think you can like me?"

"I am sure I can," said Mary, warmly, as she returned the embrace; and it was true, that absolutely different as Laura was from herself in thought and feeling and manner, she yet had not escaped the fascination which this strange being had power to exercise over every one who approached her. And here we may briefly say that Laura Wyndham is not a fictitious character; and that if all we have to record of her in the future appears exaggerated or unnatural, we have simply to answer that herself and her proceedings are drawn from the life.

She left the room at last, and closed the door. What was it that caused Mary Trevelyan, so soon as she was left alone, to sink on her knees and bury her face on her hands, while she cried out, almost with an agony of fear, "Oh, my God, I am afraid—afraid!—take pity upon me! I am full of terror—save me—save me?"

We know a case in real life, of a human soul, on a fair summer morning, when the sunny world without was not brighter than the hopes it held within, when life seemed to be securely fixed in a haven of perfect peace and joy, when to the future had been given the promise, and, in a sense, the certainty of all that poor blind soul most ardently desired, and yet to whom in that calm bright hour, sudden as a black thunder-cloud swooping down upon a cloudless sky, there came an awful inexplicable terror of the very sources of its joy and hope, a terror so unendurable that for the moment the impulse to fly then and there away from all it most loved and valued, could scarcely be repressed, even by the very power of its passionate attachment to that which it seemed goaded by this mysterious dread to leave for ever. Well had it been for that soul if it had accepted the warning and obeyed the impulse! but it cast it off as a delusion, and a temptation, and went on gaily over the sunshiny path it might in that hour still have quitted if it would, and it was so, that long years after, the black terrible reality of which the shadow had been projected on it then—a reality which it could never, by any conceivable process, have foreseen, came down upon it with a fell power which crushed the very life well-nigh out of it, and wrecked it fatally for time and almost for eternity.

CHAPTER XIV.

Mr. Wyndham was a striking instance of the fatal power which adverse circumstances can have upon a weak and timid nature: he had a fair amount of intellectual capacity, and had pursued his studies in the days of his youth with a degree of plodding perseverance which had made him no mean scholar; he had always, however, been of a retiring disposition, and was absolutely deficient in moral courage or manliness; if, in the earlier stages of his career, he had been thrown with men of his own age, who would have shamed him out of his want of energy and spirit, his subsequent history might have been very different, but from the first the conditions of his existence were against him.

He was the only son of a widow, who had him educated at home under a private tutor, and who died soon after he came of age, leaving him with so small an amount of capital that it was necessary for him to adopt a profession. He decided at once to become a clergyman; but his choice was dictated by the hope that in this position he could lead a quiet and peaceful life, rather than by the zeal for religion which alone can make a man fit to enter on that holy calling. Francis Wyndham was not insincere, however, though he was morally feeble, and his religious principles were perhaps the strongest elements of motive power which he possessed; but they were not strong enough to withstand the opposing tide of external influences, which soon set in after such a fashion as to reduce him finally to a state of spiritual helplessness and inertness.

Immediately after his ordination, he had the misfortune to marry a silly, frivolous, very beautiful girl, whose sole desire was to enjoy society and amusement wherever she could find it. She swayed her husband so completely, that he was indeed a "reed shaken by the wind," and as he had no settled home when they first married, she compelled him practically to ignore his sacred calling, while she dragged him about from one watering-place to another—chiefly on the Continent—till she finally succeeded in quite exhausting their pecuniary resources. It then became a necessity for him to take a curacy, and to the supreme discontent of his wife, he found himself relegated to that of Chiverley in the Yorkshire wolds. Undoubtedly it was an uncivilised place, very much cut off from the outer world, but the clergyman to whose care its humble poverty-stricken inhabitants were committed might have found ample occupation and interest in watching over their spiritual and temporal welfare, had he been reasonably determined in the performance of his duties.

Although Mr. Wyndham was only curate in charge, he had full authority in the parish, as the real rector was a paralytic invalid, who lived at a distance, and took no further interest in the living than was involved in the appropriation of the income.

The stipend allowed to Mr. Wyndham was very small, and his wife absorbed the whole of it, so that he felt ashamed to go amongst the poor people without being able to help them at all in their great necessities, and his wife did her best to hold him back from all but the barest performance of absolutely imperative obligations. She was utterly without sense of duty, and thoroughly discontented with her position.

When she was at Chiverley her husband was her only companion, and she grudged every moment he spent away from her, but she had an outlet from the dulness of her home, as her sister was married to a wealthy merchant in London, and the Wyndhams could go to stay with her whenever they pleased. So, as often as they could manage, by the payment of some guineas, spared with difficulty, to get a stray clergyman to take the Sunday duty at Chiverley, they started off for London, and remained there as long as they could.

Gradually the feeble remonstrances of Francis Wyndham's conscience succumbed to the mighty power of habit, and when his wife died, leaving him with his one child, Laura, at the age of sixteen, he found that her influence was not only quite as systematically adverse to his profession as her mother's had been, but greatly stronger, inasmuch as she was a far more powerful character.

For her, too, the only outlet from the dreary monotony of Chiverley was the London home of her rich aunt, and she made her father take her there as often as possible, until the death of this desirable relation consigned Laura finally to the narrow sphere where she felt like a bird in a cage.

Her expensive tastes so far outran her father's means that he found himself constrained to take pupils, in order to supplement them; and it was chiefly to make his house a suitable home for them that he married the second Mrs. Wyndham. It was almost as unfortunate a choice as his first, although she did not crave for amusement in the same way as her predecessor; she was indolent and selfish; good-humoured, when to be so did not interfere with her own interests, but with a mind so restricted and commonplace that she seemed incapable of rising above the consideration of her personal ease and comfort from day to day.

Of course such an helpmeet did but confirm Mr. Wyndham in his hopeless apathy and listlessness, and the only change which her advent made in the household was the excitement of the combat which straightway set in between her step-daughter and herself, but which had not resulted in many passages of arms before Laura established her position so triumphantly as the conqueror, that there was never again a question of interference with her perfect independence of action on the part of either her father or his wife. In fact, perfect freedom of action was the rule for all the inmates at Chiverley Rectory; and Mary Trevelyan soon found that whatever she might have lost by becoming one of this peculiar household, she had at least attained her most entire liberty. She was left completely to her own resources; every one went their own way, and left her to take hers, according as it might please her; and as her natural instincts led her strongly to the wish that she might in some manner be useful to her fellow-creatures, it was not long before she made her way into the village, and began to cultivate the acquaintance of the neglected little children, and, as a sure result, of the parents also.

Up to the late dinner-hour, Mary was always left to herself. Mrs. Wyndham invariably spent the day taking her ease in her arm-chair, diversified by instructions to Sally as to the cooking of various dainties which she afterwards consumed in solitary enjoyment. Laura was generally occupied in her own room with a most voluminous correspondence, which seemed to form the chief interest of her life; and the young men were out of doors or at their studies. But in the evening the heterogeneous elements of which the family was composed seemed to be driven together by the force of circumstances, and the young people would take long walks, or roam about the garden in each others' company. On these occasions John Pemberton always followed Laura like her shadow, so that Mary generally fell to the lot of frank boyish Charlie Davenant, and by the time she had been a week or so at Chiverley he seemed to be the one of the whole party with whom she felt herself least a stranger.

One evening that they had gone rather further than usual, Laura and her companion had turned unperceived into a different path from that by which they had come, and Mary found herself under the necessity of walking home alone with Mr. Davenant.

"This is an excellent opportunity!" exclaimed Charlie, when they had realised that they were really left alone. "I have been wishing so much, Miss Trevelyan, to know what you think of us all. Now do tell me, in confidence!"

"I think you are all very kind," she answered, with her quiet smile.

"Do you, indeed? It is more than I do! There may be some of the outward semblance of kindness at Chiverley, but there is not much of the actual reality. However, what I want to know above all is your opinion of Lurline. I am most curious to know the impression she has made upon you."

"Tell me first why you call her Lurline."

"Do you not know what it means?" he asked.

"Not at all," answered Mary.

"Lurline or Lorelei is the syren witch of the Rhine, who allures men to their death by the entrancing sweetness of her songs. The name is exactly appropriate to Laura Wyndham, and she knows it. I have made no secret of my reason for giving it to her."

"I suppose you mean that she exercises a singular fascination on all who come in contact with her. I have felt it myself."

"Yes; but it is not only an involuntary fascination, though she has that too in her appearance and manner. The witch of the Rhine does not set herself more deliberately to entrance her victims than does our Lurline."

"Victims, that is a strong word!" said Mary.

"Not too strong for the occasion. I know what I am saying very well. Miss Trevelyan, I will tell you frankly that I have a reason for wishing you to understand Lurline which I do not like to explain to you, at least at present; you must let me give you some insight into her character and history."

"If it does not involve my being told anything which I ought not to hear of a lady whose guest I am," said Mary, gently.

"You are hardly her guest," said Charlie, with a boyish laugh. "She did not at all want you to come here, I can tell you; though she is rather glad of it now, when she sees what it is likely to involve. However, I do not want to enter into all those mysterious under-currents at present. I simply desire that you should know the truth about Lurline as much as any human being can know it, which is probably not to any very great extent, after all."

Mary turned and looked at the open face and the truthful eyes that met her own so frankly. The boy was speaking with a serious earnestness, which was very unusual with him. He was about the same age as herself, and therefore not really any longer a boy, but he was so young-looking, so almost child-like sometimes in his gaiety, that she instinctively thought of him as one much younger than herself.

Mary had discovered that with all Charlie Davenant's mirth and boyishness, he was both shrewd and right-minded, so she said, gravely, at last, "If there is anything you think I ought to know, Mr. Davenant, you can tell it to me, but I trust you not to bid me listen to anything which it would not be right for me to hear."

(To be continued.)

ENGLISH SACRED POETRY.—IV.

THE ELIZABETHAN PERIOD.

WE have now brought our sketch of the history of English sacred poetry to a point where we may well pause. We have arrived at the most brilliant epoch in the literature of the world—an epoch which has no parallel either in ancient or in modern times. The dazzling galaxy of genius which surrounded Pericles in Greece, Augustus in Rome, the Medici in Renaissant Italy, must pale before that which flung its radiance over the thrones of Elizabeth and James. We dwell with astonishment and almost awe on an era which witnessed the contemporaneous appearance of Shakespeare, Bacon, Spenser, Raleigh, Hooker, which produced such men as the Elizabethan dramatists, the least of whom were giants; which gave us that grandest of our national treasures, our matchless, our noble translation of the Bible; which laid the foundation of our literature in almost all its branches—theology, criticism, fiction, biography, history.

In treating of the sacred poetry of this era, it will be well to do as we have done before—to deal first with the sacred poems scattered among the works of secular poets, to proceed then to the sacred poets proper; though, as the materials are so much more abundant, our selections must be more confined and less exhaustive than they have hitherto aimed at being.

Had time been kind to us, the first poet on our list would have been Edmund Spenser, but the fate which has, if report say true, deprived us of the last six books of the "Faerie Queen," has deprived us of a series of no less than five sacred poems, a poetical translation of "Ecclesiasticus," and of the "Song of Songs," the "Hours of our Lord," the "Sacrifice of a Sinner," and the "Seven Psalms;" and of all the many losses literature has sustained, this may rank among the greatest. One of the most beautiful of our early dramas is a sort of semi-sacred interlude, entitled, "David and Bethsabe with the Tragedy of Absalom," a very charming dramatic poem, written by George Peile, and published in 1599. David in one place is made to say, with exquisite feeling:—

> "Thou power,
> That now art framing of the future world,
> Know'st all to come, not by the course of Heaven,
> By frail conjectures of inferior signs,
> But by a true and natural presage,
> Laying the ground and perfect architecture
> Of all our actions before thine eyes.
> * * * * * *
> Transform me from this flesh, that I may live
> Before my death regenerate with me;
> That when I think thy thoughts may be my guide,
> And when I speak I may be made by choice
> The perfect echo of thy heavenly voice."

The subject of the work is a painful one, but the tone of it is singularly pure and dignified.

Ben Jonson has written a few sacred poems, and among them the well-known "Hymn to God the Father," beginning:—

> "Hear me, O God!
> A broken heart
> Is my best part."

The three poems entitled, "The Sinner's Sacrifice" and the verses "To Heaven," are well worth perusal, and prove what a sterling vein of deep religious feeling underlay that great but somewhat coarse man.

Scattered too up and down the pages of the dramatists are little passages which rank among the choicest gems of the sacred muse. Who feels not better after reading those sweet verses of old Dekker?—

> "Patience! why 'tis the soul of peace;
> Of all the virtues, 'tis nearest kin to heaven:
> It makes men look like gods. The best of men
> That e'er worth earth about Him was a sufferer;
> A soft, meek, patient, humble, tranquil spirit,
> The first true Gentleman that ever breath'd."

George Chapman, who is so celebrated for his grand translation of "Homer," has left us a translation of Petrarch's "Seven Penitential Psalms," and a "Hymn to our Saviour on the Cross," but they are, we must honestly confess, rather heavy.

Passing by the various poetical miscellanies of this marvellously prolific age, we come to a great name, which calls up a vision of mingled melancholy and gratitude. There are few sadder pages in biography than those which record the life and the sufferings of one of the greatest of our sacred poets—Robert Southwell. He was born of a good family about the year 1562, and while a mere baby was stolen by a gipsy, who, however, was soon discovered, and compelled to restore the poor child to its parents. Southwell has left a considerable number of poems—the largest of them is entitled "St. Peter's Complaint," and is a lament supposed to be spoken by the apostle, after he had denied Jesus; the versification is sweet and flowing, many of the stanzas are singularly eloquent, and the tone of the whole piece is fervid and intense. His other poems consist of short lyrics, moral and religious. They are all well worth reading, though "Loss in Delay," "I Die Alive," "Life is but Loss," "Times go by Turns," "Mary Magdalene's Complaint," of the "Blessed Sacrament," "Scorn not the Least," "The Image of Death," "I Die without Desert," "Decease, Release," may rank among the best. As we must give selections from rarer volumes, two stanzas from Southwell must suffice—they are from "Loss in Delay":—

"Shun delays, they breed remorse!
Take thy time while time is lent thee;
Creeping snails have weakest force,
Fly their fault, lest thou repent thee;
Good is best when soonest wrought,
Linger'd labour comes to nought.

"Hoist up sail while gale doth last,
Tide and wind stay no man's leisure;
Seek not time when time is past,
Sober speed is wisdom's leisure;
Afterwits are dearly bought,
Let thy forewit guide thy thought."

In quitting Southwell, we may observe that his prose, of which there is but little, is solid and elegant.

The next poet on our list is Francis Davidson, son of Queen Elizabeth's unfortunate secretary, whose tale we know from history. Of Davidson's life very little is known. In 1593 he was a member of Gray's Inn, and in 1595 he was on the Continent, and there all knowledge of him ends; but it is pretty certain that, like many of the poets who were his contemporaries, he died in poverty. He is principally known as being the first editor of a collection of poems, entitled, "The Poetical Rhapsody," published in 1602. He published, however, a small collection of sacred poems, principally paraphrases of the Psalms, in conjunction with a brother and some other contributors. They have not very much merit, though a version of the twenty-third Psalm is pretty, and may be compared with Addison's.

Contemporary with Davidson, but of a different order of genius, lived Barnaby Barnes, son of the Bishop of Dublin. He was born in Yorkshire, 1569, became a student of Brasenose College, Oxford, but left the University, like many other brother bards, without taking a degree. In 1591 he joined the expedition which was sent by Queen Elizabeth, under the command of Essex, into Normandy, to aid the King of France against the Prince of Parma. On his return to England he became involved in the literary brawls between Thomas Nash and Gabriel Harvey, and has been roughly dealt with in the prose satires of the former. He interests us as being the author of a "Divine Centurie of Spiritual Sonnets, to the Honour of God and His Saints." This very rare volume has only been reprinted once, in a volume now almost as rare as the original. It consists of a hundred sonnets, addressed chiefly to God and to our Lord. These sonnets are written with extraordinary vigour; are full of genuine feeling, and the intensest religious fervour. The following is a fair and typical specimen of the rest; it is addressed to our Saviour:—

"Fountain of life and endless happiness,
Oh, quench these worldly sparks of Satan's fire,
Enkindled in my fancies and desire!
Rock of salvation and all blessedness,
Defend me, charg'd with sinful wickedness,
Spirit of comfort, let thy breath inspire
My soul infected, ready to retire,
And carnal notions striving to repress;
I thirst, clear fountain, for the stream of life.
I fall, far set from my salvation's rock,
And Satan with my spirit is at strife,
Urging that I am sever'd from thy flock;
Yet my dear Saviour, strong rock, and sweet spirit,
Through mercy my poor soul shall heav'n inherit."

But the greatest of the Elizabethan sacred poets was Giles Fletcher, author of "Christ's Victory." He was the brother of Phineas Fletcher, well known to the admirers of our old writersfor his allegorical poem. "The Purple Island." The date of his birth is not known, but he was educated at Westminster School, and at Trinity College, Cambridge. Some time afterwards he entered into holy orders, and was presented in 1612 with the Rectory of Alderton, in Suffolk. There, surrounded by uncongenial companions, in an unhealthy district, but conscientiously fulfilling his duties as a parish pastor, he seems to have pined away, but the actual year of his death has not been accurately ascertained. "Christ's Triumph" is a poem which even Milton might not have blushed to own—grave, lofty, spirited, eloquent; stiff with gorgeous embroidery of classical ornament, rich with variegated diction, but chaste and sustained. It is divided into four cantos: I. "Christ's Victory in Heaven." II. "Christ's Victory on Earth." III. "Christ's Triumph over Death." IV. "Christ's Triumph after Death." In the first canto we would particularly instance the passage where Mercy is represented as pleading with Justice for the redemption of man. The stanza, which describes the effect of the address to Justice, is sublime:—

"She ended, and the heavenly hierarchies
Burning in zeal, thickly embranded, were Like to an army that alarum cries,
And every one shakes his dreaded spear,
And th' Almighty's self, as he would tear
The earth, and her firm basis quite in sunder,
Flamed all in just revenge and mighty thunder,
Heaven stole itself from earth by clouds that moisten'd under."

Then follows a brilliant description of the charms of Mercy. The first canto concludes with the birth of Christ. In the second canto we have an account of the Temptation in the Wilderness, Satan coming to our Lord in the likeness of an old palmer, "footing slowly." Wandering along together they arrive at the Cave of Despair, which is painted in terrific colours, and with some touches borrowed from Spenser. Our Lord is next transported to a high mountain, where the pavilion of Presumption is spread, thence he is described in a splendid passage as beholding the empires of the world, and the glory of them. Presumption, however, fails to seduce the Divine spectator, and a choir of angels bear Him away to another "airy mountain," where is situated the Bower of Vain Delight, but Vain Delight is as unsuccessful as Presumption. There is almost oriental magnificence about this part of the poem, which, if it reminds us of Spenser, proves also the richness of Fletcher's genius. We cannot spare room for more than a few lines:—

"And here she shed
Blue violets, and there came roses red,
And every sight the yielding sense as captive led;
The garden, like a lady fair, was cut,
That lay as if she slumbered in delight,
And to the open skies her eyes did shut.
The azure fields of heaven were sembled right
In a large round, set with the flowers of light,
The fleur de luys and the round sparks of dew
That hung upon their azure leaves, did show
Like twinkling stars that sparkle in the evening blue."

Canto III. describes the Crucifixion, with the incidents which preceded and attended it. The description of the horrors of conscience which torture Judas, is scarcely excelled by Juvenal or Shakespeare, who have both dealt with the same subject at length and elaborately; we give a few lines from this passage:—

"Yet oft he snatched and started as he hung,
So when the senses half enslumbered lie,
The headlong body, ready to be flung
By the deluding fancy from some high
And craggy rock, recovers greedily,
And clasps the yielding pillow half asleep."

We now reluctantly leave Fletcher, at the same time cordially recommending him to our readers, many of whom have, perhaps, never so much as heard of his name, for this true poet has somehow or other quite escaped the notice of critics and popular commentators.

BRAVEST OF ALL.

A STORY FOR BOYS. IN THREE PARTS.

PART II.

WHEN Bob Nicholson came in sight of the pond, he stopped to draw breath, for his pace had been so swift that he found himself panting almost as if he had been running a race. He had been running up hill too; but now, as he reached the summit of the incline, he could see all that was going on below him. He stopped short for an instant, to watch the progress of the fun. Was it fun, or something more serious that was going on? The boys were grouped together, but there were others there besides the Winchbrook College boys, and there was a swaying backwards and forwards of the crowd which sorely puzzled Bob to understand. Waiting only to recover his breath, he dashed down the road, and was soon in the midst of the noisy concourse, which seemed too completely absorbed in its own affairs to notice Bob's arrival. The moment he reached the spot he understood what had taken place. A neighbouring school had also come to enjoy the ice of the mill-pond, and there being an old existing feud between the scholars, it had broken out upon the question of priority of claim to a certain favourite spot on the ice, which was most favourable for a slide. David Maxwell had come out as the champion of Winchbrook College, and had challenged the biggest boy on the other side to fight him. The noisy swaying crowd which Bob Nicholson could not understand, proved to be the united schools collected round the two champions. There was nothing unfair or unmanly in what had taken place, and when Bob had thrust himself into the crowd, and elbowed his way to the centre, and then interposed himself between the combatants, he did so altogether with the desire to see fair play. He happened to be a little taller and heavier than David Maxwell, and he could not bear the thought of allowing his brave friend to take the position that was his by right of age and strength.

"Davie, you must let me settle this," he said, coming between the two boys, and stopping the fight.

David Maxwell was astonished at the presence of his companion, but doubly so at the very unexpected manner in which the contest was interrupted. It would have provoked a smile on any face but a boy's to see the well-arranged and unexcited manner in which the two champions were fulfilling their parts. Neither of them entertained the least ill-will towards the other, and it was purely for the honour of the school, as they thought, that they had accepted their positions. Up to this point, indeed, no blows had been struck, the contest having been a very elaborate and scientific match at sparring, in which art both schools prided themselves.

As soon as Bob Nicholson interposed himself, the boys seemed heartily glad to escape from any further display of their boxing powers, although David Maxwell said, "I have begun this affair, and I intend to see it out."

Bob turned round to Dashford, who was the rival champion, and said, "Do you really wish to fight this out?"

"Oh, I have no ill-will one way or the other," answered young Dashford, good-humouredly.

"Then I don't think there is any need to fight it out. Will you two shake hands?" Bob asked turning, with a smile, from one to the other.

"I don't mind in the least," said David.

"Nor I," said Dashford; so the champions shook hands warmly, and the fray ended.

Until it was all over Bob did not stop to consider what he had been doing, but when peace had been made, and he looked round him, he could not refrain from a merry laugh. "I think it's just as well I went home," he said to David, "although you did taunt me with being a coward!"

"Bob, I didn't mean it," said David, in his impetuous way; "I'm sorry if I hurt your feelings; but I was annoyed to think you were not coming with us."

"I promised Ned when I came away this morning that I would get back as soon as school was over, and I could not break my word, Davie."

David Maxwell looked at his companion with an expression in his face which seemed to show how much he felt his unworthiness in misjudging the motives that had influenced Bob. "What a thoughtless fool I am!" he said, with self-reproach in his voice; "I am ashamed of myself!"

"Nonsense, Davie. But you can understand how lonely Ned feels up in that room all day!"

"Indeed I can. How is he, Bob?"

"Poor old fellow, he is very weak. I sometimes think, Davie, that he'll never be strong again," said Bob, lowering his voice, and speaking sadly.

"Bob, don't say that! surely he is not so bad as you imagine?"

"I hope not; but if you saw his face sometimes when he is asleep, you would think so too."

It was only a few words which passed between them, but they were sufficient to make a deep impression on David Maxwell, who had a very tender heart, although he was often betrayed into doing and saying things which seemed heartless.

Peace having been restored, the lads fell to with hearty good-will, and were soon enjoying their healthy recreation with all the spirit and energy of youth. The difference between the schools proved to be no deeper than such differences usually are, and the boys' enjoyment was all the greater from knowing that the breach had been healed. In the midst of their enjoyment there was a cry of terror raised, which caused them all to look to one corner of the pond, where an indiscreet boy had ventured on the thin ice, and had fallen through into the water. There were shouts for help as the boys rushed headlong towards the spot, and a serious accident might have happened had not Bob shouted out, "Run to the bank!" Springing forward himself, he led the boys from the ice, and with movements as swift as thought, he soon reached the bank nearest to where the boy had fallen into the water. "Davie, give me your hand! Hold me tight! Catch Dashford's hand, and hold on to him! Now then, there is no fear!" and Bob sprang into the water, and soon succeeded in rescuing the unconscious form of the unfortunate boy who had fallen in.

The little fellow was more frightened than hurt, and with the energetic help of the boys, was soon restored to consciousness. He cried a great deal, but David Maxwell wisely said, "You must get home at once, and you must run every step of the way; don't stop for anything, and get into bed as quickly as possible."

Then he turned to Bob Nicholson. "Bob, you're shivering. Let us get home at once."

"I feel cold, but I will soon run myself warm again. I must call at the doctor's for Ned's medicine as I go along."

The boys quickly dispersed after this, Bob and David running off together at a brisk pace towards home, whilst the boy who had suffered involuntary submersion went home under the care of Dashford. Bob had to wait a short time at the doctor's until the medicine was got ready, and he felt the cold from his wet clothing.

"I wish you would go on, and let me bring the medicine, Bob; you are chattering with the cold!" David said.

"I feel very cold," said Bob; "I think I must do as you say," and with shivering limbs and chattering teeth, Bob went homeward as quickly as he could, feeling a strange uncomfortable sensation of inward chill upon him, which made him look and feel extremely ill. (To be continued.)

"THE QUIVER" BIBLE CLASS.

181. In Mark ii. 21, it says, "No man also seweth a piece of new cloth on an old garment . . . else the rent is made worse." Why was this?

182. What relation was David to Joab?

183. Where do we find an account of an army being sent to take one man?

184. Where does it state that our Saviour spent some time with the "wild beasts?"

185. Why were not the Jews permitted to sell their land for more than a certain number of years?

186. Which of the Evangelists is it who states that when the soldiers came to the Garden of Gethsemane to take Jesus, "They went backward and fell to the ground?"

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS ON PAGE 432.

169. Archelaus (Matt. ii. 22).

170. "And Jesse took an ass laden with bread, and a bottle of wine, and a kid, and sent them by David his son unto Saul" (1 Sam. xvi. 20).

171. "Mesha king of Moab was a sheepmaster, and rendered unto the king of Israel an hundred thousand lambs, and an hundred thousand rams with the wool" (2 Kings iii. 4).

172. "Repent: for the kingdom of heaven is at hand" (Matt. iv. 17).

173. Mount of Corruption (2 Kings xxiii. 13).

174. Anah (Genesis xxxvi. 24).

175. Gadarenes (compare Matt. viii. 28—34 with Mark v. 1—17).

(Drawn by CAROLINE SLADER.)

LITTLE SAMMY.

"WHAT'S the use of baby, Nelly,
Five months old, and oh so small?
What's he come for? do we want him?
Is he any use at all?

"Do you think your little brother
Can be any good to us?
Crying, sleeping—sleeping, eating;
Are you glad to have him thus?"

"Yes, mamma, I think he's useful;
Soft and warm, like Janie's dove;
And though weak and brown and tiny,
He's a deal of use to love!"

"From the mouths of babes and sucklings," Perfect love and praise are taught;
Nelly, dear, thy two-year wisdom
Is with Truth eternal fraught.

THE BRIDGE BETWEEN.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE TROUBLES OF CHATTY AND MOLLY," "THE DINGY HOUSE AT KENSINGTON," "QUEEN MADGE," "AGAINST HERSELF," ETC., ETC., ETC.

CHAPTER XVII.—"GOOD-BYE."

ANOTHER six weeks, and only the beginning of August! What a long summer it seemed to Dorothy! and yet in all previous years she had so delighted in the sunshine, and missed and mourned for every flower when its day was over.

"How happy I was last year!" she said to herself; "and yet I was impatient, and wished the time away."

And they had been happy days, too, though in them, as in all others, she felt as she felt now, waiting for something—for some life or some world she had not seen as yet, and the key to which she thought Adrian Fuller held.

Colonel Wade had been but little missed. Before the summer waned Netta filled the house with guests; and Sir George Finch and Major Henty, and all her admirers, came to her, bringing her books and flowers, and making water-parties and pic-nics; and elderly ladies, who like the éclat of having a pretty girl under their wing, called to take her for drives, "and to brighten her up a little, for she has had a sad loss, you know." Netta was always ready, and pretty, and well-dressed; it seemed to Dorothy that if she were to put on a sack, or dress herself in a blanket, she would do it gracefully, and she did not wonder that she was admired. There was a grave side to Netta's character, too, there were many sides, in fact, that fascinated even Dorothy—a time when she could, gravely and sweetly, in a low, almost sad voice, talk of her grandfather and by-gone days, or even of the poetry and the stories that Dorothy herself loved, and she would sing (in the twilight usually) wild weird songs generally, with some dreary refrain, or simple old ones, in a way that none who heard her could forget. There were days in which Dorothy almost loved her beautiful sister; there were others in which she tried hard not to hate her. Netta fascinated Adrian Fuller completely, and roused his sluggish nature as Dorothy never could have done. He was always by her side, reading or walking, or hanging over her chair while she flirted with her crowd of admirers at her mother's "at home," and when she sang he chose her songs, and pleaded for his favourite ones, and afterwards, on the clear summer nights, he would wrap her in one of her favourite wraps, lingering to put the folds in some way grateful to his artist eyes, and then they betook themselves to the garden.

"They might have left me the garden!" Dorothy sighed once.

Poor Dorothy! it was a dreary summer for her. She hated strange people and visitors, and when they came hid herself, or if she appeared, was shy and awkward, and so allowed to remain unnoticed. She hated the smart rooms, too, all loaded with gimcracks, and kept neat and tidy; and the only one in the house untouched—the study—Netta and Adrian Fuller occupied all the morning, for the Beauty was sitting to the artist, and in the evening Mr. Woodward, if at home, sat there busy with his writing.

Mrs. Woodward's money had all been risked in the paper, and Mr. Woodward was busy and anxious. He was almost angry at the difference made in the household. "We must be careful for a time," he said, "for remember we have to wait till the paper has had a little run before we can launch out;" but Netta and Mrs. Woodward laughed at him.

"We must keep up an appearance," Netta said, "and live in a well-bred manner."

"Of course we must," assented Mrs. Woodward, ready to agree to everything, provided she was not troubled.

"Mamma," said the Beauty, later in the day, "don't you think papa could manage to send Sally to a boarding-school for a year? Sir George was saying yesterday that my sisters were more picturesque than beautiful."

"And exceedingly rude and ungentlemanlike it was of Sir George then!" exclaimed Dorothy. "Papa can't afford to send Sally to school; and, besides, I should be miserable, and Sally learns at home and at the School of Art well enough. You have taken Mr. Fuller from me, and now you want to take Sally!"

"Mr. Fuller, I want you to go and talk to my little sister Dorothy," the Beauty said, when he came. "She says I have taken you from her."

He went over to his old playmate, but both their tongues seemed tied. The old footing had gone for ever.

"So you are jealous of Netta," he said.

The colour rushed to her face.

"We never talk of books or anything now," she said; "you make Netta your friend."

"But she is sitting for me, remember."

"Yes, but not all day."

"And we are learning German together. You are such a foolish child," he added, his eyes turning restlessly in search of Netta. Hers filled with tears.

"I am not a child!" she said, passionately; "you always forget that."

"But, Dorothy, you must be a child," he answered; "I have always considered you one;" and he put his hand on hers.

The colour left her face, and then rushed back in a torrent. There seemed something terrible in his words, something that struck despair into her heart, while her cheeks burnt with shame. Yet still she struggled against his words.

"But I am not a child," she repeated, helplessly. "Why, Netta does not think me one."

"Think you what?" asked the Beauty, coming to the rescue.

"A child."

"No, of course I don't. By the way, I have written to ask your dear Mr. Blakesley here this evening."

"Mr. Blakesley!"

"Yes; so cheer up, Dorothy. He does not think you a child either, I dare say."

"Netta is always thinking of marrying," Dorothy said, without meaning it, as her sister went into the next room.

"So are most young ladies," and he tried to laugh. "We will all come to your wedding, Dorothy," he added.

Then she burst fairly into tears.

"How can you say such things, Mr. Fuller! I shall never be married—never! and you want to get rid of me, I believe, and do not care for me any more than any one else does; for you know if I married we should never be friends again."

"Why shouldn't we?" he answered; "I hope we should, if I liked your husband and he me." Then he looked at her; she was trembling with excitement, and she tried to return his gaze, but her eyes drooped and fell, and her lips quivered. "My dear child," he said, kindly, and quietly taking her hands, "there is something the matter with you to-day: go and lie down a little while, and remember there is no reason why we should not always be friends, and you must not let any foolish notions get into your silly little head." He let go her hands, and they dropped nervously to her side.

"Yes, I will go and lie down for a little while," she said. "Good-bye."

He did not know how much there was in her "good-bye"; and she went. She met her mother on her way up-stairs, and she stopped and put her arms round her neck.

"Mamma," she said, "do kiss me. If you would only love me as you do Netta, and be proud of me!"

"Of course I love you," Mrs. Woodward answered; "but take away your arms, you crumple me so." The words were only said as a matter of course, and the girl felt it, and went up to her room. Once there, she locked her door, and threw herself, face downwards, on the bed; she did not cry or grieve, or even feel very wretched—only thought, in a dazed sort of way, of all the happy by-gone hours she had spent in the garden with Mr. Fuller, and of his words when he wished her good-bye, and those few cloudless days after his return. She could not believe that this was the end; through all the time that Netta had taken her place, she had yet thought that he was true to her, and she could not believe that he meant what he had said, only that perhaps he was afraid of making Netta angry, as every one else was. How she hated Netta, and how she envied her—her beauty, and brightness, and self-possession, and everything else; and then she tried to remember his words again, and could not. But she remembered his look when he told her that she "must be a child," and her face burnt with shame.

Presently a knock came to the door—it was Netta.

"Let me in, Dorothy," she said. "I have come to tell you we all think you are lost; it is nearly seven o'clock;" this was all she had to say; and then Dorothy rose and smoothed her hair, and bathed her face, while the Beauty sat and watched. "I wonder if Mr. Blakesley will come," she said; "you know he is an excellent match." Somehow Netta's manner was soft and kind that evening. But the tears swelled up into Dorothy's brown eyes again.

"Oh, Netta," she said, "I could not marry for money's sake!"

Her sister made no answer till she had finished her toilette, and was ready to go down-stairs, then she turned round and kissed her—she, Netta, who was usually so cold, did!

"Love is not all, Dorothy dear," she said; "perhaps it would be a good thing if it were;" and they went down-stairs.

Dorothy felt afraid and ashamed to enter the room where Mr. Fuller was; but when she did, he only looked up for a moment, and then went on with the German book he was skimming over before reading it with Netta. He never forgot Dorothy that evening though, there was such a strange look upon the girl's face—a dazed, worn, and weary look, and yet she was evidently keeping a strong control over herself.

"Your faithless knight is not coming, I fear," Netta said, when the daylight faded and there were no signs of George Blakesley.

"He has forgotten me," Dorothy thought. "Even he does not care for me now!" and then she went to the piano, and, unasked, began to play.

She did not know what she played, but she kept on and on—she could play well when she liked—putting all her soul into her music without knowing it, asking herself all the time, in the bitterness of her heart, what she could be living for now, and for what reason life was given to her, and trying to answer her own question in the sounds her own hands made. Then presently, with a start, she came to a standstill.

"Come and sing, Netta," she said; and rose abruptly; and when they were all listening to Netta's sweet voice, she stole softly from the room, and out into the garden, and on to the sycamore-tree. She stopped beneath its shady branches, and looked up at the sky, and back at the house, almost hidden now by the darkness, and stood on the grave of Venus, and thought of all the hopes and dreams she had had on that very spot. Then she went and looked over the low fence (that bounded the garden) at the dim distance, and somehow crept along the fence till she stood almost behind the sycamore-tree, but yet was hidden from sight by the darkness, and the underwood, and the tall nodding grass and weeds, then she put her face down into her hands, and was quiet for a little while. It was such a blessing to be alone there where no one could find her. It was not for long though; she heard voices soon, Netta's and Mr. Fuller's, and they came and stood behind her under the sycamore, little thinking how near she was, but she kept quite still, and made no sign.

"Do you remember the day you came here, just after your return, Adrian?" she heard Netta say. Dorothy winced beneath the last word. She had never called him Adrian in her life!

"Yes, and found you in your white dress sitting here waiting for me."

"I wonder if it was chance or Providence," she said, in a low voice. "I see you do remember."

"Oh, my darling!" he answered, fervently, "is there anything in the world connected with you that I could forget?" and arm-in-arm they sauntered back down the garden path.

(To be continued.)

DAVID IN THE WILDERNESS.—I.

BY THE REV. WILLIAM HANNA, D.D., LL.D., EDINBURGH.

SAUL'S persecution of David was as bitter and relentless as it was unjust and ungenerous: he tried to justify it to others—perhaps, even to himself—by alleging that David and his men were engaged in a conspiracy aiming at his life, or, at least, seeking to dispossess him of his throne. It was a baseless calumny. David knew, indeed, that he was Saul's destined successor, but till the way was opened by God's own hand to that succession, he would do nothing to force his passage to it.

Treated as he had been, many in like circumstances would have counted themselves relieved from its obligations, and renounced their allegiance. The band that gathered round him were not indisposed to raise the standard of revolt, but neither by word or deed did he, through all these years of persecution, countenance the slightest opposition to Saul's kingly authority. There was much of the outlaw in the kind of life which Saul's violence had forced on him, but there was nothing of the rebel. How sacred the king's person was in his sight, the two occasions on which Saul's life was in his hands gave striking proof. It was no unguided chance that turned Saul's footsteps that day into the cave and put him within David's easy reach. To the eyes of his rough followers it seemed as if the occasion had been ordered of Heaven. One thrust of his sword, one stroke of his javelin, and David had eased himself of an adversary who would not have hesitated for a moment had a like advantage been given him. But all that David did was to "cut off the skirt of Saul's robe privily." And even for doing that his "heart smote him." The men around him felt no such restraint. They wondered at it as a piece of egregious folly when their leader did no more than cut off the skirt of the robe. They wondered more when he said to them, "The Lord forbid that I should do this thing unto my master, the Lord's anointed, to stretch forth my hand against him, seeing he is the anointed of the Lord."

There was not another man within the cave, perhaps within the country, who had any such feeling as to the divinity that hedged round such kingship as that of Saul. Seeing the fastidiousness of their leader, his followers would have taken the matter into their own hands, and made a quick end of Saul and of his persecuting violence. But a hand was laid upon them, whose power to smite they had often witnessed, but of whose power generously to forbear they had never seen such a token. Nor has the world witnessed many exhibitions of a loyalty equally devout and equally chivalrous.

It failed, however, in producing anything but a temporary impression. For the moment Saul's fitful and passionate temper was overwhelmed with remorse, and melted into tenderness. But it was like the thaw that visits the surface of the ice-bound lake beneath the few warm sunbeams of the winter's day, hardening ere nightfall into a thicker coat of ice than ever. Softened for the moment, Saul's spirit hardened ere many weeks went by into an intenser hatred than before. The faithless Ziphites send him word that David is hiding in the hill of Hachilah, a place easier of access than the fastness of Engedi. With three thousand chosen men, Saul sets off in pursuit. He had not yet reached the place the Ziphite spies had indicated, when one night he lay down, in fancied security, to sleep; his cousin and chief captain by his side, his men stretched in a circle round him.

Skilful leader as he was, David had been watching the approach of this formidable foe. From some unseen post of observation his quick eye had scrutinised the royal ranks, and marked especially the careless manner in which the night-watch was set and kept. Stealing into the camp at midnight, he and Abishai made their silent way unnoticed to the spot where the king was lying asleep, his javelin stuck in the ground at his bolster, and a cruse of water by his side.

Abishai had seen before how tender David was of lifting his hand against Saul; he would relieve him of the task. "Let me," he said, as, whispering together, they stooped over the prostrate figure, "let me smite him, I pray thee, with the spear, even to the earth at once, and I will not smite him a second time"—a second stroke will not be needed. "Destroy him not," said David; "for who can stretch forth his hand against the Lord's anointed and be guiltless?" The sleeping monarch is suffered to sleep on untouched. But they drew the spear out from the ground, and lifted up the pitcher from his side—to be borne away, and lifted up next day from the top of a distant hill in proof of how absolutely Saul's life had been once more at David's disposal.

The magnanimous forbearance displayed by David in his conduct towards Saul was shown on a lesser scale in the two incidents of the water brought to him from the well of Bethlehem, and of the treatment of the churl Nabal. Never was the proverb, that "the discretion of a man deferreth his anger, and it is his glory to pass over a transgression," more signally and picturesquely verified than when David said to Abigail, "Blessed be the Lord God of Israel, which sent thee this day to meet me, and blessed be thy advice, and blessed be thou which has kept me this day from coming to shed blood, and from avenging myself with mine own hand."

All through his life in the wilderness, David's bearing towards those he led, and towards all with whom he was thrown into contact, wins our warmest admiration. Our only regret is that its closing period should have so dark a cloud resting upon it. He had the distinct assurance of Divine protection. He had the evidence of many years, and of singular deliverances, that God could and would make that protection good. Yet now, almost at the last, his faith apparently gives way, and he says in his heart, what has found its way into the record of his life, "I shall now perish one day by the hand of Saul: there is nothing better for me than that I should speedily escape into the land of the Philistines; and Saul shall despair of me to seek me any more in any coast of Israel; so shall I escape out of his hand"—words scarcely worthy either of his wisdom, his courage, or his faith. Unwarned by what had happened years before, David threw himself into the arms of Achish, King of Gath. Moved, perhaps, by what he saw and heard of the strength and prowess of David's following, and of the persecutions to which they had been exposed, the Philistine king assigned him the frontier town of Ziklag as his place of residence. Here, in a position secure by its remoteness from the attacks of Saul, David dwelt for a "full year and four months." At first, in the wilderness, when sudden shiftings and rapid marches had to be made, David's band had not numbered more than four hundred men. As its power to protect and provide for itself became apparent, it got continually accessions of great strength. Eleven "men of might, fit for the battle, that could handle shield and buckler, whose faces were like the faces of lions, and who were swift as the roes upon the mountains," came to him from the tribe of Gad, beyond the Jordan, crossing the river when at top flood, and scattering on every side all who opposed their march. Twenty-three men, whose names are also given, joined him from Saul's own tribe, "mighty men, helpers of the war, who could use both the right hand and the left in hurling stones and shooting arrows." Judah and Manasseh sent others, who were made "captains of the band," which had now swelled out into more than six hundred fighting men. And now that a settled habitation had been found for them, every man gathered his household round him, so that it was nothing short of a small tribe over which David ruled at Ziklag. But if he felt the growing extent of his power, he must have felt still more the peculiar restraints of his position. He had to find employment for a numerous company of warlike, if not unruly men, who had their families around them to support. True, they were well placed; Ziklag was a good centre from which raids might be made out upon the Geshurites and the Gezrites, and the Amalekites, the aboriginal tribes inhabiting the south. But then it was a condition of his alliance with Achish that a certain portion of the booty thus acquired was to be carried to Gath, and unfortunately, on one occasion at least, when David went up to Achish to fulfil this condition, and was asked by the king, "Whither have ye made a road to-day?" he told Achish that it was from the south of Judah, and not from the native tribes, that the prey had been gathered; still worse, afraid "lest they should tell on him," when he smote "the old inhabitants of the land as thou goest to Shur, he left neither man nor woman alive." A heavy price in deception and in cruelty to pay for the gaining and keeping of such protection as the Philistine afforded. But still worse lay behind. Another condition of this ill-omened connection was that, when required, David should take service in the Philistine army, and aid it in any war wherein it was embarked. David could scarcely have been unaware that in the event of a war breaking out between the Philistines and Saul, he had bound himself by this engagement to take part in it against his own countrymen. But he hoped that the occasion would not arise, or if it did, he trusted that some method might be found of escaping out of the painful and perilous dilemma in which it would place him. And for sixteen months his hopes were verified. But at last the occasion came. The Philistines gathered their armies together to fight with Israel. "And Achish said unto David, Know thou assuredly that thou shalt go out with me to battle, thou and thy men. And David said to Achish, Surely thou shalt know what thy servant can do." What he would have done had things taken their natural course we cannot say. He must either have proved false to Achish or have fought against Saul. Never was interference more opportune, never escape more welcome, than when the lords of the Philistines insisted that David and his men should go back before the battle to Ziklag. He had made himself the difficulty, and had no right to look for such a singular deliverance, but when it came, how glad, how grateful, must he have felt! He returned to Ziklag, to find it burned with fire, and all their wives and their children carried off. For the moment there was a look of mutiny among his men. They even spake of stoning him. But he "encouraged himself in the Lord his God"—that God who had so recently and so wonderfully extricated him from a still greater danger. The pursuit of the Amalekites was undertaken, and successful. All that had been carried away from Ziklag was recovered, and so much rich booty besides, that David was able to send presents to the men of all the cities of Judah, whom he and his men had been wont to haunt. It was on the third day after his return to Ziklag that David heard of the death of Saul. The weary days of his persecution were ended, the way at last was opened for him to the throne of Israel.

(To be concluded.)

STILL AND DEEP.

BY F. M. F. SKENE, AUTHOR OF "TRIED," "ONE LIFE ONLY," ETC.

CHAPTER XV.

CHARLES DAVENANT walked on in silence for a few minutes, and then looked round at Mary with a quiet unshrinking gaze.

"You may trust me, certainly, Miss Trevelyan; my wish is to do you a service, and some day I may be able to explain it to you, but not now. I shall tell you nothing of Lurline which she has not herself made patent to all who know her, and which most persons inhabiting Chiverley Rectory could hardly fail to learn; but I do not think you will." He respected Mary too much to add what was indeed his thought, that he believed her to be too pure and high-minded to be able even to conceive such a character as Laura's.

"You have," he continued, "felt the Lorelei's fascination in some slight degree, but you have very little idea of the power she really possesses in that respect, or with what consummate and unscrupulous art she uses it. She is perfectly aware of her gifts, and of the wonderful charm she can exercise over her fellow-creatures, and she is absolutely selfish in the manner in which she avails herself of it to gain her ends. To minister to her own self-love is the sole object of all her actions; but she clothes her intense egotism and real coldness of heart with the alluring semblance of a disposition so loving and tender, that she deceives the most astute, and wins from them a sort of compassionate affection which she knows how to foster into an ungovernable passion. Lurline's proceedings are never the result of impulse or natural temperament, though they always appear to be so because she is so exceedingly outspoken and free in her speech and manners. She establishes it as a settled fact that she is thoroughly unconventional, and does not choose to be bound by the customs of society, and this, of course, gives her great facility in her dealings with men; but, as a matter of fact, all she does is done with perfect consciousness and calculation of its import and results. She has two very distinct motives, which, however, work admirably together in the exercise of her great gift of fascination. The first is the intense self-love which makes her wish to draw to herself and entirely engross the affections of every person she meets; and the second, which is by far the strongest, is her imperious desire to make some marriage which shall carry her away out of this dull life, and bring her into a sphere where she can enjoy the world and its attractions."

"I have often wondered that she has not been married already," said Mary. "She is, outwardly at least, so very charming, that I should have thought many would have sought her long before this time!"

"And so, more or less, they have," said Charlie; "but there have been many causes for her failure, the chief of which has undoubtedly been that she has so frequently overshot her mark. She has led men on to a certain point, and then, in her eagerness to secure them, she has made her purpose so plain, that she has completely disgusted them, and they have backed out as ignominiously for themselves as for her. Then—although I think now, when she is verging on thirty, she would marry almost any one—in her earlier days she was disposed to fly too high, and aimed at those who could give her wealth and station. She has more than once come to grief, moreover, by trying to have too many strings to her bow, and has played off two or three individuals upon each other, till she has lost them all."

"How is that possible?" said Mary; "how could more than one stand on such ground of intimacy with her, at least at the same time, as to lead to the probability of marriage?"

"Oh, Lurline has a capital device for holding them all on a special footing of familiarity with her," answered Charlie, laughing; "she elects them to be her adopted brothers, and treats them with the familiar tenderness of a most affectionate sister, till such time as she thinks a revelation may be made that their mutual affection has passed the fraternal limits, and ought to be otherwise consolidated."

"But she calls you and Mr. Pemberton her brothers," said Mary, turning upon him a look of innocent bewilderment.

"Precisely," laughed Charlie; "and I think if I were simply to tell you the history of her proceedings with us two, you would better understand what the syren Lorelei of Chiverley is, than by any amount of general descriptions."

"But ought I to hear all this, Mr. Davenant?" said Mary, shrinkingly; "it is very painful to me"— and in truth her pure crystalline nature was cruelly jarred by these revelations of a scheming worldliness, which she had never before so much as dreamt of, and which was utterly distasteful to her.

"Oh, Lurline is certain to tell you all about it herself, the first day she can spare time from more important matters to give you her confidence; there is nothing she likes so much as talking of her various adopted relationships; besides, Miss Trevelyan, as I said before, I have a reason for speaking to you on this subject, and you have promised to trust me."

Gentle Mary said no more, and he went on.

"To begin with myself. When I came here two years ago, I was but a boy, I believe you think I am not much more now, and any idea of marriage for me would have been preposterous, especially with a woman nearly ten years older than myself; moreover, I am the youngest son of a country gentleman who has a small property and a large family, so that he has often told me he can do no more for me than give me a good education, and then leave me to shift for myself and make a living as best I can. I have some thoughts of trying my luck in the Australian bush, if anybody can be found to pay my passage out, but as a rule I am seldom possessed of any capital to an amount higher than three-and-sixpence; and I came to read with Mr. Wyndham because he takes us on very low terms, and my father could not afford to send me to the University; well, all this being made known to Lurline, she decided at once, of course, that I was not worth powder and shot so far as marriage was concerned, but at the same time it was quite impossible for her not to try to make me like her better than any one else in the world, and she succeeded. I was as much fascinated by her as every one else, and, having arrived at a mutual explanation, she adopted me as her brother, and I adored her as a species of goddess. A few months after my advent, John Pemberton came. Now, his position was in all respects different from mine; he was the only child of a man who had been very extravagant, and who had mortgaged his property to such an extent that it was quite certain his son would inherit nothing at his death but heavy pecuniary obligations; he has, however, an immensely rich uncle, and it is generally supposed that he will succeed to his great wealth. Lurline was under the impression that this was certain when he first came, and she marked him at once as her own; her enchantments took effect on him with much greater power than on me; he is two or three years older than I am, and far deeper and more solid in his natural qualities. When John Pemberton, on whom Lurline put forth the utmost power of her fascination, finally delivered up his heart and soul to love for her, he did it for his life, he will never more love any one on earth but her, be the end what it may."

"I can understand that," said Mary, quietly.

"This being the case, you can see how fearfully hard upon him is his present position. Of course, when she had brought him to this pass he asked her to marry him; then the fact came out, which he, poor fellow, had never had any intention of concealing, that his chances of succeeding to his uncle were extremely problematical; the old gentleman was very eccentric, he had distinctly told John not to count on his inheritance, and many persons thought that he would build a church or a hospital with his great wealth. It became necessary, therefore, that Lurline should make an ingenious little arrangement, by which she could save herself from any risk of losing John if he ever should become wealthy, and yet which should enable her to escape from him if any better marriage were offered to her, or if he remained poor. She persuaded him that she loved him as tenderly as he loved her, but that as it was impossible they could be united, at least at present, they would adopt each other as brother and sister, only in a far deeper sense than in her similar arrangement with me. John and she would be all in all to each other; they would enjoy the fullest confidence and friendship in the meantime, and if ever marriage became possible for them, their bliss would be supreme; at the same time it was best they should both consider themselves free, simply to continue the fraternal relation always, and to ally themselves matrimonially otherwise, if it should be desirable. Poor John told me all this himself, and it was with the saddest smile that he spoke of his dearest Laura's generous thoughtfulness in having wished to leave him free, while he knew well, and never dreamt that she did too, that he had bound himself to her with an adamantine chain which he would drag with him to the grave. Poor, dear, honest fellow! it is a most cruel fate for him in every way; ruin and destruction to all his hopes and prospects. He looks upon it simply as an engagement, and whether she married him or not, he could never give a thought to any other woman to the end of his days; while she is prepared to throw him over the very first moment she can meet with any one who will marry her, and can afford it."

"Oh, impossible!" exclaimed Mary.

"It is perfectly certain, Miss Trevelyan, for she says so herself. She will tell you that dearest John would wish her to be happy with some one else if she cannot be his wife, and that she will make it a condition with any one she marries that the fraternal attachment between John and herself is to be continued."

"But no one would marry her under the circumstances, on such conditions."

"No; and therefore she will drop all mention of it the moment there is any question of another marriage; in the meantime it satisfies poor John that in no case will he be altogether separated from her, and, as a matter of fact, he does not realise the possibility of her marrying any one but himself, or of her failing to be as faithful to him as he will be to her if their union is never possible. He believes that her affection for him is as true as his own; and how he is deceived!—for his is the noble unchanging love of a loyal heart!"

"But there is a chance that they may be married some day," said Mary, "and if so, all will be well for him, no less than for her."

"I cannot think that; her conduct with regard to John Pemberton, whom I love and revere with all my heart, has opened my eyes as to what Lurline really is; she is in no sense worthy of him, and we have the proof of it in the fact that good, and in some respects even saintly, as John still is, he has yet experienced a certain amount of spiritual deterioration by his intercourse with her. He has always been a man of strong religious principles, but the death of his mother, and other circumstances, so deepened his devotional feelings, that he determined to devote himself entirely to the service of God, and to take holy orders so soon as he was able to pass the necessary examinations; he has not abandoned this intention, because Lurline has not in so many words asked him to do so. But she has said plainly that nothing would induce her to be a clergyman's wife, and he has agreed to postpone any step which would finally bind him to that profession; I much fear if it were a choice between Lurline and the holy calling to which he so ardently aspired, there is little question which would carry the day. Am I wrong in saying that she is fearfully cruel thus to drive him from a high and worthy aim, to lower his standard, and weaken his principle, and then when it suits her to desert him, leave him stranded in a wrecked existence?"

"But, Mr. Davenant," exclaimed Mary, earnestly, "why should you blame her for what she may never deserve; surely, you are specially hard judging to-night, you always seem to like her very much yourself."

"I like her society because she is in every way attractive, and very good-tempered in a general way, but she is essentially dangerous, Miss Trevelyan, and so you will find."

CHAPTER XVI.

Mary Trevelyan made no answer, for she could not bear to prolong a conversation in which so much that was absolutely abhorrent to herself was attributed to one of whom personally she knew no evil; but could she have guessed what kind-hearted Charles Davenant's motive had really been for being so persistently determined to make these revelations to her, how would her serene spirit have been troubled, and her deep tender heart pierced with an anguish of terror!

The true state of the case was simply this, one morning, a day or two previously, Charlie Davenant had been sitting reading in the bow window of the drawing-room, where Mrs. Wyndham was also established in her easy chair, when Laura came in with a piece of embroidery in her hand, an art in which she had exquisite skill, in addition to her other accomplishments. She took a low chair, and sat down opposite to her step-mother, nodding to Charlie to show that she was cognisant of his presence, and said, "I have come to have a chat with you, Mrs. Wyndham."

"Indeed!" said the lady. And to what am I indebted for so unusual a favour?" There was never the smallest pretence of affection between these two; and it was one of the strange contradictions of Laura's very singular character, that with all her artfulness she was recklessly outspoken whenever it did not interfere with her schemes that she should be so; her answer was prompt, and to the point.

"Because I want you to tell me all about Mary Trevelyan."

"What is there to tell?" said Mrs. Wyndham, indolently; "you know her history as well as I do;

(Drawn by W. SMALL.)

"I have come to have a chat with you, Mrs. Wyndham."—p. 475.

she is a friendless orphan, and Mr. Lisle's adopted daughter."

"Yes; but I want to know what her history is in connection with Bertrand Lisle."

"Simply that in all probability she will become his wife."

"What ground have you for saying that?"

"Mr. Lisle's letter to myself," said Mrs. Wyndham, yawning. It was less trouble to answer her step-daughter's sharp questions with a direct reply, than to make any attempt at holding back what she saw no reason for concealing.

"What did he say? tell me exactly," said her imperious questioner.

"Oh dear me, Laura, how can I remember all he said; and I destroyed the letter."

"That was just as well perhaps; but tell me what was in it. You cannot have forgotten how you got the impression that Mary was to be Bertrand's wife."

"Mr. Lisle said that he had reasons for wishing such a union above everything in the world, that he intended to make it his dying request to his son that he should marry her, and that he had not the slightest doubt it would be Bertrand's own desire, as he was convinced they were mutually attached to each other."

"Did he say if there was any engagement between them?" asked Laura, eagerly.

"He distinctly said there was not, and that he knew the subject had not then been approached by them."

"And they can scarcely have engaged themselves since, over the old man's new-made grave," said Laura.

"No; I can tell you that they have not, for I wanted to know what was to become of Mary after her year with us was out, and I asked her in so many words if she was engaged to Bertrand, and she told me she was not."

"Yes, and she told me she had not the remotest idea where she was to go after she left us," said Laura. "That is all right; I quite understand the whole affair; it is one of those family arrangements that will never take place."

"Why should it never take place?" said Mrs. Wyndham, looking at her inquiringly, out of her sleepy eyes.

"I do not feel called upon to reveal all the mysteries of my prophetic soul," said Laura, laughing, as she rose, and folded up her work, having ascertained all she desired; "only I can tell you this, Mrs. Wyndham, that Bertrand Lisle will never engage himself to Mary Trevelyan!" and she walked out of the room with the light of triumph in her gleaming eyes.

Charlie Davenant listened in perfect silence to this conversation; and now he said quietly to Mrs. Wyndham, "Do you expect Mr. Bertrand Lisle here at any time, Mrs. Wyndham?"

"Yes; he has written to tell me that he hopes to pay us a visit in the spring in order to see Mary Trevelyan. I think it is rather cool on his part, considering that I had not invited him; but he is my cousin, of course."

"Then you have agreed to receive him?"

"Oh yes; I could not do otherwise. He will be here some weeks."

"And Laura knows it?"

"Of course!" and she turned round, apparently with the determined purpose of going to sleep in her chair.

"Just so!" said Charlie to himself, as he left the room. "I see it all. Bertrand Lisle, the diplomatist, living in gay Italy, a man in the first society, is the very beau ideal of a husband for Lurline. She has made up her mind to win him, and she will succeed, I fear; and if Mary Trevelyan loves him, as no doubt she does, it will go far to crush the life out of her, for she is not one to love lightly or to change, I am very sure. Poor, sweet Mary! so still, so pure, so white! She always reminds me of the sculptured angels in the cathedral at home. I cannot bear to think of her being made to suffer, perhaps to the death, by our unscrupulous syren. I will try to warn her. Perhaps, if she knew what Lurline really is, she could put her lover on his guard, or prevent him coming here at all, which would be wisest. At least, I will try what I can do."

And Charlie did his best, as we have seen. He was exceedingly shrewd and observant, and he had been very much struck by the beauty of Mary Trevelyan's character, even during the short time he had known her. He had penetrated to the depths which lay beneath her stillness of manner, and had recognised the noble self-devotion, the pure truthfulness, the sweetness of charity which were hidden there; and although she seemed too far above himself for him to dream of falling in love with her, he was yet rapidly drifting into a feeling of most deep and sincere friendship for her, which made him intensely anxious to save her from future suffering.

Nevertheless, his well-intentioned effort had not proved very successful: one of Mary Trevelyan's most amiable qualities was her complete possession of that special element of heavenly charity which "thinketh no evil." It was almost impossible for her to harbour an uncharitable thought of any one. She had the most generous trust in the goodness of her fellow-creatures, and it was unendurable to her to believe that Laura could really be such a character as Charlie had represented her.

Charlie Davenant made one more attempt to show her that at least there was deep design hidden under most of Laura's actions. He had noticed, with his usual shrewdness, that, for some reason or other, Laura persistently resisted all Miss Trevelyan's entreaties that she would let her hear her sing.

Mary herself sang charmingly, with a low rich contralto voice singularly touching and pathetic in its tone, and it had been one of her chief attractions to Bertrand, who was passionately fond of music—a fact which Laura had succeeded in drawing from her on one of the many occasions when she questioned her guest as to Mr. Lisle's tastes and fancies.

But it was quite in vain that Mary asked for the pleasure of hearing her, which John Pemberton owned to her was often bestowed on him when she was out of the way. Laura had always some convenient excuse for putting it off to another day, which never came.

One evening, when it was dusk, Mary was coming home from the village, where she had soon made her way both into the hearts and homes of the neglected people, when she found Charlie Davenant waiting for her at the gate.

"Come round with me this way if you are not in a hurry, Miss Trevelyan," he said, pointing to the gravel path which led round to the back of the house. "I have a pleasure in store for you, and I have been waiting to waylay you before you got into the house."

She followed him at once with a smile, thinking that in his good-nature he had prepared some pleasant surprise for her. He led her round to a part of the shrubbery near the open window of a little room which was used by Pemberton and himself as a study. As they drew near it there suddenly fell on Mary Trevelyan's ears a sound which she could scarce believe belonged to this gross lower earth at all. It was a voice of melody so wildly sweet, so exquisitely soft and thrilling, that a tremor ran through all her frame as the celestial harmony rose and fell upon the dying night breeze like the harmonious echoes of heavenly strains. Never in her life had Mary Trevelyan heard or imagined anything equal to the beauty of this wondrous singing. It seemed hardly possible it could come from a human voice, and it was unlike any style of music she had ever known. There was no accompaniment of an instrument; yet it seemed almost impossible that a single voice could produce all the marvellous effects which floated on the air—now sounding like the sweetest wail of sorrow, now like a joyous bird carolling among the trees, now like an echo giving back the perfect notes with the most ethereal delicacy of tone.

"What is it? where does it come from?" asked Mary, quite bewildered.

Charlie drew her to the open window, and there within the room sat Laura, looking more like the lovely witch of the Rhine than ever, with her gleaming eyes and flowing hair, while John Pemberton, flung on the ground at her feet, was gazing up into her beautiful face with enraptured eyes.

(To be continued.)

"ABOUT MY FATHER'S BUSINESS."

BY THOMAS ARCHER.

WITH THE POOR AND NEEDY.

"ABANDON hope all ye who enter here," would, as we might almost fancy, be an appropriate inscription for many a wretched court and alley in the greatest and most opulent city in the world—a city distinguished for its claims to be regarded as the centre of civilisation; as the exemplar of benevolence, and of active Christianity. It is one of the marvellous results of the vast extent of this metropolis of England that there are whole districts of foul dwellings crowded with a poverty-stricken population, which yet are almost ignored, so far as public recognition of their existence is concerned. Legislation itself does not reach them, in the sense of compelling the strict observance of Acts of Parliament framed and presumably enforced for the purpose of maintaining sanitary conditions; philanthropy almost stands appalled at the difficulty of dealing with a chronic necessity, so widely spread, a misery and ignorance so deep and apparently impregnable; sentimentalism sighs and turns away with a shiver, or is touched to the extent of relieving its overcharged susceptibilities by the comfortable expedient of the smallest subscription to some association in the neighbourhood. True, active, practical religion alone, of all the agencies that have operated in these places, gains ground inch by inch, and at last exercises a definite and beneficial influence, by taking hold of the hearts and consciences of the people themselves, and working from within the area of vice and misery, till the law of love, beginning to operate where the law of force had no influence, a change, gradual but sure, here a little and there a little, is effected.

We are continually hearing of the "dwellings of the poor;" and can scarcely take up a newspaper without noting the phrase, "one of the worst neighbourhoods in London" connected with some report of crime, outrage, or suffering; yet how few of us are really familiar with the actual abodes of the more degraded and miserable of our fellow-citizens! how quickly, how gladly, we dismiss from our memory the account of an inquest where the evidence of the cause of death of some unfortunate man, woman, or child, without a natural share of light, air, food, and water, reveals hideous details of want and wretchedness, which we might witness only a few streets off, and yet are unconscious of their nearness to us in mere physical yards and furlongs, because they are so far from us spiritually, in our lack of sympathy and compassion.

Even at the time that these lines are being written I have before me a report of an examination by the coroner into the circumstances attending the death of a woman of seventy years old, who obtained a miserable and precarious living by stay-making, and who was found dead in the back kitchen of a house. Her death was alleged to have been brought about by the unhealthiness of the house in which she lived, although the landlord was a medical officer of health for one of the metropolitan districts.

In this case the alleged landlord, who was actually a medical officer of health, answered the charge made against him by the statement that he had only just come into possession of the property, and had at once set about putting it in repair. It is to be hoped that this was the case, and, indeed, the evidence of the sanitary inspector went to show that it was so; but the question remains: How is it that dwellings are permitted to be thus overcrowded, and to become actual centres of pestilence in the midst of entire neighbourhoods, where, for one foul tenement to have an infamous reputation amidst such general filth and dilapidation, it must indeed be, as one member of the jury said this place was, "so bad, that no gentleman would keep his dog there?"

Keep his dog indeed! Why I know whole rows and congeries of intersecting courts and alleys where a country squire would no more think of kenneling his hounds than he would dream of stabling his horses! There has during the past few years been a tolerably determined stand made against the introduction of pigstyes into the backyards of some of the hovels about Mile End and Bethnal Green; and though cow-sheds are not altogether abolished everywhere in close and overbuilt localities, there are some precautions taken to diminish the sale of infected milk by an inspection of the laystalls, and the enforcement of limewhiting and ventilation in the sheds. Costermongers' donkeys are the only animals besides dogs and cats which are commonly to be found in London slums now, and as these can be stowed in any shanty just outside the back door, or can be littered down in a spare corner of a cellar, they remain, in costermongering districts, without much opposition on the part of the local authorities. For, after all, what can these authorities do? Under the 35th section of the Sanitary Act, power was given to them to register all houses let out by non-resident landlords, who were under a penalty of forty shillings for not keeping their houses in repair, well supplied with water, drainage clear, &c. To those who have an intimate acquaintance with the density of population in whole acreages of London slums, there is something almost ludicrous in these words, especially when they are read in the light of the fact that the landlords of such places are frequently parochial magnates or officials, who know how to make things pleasant with subordinate sanitary inspectors.

What may be the ultimate result of an Act of Parliament "for improving the dwellings of the poor" it is not at present easy to say; but assuredly any plan which commences by a general and imperfectly discriminative destruction of existing houses, hovels though they may be, will only have the effect of crowding more closely the already fœtid and swarming tenements where, for half-a-crown a week, eight or ten people eat, live, and sleep in a single apartment. It was only the other day, in a district of which I shall presently speak more definitely, that a "mission woman" was called in to the aid of a family, consisting of a man, his wife, his wife's brother—who was there as a lodger—and five or six children, all of whom occupied one room, where the poor woman had just given birth to an infant. The place was almost destitute of furniture; beds of straw and shavings, coverlets of old coats and such ragged clothing as could be spared; little fire and little food. Such destitution demanded that the "maternity box," or a suddenly-extemporised bag of baby-clothing and blankets, should be fetched at once; and though the mission there is a poor one, with terrible needs to mitigate, a constant demand for personal work and noble self-sacrifice, such cases are everyday events, such demands always to be answered by some kind of helpful sympathy, even though the amount of relief afforded is necessarily small and temporary in character.

Not in one quarter of London alone, but dotted here and there throughout its vastly-extending length and breadth—from St. Pancras, and further away northward, to Bethnal Green and all that great series of poverty-stricken townships and colonies of casual labour, on the east; from the terrible purlieus of Southwark, the districts where long rows of silent houses, in interminable streets, chill the unaccustomed wayfarer with vague apprehensions, where "Little Hell" and the knots and tangles of that "Thief-London" which has found a deplorable Alsatia in the purlieus of the Borough and of Bermondsey; and so round the metropolitan circle, westward to the neighbourhood of aristocratic mansions and quiet suburban retreats, where the garotter skulks and the burglar finds a refuge; further towards the centre of the town, in Westminster, not a stone's-throw from the great legislative assembly, which, while it debates in St. Stephen's on sanitation and the improvement of dwellings, scarcely remembers all that may be seen in St. Peter's, about Pye Street, and remembers Seven Dials and St. Giles's only as traditional places, where "modern improvements" have made a clean sweep, just as the Holborn Viaduct and the Metropolitan Railway swept away Field Lane, and the new meat market at Smithfield put an end for ever to the horrible selvage of Cloth Fair—are to all but the legends of Jonathan Wild's rookery and the "blood-bowl house."

But the very mention of these places, and the reflection that not in outlying districts, but in the very heart of London, in the core of the great city itself, the canker of misery, poverty, and vice is festering still. What is the use of eviction, when the law punishes houselessness, and the Poor Law cannot meet any sudden demand, nor maintain any continuous claim on the part of the houseless? Summarily to thrust a score or so of wretched families into the streets is to make them either criminals or paupers. They must find some place of shelter; and if they are to live by their labour they must live near their labour, the wages of which are, at best, only just sufficient to procure for them necessary food and covering for their bodies.

In the neighbourhood to which I have already referred, four thousand evictions have taken place, or, at any rate, the population has diminished from 22,000 to 18,000, because of a small section of a large puzzle map of courts and alleys having been taken down in order to build great blocks of warehouses. The consequence is, that in the remaining tangle of slums the people herd closer, and that a large number of poor lodgers have gone to crowd other tenements not far distant, and which were already peopled beyond legal measure.

For this acreage of vice and wretchedness of which I speak is close to the great City thoroughfares—almost within sound of Bow bells. It is about a quarter of a mile in extent each way, lying between the Charterhouse and St. Luke's, close to the new meat market at Smithfield on one side, and Finsbury Square on the other. One entrance to it is directly through Golden Lane, Barbican; the other close to Bunhill Fields burial-ground, along a passage which bears the significant name of "Chequer Alley." It is a maze of intersecting and interlocking courts, streets, and alleys, some of them without any thoroughfare, some reached by ascending or descending steps, many of them mere tanks, the walls of which are represented by hovels inhabited by costermongers, French-polishers, dock-labourers, chair-makers, workers at all kinds of underpaid labour and poor handicrafts. Many of the women go out to work at factories, or at charing, and the children are—or at least were—left to the evil influences of the streets, till another and a more powerful influence began to operate, slowly, but with the impetus of faith and love, to touch even this neglected and miserable quarter of London with "the light that lighteth every man."

In this square quarter of a mile—which, starting from the edge of Aldersgate, stretches to the further main thoroughfare abutting on the pleasant border of the City Road, and includes the northern end of Whitecross Street—there are eighty public-houses and beer-shops!

I tell you this much, as we stand here at the entrance of Golden Lane, but I have no intention just now to take you on a casual visit either to the dens of wretchedness and infamy, or to the homes where poverty abides. I must try to let you see what has been done, and is still doing, to bring to both that Gospel which is alone efficient to change the conditions, by changing the hearts and motives of men. I may well avoid any description of the places which lie on either hand, for, in fact, there is nothing picturesque in such misery, nothing specially sensational in such crime. It is all of a sordid, miserable sort; all on a dreary dead-level of wretchedness and poverty, full of poor shifts and expedients, or of mean brutality and indifference. There is no show-place to which you could be taken, as it is said curious gentlemen were at one time conducted to the dens of the mendicants, thieves, and highwaymen of old London. Even in the tramps' kitchen the orgies, if there are any, are of so low a kind that they would be depressing in their monotonous degradation.

Let us go farther, and enter this strange wilderness by its fitting passage of Chequer Alley, so that we may, as it were, see the beginning of the work that has been going on with more or less power for more than thirty years.

I think I have some acquaintance with what are the worst neighbourhoods of London. I have made many a journey down East; have studied some of the strange varieties of life on the shore amidst the water-side population; have lived amidst the slums of Spitalfields, and passed nights "Whitechapel way;" but never in any unbroken area of such extent have I seen so much that is suggestive of utter poverty, so much privation of the ordinary means of health and decency, as on a journey about this district which I long ago named "The Chequers." Each court and blind alley has the same characteristics—the same look of utter poverty, the same want of air and light, the same blank aspect of dingy wall and sunken doorsteps, the same square areas surrounded by hovels with clothes'-lines stretched from house to house, almost unstirred by any breeze that blows, shut in as they are in close caverns, only to be entered by narrow passages between blank walls. It is the extent of this one solid district, almost in the very centre of City life, that is so bewildering, and wherein lies its terrible distraction.

The labour of reformation has begun, but the labourers are few. For more than thirty years some efforts have been going on to redeem this neglected and unnoticed neighbourhood, which lies so near to, and yet so far from London's heart.

Let it be noted that this moral effort had gone on for nearly twenty-nine years before any very definite attempt was made to improve the physical condition of the places.

In 1841 a tract distributor, Miss Macarthy, began an organised endeavour to teach the depraved inhabitants of Chequer Alley. In 1869, a sanitary surveyor, reporting on one of the courts of this foul district, recommended that the premises there should be demolished under the "Artisans' and Labourers' Dwelling Act," because the floors and ceilings were considerably out of level, some of the walls saturated with filth and water, the others broken and falling down, doors, window-sashes and frames rotten, stairs dilapidated and dangerous, roof leaky and admitting the rain, no provisions for decency, and a foul and failing water-supply.

The "pulling-down" remedy, without any simultaneous building up, has been extended since then in a locality where a model lodging-house, which has been erected, has stood for years almost unoccupied, because, like all model lodging-houses in such neighbourhoods, neither the provisions nor the rentals are adapted to meet the wants and the means of the poorest, of whom, as I have already said, a whole family cannot afford to pay more than the rental for a single room, or two rooms at the utmost.

But we are wandering away from the work that we came to see. Look at that wistful young native, standing there quite close to the mouth of Chequer Alley. Ask him what is that sound of children's voices from a casually-opened doorway, and he will tell you, "It's our school; yer kin go in, sir, if yer like—anybody kin." As the name of the institution is "Hope Schools for All," his invitation is doubtless authorised, and we may well feel that we have made a mistake in thinking of the Italian poet's hopeless life, for out of the doorway there comes a sound of singing, and inside the doorway is a room containing fifty or sixty "infants," seated on low forms, and many of them such bright, rosy—yes, rosy—clean—yes, comparatively, if not superlatively clean—little creatures, that hope itself springs to fresh life in their presence. It is thirty-four years since Miss Macarthy, with an earnest desire to initiate some work of charity and mercy, resolved to become a distributor of tracts, and the district she chose was this same foul tangle to which I have asked you to accompany me. Bad as the whole neighbourhood is now, it was worse then. It was never what is called a thief-quarter, but many juvenile thieves haunted it; and the men were as ruffianly and abusive, the women as violent and evil-tongued, as any who could be found in all London. Instead of being paved, and partially and insufficiently drained, it was a fœtid swamp, with here and there a pool where ducks swam, while the foul odours of the place were suffocating. No constable dare venture far into the maze without a companion. But the tract distributor ventured. In the midst of an epidemic of typhus, or what is known as "poverty" fever, she went about among the people, and strove to fix their attention on the message that she carried. The religious services commenced in a rat-catcher's "front parlour," and at first the congregation broke into the hymns with scraps and choruses of songs. The crowd which collected outside not only interrupted the proceedings, but threatened those who conducted them with personal violence, and even assaulted them, and heaped insult upon them; but the lady who had put her hand to the plough would not turn back. In the midst of her patient and difficult work she herself was stricken down with fever. She had visited and tended those who were suffering. When the question was asked what had become of her, the barbarous people learnt that she was like to die. Perhaps this touched the hearts of some of them, for she had begun to live down the brutal opposition of those who could not believe in unselfish endeavours to benefit them. She recovered, however; and, supported by others, who gave both money and personal effort, the beneficent work went on.

In this large room where the infants are singing we have an example of what has been effected. Some of the little creatures are pale, and have that wistful look that goes to the heart; but there are few of them that have not clean faces, and who do not show in the poor scanty little dresses some attempt at decent preparation for meeting "the guv'ness."

There is a school for elder children also; and in the ramshackle old house where the classes are held there are appliances which mark the wide application of the beneficent effort that has grown slowly but surely, not only in scope, but in its quiet influence upon the people amidst whom it was inaugurated. Yonder, in a kind of covered yard, is a huge copper, the honoured source of those "penny dinners," and those quarts and gallons of soup which have been such a boon to the neighbourhood, where food is scarce and dear. Then there was the Christmas dinner, at which some hundreds of little guests were supplied with roast meat and pudding, evidences of how much may be effected within a very small space. Indeed, this Hope School, with its two or three rooms, is at work day and night; for not only are the children taught—children not eligible for those Board schools which, unless the Board itself mitigate its technical demands, will shut up this and similar institutions before any provision is made for transferring the children to the care of a Government department—but there are "mothers' meetings," sewing classes, where poor women can obtain materials at cost price, and be taught to make them into articles of clothing. There are also adult classes, and Sunday evening services for those who would never appear at church or chapel but for such an easy transition from their poor homes to the plain neighbourly congregation assembled there. There are evenings, too, when lectures, dissolving views, social teas, and pleasant friendly meetings bring the people together with humanising influences. I have even heard that there is a flower-show in the summer—fancy a flower-show in Chequer Alley!—and I know that there is a summer excursion for the poor little denizens of this dread district, where the poor and the needy are at last hearing the voice that calls them to Divine grace and tender loving-kindness.

But here is a youthful guide—a shambling, shock-headed lad, with only three-quarters of a pair of shoes, and without a cap, who is to be our guide to another great work, on the Golden Lane side of this great zigzag, to the "Costermongers' Mission," in fact. You may follow him with confidence, for he is a Hope School boy—and that means something, even in Chequer Alley.

BRAVEST OF ALL.

A STORY FOR BOYS. IN THREE PARTS.

PART III.

MANY days passed, and Robert Nicholson lay in bed, seriously ill. He had taken a severe cold from standing so long in wet clothes, and the doctor in attendance expressed grave fears as to the result of the attack, although comforting the boy's parents by assuring them that his constitution was naturally very strong.

David Maxwell was a daily visitor, but he had been obliged to content himself with sending messages of sympathy to his friend, for he was not permitted to enter the sick lad's room at present. Young Dashford had called several times, having heard that the accident on the mill-pond had resulted in serious consequences to Robert.

The very first day the invalid was strong enough to speak a little, he asked to be allowed to see David Maxwell, who had sent up a message by Mrs. Nicholson.

David was permitted to come up-stairs to see his friend for a short time; and the impetuous fellow was almost overpowered with grief when he saw how ill Robert looked. He had never before seen any one so seriously ill, and the thought immediately came into his mind that his friend must be dying; but had he considered for a moment, he might have understood that his presence in the room was a proof that his friend was improving.

Robert put his hand out, saying very feebly, "Davie, I'm glad to see you!"

David could not speak for a moment, his heart was so full; but presently he answered, "I wanted to come up long ago, Bob, but the doctor would not hear of it. Are you better?"

"A little better, Davie," said Robert, feebly.

Then David's tongue was loosed, and he said, "That young scamp who brought all this about was at school next day as well as ever. I only wish he was ill instead of you! He richly deserved to be ill."

A faint smile on Robert's face showed that he understood the nature of David Maxwell's good-will towards himself, although it was expressed in such extraordinary language.

"Don't say that, Davie! Poor little Briscoe might have died!" he said.

"And so might you have died, Bob!"

"Yes, I might have died, David," said the sick boy, slowly and seriously, but without any fear in his voice, as he looked steadily into his friend's face and repeated the words again as if to himself, "I might have died!"

Whether he intended his words to make any impression on his companion or not, they seemed for a short time to create a silence between them, which was broken presently by David asking, "Weren't you afraid, Bob?"

"Of what, Davie?"

"Why, afraid of what we were talking about a moment ago."

"Dying, do you mean?"

"Yes, weren't you afraid that you might die?"

A moisture seemed to dim the sick boy's eyes for a brief moment, but his tears gave place to a pleasant smile.

"Yes, Davie, I was afraid at first," he said.

"And you're not afraid now, I suppose, the danger is over?" inquired David.

"The doctor doesn't think me out of danger yet; but I'm not afraid."

"I'd be in a dreadful fright if I were in your place then," said David, candidly.

"Why should you be afraid? you must die one day, David."

"Yes, of course we must all die; but I think if I knew I was in danger I should be frightened."

"My mother explained to me about God, and about Jesus dying for me on the cross. I wasn't afraid when I knew that there was nothing to fear, David."

David had often heard these things before from his own parents, but they never seemed to have arrested his attention particularly until now, when Robert Nicholson used them. The near approach of death is a very solemn time for all, but especially solemn for a bright eager thoughtless boy, who finds for the first time in his life that it is a terrible reality. He left his friend after a little, wondering much to himself what secret power it was that had removed Bob Nicholson's fear, and made him brave, even in the face of death itself.

He came to see his friend almost daily, but strange to say he carefully avoided all reference to the subject that had occupied their attention on the occasion of his first visit. Bob often wondered whether David had forgotten all about the matter, but people do not necessarily forget because they do not give expression to their thoughts.

As the early spring approached Bob regained strength rapidly, whilst poor Ned, who had all this time been a patient sufferer, grew weaker and weaker. Long before this the doctor had whispered to Mr. and Mrs. Nicholson that their youngest son would not again be strong, and that his stay amongst them might now be counted by days. Very tenderly and lovingly was the poor sufferer watched and tended, Robert devoting his days of convalescence to cheering him by reading and conversation.

One bright April day, long to be remembered, David Maxwell had come to spend the afternoon with his friends, for Ned looked for his cheerful face now almost as eagerly as Bob did, and welcomed his coming with as much glee. But this day Ned was too weak to do more than welcome him with a smile, and so the boys sat close to the bed and talked to each other in whispers, until Ned went off asleep. By-and-by he woke with a start, and tried to sit up, as if he wished to look about him. His brother was bending over him in an instant, soothing him.

"Have you been dreaming, Ned?" he inquired.

"No, Bob, not dreaming! I saw the angels beckoning me to come up hither."

"Lie down and rest, Ned; you were dreaming," said his brother.

But the sick boy protested, as well as his failing strength would permit, that he had seen God's angels calling him, and that he would soon be with them himself.

"Davie, won't you come and live with God?" he asked, turning to where David Maxwell sat, and putting his thin cold hands on his. "I'll be thinking of you in heaven, Davie, and wishing to have you there—won't you come?"

"I'll try, Ned—indeed I'll try!" answered David, with tears in his eyes.

Ned looked with pleasure at him, saying, "Jesus will take you, Davie, if you ask Him. You'll never be able to get there by yourself—won't you ask Jesus?"

"Yes, Ned, I will—indeed I will!" said David, fervently!

Ned passed away quietly to his rest on the following day, and the vision he had seen of God's angels was not perhaps a dream after all—who shall say?

There is in Winchbrook churchyard a quiet grave, beneath a spreading chestnut-tree, where in the summer-time two lads are fond of spending many an hour together in earnest conversation. They are both healthy and strong, but always when they enter this quiet retreat a sense of deep solemnity appears to make them more thoughtful than lads of their age usually are; and one, who is easily recognised by his bright eager face as David Maxwell, not unfrequently lays his hands on his companion's shoulder when they approach the small grave, saying, "You and I remember our promise to Ned, Bob! I understand now what made you so brave in the very presence of death."

C. F. H.

"THE QUIVER" BIBLE CLASS.

187. What was to have been the sum of money paid by Haman for the destruction of the Jews?

188. Quote a passage which would show that, after his conversion, it was three years before St. Paul knew any of the apostles.

189. What governor of Damascus endeavoured to take St. Paul, and make him a prisoner?

190. It is said of the ostrich that she lays her eggs in the sand to be hatched by the heat thereof. Mention any place in the Book of Job where this is stated.

191. What is mentioned in the Gospels as signs of the coming of rain?

192. What was the origin of the two days of Purim, kept as days of feasting and joy by the Jews?

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS ON PAGE 448.

176. Jehoiachin (2 Chron. xxxvi. 9).

177. "Know ye that our brother Timothy is set at liberty" (Heb. xiii. 23).

178. By putting an image in the bed with a pillow of goat's hair for his bolster (1 Sam. xix. 13).

179. "And one of the king of Israel's servants answered and said, Here is Elisha the son of Shaphat which poured water on the hands of Elijah" (2 Kings iii. 11).

180. Profaning the Sabbath (Neh. xiii. 18, Jer. xvii. 27, and Ezekiel xx. 24).

(Drawn by M. E. EDWARDS.)

SUMMER MORNING.

TO wake of summer morn, and from the grey
Warm roof of slumb'rous vapour, soft and low,
Hear music coming from the quiet bay—
Ethereal beauty, sweetest far away,

Upon the glimmering waters brood and flow;
Divine as is a rose in fullest blow,
With cool dews of the happy dusk of May,
Still dreaming on its leaves, in the first glow;

And listening, deem it half a dream, the while
'Tis lost beyond the headland; and in lieu,
From the open casement where the lilacs smile,
Be visited by airs from beds of blue
Violets and heath. Then rise and walk a mile
By hedges, with the wave-lights dazzling through.

T. C. I.

THE BRIDGE BETWEEN.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE TROUBLES OF CHATTY AND MOLLY," "THE DINGY HOUSE AT KENSINGTON," "QUEEN MADGE," "AGAINST HERSELF," ETC., ETC., ETC.

CHAPTER XVIII.—BENEATH THE SUMMER SKY.

THE grasshopper sang its love song to the summer night, the stars came out and stared blindly down at her, and a gentle breeze rose and rustled among the tall grass and the tangled underwood; but still she did not move or stir. Dorothy understood it all now. For the past two years, nay, all her life it seemed to her, she had been dreaming, but now she was wide awake, and would never dream again. Yet she could not realise, after all, the time he had known her, and all he had said, and after those happy days just before her grandfather died, that he did not love her more than Netta. She had not scrupled too to let him see her own feelings, she had been too much of a child, and too innocent, to hide them, but now that she understood that her own heart and its knowledge had chased her out of her Eden into the world's beaten track, the remembrance of all she had said and done flashed upon her. And so, suddenly, pride was born to her, and she stood, her face still resting in her hands upon the fence, and struggled with that bitter sorrow which sometimes comes into a girl's life, yet only once, and while the world is still new and strange to her, and which is as keen and bitter as any that is placed on the world's long list of troubles. It was so dreadful too, she had nowhere to hide herself, no one to tell, or to sympathise with, and the summer and the sun, and the world, and all it held, seemed to have lost their beauty for ever. She, who had waited for his return, and remembered his words and treasured his letter, to be forgotten for Netta, who had only been six or seven weeks in the house, it seemed cruel; and every time she thought of her sister's beautiful face, she knew how hopeless it was to think that he might ever return to her. There seemed nothing left to live for; no one loved her—no one save her brothers, and sister Sally, and even they were getting new tastes and new ideas, and learning to live their lives without her. She would have given anything in the world if some one would have cared for her if only a little, it seemed such a blessed thing, and she shivered in the warm air as she thought of Adrian Fuller's tender tone when he spoke to her sister, and remembered how different had been his manner to herself only that afternoon. She looked up presently, and stared back across the garden at the house, then went slowly down the pathway, and in-doors. She listened for a moment, and heard the sound of cheery voices in the sitting-room, it seemed like a world out of which she was shut, and then she went up-stairs to her own room again, and locked herself in.

"No one will miss me now," she thought; "and I feel as if I could never see him again."

CHAPTER XIX.—THE SCENT OF THE ROSE.

IT seemed to Dorothy when the morning came, that she was years older. "The world was under my feet the other day," she said; "but now I feel as if I carried it on my shoulders;" and the old vexed question came back to her, "What do we live for, I wonder?"

"Dorothy, what is the matter?" Netta asked—there was something in Netta's manner that made Dorothy recoil from her—"you look as white as a ghost. I expect Mr. Fuller this morning, and want you to put the study nice and neat." It used to be Dorothy who expected him once.

"I won't!" and she turned round and faced the Beauty with a firm set face.

"Dorothy, what's the matter?"

"Nothing is the matter, only I won't do as you tell me, and I won't let you order me about. You have come home and spoilt my home for me, even the garden," and the tears came into her eyes, for she had so loved the garden; "and you have turned every one against me; no one cares for me, no one at all, and—and you have taken even Mr. Fuller away from me."

"I! how can you be so foolish, Dorothy! I have not taken Mr. Fuller. I have only tried to prevent you from making yourself foolish; why, he could see you were in love with him, and knew it as well as I did."

"He didn't!" said Dorothy, with flashing eyes and face and throat dyed crimson, as she stood also chained to the spot on which she stood, while a faint sick feeling sent a chill into her very heart. Presently, slowly and deliberately, she turned round, and looked at Netta, at her beautiful face and golden hair, at her small white hands and the graceful snowy frill round her white throat, and (for she was so great a lover of all that was beautiful) she found an excuse for her old companion, though she read her own hopelessness in her sister's soft blue eyes. "He didn't!" she repeated softly, her head drooping, and the pride that was new stinging her till she felt almost cowed.

"He did," repeated Netta; "he told me so."

Then the pent-up passion in the girl's heart found expression.

"It is too bad!" she exclaimed, bursting into passionate tears. "And he shall see how mistaken he was, for I will never see him more! And Netta!——" for she determined to tell her sister all she had overheard. "Last night——"

"Netta!" called Mrs. Woodward; "Mr. Fuller is here, waiting for you."

"Say I am not very well," said Dorothy, pleadingly; "and let me lie down a little while; I am so very tired," she added, in a sorrowful voice, that touched even Netta, for she bent over and kissed her sister, though Dorothy shrank from the embrace.

"Lie down a little while," she said, and went downstairs. "Poor little thing!" she said to herself, as she went; "I wish I had not been so cruel to her. She little thinks how well I understand it all!"

"Mr. Fuller is in the study, Netta," Mrs. Woodward said, meeting her at the foot of the stairs, "and I have a note for you from Sir George Finch," and she held it out.

Netta's fingers trembled as they took it, and she sat down on the stairs to read it, and having done so, went into the study to Adrian Fuller.

There was not much painting done that morning; they sat and talked—Adrian Fuller and Netta Woodward—not the Netta who domineered over the household, but a softer, better, more womanly one who seemed to have taken her place.

"Do you know I am not half so good as you imagine," she was saying, gravely looking out at the wild old garden—"not half. I should not make you happy, as you think I should; and poverty—" and she almost shuddered—"poverty would kill me."

"You shall never know it, my darling," he said; "I will work for you, and make a home worthy of you."

"You only love me in idea," she said, calmly; "and because you think I am pretty, I believe in reality that you care more for my little sister Dorothy."

"She is a mere child," he answered, impatiently.

"No, she is a woman, and you know it, Adrian," her voice was almost sad, for she thought of the weary face she had left above. "And she would love you far better than I should, and not mind being poor, and though you say you would work for me——"

"Work!" he interrupted, "I would do anything for you, Netta. "Oh, my darling!" he said, going over to her, and looking down into the clear blue eyes that turned shyly from their long gaze into the garden to meet his own. "There is nothing in the world I would not do for you, if you would once say that you loved me."

She seemed to be struggling against her fate, as she answered—and there was no acting or make-believe in her voice—"I do love you, Adrian, but—" and she almost held him from her—"I must not be bound by these words, remember, and there is no engagement or anything like one between us." She gave a sigh of relief as she said the words, and let her head droop for a single moment on his shoulder—"I loved you from the very first, as you did me." How strange it was, that even as she said what he had so longed to hear, there crept over him a feeling of doubt and misgiving, something that was almost like regret, as he thought of the Dorothy whose rose was yet treasured, and whose happy feet had wandered by his side through the summer fields not three months since.

(To be continued.)

DAVID IN THE WILDERNESS.—II.

BY THE REV. WILLIAM HANNA, D.D., LL.D., EDINBURGH.

SUCH as we have now described it in its most salient incidents was David's life as an outlaw. The events of the period are recorded in twelve successive chapters of the 1st Book of Samuel. But besides these chapters we have twelve Psalms composed by David himself in the course of this period.* Let us imagine that the twelve chapters, and these only, were put into one man's hands, and the twelve Psalms, and these only, into another's. How different the ideas of David which the two readers might gather each from his own exclusive source of information! The one having the narrative alone before him, might think of David as of a brave and noble youth, who having won in a single day by a single gallant deed, an unbounded popularity, had become exposed thereby for years to the cruel and capricious vengeance of a moody and envious tyrant, who first drove him from his court, then chased him day by day (1 Sam. xxiii. 14), forcing him to make his shifting home in the wildest regions of the country, reducing him and the motley group who clung to his fortunes often to the last extremities of want and danger, and driving him at last as an exile into a foreign land. No want here—in the sudden dangers, the hasty flights, the hair-breadth escapes, the marauding expeditions —of matter fitted to excite the liveliest interest in David's changing fortunes and final fate. No lack of information here as to many a prominent feature in David's character. His power to attract the love and confidence of his fellows; his patience, wisdom, and undaunted courage; his scorn for everything unjust, and mean, and selfish; his capacity for all kinds of command; his frank, manly, gentle, forgiving, altogether unrevengeful and chivalrously generous spirit. And yet, having noticed all these, and lavished on them all the admiration they are so well fitted to excite, how little, after all, of the real David of this period might the reader of the twelve chapters know! Our other reader has only the twelve Psalms to guide him in his notions of the writer's character and condition, and he pictures to himself a poor, desolate, persecuted, yet most ardent and enthusiastic pietist, of the most delicate spiritual sensibilities, subject to many fluctuations of varying spiritual emotions, now sinking into the depths, and sending from them low wailing cries of sorrow and despondency; anon springing, as if with angels' wings, up to the very gates of heaven, leaving behind in his ascent a stream of ecstatic praise that fills the air with its melody. And yet there are not two Davids. The David of the two readers is one and the same man, but that man revealed to us in his double nature, his earthward and his heavenward aspect; his outward intercourse with man, his inward converse with God.

* Psalms vii., xi., xviii., xxxiv., xl., liv., lvi., lvii., lviii., lix., lxiii., cxli. See Ewald, Stanley, Perowne, &c.

Before bringing the two accounts—the historical and the devotional—together to see how they fit into each other, and mutually cast light upon one another, let us notice one point of beautiful harmony, that comes out at once and most noticeably to the eye. Upon the very surface of the historical narrative is to be seen David's instant and intense recoil from anything that would have imperilled the life of his royal master. It takes a second and closer look to detect as strong a desire to shield Saul's character as to protect his person. Yet to what else than to the generous desire to impute as much blame as he could to others, and as little of it as possible to Saul, can we attribute the very first words that he addressed to the king from the cave's mouth at Engedi: "Wherefore hearest thou men's words, saying, Behold David seeketh thy hurt?" or the words spoken in his last interview with Saul, when, constrained to take a somewhat darker view of the king's conduct, he yet puts the alternative in this peculiar form: "Now therefore, I pray thee, let my lord the king hear the words of his servant. If the Lord have stirred thee up against me, let him accept an offering: but if they be the children of men, cursed be they before the Lord; for they have driven me out this day from abiding in the inheritance of the Lord, saying, Go, serve other gods" (1 Sam. xxvi. 19). Is it not in striking accordance with all this, that throughout those psalms, composed under the cruel and long-continued persecution, never once does the name of Saul escape from David's lips; as little will he lift his pen as lift his sword against the Lord's anointed. He refers often to his persecutors, but with the utmost delicacy of feeling he refrains from ever pointing to the bitterest of them all—either mixing him up with the others, or speaking in the most general terms: "O Lord my God, in thee do I put my trust: save me from all them that persecute me, and deliver me; lest he tear my soul like a lion, while there is none to deliver." "Be merciful unto me, O God: for man would swallow me up; he fighting daily oppresseth me. Mine enemies would daily swallow me up: for they be many that fight against me, O Thou most High." "For strangers are risen up against me, and oppressors seek after my soul" (Psalms vii. 1, 2; lvi. 1, 2; liv. 3). Had it indeed been only strangers that oppressed him; had it been only Amalekites or Geshurites or Gerzites who chased him over the mountains, he had not felt it as he did. With his hundreds against their thousands he had not feared to face them. Mere outward privations or perils had been little to him. He had been trained from boyhood to sleep out among the hills—to have his locks wet with the dews of the night; he had met the lion and the bear, and was as ready to meet wild men as wild beasts in the wilderness. But it was his own king, the anointed of the Lord, that "sought him every day;" it was his own countrymen who chased him as a partridge over the hills. Even their open hostility he could manfully have endured. But when there was flung upon him the "reproach of those who would swallow him up, whose teeth were spears and arrows, and their tongue a sharp sword;" when privily and perversely a snare was laid for him; when working deceitfully like a sharp razor the tongue of malice was opened against him, pouring out devouring words; and when at last he heard that nothing short of the vilest treachery was imputed to him, then it was that his spirit was overwhelmed within him, and from the depths he lifted up his cry: "O Lord my God if I have done this, if there be iniquity on my hands; if I have rewarded evil to him that was at peace with me, let the enemy persecute my soul, yea, let him tread down my life upon the earth, and lay mine honour in the dust."

It was upon a dark background of human falsehood, injustice, and oppression, that David had to look; but the double confidence in his own integrity and in the justice of the Divine government remained unshaken. "Judge me, O Lord, according to my righteousness, and according to mine integrity that is in me; verily there is a reward for the righteous; verily He is a God that judgeth on the earth. If the foundations be destroyed what can the righteous do? The Lord is in His holy temple; His eyes behold, His eyelids try the children of men. For the righteous Lord loveth the righteous, His countenance doth behold the upright."

It was only as a man among his fellows that David fell back upon his integrity, and found in it such a firm support. It was very different with him when his iniquities took hold upon him, and he felt how sinful a man he was before his Maker. Then it was that his heart failed him, so that he was not able to look up; then it was that his soul was in prison; that he sunk into a horrible pit, and felt his feet sinking as into the miry clay; then it was that as, poor and needy, he cried unto the Lord, and "the Lord heard him, and saved him out of all his troubles;" and he bore this testimony as to the Lord's dealing with him at this time: "The Lord is nigh unto them that are of a broken heart, and saveth such as be of a contrite spirit."

Surrounded as he was by scenery so singular, and in many regions so sublime; coming in contact daily with such men as are described to us in 1 Chron. xii., engaged in raids and strifes, often so romantically perilous, what large material did this period of his life supply for lyric odes of the common poetic type, such as David's genius well fitted him to compose! But none such were written by him. The inspiration that prompted the Psalms of the Wilderness had a deeper fountain head, even that pervading, subduing, supporting, elevating sense of God's constant presence, protection, and loving-kindness, by which his whole nature was permeated, to which in these psalms he has given such full and impressive expression, serving thereby to plant and to nourish the same in so many other human breasts. The rocks, the caves, the slippery heights, the waterless river-courses, the bursting thunder-storm, the floods of many waters are, with him, not topics of poetical description, but signs of the Divine Presence, mementoes of deliverance wrought by the Divine Hand, It was from objects that had grown now so familiar to him, that he borrowed some of the most favourite epithets bestowed by him on the Eternal: "The Lord liveth, and blessed be my rock. For who is God save the Lord, and who is a rock save our God? I will love thee, O Lord my strength. The Lord is my rock and my fortress and my deliverer. He only is my rock and my salvation; the rock of my strength; and my refuge is in God." No incident of this period was too trivial for David not to see in it and to acknowledge the hand of the Most High. If darkness gathered round him, if his feet had well-nigh slipped down some deep precipice, if he passed harmless through the camp of the enemy, if in flight he sprang over some strong barrier distancing his pursuers, if in the thick of battle he prevailed, it was God who "lighted his candle and enlightened his darkness;" it was God that enlarged his steps under him that his feet did not slip; it was by God that he "ran through the troop and leaped over the wall," making "his feet like hind's feet, and setting him upon his high places;" it was God that girded him with strength unto the battle."

And in that God he placed his firm unfaltering trust, and to Him he gave all the praise. Waking early in "the dark cave of Engedi, he meditates on all the way the Lord had led him; takes his harp in hand, goes forth among the sleepers, seeks some cleft of the rock, looks up to the heavens, and pours his spirit out in prayer and praise: "Be merciful unto me, O God, be merciful unto me, for my soul trusteth in thee: yea, in the shadow of thy wings will I make my refuge, until these calamities be overpast. I will cry unto God most high: unto God that performeth all things for me. Be thou exalted, O God above the heavens, as thy glory be above all the earth. My heart is fixed, O God, my heart is fixed; I will sing and give praise. For thy mercy is great unto the heavens, and thy truth unto the clouds. Be thou exalted, O God, above the heavens, let thy glory be above all the earth."

SCRIPTURE LESSONS FOR SCHOOL AND HOME.

SCRIPTURE STORIES. First Series. No. 27. Paul before Agrippa.

Chapter to be read—Acts xxvi.

INTRODUCTION. Sum up with the children the number of times St. Paul has been placed on his defence—viz., on the stairs of the temple at Jerusalem, before the Council of the Jews, before Felix the Governor of Cæsarea, and Festus his successor. Now once more pleads for himself before Herod Agrippa. From xxv. 23 the scene may be described. The judgment-hall crowded; all the principal officers present, and great men of the city; the king and queen probably seated on a raised daïs, with courtiers and attendants around. What a hold Paul's preaching must have taken upon the city to excite so much commotion. Now the prisoner is brought in—small of stature, pale after two years' confinement, bound with chains to a soldier on each side of him, but looking calm and dignified.

I. THE DEFENCE. (1) Early life. (Read 1—11.) Paul begins his defence. Stretching out his hand, as an orator, to call attention, the chain would be seen. Let children see how wisely he begins, commending the king's knowledge of Jewish customs, &c., so as to be able to hear patiently and judge fairly on the questions at issue. Then passes to his early life, well known to all the Jews. To what sect did he belong? Explain that word Pharisee means "separated," and how Pharisees claimed to be most exact in obeying the law. Remind of Pharisees' statement when praying in Temple (Luke xviii. 11), of Christ's rebukes to them for undue importance given to ceremonies (Mark vii. 8). Such an outwardly God-fearing, honest, religious Jew was Paul, how then did he and the Jews fall out? For what does he say he is judged? (ver. 6.) Remind what this hope was: to Adam and Eve, that one should be born of a woman to destroy the power of Satan (Gen. iii. 15); to Abraham, that in his seed all the world should be blessed (Gen. xxii. 18); to Moses, of a prophet like unto him (Deut. xviii. 15). Question the children as to how these prophecies were fulfilled in Christ, born of a virgin, blessing the people by His wonderful miracles, preaching in sermons and parables in a way that none other did, and as a prophet foretelling His own death and resurrection, which had surely come to pass. For Paul's belief in this hope he was accused. He, like them, once opposed Jesus, not seeing in Him the fulfilment of the prophecies. How did he oppose Him? How did the saints bear the persecution? Let children notice how some saints died rather than give up their religion, while some were "compelled to blaspheme." Remind what Christ said as to blessedness of those persecuted for righteousness' sake (Matt. v. 11), and of the three men who were thrown into the fire rather than worship the image (Dan. iii. 25); how Paul would reprove himself for having caused any to blaspheme—i. e., give up their convictions. What a warning to all, not to cause any to offend (Matt. xviii. 4).

II. Conversion. (Read 12—23.) The story of the conversion having twice before occurred in the Acts, may be passed over now. Let the teacher dwell on the effects of the change in Paul. Why did Christ appear to him? Not only for his own sake, but to make him a witness for Him, especially among the Gentiles. Show how this was to be done. He was to open their eyes to know their state of darkness and sin; just as Christ had fulfilled the prophecy of great light appearing to the Gentiles (Matt. iv. 16); then to show them Jesus Christ as the Saviour, and forgiveness through Him; then by His power within them to turn from power of Satan to God, and obtain inheritance among the saints. What a glorious message! Could Paul disobey? What then did he do at once? (ver. 20.) To whom did he begin and where? But what were the consequences? Who came to his help? Remind of the vision given him at Jerusalem. By God's help, then, he has continued witnessing to all the great principles of the whole prophecies—viz., the death and resurrection of Christ, and the truth revealed to the Gentiles (ver. 23).

PRACTICAL LESSONS. (1) The call to repentance. Paul's message the same as Noah's before the Flood, Jonah to the men of Nineveh, John the Baptist to the people, and Peter on the day of Pentecost. The same message now. Alas, how little heeded! Repent, or perish. (2) The blessing of repentance. Paul had one object ever before him—to preach Christ, whom before he had persecuted. Do we try and undo our former evil?

III. THE RESULT. (Read 24—32.) What did Agrippa think about him? Yes! mad, to continue a prisoner for such trifles, as he thought them, as the death of Jesus of Nazareth. But were they trifles to Paul and the Christians? On this fact of the resurrection of Jesus all their hopes based. They would be fools otherwise to endure such persecutions daily if no hope in the future (1 Cor. xv. 32). Now seems to see signs of being persuaded in Agrippa's manner. So turns to him with direct inquiry—does he believe his own prophets? Mark the king's answer. "Almost!" Why not quite? Paul has not only talked of faith, but of repentance, and works meet for repentance; and the king not enough in earnest to give up sin. So they merely discuss the prisoner; are obliged to allow that he has done nothing worthy of death or even of imprisonment; but as he has appealed to Cæsar he must be sent to Rome.

PRACTICAL LESSON. Faith without repentance worthless. Agrippa was persuaded, but could not give up sin. So often with children. Know perfectly what is right; have read the Bible; know right from wrong; but cannot give up some sin. Love their sin better than Christ. But His commands are imperative; must take up cross, deny self, or else will be rejected at last day. Now is time to choose; may not be able if delay; but Christ himself helps by Holy Spirit.

Questions to be answered.

1. Enumerate the different occasions on which Paul was placed on his defence.

2. Describe his early life, &c., education and habits.

3. What effect had his persecutions on the Christians?

4. What distinct work was set before him at his conversion?

STILL AND DEEP.

BY F. M. F. SKENE, AUTHOR OF "TRIED," "ONE LIFE ONLY," ETC.

CHAPTER XVII.

THERE was nothing poor John Pemberton liked so much as to talk of what seemed to him the transcendant qualities of the syren to whom his whole honest heart was so loyally devoted, and Mary let him talk to her about Laura's voice as much as he liked, while her own thoughts had flown to that one from whom they were never long absent.

"How charmed Bertrand will be with Laura's singing if she ever lets him hear her," she innocently reflected, little dreaming how for Bertrand alone the Lorelei had striven to hide her gifts that they might burst upon him with a stranger, sweeter charm.

The days and weeks were speeding onward, now counted by Mary night after night as she laid down to rest, with the joyous thought that there was one term less of four-and-twenty hours to be passed, before she could see again the bright blue eyes that even in absence seemed ever shining in upon her life with a light that nothing else could give. He wrote to her often, charming tender letters, full of everything that was interesting to himself, as if he did not doubt her entire sympathy and oneness with him, and she answered, speaking ever of his concerns rather than her own, and when she had occasion to allude to those with whom she sojourned, talking of them always kindly and gently, with no hint of evil in connection with any one of them; she heard, too, often from nurse Parry, who was very dismal and unhappy away from her darling.

Autumn came and went, and winter certainly was dreary enough at Chiverley; but when the frost set in Laura found amusement and excitement in skating with Pemberton and Charlie on a little lake near the rectory, where the perfect grace of her lithe supple form showed to wonderful advantage, as she skimmed along like a bird with her pretty hands extended, and her long hair floating out upon the breeze.

Meanwhile, Mary left alone, went stealing silently into the miserable cottages, where the poor were forgotten in their want and suffering; all she had, and it was little enough, was expended in trying to relieve their grinding poverty to some extent, and even when her wardrobe required renewal she denied herself the tasteful dresses which a young girl naturally likes to wear, in order that she might have more to give away. Her self-denial in this respect placed her at a great disadvantage by the side of Laura, who was always dressed to perfection, as her father knew to his cost; for, poor as they were, the necessary sum for Laura's toilette was never allowed to be stinted in the smallest degree. But if Mary, in her plain black dress, looked unattractive beside Laura's lovely radiant figure, she seemed as an angel clad in shining garments to the poor people shivering with cold and pinched with hunger, to whom she brought comforts of every kind.

One morning, when all the frost had disappeared, and the air was moist and fragrant, Laura was standing at the drawing-room window looking out towards the shrubbery which bordered the green rectory lawn. She was watching Mary Trevelyan, who was outside, at some little distance, with the greatest curiosity as to what could possibly be the meaning of her proceedings, and of the unusual animation she was displaying. She had seen her first walking very slowly along the foot of a mossy bank which shelved upward to a group of fine old trees, evidently searching for some object which she was eagerly desirous to find, and for a time apparently her search was without avail; but suddenly Laura saw her bound forward, and kneel down upon the moss, while, with the utmost care, she took her treasure, whatever it might be, from the ground. Then Laura saw her rise, and stand holding it with both her hands, the one below the other, while she gazed down upon it with such a look of radiant joy on her pale calm face, as never certainly had shone upon it during all the time she had been at Chiverley.

The Lorelei's curiosity was too strongly excited not to be gratified at once, and in a moment she had opened the French window at which she was standing, and ran, fleet and graceful as a deer, to the spot where Mary's dark-robed figure stood within the shade of the trees.

"What have you found, Mary?—what is it?" exclaimed imperious Laura; and at the first sound of her voice Mary started, and made a movement to conceal her treasure, but as Laura came close to her, with the bright piercing eyes scanning her face, her perfect stillness of manner returned, and without a word she opened her half-closed hand, and let her companion see what lay there. A simple treasure indeed it seemed—only a little dewy violet laid on its own green leaf, with a faint exquisite fragrance issuing from it, like the breath of the infant spring. "A violet!" exclaimed Laura, much surprised. She was silent for a few moments, evidently pondering over the matter; then she looked Mary full in the face. "There is something under this, Mary Trevelyan, I am certain. The sight of a violet alone would not have animated you suddenly as much as if you had received a new soul, like Undine in the story. Tell me, what does it mean?"

"It means spring," said Mary's low voice; and a soft happy smile played on her lips.

"Spring?" said Laura, slowly, while her subtle unscrupulous spirit laboured to probe her friend's secret. Suddenly she clapped her little hands triumphantly. "Spring! I have it! I know what it means. Your brother Bertrand comes in the spring."

"Laura, he is not my brother," said Mary, turning round, and looking at her calmly, though her lips were quivering.

"Oh, I always forget he is not so actually; it seems to me so like it, you know. His parents were quite a father and mother to you."

"They were my kindest friends—no more. My father and mother lie beneath the great Atlantic, and I have no brother or sister in the world."

"I will be your sister, if you like, just as I think Mr. Lisle ought to be your brother."

"Laura, I believe I have explained to you before that I cannot think it right to try to establish false relationships, which are not of God's appointment."

"Oh, very well," said Laura, with her light laugh; "it will come all to the same thing in the end," and she darted back across the lawn. Mary followed more slowly, bearing her little fragrant prize carefully in her hand, while she murmured, "He said he would come with the violets—with the violets; and this is the first!"

Any one less intensely reserved and delicate in her feelings would have enclosed this violet to Bertrand in her next letter; but she would not even thus remind him how the hope of his coming was as the rainbow of promise on the horizon of her thoughts; she laid the tender floweret close to the precious white rose, which had felt the beating of her true heart night and day since Bertrand gave it to her, and waited for the fulfilment of the dear hope of which it was the harbinger.

And he came with the violets. A few mornings later, while the family were at breakfast, the letters were brought, and Laura's keen eyes quickly spied out one in Bertrand's handwriting, which she had learned to know, for Mary, and another, also from him for Mrs. Wyndham; on this last she pounced at once, saying, "Here is a letter for you, Mrs. Wyndham, from Mr. Lisle; shall I read it for you, and tell you what is in it, as you are having your breakfast?"

"People generally like to read their own letters, Laura, but it would be more trouble to fight with you for it than to let you have your will," said her stepmother, languidly; and the Lorelei had torn the letter open before she had done speaking.

"He is coming on Monday week," she said, "and hopes to be here in the afternoon;" and she tossed the letter across to Mrs. Wyndham, while she sat thinking so deeply, that poor John Pemberton could not win another glance from her all through the breakfast hour. Charlie Davenant's good-tempered laughing face meantime clouded over in a manner most unusual to him. During the months that had elapsed since Mary Trevelyan came to the rectory, the young man had watched her quiet silent course with a thoughtful scrutiny, which had in it an element almost of reverence, for she had impressed him as no one else had ever done with the heavenly beauty of that charity of which so lovely a picture is drawn in the Scriptures, and which she seemed to him completely to represent in all its manifold yet harmonious qualities, the charity that suffereth long and is kind, vaunting not itself, seeking not its own, enduring all things, hoping all things, believing all things, walking ever in the more excellent way. He noted, with keen interest, the contrast between her and the brilliant woman who had so fascinated him for a short time. Laura had been to him like a dazzling meteor flashing through the air and shedding round a thousand sparks of brightness; but Mary was like the silver moonlight, white and still, shining steadfast in its pure serenity over the wild waves of the troubled sea.

Had Charlie Davenant been a few years older, with an assured income and a post which could give some confidence for his future and his career, he would probably have allowed himself to think of Mary Trevelyan as one whom he might at least dream of winning to himself one day; but as it was, he felt her to be so far removed from him in every way, that he never thought of regarding her but as a "bright particular star," appearing for a time above his earthly path, to lure his eyes and heart heavenward far beyond even herself.

And there was another reason why he never permitted his enthusiastic admiration to express itself outwardly in more than honest friendship: he felt certain that Mary had already given to Bertrand Lisle the rich undivided treasure of her whole heart's affection; he had watched her when his letters came, he had scanned her face when his name was casually mentioned, and he had seen the light that stole into the soft dark eyes, the tremor of the sweet lips, the faint flush on the pale cheeks.

"She loves him," he said to himself that morning, as he had many a time before; "and she will love him even to the death, yet the Lorelei, who does not know what it means to be true to any one but herself, will lure him from her to gratify her worldly ambition, and my star will be left to fade away alone in a long dark night of anguish! What can I do—what can I do to save her!"

The matter seemed the more difficult to poor Charlie because his father wished him to come home for a few weeks at Easter, which would prevent his being at Chiverley during most of Bertrand's visit.

(Drawn by W. SMALL.)

"What have you found, Mary?—what is it?"—p. 487.

CHAPTER XVIII.

SPRING had come, and the violets; and then came a fair and smiling dawn, flushing the sky with crimson light, and Mary Trevelyan's wakeful eyes saw the rising of the blissful day that was to bring her back the one love of her constant heart. "At last, at last!" she said, as she looked out upon the sunny world, her face transfigured to a wondrous beauty by the light of joy; but when she took her place at the breakfast-table a few hours later, the mere fact that human eyes were on her had driven the unwonted radiance from her quiet countenance, and made her seem once more what Laura often called her, a statue of snow. Almost the first words spoken referred to Mr. Lisle's expected arrival.

"Does not your friend Bertrand come to-day?" said Mr. Wyndham to Mary. "At what hour do you expect him? I must take the pony-carriage to meet him."

"There is only one afternoon train he can come by," broke in Laura; "at five o'clock."

"Five!" said Mary; I thought it was at 4.30."

"Perhaps; I will look into Bradshaw," said Laura, hastily. "Mary, you would like to go to the station to meet him, would you not?"

"Oh yes!" she exclaimed. "Laura is really kind," she added in her own mind; while Charlie's mental reflection was, "Lurline is at work already, what does she mean?"

"Of course you ought to go," continued Laura, "and I shall drive you there myself. You need not trouble to leave your books," she added to her father; "I want a breath of fresh air, so I shall take Mary to meet the train."

"Very well," said Mr. Wyndham, meekly. But his wife roused herself to say, "It does not seem to me quite a suitable arrangement, Laura."

"Why not?" said Lurline, turning round and looking full at her step-mother with her clear bright eyes. Mrs. Wyndham subsided at once, and said not another word; the idea of seeing Bertrand again so completely filled Mary's whole soul, that she was hardly able to care who went with her, but she was conscious of a slight regret that it was to be Laura rather than Mr. Wyndham. She said nothing, however; and later in the day when she and Laura were in the room alone, the latter said to her, "Mary, is not this your school or choir day, or something of that sort?"

"It is the day I generally practise with the choir in the afternoon, but I shall go to the school and ask them to change it to another time, as I am going to the station."

"But you need not; and it would be a pity, as the girls sing so much better when they are kept steadily to their practice, you will be in plenty of time if you are here by four o'clock; I will have the pony carriage ready for you."

"But surely that would be too late if the train comes in at half-past four!" said Mary, anxiously.

"But it is at five, I tell you; we shall have a whole hour; however, you can come back even earlier than four o'clock, and still have time for the choir."

"Yes, that is true," said Mary, "they need not have a very long lesson to-day."

So, at the usual time she went to perform her self-appointed duty, in trying to make the services in the House of God less irreverent and discordant.

She gave the children all her attention, though her own voice was tremulous, and her heart was beating fast, and when at length the task was over—a little earlier than usual—with a promise to the girls that they should have an extra long lesson next day, she left the school and sped through the village at her swiftest pace, hardly able to bear the tumult of happiness that agitated her quiet spirit, till she reached the rectory gate, and ran on to the door. Then she felt disappointed not to see the pony-carriage waiting. "Oh, I hope they will not make us late in starting," she thought; and she hurried on to the sitting-room, and went in. Mrs. Wyndham alone was there, half asleep as usual. "Where is Laura?" said Mary—and even in that moment of excitement her voice was soft and low—"it is quite time for us to set out."

"Laura?" said Mrs. Wyndham, yawning; "oh, she is gone to the station."

"Gone!" said Mary, in a faint tone.

"Yes; she told me to tell you she found out just at the last moment that she had made a mistake in the time of the train, and that unless she went off that instant it would be too late, so she could not wait for you; she was very sorry. I suppose she took her father instead, but I really do not know;" and Mrs. Wyndham turned round, and closed her eyes. Not a word did Mary utter; softly she left the room, and stole up-stairs to her own, then she sunk down on a chair and buried her face in her hands.

"How can I bear it? Oh, my Bertrand, my Bertrand! he will think I did not care to meet him! my own, my only love!"

But Bertrand would never see those tears or hear that cry; he was at that very moment looking out from the window of the railway carriage, watching with happy expectation the far-off country station of Chiverley to which they were approaching, and feeling perfectly certain that the first sight which would greet him on the platform would be that pure still face, whose dark eyes, true and tender ever, would be so eloquent of a loving welcome. And the train rushed on, and tore thundering into the little station, and Bertrand, the only passenger to alight, as Mary herself had been, sprang from the carriage, and looked round for her. She was not there; but before he had time almost to realise the blank feeling of disappointment he experienced, his attention was irresistibly attracted by the most radiant vision he had ever seen, which suddenly emerged from among the rough country people who had come to meet the train, like a being from another sphere. Lurline seemed to have attired herself as a representation of spring, with white robes fluttering lightly round her, caught up here and there by knots of delicate green ribbon, a little hat chiefly composed apparently of gossamer white lace, with a bunch of snowdrops surrounded by green leaves in the front, and all her fair hair with its burnished tints was gathered up loosely under it, with many a shining curl escaping from the bond and straying down over her pretty shoulders; her eyes were radiant with sparkling animation, her bright face strangely fascinating in the witchery of its expression, and when she came swiftly forward, light and graceful as a bird, her little feet scarce touching the ground, and her dainty hands filled with flowers, Bertrand thought that he had never seen a more singularly lovely or attractive being. He was so taken by surprise, that after the first instinct of courtesy had made him raise his hat as she came straight up to him, he simply stood and gazed at her without speaking; then with a soft laugh on her lips, and a movement full of grace, she made him a little coquettish curtsey, and said, "Let me introduce Laura Wyndham to you, Mr. Lisle, representative of the inhabitants of Chiverley Rectory, who have sent her to bid you welcome."

"Miss Wyndham," he said, "it is indeed kind if you have taken the trouble to come and meet me; but Mary—Miss Treveleyan—I hope she is not ill?"

"Oh dear no; Mary is in excellent health and spirits. My father meant to have met you but he was engaged, so I volunteered my services. I am sorry you should have no better escort; but I am afraid you must be content with me as a charioteer all the way home."

"A very charming prospect," he said, with a courteous smile; "if I can relieve you at least of the fatigue of driving."

She shook her pretty head. "Oh no, that would never do; but I will go and take my place while you give our unique specimen of a porter some instructions as to your luggage."

She was gone before he could answer, and somewhat bewildered as well as dazzled, Bertrand went off to claim his portmanteaux; as he stood watching the porter disengaging them from the heap of boxes that had been left by the retreating train, his mind reverted to the fact that Mary had not come to meet him with a very wounded feeling; he could not understand it; surely it was a very marked proceeding; and could it really be possible that his quiet Mary, his loving steadfast Mary, had sent this brilliant attractive girl to meet him? What could have been her motive? He felt hurt and perplexed; at the same time the Lorelei was much too bewitching for him to dislike the prospect of a drive with her, though he was not prepared to find that they were to be absolutely alone together. When he made his way out through the little gate, however, he found the shabby basket carriage, with the subdued pony looking more than usually downcast, and Laura already established in her place, with the wind playing in her hair, and her little ungloved hand holding the reins with an easy grace.

"Am I to sit beside you," he said, dubiously, as he saw the narrow space in which the occupants of the front seat were expected to settle themselves.

She turned her bright laughing face towards him. "There is no alternative; your weight, not to say your dignity, would be quite too much for that ignominous little seat behind; jump in, please, Mr. Lisle."

He obeyed, and seated himself at her side, and then, at a word from her familiar voice, the old pony set off at the slow jog-trot from which it never could be induced to vary.

It seemed to Bertrand rather odd that he should be travelling across country alone with a young lady whom he had never seen five minutes before; but he was a man of the world, and since it had been so arranged by no effort of his own, he accepted the situation, and prepared to enjoy it. He leant back with folded arms, looking at the strangely winning face of Laura Wyndham, and thinking that although among the ladies of the foreign court he had seen many a face of more perfect beauty than the Lorelei's, yet he had never seen one with so singular a power of fascination as that on which his eyes were riveted now; he wanted to hear her musical voice again, so he spoke.

"Are you still determined not to let me drive?"

She nodded, setting her red lips together with a smile, and glancing at him with her flashing eyes.

"And why, pray, Miss Wyndham?"

"Because I have an accurate sense of the fitness of things; you and this wretched old pony ought not to be associated together as driver and driven. You ought to drive a splendid bay standing higher than my head, with magnificent action, that arches its neck and paws the ground, and is altogether a glorious animal."

It was impossible for Bertrand not to be pleasantly conscious of the subtle flattery contained in these words, and her fearless manner seemed to suit his new acquaintance well; but the thought passed across his mind how unlike Mary it would have been to have made such a speech.

"You said Miss Trevelyan was well, I think; but I rather expected she would have met me at the station."

"She did think of it, I believe," said Laura, carelessly; "but she has taken a fancy to improve the singing of the school children in our old-fashioned church, where we have managed to say our prayers hitherto very well without the shrill voices of the village girls being trained to assist, so I do not take much interest in Mary's innovations; however, this happened to be the practising day, and she would not give it up even to come to the station to meet you. I told her I would wait for her as long as I could, if she would try to be back in time, but she never appeared."

Bertrand was silent for a few minutes, not choosing to betray to this stranger how much he felt wounded; it seemed very mysterious, and he thought he would try to probe the matter a little further.

"It is unlike Mary to be so very enthusiastic on any subject; she is usually very quiet and undemonstrative."

"Yes, that indeed she is; but simply because she has nothing to demonstrate; till I knew Mary Trevelyan I never could have believed there could exist a nature so hard and cold and passionless as hers."

"That is not my impression of her," said Bertrand, with a frown, which Lurline saw without turning her head.

"I can well understand that," said Laura; "from what I have heard of you I should imagine you were the last person to understand a character without power of feeling or affection; and any one looking at Mary's calm face and deep dark eyes would be apt to fancy there must be a world of thought and sentiment hidden beneath, but I have learnt to understand her thoroughly, and I have discovered what an utter mistake it is."

"You forget that I have known her from infancy, Miss Wyndham."

"That is, you, a man many years older than herself, have lived more or less in the same house with her for the short period of her life's duration, but if you think that constitutes anything like the knowledge two girls acquire of each other when they are shut up together for nearly a year in a dull country rectory, you are greatly mistaken. However, Mr. Lisle," and the Lorelei turned round her lovely face, with all its power of fascination vividly at work, "I cannot think how it happens that within half an hour of our first acquaintance I find myself seeming to describe unfavourably my very dear friend Mary. I have not the smallest desire to detract from her merits."

"Are you friends with her, Miss Wyndham?" said Bertrand, bending down and looking into her winning face.

"The best of friends," she answered, with her brilliant smile; "there has never been a word of disagreement between us; she is an excellent girl, far better than I am, with nice little formal ideas of duty to which she rigidly adheres with praiseworthy pertinacity, naturally they are all based on her early training, and I dare say to you it will seem very beautiful to note the especial reverence she has for the slightest wish your poor father may ever have expressed; be it what it may that he ever has asked of her, she makes his will her law now, just as much as when he was alive."

The subtle Lorelei! that poisoned arrow went straight to its mark, as the dark cloud that passed over Bertrand's fine face told her; but she had others of yet more deadly power in her quiver, and these she now prepared to use.

(To be continued.)

THE SPHERE OF PRAYER.

"In every thing by prayer and supplication with thanksgiving let your requests be made known unto God."—PHILIPPIANS iv. 6.

SCIENTIFIC investigation has done much service in the cause of humanity. It has added largely to our stock of truth; and also to our comforts in life, and to the amelioration of suffering; and in many ways aided the advancement of man. This is the mission of true science.

But man has wants which the things of earth cannot satisfy; and sometimes scientific theories would seem to shut out from him any other supply. Among these may be mentioned various ideas with regard to the sphere of prayer. We are sometimes taught, in effect, that the ruler of all things is not God, as we were accustomed to believe, but Law, that we and all things are in the grasp of an iron and relentless power, that must of necessity grind on in its appointed groove of cause and consequence, and that such being the case, it is in vain that we lift up our feeble voices in supplication, for the laws of Nature are invariable, they cannot alter their stern and rigorous course.

Some reply to such teaching by strongly expressing their objection to be trundled into such a tread-mill of destiny as this. Others appeal to the universal instinct of mankind in the hour of danger or desolation to cry for help to a higher power—an instinct that refuses to be stifled by the dogmas of the scientist—and ask how it can be accounted for on material grounds. Others, again, unfettered by speculation of any kind, simply appeal to the Word of God, which tells us there is a hearer and answerer of prayer, and quote instances of help asked and received, invariable law notwithstanding.

But it is unreasonable either to accept or reject any seeming truth because it appears to clash or otherwise with other truths which we believe. True faith in anything is the result of reason

And when anything new is presented to us as truth, let it be calmly investigated; if it has a proper foundation of fact let us not be afraid of it, for truth can never lead us wrong; and if it is not based on fact it cannot lead us at all.

Putting, therefore, moral objections aside for the present, we will make some inquiry into this doctrine of necessity, and try to find out whether it sweeps away, or puts any limit to the sphere of prayer.

It is of the utmost importance that we understand clearly what we mean by invariable law, for not seldom are such phrases used in current literature in a manner so vague and ambiguous, that though in some sense what is said may be true, the inference drawn or the impression left on the mind of the reader may be false.

All the operations of Nature are performed by invisible forces or laws. For the most part we do not know what these forces are, we only see the operation. When, from careful observation, we learn that certain movements of matter always and without fail occur in the same way, we call that a natural law, though in reality it is the work of a number of laws combined. There must be a cause or causes why these movements occur with such certainty, and sometimes we can discover this cause or force or motive power, and we call it a natural law, though this also, for aught we know, may be but the operation of other unseen laws.

Kepler discovered that the planets move in their orbits with a precision that can be calculated to a fraction, but he did not know the force that kept them going so steadily, he only saw the operation. Newton got a step further, he discovered gravitation; this was seeing more than the operation. it was the discovery of the force which holds them in their places—a force whose power can be calculated to a nicety, and whose action is invariable, It is an all-pervading force, of which we know nothing more than its existence and action, whence it derives its power we know not. There are forces behind forces in the mystery of matter, wheels moving wheels away into darkness, till we see the material blending with and moved by the spiritual, or what seems to be that in all nature as in ourselves. Every observer is forced to admit that there is some inscrutable power, a mysterious force, behind those invisible and perfect forces of Nature, something from whence they are derived, and this power the Bible calls God.

It is true that, so far as we know these forces, these laws of Nature, they are invariable; no law can by any possibility be broken. That is true; but it is not the whole truth. It is also true that every law is liable to be counteracted by other laws, and made to work out quite a different result from what it would do if left alone. Every law is rigid in its action, and if left alone would work destruction. If the law of gravitation was not opposed by centrifugal force, our world and the other planets would rush into the sun; if centrifugal force was not held in check by gravitation, they would all be hurled away into space. Unless law were pitched against law everything would in a moment rush into confusion and destruction. But we find that natural laws, each invariable by itself, so counteract and modify each other, that a most wonderful and perfect balance is kept up. We find that there is a nice and intricate adjustment of laws to work out purpose.

It is true that we are under laws that cannot be broken; but it is also true that no law works alone. Every operation of Nature is the result of a number of laws, or forces, delicately adjusted to balance and keep each other in check, and work out the required result. And by the slightest change in the adjustment of even one of them a totally different result may be obtained. One law, if let work alone, would without fail produce a certain result; bring another law to work with it, and both together would produce a result different from either of them if left alone; bring a third law into the combination, and still another result is produced, and so on. With a few forces at work a great variety of results can be obtained by combining them differently. Natural forces always work in combination. Even the formation of a drop of dew is the work of a combination of many laws. The more we know about natural laws we just find that the more wonderful is the intricacy with which they mingle and counteract in ever-changing adjustment for the accomplishment of purpose.

It is true that we are under laws that cannot be broken; but it is also true that although certain laws, under certain conditions, will work out a certain result, yet, by altering the conditions, an infinite variety of results may be obtained, and this without breaking any law, for that cannot be, but by bringing them to act upon one another. Thousands of instances of this may be seen in mechanics and chemistry.

It is true that we are under laws that cannot be broken; but it is also true that their rigidness, so far from shutting us in with a wall of destiny, is an "indispensable condition" to their being of service in working out our purposes. If their action was irregular or uncertain they would be unmanageable and useless. Water under certain conditions becomes steam, we know that that is quite certain, and can therefore produce steam when we want it; but if, under the same conditions, water sometimes became steam, sometimes did not change at all, or sometimes became ice, it would be unmanageable just because of its uncertainty. It is the very rigorousness of the laws of Nature, with which some would tie the hands of the Creator himself, that makes them manageable, brings them under the power of will, and fits them for His and our service, so that by proper adjustment we can make those mighty forces our obedient servants.

Forces stern and rigorous, that cannot by any possibility be broken, instead of hedging us in, are, by their very invariableness, made servants on whom we can depend with certainty. We are, in a multitude of ways, continually interfering with the laws of Nature, controlling and guiding them at our will in our daily business. The science of mechanics takes in hand those immutable laws, and adjusts and combines them in many ways to work our will. Up to the measure of our knowledge of how to use them we have them under perfect control; up to the measure of our knowledge we can prevent consequences; and if we, with our limited knowledge and power, can so manipulate natural laws, how much more God, who is all-knowing and Almighty?

To say that because the laws of Nature are invariable in their action, and that therefore they must necessarily leave no room for God to work freely, is only a half-truth with a wrong inference. If it were the whole truth, freedom of action would be denied to man also, he would be a mere automaton, and some, logically following out their theory, have tried to make him such. But we see that man has freedom, and that this very invariability of laws is an indispensable quality to enable man to use them at his will. He knows what they will do under given conditions, and so he can alter the conditions, and make them work his pleasure.

It is not true that invariable law rules the universe. Laws that are invariable are everywhere at work, but no law works alone. Every operation of Nature is carried on by a combination of laws, and these combinations so far from being *in*variable are infinitely variable. It is ambiguous and misleading to talk of phenomena being governed by invariable laws. Invariable forces are at work, but always combined and variable in combination, and capable of being adjusted to work together in an endless variety of ways. Each law is rigid, but combined, as they always are, they are variable. And in this sense, practically, law is not rigid, but pliable and manageable, giving perfect freedom of action up to the measure of our knowledge of how to use them. It follows, then, necessarily, that God, the all-knowing, has perfect freedom of action, and we are not in the grasp of an irresistible iron despotism called Law, but that we only want perfect knowledge to have every law under perfect control.

Invariable law, then, does not limit the sphere of prayer. We are sometimes told that the rigidness of law precludes the idea of prayer being answered; prayer or no prayer, cause must produce consequence in one unbroken and never-ending chain, for law cannot be turned aside, it is irresistible, and will and freedom are crushed before it. To have a Juggernaut car like this for ever grinding on would be a dreadful state of matters, if it were true. But we have seen that laws can be turned aside by bringing other laws to bear upon them, that their very rigidness brings them under the control of will, that we ourselves can work them, and produce results at our pleasure without breaking any of them—there is no need for that, but merely by managing them. And surely we cannot deny to God such power as we ourselves possess? Reason compels us to believe that he holds them in absolute control, and that therefore when we cry to him he can make all things work together for our good.

We are sometimes told that though, on account of the rigidness of law, prayer be in vain with regard to material things, it is available to obtain spiritual blessings. But the spiritual, as far as we know, is under law as well as the material. Analogy would lead us to expect this; and, so far as we can understand its workings, mind is governed by law. This comes to be partly from the mysterious connection between mind and matter: natural laws, through our material frame, are brought to bear on the motions of the mind, everybody knows and feels this. We also see law operating on the mental in the form of motives. Motives, in the realm of mind, perform a function somewhat analogous to forces in the realm of matter. We balance motives against each other on mind when we are considering how to act in any emergency, just as we balance natural forces against each other in effecting our purposes on matter, and it is always in combination that motives act on the mind in producing a determination of will, just as natural forces act in combination in producing a result in matter. Here we see law governing the *im*material; and the same theory that makes prayer vain in the region of the material, if carried out to its logical conclusion, would make it equally in vain in the spiritual.

But although both the Bible and science recognise governing law in all things, neither of them puts any limit to the sphere of prayer. Science tells us we are not bound to the iron wheel of destiny, but under the free government of an intelligence whose knowledge and power is vast and inscrutable. Science leads us up to the Bible, where we learn that this intelligence is our Father who is in heaven.

The human heart in its hour of extremity instinctively turns in its helplessness to a power higher than itself—to one that is Almighty, and who has all things under his control. This instinct of faith cannot be stifled; the heart will not be cheated out of its birthright by heartless half-truths of science.

The sphere of prayer embraces all things with which we have to do, and includes all circumstances. Yet, when we pray for any blessing, we are also to work for it, if it is in our power to do so. The value of prayer can never be tested by using it alone and comparing with the result of natural means used alone. And we can never distinguish between the effect of means and of prayer along with means, for to us they are inseparable. Our tests are not subtle enough for that; such things are not subject to chemical analysis; they belong to a region which reason as well as revelation shuts us up to believe, but of which we know but little.

We have seen that God is free from the shackle of law, that without breaking any laws but by working them he is free to bring about anything he pleases in answer to prayer.

It may be asked, "Are there things which interest us that it would be foolish or stupid to make a subject of prayer?" We think not. Our heavenly Father is interested in our well-being. His love and sympathy is constantly surrounding us; and surely, with the confidence of children in a loving father, it is natural that we should carry all our sins, our joys and sorrows, and all our interests to Him in prayer, and seek His aid and guidance and blessing. Even things that are very unlikely to be altered at our petition are to be no exception. Our Saviour Himself prayed that if it were possible His cup of suffering might pass from Him, but only if it were the Father's will. It was the cry of His weak human nature for help in the hour of darkness. And though the cup could not pass from Him, His prayer was answered by heavenly visitants coming to strengthen Him. Surely this is an example for us. When we are sore pressed let us not idly reason about the unlikelihood of our cup of suffering or whatever is against us being removed; let us simply tell our Father in heaven all about it, and he will see us through it in some way. What a rock we have here on which to plant our feet and stand in the battle. "The Lord is nigh unto all that call upon him, to all that call upon him in truth; he will fulfil the desire of them that fear him; he also will hear their cry and will save them."

J. HUIE.

IN PERIL

BY THE AUTHOR OF "SHAG AND DOLL," "HUGH'S HEROISM," ETC.

CHAPTER I.

IT was a Sunday evening in June. The day had been very hot, even in the country, where a cool breeze, springing up every now and then in the shade, played among the leaves of the old elms, or the spreading oaks, or the stately beeches.

And now the sun, beginning to sink in the west, was casting smooth broad shadows over the soft green turf, checkering it with light and shade; whilst the sea, though still sparkling and rejoicing in the sun's rays, no longer gave forth the glare of mid-day, but lay calm and tranquil, reflecting back a clear softened light, and mirroring each passing cloud that floated in the bright blue heavens above.

The little village church, nestling among its old yew-trees, half way up the grassy slope of the hill, looked out upon a fair scene, which appeared fairer than ever that lovely summer's evening, when the sweet calm and peace of Nature was brooding over everything, and busy working life seemed suspended for a while, in order that all might have an opportunity of rejoicing in the spirit of beauty that was abroad, sent to bear upwards on its wings heaven-born thoughts and aspirations for yet nobler purer things.

A little lower down the hill, under the protecting shadow as it were of the church, stood a little whitewashed cottage, with honeysuckle-covered porch facing the sea, and little piece of garden in front, full of stocks and sweet-peas and white pinks, and other easily-reared flowers, which grew freely, and flung their perfume on the breeze as lavishly as if they felt they were placed in a favoured spot, and rejoiced in return to give out their tribute of sweet scents to add to the enjoyment of the passer-by.

Within the porch, on a low seat, sat an old woman, with black gown, but spotlessly white cap, the border of which formed a framework for a face so calm, so sweet, so peaceful, it seemed as if the mind —of which the face was as it were but the mirror— must have attuned itself to the spirit which that evening pervaded the scene upon which she gazed. All storms, all strivings, all sorrows, appeared laid to rest; the repose of those who ride safely at anchor within the harbour seemed to have settled down upon her spirit.

At times, it is true, a cloud was accustomed to dim her aged eyes; but this evening no trace of it was there, for ever and again she glanced down upon the open pages of her Bible, which rested on her knee; and when next she looked out over the smooth waters, her brow was as unruffled as they; her expression one of patient hope and quiet confidence. Her finger rested on the words, "Though there were of you cast out unto the uttermost part of the heaven, yet will I gather them from thence."

"'The uttermost part!'" she murmured to herself; "aye, though he has, may-be, wandered to the uttermost part—so far that none but God can reach him—yet still He says He will gather him from thence! Why should I doubt? Is distance anything to Him? Don't His mercies reach from the one end of heaven to the other? Then they can reach even to that far country in which, may-be, he's wandering still, and they can fetch him back and bring him to his Father's home. 'From the uttermost part!' Oh, my son, my son! if I could but see thee brought back, I should have no other earthly wish! But, though I may not live to see it, I believe that it yet shall be. Something seems to whisper to me this evening that the mother's prayers have pierced through to the Father's ears, and have won a blessing for the erring one."

* * * * * *

In London the sinking sun that evening looked upon a very different scene, especially in the densely populated parts inhabited by the poorer portion of the community. There the heat was stifling, the sun's rays having beat down with scorching power all through the long day, until the very air—if by chance the faintest breath of it arose—seemed hot and unrefreshing.

People dragged themselves to their doors, or congregated on the shady side of the narrow streets, as soon as the sun, in moving on, had left one side in shade; but go where they might, they seemed scarcely able to breathe. Rendered irritable by their sufferings from the heat, quarrelling and disputing appeared more than ever the order of the day, even the children adding their shrill cries or clamorous complaints to swell the general discord.

The squalid unwholesome dwellings seemed more than ever unwholesome this evening, the dirt and wretchedness more conspicuous, the fumes of tobacco and beer or the odours of decaying vegetables rotting near more offensive, if possible, than usual.

It was to escape from such a scene as this that James Forrest suddenly resolved to spend what money was still left in his pockets after last night's carouse in making an excursion into the country—somewhere, anywhere, so that he might escape for a few hours from this poisonous atmosphere, and find a breath of pure fresh air to cool his heated brow.

He could not tell, nor did he stay to inquire, how this craving for country sights and sounds had sprung up in him after lying dormant for so long, he was only conscious of its presence, and obey it he must. So, half an hour later found him seated upon the top of an omnibus, rolling onwards in the direction in which green fields and the open blue sky might be found.

Although it was Sunday he was still in his everyday working-clothes, for he had long since ceased to make any efforts to look respectable on that day. He would only have been laughed at by his neighbours had he attempted such a thing; and as nothing was now farther from his thoughts than entering a place of worship, it mattered little about his appearance.

He sat moodily, never glancing at his fellow-passengers, or exchanging a word with them, as the omnibus rattled over the stones. Strange that that noise of incessant rumbling seemed to him this evening like the roar of the sea, breaking in, wave after wave, upon the beach! He had not stood upon the sea-shore for years—not since he had left his native place, in his self-will and restless desire for change, to seek his fortune in London, and that had been five years ago—but yet that roar sounded in his ears almost as if he had been listening to it yesterday.

Suddenly, a louder rush than usual, a bigger wave dashing itself to pieces, brought before his mind's eye, by the power of association, a small white-washed cottage that stood within hearing of those waves. It had a porch, in which was sometimes seated the figure of a widow woman, with anxiously expectant face, which brightened up as a step drew near, and greeted with a sweet smile of welcome the returning one. That young man had been himself, that loving gentle woman his mother.

He started as he arrived at that point in his reverie, and found that the omnibus had reached its destination, and that he must descend.

(To be continued.)

"THE QUIVER" BIBLE CLASS.

193. What means did our Lord, on one occasion, use in healing one who was deaf and dumb?

194. What was the means whereby the priest knew how much of the sacrifice to take for himself?

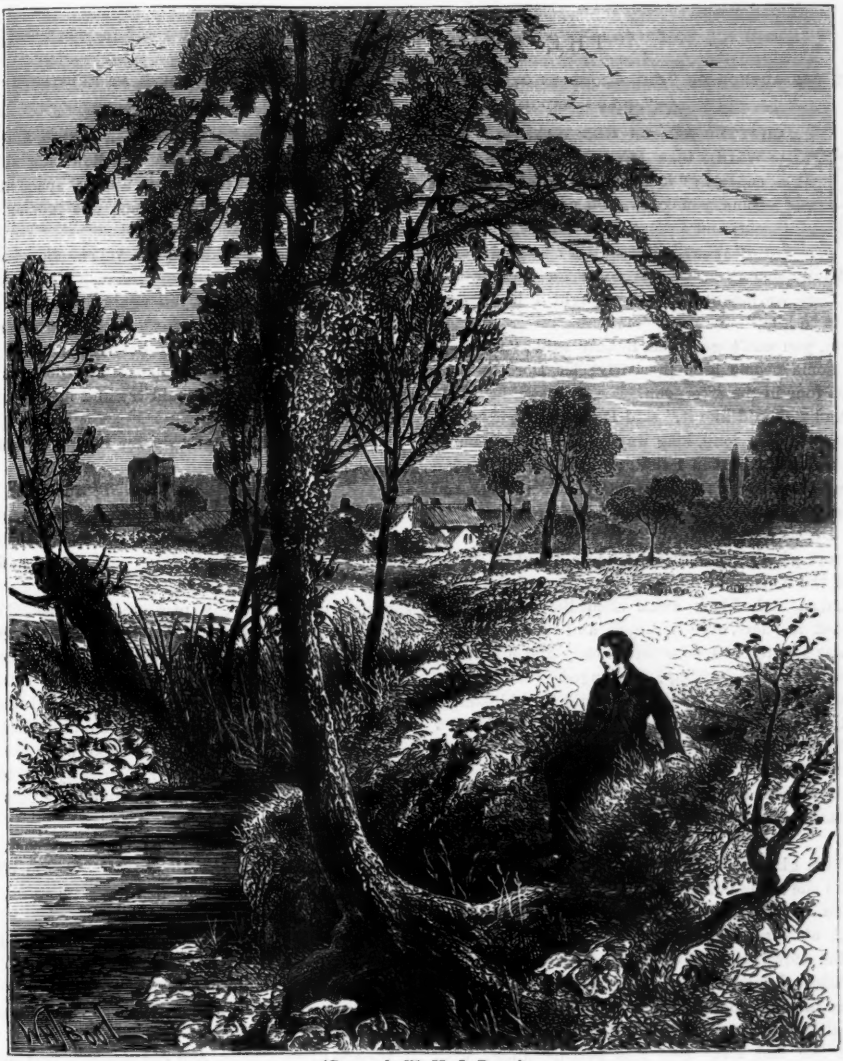
195. Where in the New Testament, do we find any mention made of the trade of the fuller?

196. Quote any passage from the Old Testament where it is stated the people were exceedingly terrified because of the abundance of rain which fell.

197. By whom were the Pharisees and Sadducees called "a generation of vipers?"

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS ON PAGE 464.

181. Because the garments were made of a coarse woollen fabric which shrank very much in washing.



182. Uncle (1 Chron. ii. 16).

183. 2 Kings vi. 11—15.

184. Mark i. 13.

185. Because the land was God's, and they were only strangers and sojourners there (Lev. xxv. 23).

186. St. John (John xviii. 6).

(Drawn by W. H. J. Boot.)

SABBATH CALM.

LAPT in a dream of peace the Sabbath lay,
The sunshine playing on its placid breast;
All Nature seemed to know the sacred day,
And hush its hoarse unrest.
The trees basked moveless in the sunny glow,
The birds skimmed silent through the breezeless air;
The very surge's murmur was as low
As is a whispered prayer.

So placid hung the blue sky stretched above,
So peaceful lay the bright earth spread below,
So gentle was the water's waveless move,
So faint and hushed its flow,
That I, o'erwearied with this rude world's storms,
By clamorous week-day tempests toss'd and driven,
Could almost deem I breathed the air that forms
The eternal calm of Heaven.

THE LATE WILLIAM LEIGHTON.

THE BRIDGE BETWEEN.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE TROUBLES OF CHATTY AND MOLLY," "THE DINGY HOUSE AT KENSINGTON," "QUEEN MADGE," "AGAINST HERSELF," ETC., ETC., ETC.

CHAPTER XX.—ON HER WAY.

"I WILL take it, mamma," she said, eagerly; "it is the day all the people come, you know, and you must not be out, and I do so hate visitors."

"What is the matter?" asked Netta.

"An important letter has come for your father, sent here by mistake, and I thought I had better take it to him."

"Oh, you can't go," the Beauty said; "we shall have some people here presently; let Dorothy go." It was four in the afternoon.

"And I should like it," said Dorothy, eager to get away; "it is a long, long way to the Strand, but I shall walk it, and then I shall go into Covent Garden coming back, and walk down the centre avenue and look at the flowers. Yes, do let me go, mamma."

So Dorothy went.

It was a long way, but she was so thankful to be out of the house and thoroughly alone, and she drew her hat, a little black straw absurdity, with a tuft of black feathers, over her eyes, and trudged along. She was so wretched, so utterly lonely and miserable, and so tired with fretting; she longed to lie down by the way to sleep. "I am sure it would be a blessing," she thought; "and I am of no use in the world now at all," and pondering over that thought, she went into her father's office, and delivered the note. Mr. Woodward was engaged; she did not ask to see him, and came away at once.

"I am glad papa was engaged," she said to herself, as she made her way from the Strand to Covent Garden. She delighted in the centre avenue, most of all at spring-time though, when the primroses and the snowdrops and violets first came; but it was a pleasant dreamy walk always. There were summer flowers in profusion, though it was late for them, but they all seemed to Dorothy as if they belonged to a world she had left. She was getting angry with Adrian Fuller, more and more every time she thought of him, for even if he had seen she liked him he might have kept the knowledge to himself, and not have talked about it to Netta, and have told herself, as he had in manner if not in words, that it was useless. It was a terrible thing to remember, and pride and sorrow struggled for a mastery, till her cheeks burnt, and yet the sorrowful tears were in her eyes.

"I must go home," she said, with a sigh, and she took a last look at the masses of flowering shrubs and trees, all heaped together in a small space at the end of the avenue. Suddenly some one touched her shoulder.

"Miss Dorothy," said a quiet voice. She turned round quickly. It was George Blakesley.

"I am so glad to see you again," he said; "I called at your house this afternoon to apologise for not coming last night, and I heard where you had gone, and that you should come and look at the flowers, so I told them I would try and find you, and bring you home again.

"No," she said, hesitatingly, for she had so wanted to be alone.

"Yes, do let me," he pleaded; and then she laughed a little, she could not help it, for he seemed to think it would be such a treat, and so she assented, and they went up the avenue once more, and he bought her a cluster of roses at one of the grand shops, though Dorothy protested against it; he seemed so pleased to see them in her hand, though he said little, and Dorothy could not help—it was not in woman's nature to help it—being a little flattered and pleased, and contrasting his manner and that of the others, who let her live among them unnoticed and uncared for. He came at a time, too, when she was so unconsciously longing for sympathy, or to be soothed, and raised from all to which the past few days had lowered her.

So they set out together on their way back. It was nearly half-past six when they left the centre avenue, and it was a long way to Hampstead, but they both liked walking.

"I was so glad when I saw you," he said; "I caught sight of that little funeral-like plume on the top of your hat, and thought you were beneath it." They had got a good way on their journey when he said this.

He was always quiet, and did not talk very much, even that evening, and Dorothy looked up at him, at his broad shoulders and faded straggling beard, and at his untidy dress—he was always careless in his personal appearance, and yet he could not be mistaken for anything but a gentleman. He talked to her, as Adrian Fuller never did now, of books (but of books that were altogether of another type from those she had loved to linger over in the shady garden) and of his work and studies, and many things that were beyond Dorothy, until at last she wondered if after all he might not be able to understand her, and to answer that question which she was always vainly asking herself. They were nearly at Haverstock Hill before she found courage to ask him about it. He had been silently walking by her side for some minutes, as if almost forgetful of her presence, and yet he was thinking of her intensely.

"You are so fond of work," she said, wonderingly; it seemed strange that any one should find happiness in what so many tried to shirk.

"Of course I am; and if I were not I would make myself so."

"Do you know, Mr. Blakesley, she said, at last, with a sigh, "I do so often wonder what we live for!"

"The old question, Dorothy, in another form," he said; "we live chiefly to be of use to others, to do some good which shall repay the world for its life and light and shelter."

"The old answer," she said, fretfully; "you think every one should work. Yet, for instance, what could I do?"

"You can help those around you, and try to make their lives better, if only in little things; and you can do a great deal."

"No, there is nothing I can do, excepting just reading and playing and things like other girls."

"Do what you can do best, or learn something and strive to do it as best it can be done, and improve upon it and make it useful to others. There is always plenty of work for those whose hands are willing, and, depend upon it, it is one of the keys to happiness. Everything must be paid for, Dorothy, and the good we do and the works we leave, are the means with which we pay for our place in the world. We cannot even rest till we have earned the right to enjoy it."

"But I do so hate work," she said; "and it isn't wrong to do nothing, is it?"

"I think it is," he answered; "certainly, from a religious point of view it is. Half the teaching of Christ may be summed up in helping those around us, and working. Nay, if we do these two things properly and thoroughly, we shall have accomplished half of our duty towards our fellow-men. We have no more right to squander away our lives in idleness than we have to squander away our own or even another person's money with which we are entrusted."

"I shall never be of any use," she said, hopelessly. They were near Hampstead now, and she was wondering if Adrian Fuller was there as usual. "Did you see Netta?" she asked, changing the conversation suddenly—"I mean this afternoon?"

"Yes, I went out into the garden to her," he answered; "she was sitting under the sycamore-tree with Mr. Fuller."

She turned away with a quick movement of impatience.

"There is a short cut this way," she said, presently, about to turn off.

"Let us go the long way," he answered, taking her hand, and drawing it tightly through his arm. "I want to talk to you," he said, awkwardly, but she only shrank away from him. "You know what it is about without my telling you. Don't you think you could give me a different answer from last time?"

"No, oh no! no indeed!"

He did not reply, only still kept hold of the hand upon his arm. They were among the Hampstead lanes by this time, and no one could see them, so they went a little farther on their way; she thinking how different this was from the tone of those at home. They did not care for her; and here was George Blakesley by her side longing to spend his whole life with her. She turned round and looked at him, as if to see whether he was different from other people. He was not handsome like Mr. Fuller, that was certain, and she remembered that Tom had said he was "washed out," and she understood what he meant. No, he did not look like a hero, and yet there was something gentle about him that pleased her, especially then, when she longed so much for sympathy. He looked down into her face, and he had soft kind eyes. "Well, my dear little child," he said, softly, "what is it?" There was something so grateful to the girl in his manner, and he called her child too, just as Adrian Fuller always did.

"I was wondering," she said, in a dazed manner, "if you——" but she stopped, and could not finish the sentence. He did for her.

"If I love you? was that it, Dorothy? I love you more than any one in the world," he said; "and the greatest desire I have in life is to marry you."

No one had ever loved her but he, this clever man beside her, who said he cared for her more than for any one in the world. She could not help being touched by it, and it soothed her pride too, which had been so wounded, and for a moment the thought shot through her, that if she married George Blakesley, Adrian Fuller could never again think and tell Netta (her cheeks burnt with shame as she remembered it) that she was in love with him. The tears came into her eyes, and rolled slowly down her cheeks, and he, seeing them, bent over her, saying tender things and soothing ones, begging her to care for him as he did for her, his dear little innocent girl, whom he had not been able to forget.

"Try and care for me, dear," he said; "you shall not be married yet, or annoyed, and I will wait till you have learned to think I am not so dreadful as you do now."

"It isn't that," she said; "I don't think you dreadful, but I should never do, indeed, and I hate work!"

"Then you shall do nothing, my child, till some day you have learnt to hate that, and then we will plod on together. We cannot live our whole lives in day-dreams."

"And I should be so sorry to leave them"—she was thinking of home, but suddenly she stopped, for she knew how little they would miss her; she was nothing much to them, and though George Blakesley said she was the world to him—"I mean Will and Sally and Tom."

"They should come and see you and you them as often as you please."

She went on a little way farther. They had walked about so long; it was getting dark, and the shadows were clinging about the trees, and lingering low over the fields—the trees and fields among which she had walked with Adrian Fuller only three months ago.

"The same, the same, yet not the same,
Oh never, never more!"

"Well?" he said; and he came to a standstill, and stood looking at her.

She looked back at him long and wearily. She was so tired of the world and of all in it, that she did not care much what became of her; but she thought it would be something great to have the power of making a whole life happy, as he said she could make his; she, a simple girl who knew nothing beyond her own fancies and dreams, and scraps of knowledge picked up in the wild weedy garden at home, and he, a clever man, sought for in society, and listened to with attention by the thoughtful and educated men of his day. She thought, too, of his words long ago, that in life we should all try to make something beautiful, and that she could make his life so.

"Would it make you so very happy?" she asked, slowly and sadly; for it was like taking yet a last farewell of the old life and the old dreams.

"My dear child," he said, gravely, holding down her hands and looking into her face, "it would make me more happy than any words can tell."

She made no reply, only let her head droop low down on her breast to hide the tears on her cheeks again.

"Very well," she said, faintly, at last; and then George Blakesley knew that he was accepted; and so Dorothy was engaged.

She almost tottered on, clinging to his arm, not that she repented yet, at any rate, only the feeling was so new and strange. Then suddenly, when they got to the gate, she began to realise all that had happened, and to feel afraid.

"Don't tell them," she said; "don't let any one know."

"Why not?" he answered. "They must be told, you know."

"Oh, but not to-night," she pleaded.

"You are not ashamed of me, Dorothy?"

"No, oh no; only they will all be in the garden;" and she was almost thankful—when she thought of how Netta and Adrian were probably together—for what she had done.

"Well, I am not going to stand up and make a speech, dear; you must leave things to me now;" and he touched her hand.

And then, with a caged feeling, and a frightened step, she entered the house.

(To be continued.)

THE TRIPLETS OF THE BIBLE.

BY THE REV. J. HILES HITCHENS, AUTHOR OF "THE FURNACE," "THE FACE OF THE KING," ETC.

V.—THE THREE WITNESSES.

"And there are three that bear witness in earth, the Spirit, and the water, and the blood: and these three agree in one."—1 St. John v. 8.

THERE is nothing to fear from the intense activity of men's minds in relation to the grave questions of religious thought. Debate will lead to decision. Inquiry will end in enthusiastic attachment to that which is divine. Even opposition must be transformed into assistance. The banner of Heaven-given truth must be borne in sunny triumph from every field of conflict. Numerous and determinate have been the efforts to dethrone Christ, to destroy or pervert His life, to dishonour His name, distort His words, and overthrow His influence in the world: but all in vain. The career of Immanuel will outlive the most searching criticism. Everything connected with Himself, His teaching, and His disciples, was exposed to the eyes of the world. Nothing was done clandestinely. Secrecy, disguise, suppression, were heartily denounced. Every veil was rent. Jesus came before the world with the proofs of His Messiahship as prophets came with signs and wonders, as princes come with insignia of royalty, as an ambassador comes with his credentials. His words were, "If ye believe not me, believe the works." "Believe me for the very work's sake!" Both the Founder of our holy religion and His followers invited scrutiny, and never refused a reason for the hope that was in them. "I speak as unto wise men; judge ye what I say." "Prove all things; hold fast that which is good." In such words were men exhorted to exercise their reason, and so form their conclusions.

The design of the apostle in the words quoted above was to give the nature of the evidence of Christ's Messiahship. He supplies three witnesses, the importance of which cannot be overrated. He does not say, nor even imply, that these are the only testimonies that can be adduced; but he furnishes these because they are harmonious, conspicuous, decisive, and probably because they were the three witnesses upon which, in his own ministrations, he was accustomed most fully to enlarge. In considering the passage let us bear in mind that the words "in earth" are interpolated—that those words, as well as the whole preceding verse, are not found in 112 out of 113 Greek manuscripts extant that contain this Epistle, that they are not found in the Greek fathers, the ancient versions, nor the Latin copies previously to the tenth century. The words "in earth" were introduced to correspond with what had been inserted immediately before in relation to the "three that bear record in heaven." We prefer to read the apostolic words thus:—"This is He that came by water and blood, even Jesus Christ; not by water only, but by water and blood. And it is the Spirit that beareth witness, because the Spirit is truth. For they that bear witness are three, the Spirit, and the water, and the blood, and these three agree in one."

Now let us take each of these witnesses, observing how, in relation to Christ personally, and in relation to Christian truth, of which Jesus is the source and subject, that the water, the blood, and the Spirit, bear distinct and undeniable testimony.

The water. What is its testimony? How did and how does it bear witness? "This is He that came by water," says John, pointing back the thoughts of men to that solemn hour when Christ was baptised. The period having arrived for Jesus to commence His personal ministry, to come out from His privacy, and appear before the world as man's Teacher and Saviour, He journeyed from Galilee to Jordan that He may submit to the ordinance of baptism at the hands of John the Baptist. It was not from a sense of personal sinfulness that He thus submitted Himself, but from an earnest resolute intention to fulfil all the demands of the law. According to the Levitical law, Christ's connection with the people of Israel rendered Him legally impure. Though in Himself free from all taint of sin, yet He was included under the general declaration of uncleanness brought against the Jews by God through the prophet Haggai. "So is this people, and so is this nation before me, saith the Lord; and so is every work of their hands; and that which they offer there is unclean." Though innocent, yet Christ must suffer for His people. As an Israelite He became subject to the law, and He was wishful to "fulfil all righteousness." John hesitated to baptise Christ. He felt himself a servant in the presence of the Great Master—a sinner in the presence of ineffable purity. But Jesus removed John's objections, by reference to the Levitical consequences of the act—an act for which John had been specially raised up, and, in anticipation of which, John's appearance had been foretold seven hundred years before. John being satisfied, the ordinance of baptism was proceeded with, and was attended by outward phenomena of a most significant order. The heavens were opened. A light, "bright as the tenfold glory of the sun, yet lambent as the softly burning stars," enveloped Him. The Spirit, in the visionary form of a dove, descended, and a supernatural voice, "fearful exceedingly," proclaimed Jesus to be the "beloved Son" of the Eternal Father, acceptable because of the glorious work upon which He was about to enter, as well as because of His own essential excellence. Thus Jesus "came by water." Thus the water testifies of Christ's Messiahship. He was publicly set apart to the grand mission, for which He entered the world, at baptism, when heaven bore open testimony that the enterprise upon which the second person in the Trinity had entered met with the perfect approval and sympathy of the Father and the Holy Spirit. From that hour Jesus, before God, angels, and men, was devoted to the work of saving the world, consecrated to death, even the death of the cross. From that hour He possessed a personal consciousness of His unique position—a consciousness which, like a consuming fire, left only three years for His holy calling. That baptism was the inauguration of Christ's high priesthood.

And still the water testifies to Christian truth. As there is but one use of water in the New Testament economy, we must look for the testimony in the administration of baptism. That ordinance has been a permanent and palpable witness to Christ. None can observe that rite without, if thoughtful, recognising the fundamental doctrines which it at once suggests. By it we indicate our belief in the depravity of human nature, the defiled condition of the spirit of man, and the absolute necessity for divine cleansing. By it we express our belief in the existence of a fountain open for sin and for uncleanness. We confess the efficacy and sufficiency of Christ's atoning work. We proclaim our confidence that "the blood of Jesus Christ cleanseth from all sin." By baptism we signify the necessity for, and possibility of, regeneration. We allow that if we submit ourselves to the power of the Holy Spirit we shall be "saved by the washing of regeneration and renewing of the Holy Ghost." Baptism is thus a public profession of the doctrines and duties of the Christian religion. It is the Gospel set forth in figure. It seems to say to all spectators that as water cleanses, refreshes, and revives the body, so the blood of Jesus spiritually operates; and that as the water must be applied by a power without the subject, so the atoning and purifying blood of Immanuel must be applied to the heart by the Spirit of God. He must "purge the conscience from dead works to serve the living God."

The blood. What is its testimony? As the water inaugurated Christ's ministry, so the blood terminated it. By the one He was consecrated to the work of saving humanity; by the other He executed and consummated that work. The very first intimation given fallen man of a coming Deliverer, was one which associated that Deliverer with suffering and bloodshedding. Very frequently the world was taught, both by the ceremonies of the priests and the direct predictions of the prophets, that He who should come as a Saviour would shed His blood for the race of man. "When Moses had spoken every precept to all the people, according to the law, he took the blood of calves and of goats with water, and scarlet wool, and hyssop, and sprinkled both the book and all the people, saying, This is the blood of the New Testament which God hath enjoined unto you. Moreover, he sprinkled with blood both the tabernacle and all the vessels of the ministry. And almost all things are by the law purged with blood, and without the shedding of blood there is no remission."

Yes, the teaching of the Mosaic dispensation was to this effect, that He who was to come as the antitype of all the Jewish sacrifices, should shed His life-blood for helpless man. So when the Saviour appeared He became the "Man of sorrows." Six times His blood was shed: at His circumcision, in His agony in the garden, when He was scourged by the ruthless tormentors, when He was crowned with thorns, when His hands and feet were pierced at the crucifixion, and when, after death, one of the soldiers with a spear pierced His side, "and forthwith came thereout blood and water." None of that blood was shed for Himself, but for others, even for all mankind. That blood "speaketh better things than that of Abel." It speaketh to the troubled heart of man, and tranquillises it; it speaketh to the hardened spirit of man, and subdues it; it speaketh to the sin-stained life of man, and cleanses it. Every blessing of salvation man owes to the blood of Christ. Redemption is "through His blood." Justification is "by His blood." Sanctification is by the blood which cleanseth from all sin. Final victory is "through the blood of the Lamb." Heavenly honours will be ascribed to "the blood of the Lamb." Thus the blood testifies to the Messiaship of Jesus.

Moreover, prior to the Saviour's departure from among men, on that last and most solemn night He spent with His disciples in the guest-chamber, He instituted the Lord's Supper to be a permanent representation and memorial of His death. Then it was that He took the cup, and said, "This cup is the New Testament in my blood which is shed for many for the remission of sins." Just as Christ instituted the one ordinance—baptism—to convey truth to men, so He introduced the other—the Lord's Supper—to teach men concerning Himself. As the former was to be a sign of solemn verities, so the latter was to be an enduring witness. Water and blood were both ordained to testify of, and point to, Christ. Every time the people of God approach the table of the Lord, and partake of the visible memorials, the blood speaks aloud of the Redeemer. The bread and wine are emblems of the body and blood of our Saviour. The broken bread tells of His crucifixion, and brings to remembrance the language of the prophet, "He was wounded for our trangressions, He was bruised for our iniquities, the chastisement of our peace was upon Him, and with his stripes we are healed." The broken bread being eaten, and the poured-out wine being drunk, teach us that it is alone by personal appropriation of Christ to ourselves that we can be saved—that as eating and drinking are essential to physical life, so partaking of Jesus by faith is necessary for spiritual life. The words of the Divine Teacher are brought to our remembrance—"He that eateth me shall live by me." And the participation of these emblems being a social matter, not designed to be observed alone in privacy, suggests the oneness of the Church of Christ—the intimate union existing between all the members of Christ's body.

In this manner the blood of Jesus is a constant witness to Him and of Him. Well will it be for us if we can realise more and more the preciousness of the Saviour's sacrifice. Well will it be for us if we can ever plead that blood as shed for us, and show that blood sprinkled upon our hearts, even as the blood of the Paschal Lamb was sprinkled upon the lintels of the house-doors of old. Washed in that blood we shall be happy and hopeful both in the shady vales of life and in the troubled waters of Jordan.

During the late American war, the Hon. George Stuart, of Philadelphia, a noble servant of the Lord, who conducted a Christian commission to the wounded and dying, one day forgot the password. As he was riding forth on one of his errands of mercy, the sentry, after challenging him, said, "I ought to shoot you; but I give you the chance of getting the right password, though I dare not tell you myself." Mr. Stuart rode back, and obtained the password, and then coming up to the sentry again, he said, "Young man, I hope you know the password for heaven; you will be asked for it only once." "Yes, sir," replied the soldier, "I thank God I do, and I learned it from you in the Sabbath school. It is 'The blood of Jesus Christ cleanseth from all sin.'" Aye, that is the passport which is honoured of God, and accepted at the gates of the New Jerusalem. With that password we can confront the legion emissaries of hell, and safely force our way through the serried ranks of our bitterest enemies.

The third witness referred to by the Apostle is the Spirit—that is, the Holy Ghost.

During the entire period of the Saviour's ministry the Eternal Spirit bore testimony, but it is not specially to that the Apostle refers. The water was witness to Christ at the beginning of His ministry; the blood was the testimony at the end of His visible career; and the Spirit became the witness after His decease. It is to that special testimony borne by the Holy Ghost, subsequently to the completion of the Saviour's life-work, that the inspired penman alludes. That testimony began at the Saviour's resurrection. He was "quickened by the Spirit." "He was declared to be the Son of God with power according to the Spirit of holiness, by His resurrection from the dead." The testimony of the Spirit was more fully given on the day of Pentecost, when the promise of Jesus to His disciples in the Upper Room was fulfilled. That the gift of the Spirit was a witness to the acceptance and ascension of Jesus, the Apostle St. Peter very forcibly proved, when he said, "This Jesus hath God raised up, whereof we all are witnesses; therefore being by the right hand of God exalted, and having received of the Father the promise of the Holy Ghost, He hath shed forth this which ye now see and hear. Therefore let all the house of Israel know assuredly that God hath made that same Jesus whom ye have crucified both Lord and Christ." The written word which is in our houses and hands is the work of the Holy Spirit, and that word points to Jesus. Christ Himself said, "Search the Scriptures, for in them ye think ye have eternal life, and they are they which testify of me." Every touching narrative of the life of Christ; every doctrine concerning Christ; every promise from the lips of Christ; every epistle on the love, beauty, glory, sufficiency, and claims of Christ; every word that directly or indirectly calls the attention of the mind or the emotions of the heart towards Christ is a testimony from the Holy Spirit. "Holy men of God spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost." The evangelists could not have penned the Gospels had not the Holy Spirit brought all things to their remembrance. There was much that was prophetical, parabolical, perplexing, and even somewhat that was painful to the disciples, which would render a clear remembrance most improbable. Some of Christ's addresses were too long and elaborate for the strongest unaided memory. It was necessary, therefore, that all should be repreached to those four men who undertook to record the life and labours of their Lord. That Holy Ghost who "quickened" the sacred body of Jesus and raised Him from the dead, brought to remembrance the sacred words which Jesus had addressed to His people. And the Inspirer of Scripture is still the Interpreter thereof. He unlocks the truth, He unfolds the mysteries of revelation, He applies the healing balm to the yearning stricken soul of man. The heart of man naturally is veiled. The eyes of men are holden that they cannot see. It is not till the Holy Spirit opens the eyes to discern the force and fulness of Divine truth, and presents that truth in a light in which man can receive it, that he appreciates or comprehends it. Then the man is filled with rapt emotions from the vision he obtains; and he understands the words of Jesus when He said of the Spirit, "He shall glorify me, for He shall receive of mine and show it unto you." Besides all this, it must be remembered that the true Christian has the Spirit as a witness within him. He that believeth hath the witness in himself. The Holy Ghost takes possession of the godly man's soul, and confirms the verdict of conscience. "The Spirit itself beareth witness with our spirit, that we are the children of God." "Hereby we know that He abideth in us by the Spirit which He hath given us."

Such, then, are the three Witnesses, and these three agree in One—agree to establish the character and claims of One Person, agree to recommend the saving power of One Physician, agree to confirm the prophetic words of One Teacher, agree to invite all men to One Saviour, agree to point out one and only one way to the Beatific Presence. Who, with such testimony, will dare question the credentials of Immanuel? With three such Witnesses, like a threefold cord that cannot be broken, who will be so slow of heart as to repudiate the authoritative demands of the Divine Lord?

Now, more than ever, men are coming to see that Jesus is worthy to receive all honour and power. Now, more frequently than ever, hearts are adopting the language of St. Thomas, and prostrate in humble confidence and love are exclaiming, "My Lord and my God!" The world must allow Christ's character to be original. The Sun of Righteousness rose on time full-orbed, and retains, as He ever will, His unwaning, supreme, perennial glory. Ages will only cause His effulgence to be more clearly seen, and His elevating influence to be more fully felt. They who now stand away from Him will come to see that He is light to the darkened mind, life to the inanimate affections, truth to the fickle thoughts, wisdom to the wayward judgment, bread to the hungry heart, rest to the weary soul, author and finisher of faith. All in all, a paragon of excellency, a gem of the rarest and richest worth! Never will another such worthy and winsome being appear upon the world's stage. Never shall the eye of man see one beside Him who is "altogether lovely." A living poet sings very charmingly:—

"Ring out old shapes of foul disease;
Ring out the narrow lust of gold;
Ring out the thousand wars of old,
Ring in the thousand years of peace;
Ring in the valiant and the free,
The larger heart, the kindlier hand;
Ring out the darkness of the land;
Ring in the Christ that is to be."

Can human conception rise to a higher altitude than the lofty character of Jesus? Can more be expected or even wished than that we have in Immanuel? Never! never! To the living, loving, unchanging, and eternal Christ may we all and always cling, for without Him we can do nothing.

STILL AND DEEP.

BY F. M. F. SKENE, AUTHOR OF "TRIED," "ONE LIFE ONLY," ETC.

CHAPTER XIX.

THERE was complete silence between Bertrand and his companion for a few minutes, then suddenly Laura pulled the pony up short in the very middle of the road, and turning round, fixed her eyes, all filled with changeful flashing light, full on his face, and said to him, frankly, "I will tell you what I have been thinking, Mr. Lisle: here you are coming into a house amongst a set of strangers, with only one person of the whole number whom you think you know, but in truth do not; and you are really just like a man entering on an unexplored country, where he may find himself surrounded either by savages that will roast him alive, or by gentle islanders that will offer him the pipe of peace; and it seems to me that you are very much to be pitied."

"Especially if you are a specimen of the savages," said Bertrand, laughing.

"Just so; have I not been malignantly tearing to pieces the angelic character of my dear friend? but in spite of that evidence of my ferocious disposition, will you trust me, Mr. Lisle, if I do you an essential service, as I think it would be, and tell you all about the inhabitants of Chiverley Rectory before you have to make an outward acquaintance with them?"

"But they are all your nearest relations," said Bertrand, still smiling; "what can you do but praise them?"

"Even if they were I should speak out," said Laura, composedly, "or I should play you false, and that I would not do for the world; but as it happens, my father is the only relation I have amongst them, the rest are not more kin to me than to you; and when you come to know me, Mr. Lisle, you will discover that I have the dreadful fault in this punctilious world of being perfectly unconventional and outspoken; I say whatever I please without fear or favour, and I do not care in the least who I offend, nor much more who I win;" and she cast one of her gleaming glances at him.

"Plenty of the last I should think," he said; "but Miss Wyndham, do, by all means, give me the fullest description you can of my future acquaintances; I have not the smallest idea of what the family consists."

"My father, first of all, at fifty-five still a curate, therefore unsuccessful, therefore poor, therefore miserable; his second wife, my step-mother, and your cousin, comes next—your cousin," continued Laura, reflectively, when she had started the old pony once more on his course; "I wonder if you and she have inherited the same family qualities! Mr. Lisle, is it your intention to pass the term of your mortal existence in profound slumber, only diversified by intervals of consciousness for the purpose of imbibing nourishment? And do you give no other sign of animation except incessant yawning?"

"Well no," said Bertrand, laughing, "that is not precisely the style of life which commends itself to me."

"Then they are not hereditary characteristics; but you have there a brief analysis of Mrs. Wyndham's present history. Next in the actual family comes an individual whom I do not pretend to understand or to describe—we are greater mysteries to ourselves than to any one else, are we not?—Laura Wyndham, whom you will hear called Lurline, and Lorelei, and all sorts of pet names."

"Ah, Lurline! the beautiful syren of the Rhine! I can understand that the title applies well to your outward aspect; but she is dangerous, that lovely witch, and you can hardly be that."

"Dangerous! oh dear, I wonder what danger any one could be in from me!" said Laura, with the most innocent air in the world; I should not like the name if I thought it implied that—however, I really do not care what any one names me, if only they do not call me Miss Wyndham, I do detest that odious formal designation."

(Drawn by W. SMALL.)

"Her hands full of dewy flowers."—p. 508.

"But those who have no right to call you anything else must address you in that way, like myself, for instance."

"Why must you? have I not told you I care nothing for the world's customs, and I hate conventionalities of all kinds. Here you are coming to be one of the family for some weeks, and why on earth should you not call me Laura, just as you will call that pony Bob, by which name he has been known ever since he has existed on this lower sphere."

"It shall be just as you please, of course," said Bertrand, courteously; thinking, as he looked at her, that he had certainly not seen any one at all like her in his life before; he smiled when he contrasted her freedom of speech with the courtly manners of the ladies with whom he chiefly associated on the Continent; but he was very much amused by her, so he encouraged his strange companion to go on with her account of the inmates of Chiverley.

"Mary Trevelyan comes next," said Laura, "but I shall not repeat what I have already told you about her, you think you understand her better than I do, but the day will come when you will find that I am right, and you are wrong; we will pass on, however, to John Pemberton: he is a young man who has come to read with my father for the purpose of taking orders, for which he was not originally intended, so he is rather beyond the ordinary age of pupils. How shall I describe him to you? he is so good, so saintly, one of whom the world is not worthy;" and Laura's voice softened, and her expression changed to one of meekness and tender feeling. "You could hardly imagine what a true devoted heart he has; poor dear John, I wish I could have a better hope that he will be happy in the future!"

"Why should he not be happy?" asked Bertrand.

"Ah well," she said, with apparent hesitation, "people's affections are not always to be won, even by those who deserve them; but it is hardly well for me to speak of John Pemberton, so we will go on to the last on our list. Charlie Davenant is another pupil of my father's, a good-tempered commonplace sort of fellow, of whom, I think, it may be recorded, at the close of his career, that he has performed one great feat in inspiring Mary Trevelyan with a certain amount of life and animation."

"How was that?" said Bertrand, turning sharply round upon her.

"Because Charlie, being a sober youth, has fallen in love with the staid Mary, and she to him does seriously incline."

"Do you mean that they are engaged?" exclaimed Bertrand, involuntarily grasping Laura by the arm, so that she turned away her head to conceal a smile.

"Oh, as to that, I dare say Mary would tell you that there is no formal engagement, because for the present, marriage is not possible for them; but there is no doubt it will end in that. As yet Charlie is too young, and his father would not make any provision for him till he has proved his constancy to his present choice. He has always been disposed to fall in love with every young lady he meets, as I know to my cost," added Laura, laughing so gaily that the admission did not jar on her hearer's delicacy as it would otherwise have done; "it was awkward for me, as I could not quite quarrel with my father's pupil, so I established myself as his adopted sister, which suits very well."

"Perhaps Mary Trevelyan has done the same," said Bertrand, eagerly.

"No, no, answered Laura; "she is far too matter-of-fact; she told me, in the most solemn manner, that she did not approve of unreal relationships, and that she preferred more binding ties of another description."

Bertrand turned his head away, stung to the quick. Was this the reason why Mary had failed to meet him at the station? Had she shrunk from looking him in the face because she had given away the love to which he almost felt he had a right; yet, after all, he had no definite right, she was perfectly free as he was. He would have been wiser, perhaps, if he had invaded the sanctuary of death, and spoken to her of marriage and happiness while his father's corpse yet lay in the house; but no, if she had loved him so lightly, or not at all, as to have transferred her affections to this young man, it was well that he had not compromised himself. Bertrand Lisle had no fancy to be refused—such a thing had never happened to him, and never should; and then suddenly, while these bitter thoughts coursed through his mind, he seemed to hear a sad wailing voice rising out of a far-off grave, with the echo of the unforgotten words he first had heard by his father's bed of death, "Bertrand, these were her words, 'He is now, and ever will be, my one and only love.'" Surely it could not be that she had changed so soon? Well, he could but wait and judge for himself; and having arrived at this conclusion, he turned back to Laura. She had been furtively watching the varying expressions of his face, and her instinct enabled her to read his thoughts as plainly as if they had been written in a book.

"Mr. Lisle," she said, very softly, "we are close to the rectory now; let me say how earnestly I hope you may be entirely happy and peaceful during all the time you pass under its roof."

Her manner was very charming as she said this, and he thanked her warmly. "I have had a wonderfully pleasant welcome at all events," he said.

"And you will not forget that I was your first friend, among the Wyndhams at least. If I can ever do anything to conduce to your happiness here you will frankly make use of me, will you not?"

"I shall not forget your kindness, most certainly, and I should think you must always conduce much to the happiness of every one in whose society you are placed."

"I should like to make this dull place brighter for you, at least," she said; and then she turned slowly round, and brought to bear on him all the wonderful sweetness of which her expression could at times be capable, in one brief earnest look; for the hour she had so deftly won for her own purposes had come to an end, and she had already detected that which Bertrand had not yet seen—a dark robed figure standing just within the rectory gate, looking out anxiously along the road.

"There is Mary Trevelyan waiting for Charlie Davenant, no doubt," she said, as the turn of the road brought them right up to the gate, which Mary had already flung wide open.

But Bertrand's eyes had fallen on the well-known well-beloved figure, and for the moment all the poison that had been poured into his ears was forgotten; he only knew that it was Mary, his young pure love, who stood there, and in an instant he had bounded from the pony carriage, and had caught both her hands in his. "Mary, dear, dearest Mary!" he exclaimed; and she lifted up her dark eyes, filled with such a rapture as he had never seen in them before, while she breathed, in a scarce audible whisper, "At last!"

"You are glad to see me then?" said Bertrand, with a smile half sad half reproachful, as some of Laura's insinuations began to return to his mind.

"Glad! oh, Bertrand!" and Mary's hands involuntarily clung to his, while her head drooped over them, as if bowed down by excess of happiness; but she had no time to say more; for the Lorelei's clear sweet voice rang out through the air. "Good people, do you mean me to drive over you? I would pass on and leave you to your nursery recollections, if I could do so without danger to life and limb."

As a matter of fact there was abundant room for her to pass, had she chosen to do so, but Bertrand and Mary were too much absorbed to notice this. Mary started, and coloured painfully at her words, while Bertrand laughingly apologised. They both turned and went towards the house, while Laura walked the pony beside them at a foot pace, and joined merrily in the conversation. In this guise they reached the door, where Mr. Wyndham stood waiting to welcome his guest, and Mary did not see Bertrand alone again that night.

CHAPTER XX.

Bertrand Lisle had come to England at this time with the firm intention of definitely asking Mary Trevelyan to be his wife; but he went to his room on the first night of his arrival at Chiverley with all sorts of conflicting feelings combining to bewilder him. He was dazzled by Laura, doubtful of Mary, and quite perplexed as to his own position. The whole of the Lorelei's conversation with him had been most skilfully managed by her, so as just to convey the impression she wished in an indirect manner, but of all the arrows in her shaft, there were two especially which had struck home to his heart with peculiar keenness: first the insinuation that Mary would at all times obey his father's wishes at any cost to herself; and secondly, the intimation that she had become attached to Charlie Davenant. There are few men who would accept of a sacrifice in order to win a wife, and Bertrand certainly was not one of them; if Mary Trevelyan gave herself to him it must be because she loved him, and not because his dead father had desired the alliance; and if any other had won her heart he would be the last to interfere with her choice; in fact, he did not consider that he had any right to do so; he remembered very well the words he had spoken to her by the new-made grave, when he told her that his father's wishes were his most truly also, and by those words he considered himself morally, though not legally, bound to her. But he also very well remembered that she had made no answer to them, and that in so far as it might be considered that he had conveyed to her then his wish to marry her, she had neither accepted nor rejected him. At the time he had firmly believed that her silence was eloquent of a love which rejoiced in the prospect of their union, but he had no actual ground for the supposition beyond the sentence so solemnly repeated by his father on his death-bed, as having come from Mary's own lips, and it was just possible that the old man had been mistaken; or at least, if that was impossible, as to the actual words which he had so carefully treasured in his memory, it was at least conceivable that Mary might have been influenced to some extent in uttering them, by the desire to gratify the last wish of her best friend in his dying hours.

Bertrand lay awake for a long time pondering over all these considerations, and the final result at which he arrived was precisely that which the Lorelei most desired: he would wait and watch all concerned, and then be guided by circumstances; instead of seeking, as he had intended, the very first opportunity of asking Mary to join her fate finally to his, he would simply treat her with the affectionate kindness of their earlier years, and say not one word of marriage till he was well assured, as he had been until now, that she loved him and him alone.

"I will have no half-hearted wife," he said to himself; "she must be mine altogether or not at all." It was not without a pang that he thus contemplated the possibility of losing her; nor was it only caused by wounded pride, for Bertrand Lisle did love Mary Trevelyan—better perhaps than he knew himself—with a deep, long-standing, earnest affection; though he did not at present feel for her that overmastering, passionate love which would make it seem as if the very light of life were blotted out should he lose her; and yet, even after he had come to the formal determination that he would wait and test her feelings to himself, there was all the time an underlying conviction in his heart of hearts that Mary Trevelyan was indeed his own, that all her love was surely his; for the vision of her sweet pure face rose up before him, with the dark eyes, still and deep as fathomless waters, and he felt that whatever else might be doubtful about her, this at least was certain, that she was truth itself in all she said and did, and that if she had indeed uttered the words his father had reported, she had meant them in their fullest sense.

"She would not be false even to give peace to the dying," he murmured; and with this last reflection, Bertrand's handsome head sunk back on the pillow, and he went off into the profound slumber which usually carried him, with his good health and easy conscience, so lightly from one day to another.

In his dreams however there came to him another image, as different from that of fair quiet Mary as is the morning star blazing in the dim skies of early dawn from the white rose in whose heart the dew-drops lie like pearls.

All night he was haunted by a bright bewitching face, with flashing eyes and radiant smile and arch sweet looks, that came and went with the fitful fancies of sleep in a hundred changeful aspects.

When Bertrand awoke next morning, and gradually came to understand where he was and what the day was likely to bring forth, his first thought was, that he should see again that strange and lovely Lorelei; his second, that he should once more hear the low soft voice of gentle Mary.

We do not intend to trace out in detail all the arts by which Laura Wyndham laboured to separate Bertrand Lisle from his first love, and win him to herself. It is sad enough to know that there are in the world persons who will leave no stone unturned to compass their own ends, and who care not over what broken hearts or untimely graves they have to step in the attainment of their object; sad enough to know that the character we are describing is no fiction, but a living reality, and while we trust that the history of this erring soul, with her perverted gifts, may act in some measure as a warning to those who may be tempted to enter upon tortuous paths, yet it can never be a salutary process to unfold the windings of the serpent evil, and show by what means the rarest qualities, that might have been used to noble purposes in the service of the God who gave them, may be degraded to the basest uses, and made the ministers of falsehood and cruelty.

Be it remembered that the heart of Laura Wyndham was untouched by that divine fire of the love of God, which can make the desert blossom as a rose, and turn even pain and suffering into sweetest joy if borne for the dear Redeemer's sake. This mortal life was all in all to her, and she never really looked beyond it, though she believed herself to have a faith in that which was to come, and now, at the point of her career at which she stood—verging on thirty, sickened of the dreamy sameness of her existence, without a prospect of escape from it—it was hardly strange that she, such as she was, should seize, with almost desperate determination, the possibility which presented itself in Bertrand Lisle, not only of release from a detested durance in her father's miserable home, but of the possession of all that her fancy pictured as the perfection of happiness. Marriage with him had, in fact, every attraction life could offer her. He was himself a thoroughly lovable individual—handsome, agreeable, honourable, and good; he had an excellent position; the entrée into the best society; and his home was in the gayest and sunniest of Continental towns, where music and laughter were in the very air.

What wonder that she set herself to win him by fair means or by foul, and thought no more of Mary Trevelyan, whose happiness she might be crushing in the process, than she would of a tender flower trampled under her feet as she sped on some hasty errand.

And this much more may be said for Laura, though it would not have stayed her course had it been otherwise, that she did not in the least understand the depth of Mary Trevelyan's nature. She honestly believed her cold, and incapable of strong feeling, and, although she knew perfectly well by her instincts as a woman that Mary did love Bertrand truly, and him alone, yet she believed her heart to be so still and passionless, that even his loss, she thought, would but pass over it as a light cloud soon dispersed; and now, though Mary had to die for it, though John Pemberton's life should be for ever marred and broken, she, Laura Wyndham, meant to be Bertrand's wife, to live with him in his sunny palazzo, to shine like a star at his diplomatic receptions, to spend her joyous evenings at operas and balls, and taste at last all the pleasures of a life spent amid the allurements of the world.

So, from that first morning when Bertrand, coming out of his room, saw her dancing in through the open door into the hall, with her hands full of dewy flowers, fairer even than in his dreams, more radiant than the morning itself—to the day, a month later, when we resume the record of events, the Lorelei ceased not for a single moment to use every charm she possessed, every art she could devise, to allure him to herself, and she succeeded. She dazzled his senses, she captivated his fancy, and she woke a sudden passion in his heart which had neither the depth nor the durability of the sentiment he had felt and still in a measure retained for Mary Trevelyan.

As it happened, there was nothing whatever to stay Lurline in her triumphant course. Charlie Davenant had left Chiverley two or three days after Bertrand's arrival; he just remained long enough to let the new-comer see clearly that he had neither eyes nor thoughts for any one but Mary, and the excessive annoyance and distress he manifested at having to leave the rectory at this juncture could only be attributed by Bertrand to that which Lurline told him was indeed the cause, the fear that he himself might prove a rival to him in Miss Trevelyan's affections. In actual fact Charlie's great unwillingness to leave Chiverley at that time arose from his perfect comprehension of the Lorelei's plans for the capture of him on whom he well knew Mary's whole happiness depended; he could not bear the idea of thus abandoning her to her fate, although he hardly knew what he could have done to avert it had he remained. There was no help for it, however, he had to go; and Lurline knew well how to make capital with Bertrand out of his miserable looks as he bade farewell to Mary.

Laura was thoroughly mistress of the situation so soon as he was gone; for Mary never by word or look made the smallest attempt to stand between her and Bertrand, or to keep that place in his affections she had once believed to be her own. She, like Bertrand himself, had never forgotten the avowal she had made to Mr. Lisle on his death-bed, or the possibility that he might have repeated her words to his son; and to her delicate shrinking nature there could be no terror so great, no pain so keen, as that which was aroused in her by the bare thought that Bertrand might marry her by no desire of his own, but out of reverence to his father's wish, and compassion to herself. Her dread of this left her but one course to pursue. She must betray no sign of the deep enduring love she bore him, unless he made it unmistakably plain to her that he shared it heartily and without reserve. She was careful, therefore, even when they were alone, which was but seldom, to show him only the sweet gentleness of manner which characterised her with every one; she would speak to him of nurse Parry, or of any recollections they might have in common, as she might have done with any old friend, and when the Lorelei came flashing in between them, as she invariably did, Mary would quietly give way, and leave them together, as they seemed to wish, while she went down to the village to attend to the sick poor, whom she did not think it right to neglect, even for the happiness of being in the same room with Bertrand Lisle.

And so it was that the month of his visit, to which Mary had looked forward with such unutterable longing, became to her a period of intense and silent suffering; for she understood at once, by the power of her own deep affection, that he was being strongly attracted by Laura, and she felt that nothing was left to her but to stand aside and see all that was joy and hope and life itself to her pass swiftly away from her utterly and for ever.

(To be continued.)

SCRIPTURE LESSONS FOR SCHOOL AND HOME.

SCRIPTURE STORIES. First Series. No. 28. A Voyage.

Chapter to be read—Acts xxvii. (part of).

INTRODUCTION. Remind of the result of St. Paul's trial. To whom had he appealed? Where did the emperor live? Must therefore be sent to Rome. Might go by sea or land. Trace the two routes on a map (which must accompany this this lesson throughout). Which would be easier in days of bad roads, no railroads, &c.? Therefore naturally go by sea: so this story is about a voyage.

I. The Travellers. (Read 1—13.) Of whom did the party consist? and what do we know of them? (a) Paul, the prisoner—how delightful the sight of the sea and the refreshing sea-air, after two years' imprisonment!—would quite enjoy it. Remind what a great traveller he had always been by sea and land. Who else is there? (b) Aristarchus. First heard of at Ephesus (xix. 29) as Paul's companion in travel, having left his home in Macedonia to accompany Paul. See how constant he was as a friend—not tired of him or ashamed of him when in trouble and prison. Afterwards called "fellow labourer" (Col. iv. 10) and "fellow prisoner" (Philemon 24). (c) Luke. Show how this is evident from ver. 1, the plural "we" showing that the writer was present, had been left in Jerusalem (xxi. 17); how glad such old friends would be to meet again! Would be quite a happy party sailing together. Under whose charge was the prisoner? (d) Julius, a centurion. Let children notice his bearing, not haughty, but affable even to a prisoner (ver. 3). How well it speaks for both! Paul has by his conduct gained the officer's good-will, and Julius recognises the worth of his prisoner. Evidently mutual respect between the Roman idolater and Christian prisoner.

Practical Lesson. Christian courtesy.—Some children like to be rude and overbearing to servants and juniors; some also sulk when punished wrongfully: both may learn a lesson from Julius and Paul, to be pitiful, courteous (1 Pet. iii. 8, 9); so will receive blessing and be imitators of Christ.

II. The Course. Now let children trace the course on a map. Start from Cæsarea by a coasting vessel, belonging to and bound for Adramyttium, on coast of Mysia; touch at old town of Sidon, known ever since the Flood (Gen. x. 19); go on shore for few hours, then sail west along Mediterranean; instead of going south of Cyprus, obliged by contrary winds to sail between it and the continent; wind being west they sailed north-west to Myra, a populous city; there transferred to large corn-ship, bound from Alexandria, in Egypt—the great corn country—for Italy. Wind still being west, and not allowing a straight course, obliged to sail south of Crete (ver. 7) to Fair Havens, where they anchor in the little harbour. Now a consultation is held. Paul advises to stay where they are; large ship; 276 people on board (ver. 37); winter coming on; the great fast Day of Atonement, or tenth day of seventh month, i.e., September, being past; this sea, which he had often crossed, being very dangerous in stormy weather. Master of ship urges to push on to Phenice, the other harbour of Crete (ver. 12); which would naturally be more listened to? So they wait for a south wind, and again set sail.

III. The Storm. (Read 14—26) Phenice, only thirty miles off; with fair wind, would be there in few hours. Soon wind changes, and ship caught by fearful hurricane; driven south-west before wind; boat towed behind now drawn into the ship; timbers strongly bound with ropes. Now the quicksands on north coast of Africa are neared; great fear, so the topsails hauled down; some of the cargo thrown into the sea. Picture the scene: the dark and lurid sky; the sea rolling in giant waves; the wind howling; ship tossed by the hurricane; now in the trough of the sea, now riding on the top of the waves; the crew and passengers and prisoner working night and day at the pumps, throwing overboard the unnecessary sails; no observations taken; hope of being saved all gone. Now the prisoner stands forward, calm and collected, to give advice, Picture him on the deck, the sailors and passengers eagerly listening; his voice—before heard at Athens on Mars Hill, at Jerusalem on the stairs of the Temple, at Cæsarea before Festus and Agrippa—again gains hearing. Let children notice his—(a) Assurance. What warning had he given them before? Was it heeded? Now how is he assured of safety? To him alone has the angel come; what a testimony to him as under special protection of God! (b) His faith; in whom had he believed? What precious proofs had God given of His protection! So now he trusts Him, and has no fear; and all are to be safe as well as himself.

Practical Lessons. (1) Confidence in danger. Who alone was calm in danger? Whom did St. Paul serve? He confessed God before men, and so was preserved and encouraged by God. So Daniel was preserved; and Peter in prison. Similar promises to all God's people. Need fear no evil if only are in the path of the righteous; e.g., young boy at school, servant in kitchen, if do right, will be kept from evil. (2) The Ministry of Angels. Tell children meaning of word angel, as messenger, sent by God to minister to His children. Thus, angel came to Christ after temptation (Matt. iv. 11), in Garden of Gethsemane (Luke xxii. 43); to Paul at Cæsarea, and now in the ship. So always the angels near us (Ps. xxxiv. 6), to whisper consolation, to cheer spirit, to incline to pray. This for comfort and protection of saints; not alone in danger; God himself near, and angels sent to help. Only be quite sure we, like Paul, do serve God, thus may claim promises of support.

Questions to be answered.

1. Who were the travellers to Rome? Say what you can about them.
2. What lessons may we learn from the behaviour of Paul and Julius?
3. Describe the course of the voyage.
4. Name any incident in the storm.
5. What character did St. Paul exhibit in the storm?
6. What lessons may we learn?

IN PERIL.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "SHAG AND DOLL," "HUGH'S HEROISM," ETC.

CHAPTER II.

JAMES walked straight on along the road, without troubling himself to inquire whither it led. He saw a vista of green trees and fields before him, and that was enough.

After going on some distance he came to a rising ground, and, when he had gained the summit, stood still involuntarily, to contemplate the scene around him. Rich woods stretched out on one side, and on the other an open undulating country, which lay smiling in the floods of golden light which the sun at that hour in the evening sheds over the earth, seeming as if he would fain, before departing, pour out upon her his richest choicest blessings. His slanting beams glanced fitfully here and there; not, as in mid-day, lighting up everything impartially, but as if, before bidding adieu, he was singling out special favourites for a special distinction; darting upon certain leaves of the copper-beech and causing them to glow with a bright red blush; alighting on a few late sprays of drooping laburnum which were still left hanging on the tree, and making them shine like burnished gold, and, glancing through the thick foliage of the elms or oaks, danced here and there upon their leaves, which seemed at his touch to renew their youth and stand out in the bright tender green of early spring.

Contrasted with the London courts and alleys James had lately left, this fair scene appeared a perfect paradise in his eyes.

For he had been born and reared amid country sights and sounds, and had loved them in his boyhood; and it had been only since he had left them that he had gone on so rapidly in his downward course, falling lower and lower, until he had reached his present point. And that was—— James started as he thought what it was; for, compared with the peace and purity which all Nature around him breathed, it seemed to stand out in darker colours than it had ever done before.

Not only had he by this time grown accustomed to vice of every description, from which he would once have shrunk with horror, not only was he learning to drink and swear, and indulge in evil passions without restraint, but, beyond that, he stood committed to join in an act of robbery that very night! He had given his word to his neighbour, Peter Bell, to meet him as the clock struck twelve, and with him, under cover of the darkness, in the still midnight hour, perpetrate the long contemplated and carefully concerted deed of sin and shame.

So cautiously and cleverly had it been planned that there seemed no risk of detection, but a certain prospect of sudden and easily acquired riches, which the two had been coveting so eagerly, that they had with difficulty put a curb upon their impatience, and waited until the most favourable opportunity. Now, at length, the time was nearly come. That morning they had said to one another in low whispers, as they separated, "To-night, at twelve o'clock."

At this point in his reverie James started violently, for the words suddenly fell upon his ears—"Thou fool: this night, aye—this very night—thy soul may be required of thee!"

The effect upon him was almost like that of an electric shock. He trembled as he looked around, for he could see no human being; it almost appeared as if the air itself must have uttered the sounds. But again, distinctly and clearly, came those words of plain and awful warning—"This night thy soul may be required of thee; then——"

"Aye, then!" thought James, "then!" And at that instant he seemed standing on the brink of an abyss where all was dark as blackest night. He listened, and again heard the voice, though this time the wind did not bear the words to him.

Going forward in the direction whence it proceeded, he at length came upon a group of people standing listening to some one who, from a more elevated point of ground, was addressing them in distinct, earnest tones. James was irresistibly attracted nearer, and he too stood and listened.

The speaker went on. "Aye, my friends, it may be this very night the summons will come; but what then? To those who love the Master's voice it will be a joyful sound to hear Him calling them to come up higher, and take their place in His courts above. And picture to yourself, if you can, what those courts will be. If you look around, doesn't the sweet beauty of the scene lying before you seem to touch and soften your heart, and fill it with gentler, calmer feelings? Then think what it will be to gaze upon Him 'who is altogether lovely,' and to walk those courts whose glories no words we have can describe!

"But there are some who have not yet learned to love the Master's voice; who have up to this moment been dwelling in scenes of strife and sin; to whom it would be a fearful and a terrible thing to hear the words, 'This night thy soul shall be required of thee.' Then let them listen; for the Master has a word for them, too—a word not, as we might expect, of condemnation, but of gentlest entreaty. Listen! this is it: 'Turn ye! oh, turn ye! for why will ye die? Come unto Me, and I will wash you clean in the blood I shed for you, and your sins and your iniquities will I remember no more.' Oh, then, come to Him. Leave your deeds of sin, your evil passions, your toiling and hankering after this world's riches; leave it all, and come to Him. Ask Him for His holy spirit to help you, and He will give it to you as fully and as freely as the air you breathe."

For a time James's thoughts no longer followed the speaker; he was pondering so deeply upon what he had just heard. At length, however, his attention was again caught, by the words—"But if you would come to Him, my friends, it must be by leaving your sins behind you, for His eye searches out every hidden act. He is ever close beside you; when you least remember it, when you have stolen away in secret, as you think, out of range of every eye, to work some deed of darkness, He too comes in, and stands by looking on. You cannot keep Him out. No bolts nor bars can do that; though you do not hear His footfall, for it is noiseless as when he once walked upon the Sea of Galilee. The waters there gave back no echo to His tread; and it is just so now, as He glides through closed doors into dark places, where deeds of sin are being planned or committed, and hears and notes it all.

"But there is one door through which He enters not until He is invited; and that is the door of our hearts. We may keep that closed against Him if we choose; but if we will open it He will come in—silently, noiselessly, as I have said He once walked upon the waves; and in that case His coming in will be to bless and heal and fill with joy unspeakable the hitherto empty joyless heart."

Still more the speaker said, but James heeded it not; he had heard enough. Strange unwonted feelings were stirring within him. The sin which he had pledged himself to commit that night stood out in distinct lines of darkest dye, as he thought of that Eye which would be upon him, that Presence which would be beside him all the time, and which he could not shut out, try as he would. But if he would leave his sins, that Presence might be to him a delight instead of a dread!

He turned and walked on, little needing where he went, so that it was away from the great city. On he went, haunted by the thoughts that had so lately been awakened in him; and when the shades of night fell he was still hurrying on, as though pursued by some terrible fear, by some enemy that was treading on his steps, and might overtake him unless he pressed ever on and on.

A tremendous struggle was going on within him: a choice between life and death; between the powers of darkness and of light. Which would win the day? The chains of sin with which he had allowed himself to be bound were strong; but there was One strong enough to break them and set him free. Would he cry to Him, cry mightily for deliverance, or would he yield to the suggestions of the evil one, tempting him with visions of gain and sinful enjoyment? Would he, with a violent wrench, tear himself from his present life and associations, or would he prove too feeble and faint-hearted for such a course, and return to his late haunts and companions, to fall yet lower than before?

It was the turning-point in his life—the moment that was to decide his future destinies.

And again and again he murmured as he walked along, "Twelve o'clock to-night! twelve o'clock to-night!"

Ah, where would twelve o'clock that night find him?

(To be continued.)

"THE QUIVER" BIBLE CLASS.

198. It is stated in Exodus iv. 27, that God told Aaron to go and meet Moses. What proof have we that this was done in a vision?

199. What was the value of the books burned at Ephesus by those who dealt in familiar spirits and used "curious arts?"

200. How long did David reign over Judah alone in Hebron?

201. What general recommendation does St. Paul give as to the conduct of public services?

202. What expression was used by the ancient writers of the Bible to signify the whole length and breadth of the land of Israel?

203. What does St. Paul say was a stumbling-block to the Jews?

204. What proof have we that David was much impressed by the power of the archers in the army of the Philistines?

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS ON PAGE 480.

187. Ten thousand talents of silver (Esther iii. 9).

188. "Then after three years I went up to Jerusalem to see Peter, and abode with him fifteen days. But other of the apostles saw I none save James the Lord's brother" (Gal. i. 18, 19).

189. Aretas (2 Cor. xi. 32).

190. Job xxxix. 13, 14.

191. A red and lowering sky in the morning (Matt. xvi. 2), and a cloud rising out of the west (Mark xii. 54).

192. The attempt made by Haman to destroy all the Jews in the kingdom of Ahasuerus (Esther ix. 20—26).

THE FOLDED LAMB.

I HAVE a little child in heaven,
A dear one angel-bright;
Christ unto her a crown has given,
And garments pure and white.

She stands upon the crystal sea,
Before the Throne above,
With harp, and palm of victory,
And sings the song of love.

I miss the hands that clung to me,
And made my heart so glad;
I miss her prattle and her glee;
And I am very sad.

God's will be done—He knoweth best:
Her wanderings are o'er;
My little lamb is safe at rest
Where sin can hurt no more.

She might have strayed—I cannot tell;
Christ knew what lay before;
But now I know that all is well,
And fear for her no more.

Before one rising cloud could dim
Her sky, or drop in tears,
Christ came and took her home with Him
To summer all the years.

I often think, where she has gone
What honour great I bear,
That I have one before the Throne
Who calls me "mother" there!

She is with Christ—and I am His;
Round Him our hearts entwine;
And tho' far up the heights of bliss,
In heaven she still is mine.

And oh! when I my own shall meet,
Together we shall go,
And cast our crowns before His feet,
And learn His love to know!

J. Hoie.

(Drawn by M. E. EDWARDS.)

SHOULD I STAY ON MY WAY.

WHEN sunless evening settles low
On darksome grass, and men have laid
Aside their daywork tools, to go
On home along by grove and glade;

And all the rooks have floated by
O'erhead, to seek their roosting trees,
While pale and paler shine the leaze
And mead, below the high-mooned sky;—

Then on my way, beside the screen
Of bank and bough, or where may blow
The wind, through gate or bar-way, keen
Or soft, along the way I go;
Should I stay still for anything,
Unless to see, below the oak,
A knot of little fairy folk,
All dancing in a whirling ring?

Yes! By the elm I fain would stay,
And gaze on that now lonely mound,
Where, on a long-gone summer day,
We sat, in mirth, upon the ground;
Or, by the orchard's ivied wall,
Up where we saw dear Mary stand,
While apples from her lifted hand
Flew out in many a blushing ball.

Or at the stile that some lost mate
Sprang sprily o'er in one high leap;
Or at the slowly-slamming gate
That fell from hands now still in sleep;
Or at the bridge that reaches pale
O'er water where, in summers past,
Our boat, before the upward blast,
Oft stemmed the stream with bunted sail.

But even while I thus might stay,
The time would still be gliding on,
And wafting later things away,
Where those of olden time have gone;
O night! O night! how very clear
Thy light brings back an earlier sky;
O night! O night! how very nigh
Those sights bring back another year.

THE BRIDGE BETWEEN.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE TROUBLES OF CHATTY AND MOLLY," "THE DINGY HOUSE AT KENSINGTON," "QUEEN MADGE," "AGAINST HERSELF," ETC., ETC., ETC.

CHAPTER XXI.—DOROTHY ENGAGED.

"I CANNOT bear September; there is always something very sad about it," Dorothy said, wearily, as she sat with her betrothed beneath the boughs of the sycamore-tree.

She never had anything to talk to him about—or very seldom, at any rate—and when he talked to her of a hundred things she neither cared for nor understood, she quietly sailed off in a day-dream.

He used to think she would awake some day to the realities he saw so keenly, and so he waited patiently till the time should come.

"Yes, dear," he said, quietly, in answer to her remark, but without the slightest shade of curiosity in his voice, or even looking up from his book.

"It is the month in which the leaves begin to fall, you know, just as if they were trying to make a pall for the dead summer."

"Yes, dear," in the same tone.

"I hate being called 'dear!'" she broke out, passionately.

He looked up then.

"My dear child," he said, kindly, "what is the matter with you?" and he put down his book on the end of the seat, and, taking her hands in his, looked at her face, and at the two brown eyes into which the tears were slowly stealing.

"Don't call me 'child' either," she said.

It used to be Adrian Fuller's term of endearment, and now she could not bear that he should use it.

"Then I'll call you my little girl," he said, tenderly; "and so tell me what is the matter."

"Nothing," she answered; "only the summer has gone, or nearly so, and I feel as if all the past summers belonged to me, and I lived in them, but the future ones will belong to others, and I may look on, but shall never feel they are mine any more."

"Where did you get your strange fancies from, Dorothy?"

"I don't know."

"You must read more, and learn to think more, on hard healthy subjects, and get all those miserable ideas out of your head. You should learn to occupy yourself."

"That is what you always say," she answered. "But what can I do?"

"I'll find some work for you by-and-by. We will study together, dear. You shall write for me sometimes, too; you write such a nice hand, Dorothy."

"Yes," she said, not at all delighted with the prospect or propitiated by the praise. "Shall you always work?" she asked, after a minute or two.

"Yes, I hope so."

And then, seeing that the tears had vanished from her eyes, half absently he opened his book again, and she sat thinking.

She had been engaged a month, and she was so tired of it. It was like being in school, she thought, though school was a thing she had never known. She thought when she accepted George Blakesley, too, that after all Adrian Fuller would be sorry, and even his sympathy would be grateful to her; but no, he had only seemed a little surprised—that was all. And Netta had been delighted; it was a step towards the prosperity of the family, she considered; and her mother and father had been pleased also, and kissed her, and told her that now she must leave off her wild roving habits, and behave like a young lady; and her rebellious spirit rose at the speech. As for Tom, he had chaffed her in no sparing terms, and, it had fretted and worried her; and Will and Sally seemed to think that as she was engaged she was no longer one of themselves, and so they left her to her own devices, and the old happy life went for ever.

George Blakesley was always with her—always bringing her books to read, and talking to her of things she could not and would not understand or like, and she got impatient, and angry, and fretful. He was always kind, always affectionate and patient, and willing to explain things, but still she shrank from him. She was grateful to him; for, did he not love her? Yet she was not satisfied, and longed—oh, how wildly she longed!—to be free; but she felt chained and bound.

He shut his book presently. "It is getting dusky," he said. "Get your hat, dear, and let us go a little way."

She meekly obeyed him; and they sauntered out at the garden gate, and on through the dim lanes.

"Dorothy," he said, presently, "will you come to tea to-morrow at my house. You have never seen it yet, you know, and I want you to meet my aunts. We have been engaged a month, and they have not seen you yet."

She had always put it off.

"Oh no, no!" she answered, shrinkingly.

"Why not? You shall come to early tea, with your mother, in the afternoon. My aunts are nice old ladies, and they will be so fond of my little girl. We'll invite Netta too."

"Not to-morrow," she pleaded.

"Yes, dear; I have asked them already, so you must manage it. I saw them to-day, and they were so anxious to see you." Then there came a dead silence, and they walked on. "Don't you think we might be married this year?——" he began.

"Oh no, no!"

"Why not, dear?"

"Oh please don't!" she broke out; "oh pray let me off! I don't want to be married, and I shall never do—indeed I shall not! I am not half clever enough; and I would give the world to be free again. Oh, George, do let me off! I am not old enough yet, and want to be by myself a little longer!"

"My dear child!" he said, when a pause came, and reverting in his surprise to the old phrase, "you mustn't go on like this. You quite distress me. It is all strange to you yet, dear."

"Oh no—it is not that," she said, sadly; "but I shall never be reconciled to it. Won't you let me off?" she pleaded.

He looked at her with a long long grave look.

"No, dear," he answered. "I could not bear to do that now. You will get reconciled in time. I cannot let you off." (To be continued.)

MEMBERS ONE OF ANOTHER.

BY THE REV. W. COVINGTON, M.A., VICAR OF ST. LUKE'S, SHEPHERD'S BUSH.

IT has sometimes been brought as a charge against the teaching of Jesus Christ that very many of His sayings are to be found elsewhere; that some, if not all, of His teaching is copied from philosophers who are commonly called heathen; and that there is scarcely any part of His religion which can be called original. The charge contains a half-truth under which there lies a fundamental error. It is indeed true that Christ has taken and made his own much of the intellectual wealth of ancient philosophy. In accomplishing that vast mission which He came into the world to finish, He never hesitated to take and to use for His own purposes those lesser revelations by which His Father in heaven had spoken of old. He stated expressly that He was come to fulfil—that is, to fill out, to expand, and to complete—all that had gone before, and that in Him would be found the substance of which that had been the shadow. It follows as a matter of course that it is easy to select from His teaching ideas and even sentences to which a previous utterance had been given, and to show that men have struggled in all ages after some of the ideas of His religion.

But it is a very great mistake to suppose that Christianity in its essence is simply a compilation of doctrines and dogmas and ethical precepts. Were it so, a man would be justified in cutting away from it all that was to be found written, or even indicated, in the writings and the lives of the pre-Christian heroes, and so in reducing it to a residuum of that which was purely original. But such is not at all its character. Christianity is not at all a mere code of ethics, or of morality, or of casuistry. Christianity is a Person and a life, embodying perhaps much that had been written before, but embodying it in a Person, and setting it forth in a life, after a manner to which nothing else can compare. Christianity is an enthusiasm, using perhaps the weapons of antiquity, but using them after such a fashion as had never been previously attempted. Christianity is a motive power, influencing the life not so much by the regulation of outward actions as by the infusion of a spirit into the heart. And if you could prove to me, which you cannot, that every word of Christ's teaching was taken from some external source, you would not in the least shake my faith in the fact that there is something in Christianity different from all other systems which the world has ever seen, and lifting it up high above them—high as heaven above earth.

Now, we have a special instance of this use by Christ and his apostles of a pre-existing idea in the conception of a vast brotherhood, a general membership one with another, upon which they so strongly and so frequently insist. It was not a new conception; it was one which many a philosopher, many a sage, and many a leader, had tried to embody. The belief even in a great brotherhood of mankind had struggled to live in many a bygone age. Very imperfectly indeed had it been realised; very faintly had it been sketched; yet down the ages it had floated, like a dream of some lost paradise, fading away like a dream from those who most longed to grasp it, yet appearing again, and never utterly disappearing, because there lay beneath it a truth which was even divine, but reserved for revelation only in the fulness of time. It was indeed true—and philosophers of old had seen its truth—that man can only reach his highest development when he is joined by firm and lasting bonds in the unity of brotherhood, when he is a member of a society which gives him common sympathies, common wants, common feelings with others, and that he who lives utterly apart from others will soon be utterly deprived of all nobility of character, and lost in selfish isolation. That idea, once born into the world, had struggled through many an age to gain for itself a more general acceptance; but all human endeavours to maintain it had failed. Men had tried power, only too soon to find it melt away. Men had tried philosophy, and preached that all men are one, only to find it a miserable failure. Men had tried self-interest, and pointed out the greater strength of unity and of united action: but all their efforts had signally failed, and it was only that germ of divine truth which it contained which had kept the idea alive so long. It was reserved for Christ to reveal that one great fact upon which the whole rested—the Fatherhood of God, that great name, the Father, which men had sought after before, but never found. That was the great distinction which makes the teaching of Christ and His apostles as to the brotherhood of men different to the teaching of all the philosophers whom the world has ever seen—that while they only strove to teach brotherhood from below, He taught Fatherhood from above; He taught that men were brothers because they were sons of God, and that that familiar conception of family life and family love so dear to each one of their hearts was only the reflex of a vast truth, transcending all time and all space, that all men were God's children, and therefore brothers.

I have said that this conception of brotherhood had struggled to live in the ages preceding Christ, but was definitely established upon a lasting basis only by Him. I have said that while all human means had failed to establish it, the revelation of God as a Father, loving each one of His children and asking from them love in return, that revelation which was given in Christ, gave an entirely new aspect to the thought of man's brotherhood, and from that time to this has caused it to strengthen and to develope with a power previously unknown. I have only to refer you to matters of history to convince you that this is so.

Look, for instance, at the reverence for human life which has sprung into being under the auspices of Christianity. Infanticide, suicide, the games of the arena, with all their wanton prodigality of destruction, where are they now? Consigned, by the influence which Christianity has had upon the popular mind, to the well-merited doom of popular execration. And what has become of that vast institution of slavery, with all its organised system of laws and regulations, which was once the basis of civilised and uncivilised society. It has been driven by Christianity outside the limits of modern civilisation, and, though the struggle has been a long one by which it has striven to live, yet at last it has succumbed. Or, to turn from that which Christianity has destroyed to that which it has built up, look at the vast system of charitable relief, of systematic help in times of poverty and of sickness, which every Christian nation is now proud to maintain. I do not pause to ask what kinds of charitable relief do good, and what do harm; I only point you to the fact, too well-known to need further comment, that it is Christianity which has inaugurated so vast a system for the relief of those whom it calls its poorer brethren—which has covered the face of the earth with almshouses, hospitals, schools, and orphanages; which has insured, even by legal enactment, the relief of want. What are these but surest evidences that Christianity alone has put into its proper place and position the doctrine of the brotherhood of men, and has taken this as its first basis of teaching—that, brethren of Christ and children of God, "we are members one of another"?

But this unity, be it remembered, is essentially a spiritual, not a visible unity; the very word which is employed to represent it—"membership"—implies that there always is and always must be a variety amongst the members. There is nothing upon which the apostles of Christ who speak of this matter insist more carefully than this, that the unity of mankind is unity of sonship, unity of relationship to a common Father, under diversity of form. We are members, indeed, of the same body, and are therefore necessarily different; for the body could not be in itself perfect unless the difference were maintained. If every member were the hand, says St. Paul, where were the feet? On the face of this earth there are spread the varied races of mankind, differing each in their characteristics, their constitutions and their habits. These differences are no disproof, but rather a proof, of their spiritual unity in the eternal sonship of their race to God. Or if we narrow down the limits of our view within the line of Christianity itself, how shall we regard the distinctions of creed, and caste, and faith, which have found place within its ranks? Is it possible, the unbeliever will say, that these Christians can be one, when such vast gaps of custom and of belief intervene between their various Churches? Yes, indeed they are one—one in their spiritual unity with Christ their head; and to each is given his own office in the varied functions of the members of the body. Narrow down again the limits of our inquiry within the range of our own experience and of our own nation, and see how the whole fabric of our Church and of our country is built up upon this as its basis—unity in diversity—membership in one body, wherein each member is discharging his own proper functions, taking his strength and his life from the whole. Take any class of society, and cut it off from the rest, and see how it fares: take, for instance, the rich, and cut him off from the poor; leave him alone with his gold and his vast estates, and if he denied before the brotherhood of the poor, he will deny it no more. Or take the great middle classes, who are the media by which the wealth of the rich and the labour of the poor are made to meet, and cut them off both from above and from below, and they will learn a lesson which the better ones amongst them have learnt before, and only the worst have contrived to forget, that they too have a debt owing to the other members of the social body, that they too are dependent for their well-being upon the welfare of the whole.

But how are all these thoughts purified and ennobled by that grand truth which Christ and His Gospel have introduced into the world—that all these interlacings of classes and of societies, all these varied wants of rich and poor, are all part of the family organisation of our great Father in heaven; that there is One above all who has pre-arranged all this, and has decreed that thus it shall be for ever, so long as man is a tenant of this globe; that each society, each class—aye, even each individual!—shall work, whether he like it or no, not only for his own benefit, but for the benefit of others, and that each shall contribute to the general well-being of the whole, or shall pay the penalty of uselessness by being cast out from the body! And I cannot help thinking that there was something of all this in the mind of the Saviour when He left behind Him as His last precious legacy to his disciples something which should speak to them, with no feeble utterance, of their spiritual unity in His body, of the necessity of their spiritual life being nourished by and through their feeding upon Him. The strength of His body was to nourish theirs; the spirit of His life was to transfuse theirs: that, I cannot doubt, was one of the chiefest points which He desired to teach when He consecrated for ever the sacred memorials of His death; and if at other times we are prone to forget it, I cannot conceive of any Christian coming to receive at the table of his Lord, and rejoicing, as every true Christian must rejoice, to kneel side by side with the humblest in the land—I cannot conceive of any Christian forgetting then that "we are members one of another."

In conclusion, then, reader, I ask you to think of this in all the relations of social life, as well as in all the relations of religious life. Do not, I beg of you, let one spirit guide you in this and another in that. Do not go to the House of God, and speak of a common Father and a universal brotherhood in Christ, and then go forth again into the world and shut yourself up in yourself, with no thought of your duties to the brethren around you. Let your religion, your faith, and your social life be consistent. Think of this your sacred character whenever a question arises as to your duty to those around you; do not answer that question until you have brought these words vividly before your minds—"We are members one of another."

SCRIPTURE LESSONS FOR SCHOOL AND HOME.

SCRIPTURE STORIES. First Series. No. 29. A Shipwreck.

Chapters to be read—Acts xxvii., xxviii. (parts of).

INTRODUCTION. We left St. Paul standing bold and fearless amongst the sailors, telling them of the visit of the angel, and assuring them that all would be safe. Let the children draw a contrast between this calmness of innocence and Jonah's consciousness of guilt. Both going away from their own country—Jonah fleeing from God, Paul going to be a witness for God—both among heathen, but Jonah bidden by the idolaters to call upon his God, while Paul showed them how near God was to him. What has God promised to do for Paul (ver. 24)? Was he alone to be delivered? We shall see how the promise was fulfilled.

I. The Shipwreck. (Read xxvii. 27—44.) How

I. The Shipwreck. (Read xxvii. 27—44.) How long did the storm last? Remember how fearful the apostles were in the storm of only a few hours, and this one fourteen days! The ship anchored, but tossing about under the terrific waves, always worse near a shore, and noise of breakers on rocks, filling sailors with dread lest they should be driven on them. What do the sailors attempt to do? (ver. 30) See how selfish danger makes some men! If the sailors deserted the ship, who could work the sails so as to make the most of any possible chance of safety? So what does Paul say? Now look at his conduct. This dreadful night is wearing slowly away. Nothing can be done till daylight. They cannot sleep; had better take some food; have had no regular meals for a fortnight; will want full strength next day in last battle with sea and rocks.

At last day breaks. Strange land; but they see a creek, and steer for it, first cutting the anchors and leaving them in the sea (ver. 40, margin), then hoisting up the mainsail, run the ship aground; there it sticks fast, and becomes broken up by the waves. Now two dangers imminent. What do the soldiers want to do? (ver. 42) Because, responsible for the prisoners, if they escaped the soldiers would be put to death (see Acts xii. 19). But who was Paul's friend? So God again delivered him. Now comes a terrible moment. All throw themselves into the sea. Fancy 276 men struggling at once with the waves; how unlikely that all would be saved. But what was the promise (ver. 24)? and God is not a man that He should lie. So, some clinging to spars, some to hen-coops, some to bits of the wreck, all get safely to shore.

Practical Lessons. (1) The certainty of God's promised aid. Paul had work to do for God at Rome, therefore was kept in safety. So with all truly serving God and working for Him, God's aid promised. Do we serve Him as Paul did? Then God promised to aid us. May safely trust Him, and all things will be safely ordered for us. (2) The honour put upon God's people. The prisoner becomes the most important man in the ship. His cheering words, his advice about retaining the sailors, about taking food, all helped to save the voyagers. So Joseph became the most important man. So the little captive maid's advice saved Naaman. So these who honour God will be honoured by Him.

II. The Island. (Read xxviii. 1—10.) Picture the scene on the shore—the shipwrecked soldiers, sailors, and prisoners; the fishermen coming to see the wreck—doing what they can—lighting a huge fire; all helping to gather sticks. What comes out of Paul's bundle? What do the fishermen expect, because knew how venomous these snakes are? But what does happen? Another deliverance! They saw Paul was a prisoner—think he was guilty of some fearful crime. Were they right in so thinking? Remind of what Christ said about Galileans (Luke xiii. 5). Besides, does the viper do any harm? So what do they think now? What an opportunity for Paul to tell them of Christ, whose he is. Now the governor hears of the wreck. What does he do. And how is his kindness rewarded by St. Paul? So Publius has indeed received an angel, which means "messenger" of God (Heb. xiii. 2), and Paul can speak for Christ to the rich as well as to the poor. So, like his Master, goes about doing good and preaching the Word of Life.

Practical Lesson. Use hospitality without grudging. These sailors did what they could, though heathens. Can we say as much? Remind of solemn warnings to those who neglect their duty to those in want (Matt. xxv. 45).

Questions to be answered.

1. Compare St. Paul's voyage with that of Jonah.
2. Describe the events of the night before the shipwreck.
3. What lessons does the story teach us?
4. What happened at Malta?
5. What did St. Paul do during his stay?
6. Draw a practical lesson for ourselves.

STILL AND DEEP.

BY F. M. F. SKENE, AUTHOR OF "TRIED," "ONE LIFE ONLY," ETC.

CHAPTER XXI.

BERTRAND LISLE had only obtained leave from his post for six weeks, and the close of a full month after his arrival at Chiverley found him well-nigh as much perplexed as he had been the first night he had slept under the same roof with Laura Wyndham. He was irresistibly attracted by her, and had he been altogether free he would certainly have asked her to be his wife at once; but he held himself in honour bound to Mary, by his own words as well as by his promise to his father, unless it should indeed prove to be the case that she no longer loved him, even if she had ever done so. He had begun to doubt very much that there was any truth in the idea of her attachment to Charlie Davenant, though it would have been a great relief to himself to have believed it. But Lurline had almost succeeded in persuading him that Mary's stillness did really indicate a cold temperament, and that she was as incapable of feeling deep affection for any one as if she had been a block of white marble. He determined at last to put the matter to some definite test, and if he found that Mary was indeed indifferent to him, he would at once make some provision for her out of his own fortune, and then give himself up to the delight of securing the fascinating Lorelei to be the light and life of his home. It was not without pain and misgiving that he came to this resolution, however, for the true affection he felt for Mary still lay deep in his heart, beneath all the passionate excitement of feeling which Lurline caused him, and there were times when the pathetic sadness of her dark eyes, and the quivering of her sweet lips when she spoke to him, moved him strangely. One other subject of disquietude poor Bertrand had in his perplexing position, which was the fact that he could not at all understand what John Pemberton's relations with Laura really were. She called him her brother; but it was quite clear that his almost worshipping adoration for her went far beyond any fraternal attachment, and at times there seemed to be a tacit understanding between them, which did not precisely harmonise with the unmistakable love and admiration for Bertrand himself, which Lurline had taken good care to make sufficiently plain to him.

"I will end the suspense at all events," said Bertrand to himself one morning, as the family were finishing breakfast, "no later than to-day. My leave will expire in less than ten days," he said aloud, addressing Mrs. Wyndham, "so I have only a short time longer to spend with you."

Mrs. Wyndham made some sleepy sort of response, feeling secretly very glad that she would have one less to house and feed, while her husband, who had always the manners of a true gentleman, said, courteously, that he hoped Mr. Lisle would visit them again. John Pemberton was seated just opposite, and, Bertrand saw him suddenly raise his honest wistful eyes with a look of intense thankfulness, which showed how welcome his departure would be to this member of the family at least.

Laura and Mary had both risen from the table before he spoke, and were standing together in the window; and as he turned to glance towards them he was struck by the great contrast between them, and the wonderful advantages which the Lorelei possessed over her companion, at least in looks. She was standing in an attitude of perfect grace, exquisitely dressed in the most becoming costume, with the full blaze of the morning sunshine pouring down upon her lovely head, and turning all her fair disordered hair to what seemed like a nimbus of gold. A little behind her, in the shade, stood Mary, with drooping head and down cast eyes, while her slight figure looked almost too slender in the shabby black dress, which she continued to wear long after she would have wished to discard it, in order that the money which would have bought a new one might be given to her suffering poor.

"It is easy to see which would look best at the ambassadress's balls," thought Bertrand, as he turned away with a feeling of vexation against Mary, for the very plain guise in which she appeared; but when he looked back, after having stated his intention of leaving Chiverley in so short a time, he saw that she had passed out by the open window, and disappeared. It was the opportunity he wanted; he resolved that he would follow her, and make her take a walk with him in the wood which lay at the foot of the rectory grounds, so that he might speak to her alone, and ascertain, once for all, what was the real state of her feelings towards himself.

Bertrand rose at once, and left the room; he took his hat from the hall table, and went out by the front door, just in time to see the dark slender figure passing swiftly over the green lawn in the very direction he wished her to take. Mary was going towards the wood, which was a retired lonely spot, to seek the solitude which her heart, almost bursting with its load, so sorely needed. She went on quickly, till she reached its innermost recesses, where the tall trees, already in leaf, stood thickly together, and shut her out from all human sight or sound. Then, when she found herself, as she thought, completely alone, she laid her head against one of the friendly trees, and flinging her arms round it, murmured, "I shall never see him more! how can I endure it! my Bertrand! my Bertrand! mine never again!"

It was thus that he saw her as he turned the corner of the mossy track that led to the spot where she stood, and came suddenly upon her. He paused a moment to look at her. Her whole attitude was indicative of the utmost despondency: her hat had fallen to the ground, and her long dark hair hung down over her face like a veil; her breast was heaving with tearless sobs; and the little hands which clasped the trunk of the tree were pressed against its rough bark convulsively. It was no statue of snow, assuredly, which was passing through that silent storm of grief, and Bertrand came forward with a strange revulsion of feeling in his mind: if it were indeed for his departure that she was grieving thus, she was his own true Mary most assuredly, unchanged and unchangeable.

She did not hear his approach till he touched her very gently on the shoulder, and then she looked up and met his eyes fixed scrutinisingly upon her; the idea that he might have divined the cause of her anguish caused a flush of scarlet to flame for an instant over her fair face, and then it passed, leaving her more deadly white than usual, while all her maidenly pride came to her aid, and in an instant her habitual stillness had returned to her, and he stood before the calm white Mary whom Lurline affirmed was moulded out of marble, hard and cold.

For once in his life, Bertrand, diplomatist and man of the world as he was, felt very much embarrassed; he did not know exactly how to begin a conversation with her, as it was plain she would allow of no remark on her secret agitation, and presently he found himself, after some incoherent observation on the beauty of the wood, quietly walking by her side among the trees, as if they had simply strolled out together without any definite purpose. He was not going to lose his opportunity, however, which Lurline's constant companionship made a matter of rare occurrence, so at last he said, trying to see her face, "Well, dear Mary, I must soon be leaving Chiverley, and I have enjoyed my visit very much, though it grieves me to think I have seen so much less of you than I hoped."

"It is enough if you have been happy," said her low voice, calmly.

"But we have been so little together," he replied, impatiently. "You disappointed me the very first day by not meeting me at the station."

"That was not my fault," she said, avoiding his eyes.

"Was it not? Whose then?"

She did not answer, for she believed he loved Laura, and she would not accuse her to him; her silence made Bertrand suppose that Charlie Davenant had been the real hindrance; he was too much infatuated with the Lorelei to suspect her of any evil. They went on in silence till they came to a spot where a little rustic bridge spanned a swiftly-rushing stream that made its way through the wood to the valley below. Bertrand paused here, looking down into the deep water, with his arms folded on the railing, while Mary stood silent beside him.

"Have you been happy at Chiverley, Mary?" he said at last.

"They have been very kind to me," she answered.

"You have only two or three months longer to stay here," he said, looking earnestly into her face.

"I know that," she replied.

"And have you any idea where you are to go when you leave this place?"

She was compelled to answer, "None;" but she added, hastily, "I have no doubt some way will open for me."

"To Charles Davenant's home, perhaps!" said Bertrand, half bitterly, half playfully.

"Charles Davenant!" Mary uttered the name with an accent of the most genuine surprise, and, turning round, she fixed her dark eyes unflinchingly on Bertrand's face. "What can you mean?" she said.

"My dear Mary, it is no secret that Davenant loves you."

"I think you are mistaken," she said, calmly.

"I am sure I am not," he answered; "but that is not a matter which would be of importance to me at least, unless you, Mary, are disposed to return his affection."

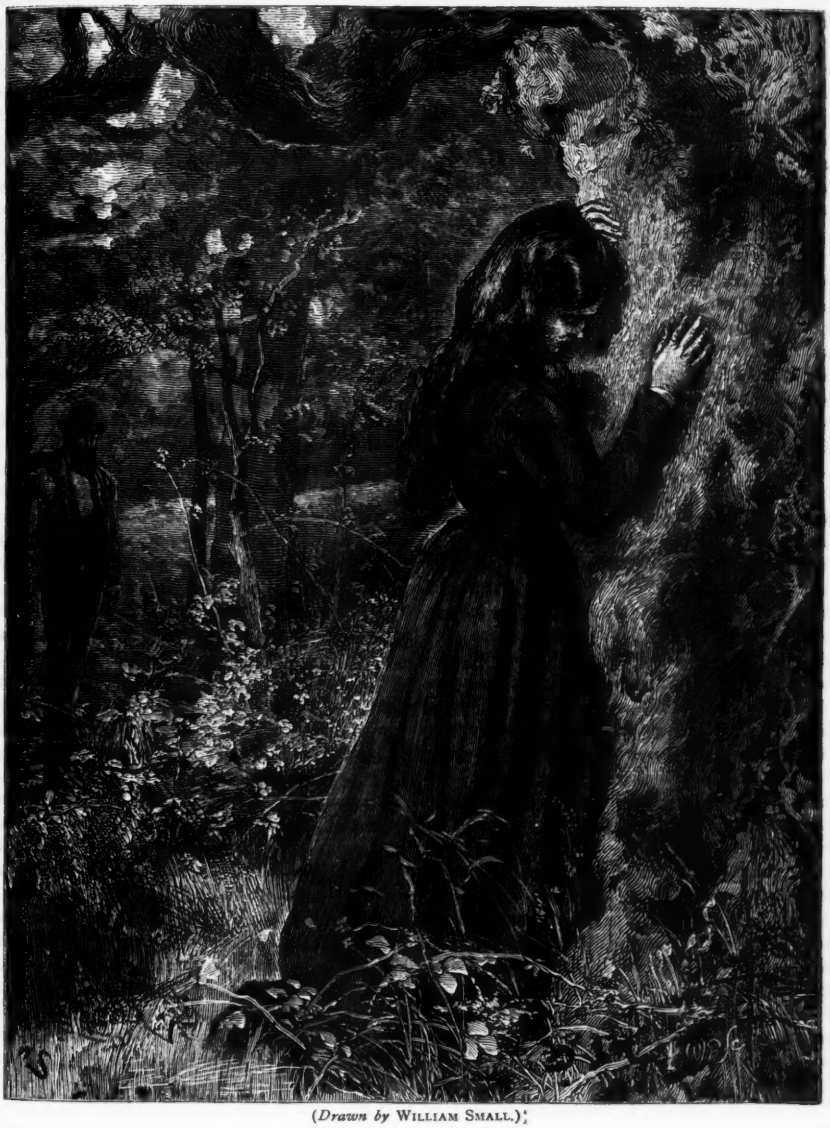
"Bertrand," she said, slowly, "I am sure you would not wish to hurt or annoy me; but you do both when you even hazard such a supposition; Mr. Davenant is absolutely nothing to me, and never can be anything."

"That is enough, Mary; forgive me;" and involuntarily he thought how incapable Lurline, with all her fascination, would have been of the quiet truthfulness and gentle dignity which Mary had shown in her answer; the strong attraction she had had for him in former times was beginning to revive, away from the syren who had lured him from her. Presently he said, in a low earnest tone, "Mary, I know you always tell the truth, but sometimes you are silent when others would wish to hear you speak; will you give me a distinct answer to one question?"

She merely bowed her head.

"Tell me what you have done with the white rose I bade you keep for me; have you thrown it away?"

"Thrown it away! Oh, Bertrand!" instinctively she pressed her clasped hands against her breast where the rose lay hid, and all her loving constant soul was in her eyes as she turned them reproachfully upon him—"how could you suppose it!"



"You have kept it then for my sake, sweet Mary?" he said, tenderly.

"Yes," she whispered; "and there lies by it now one of the violets that told me you were coming."

It was the most she had ever said as an admission of affection for him, and involuntarily he caught her hand in his; but the movement had been seen by eyes that were watching his every look and gesture in a perfect anguish of terror and dismay; and at the same instant there arose, as it seemed from the very depths of the water beneath them the low sad wail of a most lovely voice, that thrilled through the air with an unutterable pathetic sweetness, which no one could have heard unmoved. And Bertrand was the last who could have done so; for the one special charm above all others which the Lorelei had always had for him, was the wonderful beauty of her strange and exquisite singing. She had always let him hear it when they were quite alone, and she would then pour her whole passionate soul into the melody, till every tone of her perfect voice seemed to vibrate in the chords of his heart; and now that same voice, inexpressibly touching in its mournful despair, was filling all the space around him with a cry of utter anguish, and it was as though a spell had been flung over him again. Letting Mary's hand fall, he exclaimed, "It is Lurline; she must be in danger or distress!" and with one bound he had sprung from the bridge, and, dashing along the bank of the stream, was soon lost to view, and Mary was alone.

CHAPTER XXII.

Bertrand Lisle leaped from the bridge to the rocky bank of the stream below, forgetting everything but he sound, so wildly plaintively sweet, which had drawn him from Mary's side, and which seemed to recede before him as he hastened along at his utmost speed. It was Lurline's voice, he well knew, for none other could fill the air with melody of such exquisite softness and pathos, or thrill through his own heart with such dismay and pain, as he recognised in its mournful cadences the expression of some deep distress, and the thought that she was in peril or grief drove from him all recollection of any one in the world but herself.

(Drawn by WILLIAM SMALL.)

"She laid her head against one of the friendly trees."—p. 519.

Judging by the sounds, that grew fainter and fainter, she seemed to be flying away from him, and he hurried on, half frantic with dread as to what evil might have befallen her, especially when the sweet sad voice died away altogether, and he heard it no more. He increased his pace, dashing through the reeds and water-lilies that edged the stream, till at length the course of the current, sweeping round a projecting rock, brought him to an isolated spot, shut in by overhanging trees, and a very long way from the bridge where he had left Mary Trevelyan.

The water at this point was extremely deep, and the bank rose from it abruptly, with only here and there a rough moss-covered stone, affording a stepping-place for any one adventurous enough to approach the stream.

As Bertrand reached the top of the bank, and looked down upon the little inlet, he beheld a sight which struck him for a moment motionless with breathless terror: Laura Wyndham was standing on a stone which jutted out far into the deep pool formed by the stream at this point, and she was bending forward over the water in an attitude which must infallibly have precipitated her into it, but for the frail support which she received from the slender branch of a tree, round which one of her hands was clasped; her other arm was stretched out over the pool, as if she was about to fling herself into it, or at least was making no effort to save herself from sinking into its dangerous waters when the branch, which was rapidly giving way under the pressure of her hold, should finally break asunder.

This Bertrand saw, to his horror, it was in the very act of doing, even while he looked on it, and the result could only be Laura's instantaneous fall into the water, from whence, if she did not sink at once, she would drift into the rapid current that would speedily bear her beyond his reach. The danger was too imminent for him even to attempt to rouse her to a sense of her position before he rescued her from it, and with one bound he had cleared the space which separated him from her, and at some peril to himself of falling into the stream, he succeeded in flinging his arm round her slender waist, and dragging her back from her dangerous post up the bank to a place of safety.

Then for a moment he stood breathless, holding her close to his heart, which was beating wildly with the sense of the danger she had escaped, and the excitement of her rescue, while she, with her head drooping on his breast, and her long bright hair trailing over his arm, made no effort to detach herself from his grasp; but he recollected himself almost instantly, and gently laid her out of his arms on to the grass at the foot of a tree under whose shade they were standing.

It was with a bitter pang, however, that he loosed his hold, and let her lean for support against the rugged trunk of the old elm instead of on his own passionate heart, where he longed to give her a place evermore, for the agony he had suffered in the moment of her peril had been to him a sudden revelation of the extent to which she was indeed intensely dear to him, and he knew now what he had failed altogether to understand before: that if he gave her up from a sense of honour to Mary Trevelyan he gave up with her the fairest promise of happiness his life could ever have known.

"Lurline," he said, in a voice hoarse with emotion, and the words burst from him so impetuously that he scarcely knew in what terms he framed them; "darling Lurline, thank Heaven you are safe!"

Then suddenly she shook the shining hair back from her face, which was wan and mournful as he had never before seen it, and lifted up to him her lovely eyes, wide open and dilated in a wild half-frenzied look, while she exclaimed, clasping her hands convulsively, "Why did you save me, Bertrand Lisle? why did you save me? But for your merciless help I had now been lying perhaps cold and senseless under those deep waters, safe from suffering any more, safe from feeling even the loss of all I prize! Oh, why did you not let me die?"

"Lurline," he exclaimed, flinging himself down on the grass at her feet, "what are you saying? what can you mean? Is it possible that you, the brightest and loveliest of beings, can have had the dreadful thought of flinging your dear life away?"

"I did not mean to kill myself; I do not wish to do wrong," she said, piteously, "but if the branch had broken and I had fallen in, it would not have been my fault, and yet I should have been at rest, and safe from the misery I see before me."

Artful as Laura Wyndham was, there was genuine anguish in her tone, for she did feel at that moment that all her future was trembling in the balance, and that the scales were leaning heavily to that final separation from Bertrand, which would indeed be utter grief to her, although the causes which would make it so were more or less ignoble.

He caught her hand in his.

"But why do you see misery before you, beautiful bright Lurline? You are fitted to bring sunshine and joy to every heart that knows you, and it cannot be but that your own path must be blest with light and love wherever you go."

"My path has been through gloom and dreariness all my life long," she answered, passionately. "I have been like one stranded on an arctic shore, with only gloom, and ice, and solitude around me, and when suddenly there came a six-weeks' summer to my life, all full of warmth, and hope, and brightness, and I thought there was in it a light of affection that could never altogether fade away from it, do you wonder that it is misery to me to hear all in a moment from careless lips that it is about to be quenched in sudden darkness; that the drear winter of hopeless loneliness is coming back to me again, made all the gloomier for the recollection of the vanished sunshine?"

It was with an effort Bertrand kept back the words trembling on his lips, which would have asked if indeed it was his presence that had made radiance in her life, his threatened absence which was to bring back the gloom, but the recollection of Mary and of his dead father's wishes held him back, loyal and true-hearted as he was, and he gazed mutely into her exquisite face with a look which she read as if it had been written in a book. She knew how to meet it; with one of the wild impulsive gestures which enabled her so often to say with impunity what would have seemed unmaidenly in any other, but in her appeared only to be guileless freedom, she exclaimed, "I do not know what the friendship between us has been to you, Bertrand—a passing amusement, perhaps. I believe it is so sometimes with men, who care not what life-long agony they cause if they can while away a few weeks pleasantly—but I do know that to me it has been light, and joy, and blessedness, which has changed the whole world for me, and made it like the garden of Eden where you are, and a desolate wilderness where you are not; and then you wonder that I hate my life and shrink from the future when you coolly announce that you are about to take yourself out of my sight for ever and for ever!" and bursting into a passion of tears, she clasped her hands upon her knees, and laid her head down upon them, weeping bitterly.

"Oh, Lurline!" said Bertrand, almost beside himself; "if only I dared tell you what our friendship has indeed been to me these last few weeks! more, far more than ever it can have been to you, and now it would seem to me the very sweetest dream of bliss to have your companionship all my days, but I dare not, dare not speak of it, since it is so decreed that we can never be more to each other than we are now."

"Never more to each other than we are now!" she repeated, slowly; then she lifted her head, and fixed her large eyes, shining through their tears, on Bertrand's face. "Do I understand you rightly," she said, very softly, "that if there was no impediment in your way you would wish that our lives should be passed together?"

"Can you doubt it?" he exclaimed. "I am wrong, perhaps, to say it, but this once only I will make the avowal, and then lock my lips over all I feel for ever more. Darling Lorelei! to have you for the blessing of my life would be the deepest wish of my heart, and I hardly know at this moment how to bear the fiat which tells me it may never be."

A smile radiant as the morning sunshine flashed over Laura's face, and lit it up with a dazzling beauty on which Bertrand gazed entranced, while she exclaimed, in a tone of rapturous joy, "Oh, Bertrand, I think we may be happy yet! I think the terrible black cloud is rolling away from my life. I understand it all; I see where your mistake is: you think that I am bound to John Pemberton, and that you must not in honour come between us, but you are quite mistaken; I am free as the air—free to give myself to you. Poor John is nothing to me but a brother, whom I adopted as such out of very charity, as an innocent consolation to him for my refusal to make him happy, for he does love me, alas! but too well. No, Bertrand, there is none in all the world can come between me and you. I never gave my heart before, but I have given it now; it is all yours for ever!" and she gave him both her little hands with a gesture of tender grace, as if she concluded all doubt was at an end; but in the words she had spoken, which seemed the genuine outburst of a guileless heart, she had been false with the basest falseness, for she well knew that John Pemberton was not the obstacle between them.

Bertrand's fine face had taken an expression of the deepest distress and perplexity.

"Oh, Lurline, do not tempt me—do not madden me!" he said; "you cannot dream how you are stabbing me to the very heart! It is not your relations with John Pemberton which stand in our way—though I did not indeed understand before in what they consisted—it is my position with regard to Mary."

"Mary Trevelyan! Your sister Mary!" exclaimed Laura, turning round upon him with a look of almost horrified surprise.

"She is not my sister, Lurline. Oh that she were!"

"She has no other feeling for you but such as a sister might have. If she loves any one it is Charlie Davenant."

"She does not love him, Laura, I am sure of it."

"Perhaps not: because she is incapable of feeling affection at all; but in any case, she does not love you. What fatal mistake are you making, Bertrand?" continued Laura, vehemently. "You have told me plainly that you do not care for her, and that I am dear to you, and are you going to sacrifice yourself and me to the wild delusion that any love for you exists in that block of marble—that cold, passionless, rigid statue! She feels no more for you than does that stone," and Lurline pushed one angrily away with her foot.

"How can you be so sure she does not love me, Lurline?" said Bertrand, reluctantly.

"Because I have lived with her nearly a year, and I know her through and through. Have I not seen her coldness when she spoke of you, her indifference when your letters came, her careless unwillingness that your arrival should interfere with her own arrangements? A thousand things have proved it. Could she have made me her intimate friend all these months, and never a spark of her affection for you have shone through her life to me, if indeed she possessed any? Bertrand, it is madness to suppose she can love you!"

"Yet I have had good reason to think it," he said, slowly.

"What reason?" exclaimed Laura, flashing her bright eyes impatiently on him.

For a moment he did not answer: his delicacy shrank from betraying Mary's secret to any one. At last he said, gently, "I think you must not ask me that, dear Lorelei."

She started to her feet, and flung up her hands as with a movement of despair, crying out, "Because you have none—because it is a mere excuse. You are deceiving me! You have been only playing with me! You wring from me a confession of my fatal love for you, and then fling it back in my face, and tell me you are to give yourself to that block of stone. Why, why did you not leave me to die! But I can bear no more! I will never see you again! I have been betrayed, but I will never be scorned!"

And all her frame quivering with passion, she wrenched her hands out of Bertrand's grasp, and ran with the speed of a deer along the bank towards the point of danger.

But he was swifter even than she was, and he had caught her before she had gone many steps.

"Laura, Laura, forgive me!" he exclaimed, "you mistake me quite. Stay with me, only stay with me, and I will tell you all—everything you may ask me!"

(To be continued.)

THE ARCH OF TITUS AND ITS TESTIMONY TO THE FAITH.

"O Jerusalem, Jerusalem, thou that killest the prophets, and stonest them which are sent unto thee, how often would I have gathered thy children together, even as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wings, and ye would not! Behold, your house is left unto you desolate. For I say unto you, Ye shall not see me henceforth, till ye shall say, Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord."—St. Matt. xxiii. 37—39.

THE venerable remains of Phœnician, Egyptian, Greek, and Roman antiquity have often been cited in illustration of the evidences of the Christian faith. These monuments are scattered over an immense area, extending from the Euphrates to the Guadalquiver, and the Danube to the Desert of Sahara, and the slopes of the Atlas Mountains. They vindicate the truth of the inspired record, or at least the genuineness and authenticity of our sacred books, by inscriptions, by painting, and by sculpture. Among the buildings which fulfil the latter office, the arch of Titus, at Rome, built to commemorate the conquest of Judæa by that general, is not the least conspicuous. It is deservedly reckoned a perfect model of architectural grace and beauty, notwithstanding the ravages of time and the feudal wars of the Middle Ages, and the foolish attempt of the Frangipanni family, many hundreds of years ago, to improve it, by placing a sort of turret, or a crown, on the top. This excrescence has happily been removed. The monument is situated at the foot of the Palatine Hill, the original navel and centre of old Rome, on a road which led from the forum to the amphitheatre of Vespasian, commonly called the Colosseum. It consists only of a single arch, whereas the arch of Constantine and that of Septimius Severus consist of a large arch in the middle with a smaller one on each side. In fact they are similar in general outline to the Marble Arch, at the top of Oxford Street, in London, while the gateway opposite to the entrance to Hyde Park in Piccadilly rather resembles the arch of Titus. Concerning its precise architectural character it is foreign to our present purpose to treat. Let us rather carefully investigate the inscriptions and sculptures by which it is ornamented. Let us suppose ourselves leaving the Flavian Amphitheatre, in other words, the Colosseum, turning our backs to that gigantic building, and facing the somewhat distant Capitoline Hill. In front of us stands the arch of Titus. Over the triumphal arch itself stands out, in big domineering capitals, which may still be read at a considerable distance, the following inscription:—

SENATVS POPVLVSQVE ROMANVS
DIVO TITO DIVI VESPASIANI F VESPASIANO AVGVSTO.

The achievements of the imperial general are displayed in various forms upon the building. In Montfaucon's celebrated "Antiquities" there are several plates which represent the figures upon the arch more exactly than they are now to be traced. In the first we see the emperor making his triumphal entry, in a round chariot called thense, drawn by four huge war-horses. This forms a bas-relief on the right hand side of the interior of the arch, as the spectator approaches from the Colosseum. A Victory places a crown of laurel upon the head of Titus. In one hand he brandishes a truncheon, probably a symbol of supreme command, like the bâton of the modern field-marshal, in the other he holds a somewhat mysterious scroll. The well-known figure, armed with a helmet and spear, which is found in so many ancient remains, and represents the tutelary genius of the city of Rome, appears doing honour to the conqueror by leading one of the horses by the bridle. His imperial majesty is surrounded by lictors and soldiers, all crowned with the customary chaplet of laurel. On the left-hand side of the arch, in a space exactly corresponding with that on the right-hand, is found a far more interesting and suggestive group of figures. Here is shown the actual conquest of Jerusalem itself. Several legionaries, also wreathed with laurel, bear aloft the golden table which stood in the Temple that for so many ages glorified the sacred height of Mount Moriah. The two brazen trumpets, often alluded to in the Holy Bible, are borne by similar attendants. Crowds of warriors follow, some carrying the great golden candlestick with seven branches. All the bearers have staves to assist in supporting them under the enormous and crushing weight of these precious trophies. Some carry branches of laurel, and others tablets, on which were probably inscribed the names of the conquered cities. Montfaucon's work contains several other antiques, typical of the conquest. Among them, the river Jordan is borne along in triumph, represented by an old man lying down, and leaning upon an urn, which was a favourite Roman method of symbolising rivers. Contemporary with the erection of the arch, or nearly so, several medals were struck. On one of them, a woman sitting sadly by a palm-tree deplores her bitter misfortunes; behind the palm-tree stands a soldier with his foot upon a helmet, and the inscription is "JUDÆA CAPTA," that is, "Judæa taken." A fearful picture of the daughter of Jerusalem, who has so long sat and wept in the dust! The apotheosis of Titus is represented in the middle of the vault by the emblematic figure of the conqueror, borne to heaven on the broad wings of a towering eagle. Josephus* corroborates many of the foregoing remarks, and minutely describes the triumphal procession of Vespasian and his son. Amongst other trophies carried before them, the rich spoils which had belonged to the Temple at Jerusalem were conspicuous. "There was the golden table," says the Jewish historian, "which weighed many talents. It was constructed upon a different principle from anything in use amongst us now. In the middle was the main stem, which rose out of the base, from this proceeded smaller branches, very much resembling the form of a trident, and on the top of each of them was a lamp worked in brass. There were seven such in all, emblematical of the seven days of the Jewish week. The Book of the Law was the last of the spoils, and closed the mournful procession."

This narrative would not be complete if we omitted to state that the material of which the arch was constructed came from the purest marble quarries of Pentelicus, white and glistering at first, but afterwards blackened by age and exposure to the weather. At last the building became so ruinous that it was taken down, block by block, during the pontificate of Pope Pius VII., and entirely restored, Travertine stone being used for the new portions of the work. From the foundation to the frieze it is covered with suggestive sculptures. As one has felicitously observed, "it is a document in marble." It bears testimony that the sovereign pontiff Vespasian and his son, by destroying the Temple and the city, which seemed to crystallise the Mosaic dispensation, fulfilled the prophecies of Holy Writ, especially those uttered by our blessed Saviour Himself. The inscription on the side opposite the capitol honours Titus for having "subjugated the nation of the Jews, and destroyed the city of Jerusalem, a fortress vainly attacked and besieged before him by generals, kings, and peoples." The conqueror's attire was that of Jupiter Capitolinus. "His face and his arms," says Josephus, "were like the statue of Jupiter Triumphans, enamelled with minium or vermilion." This stately colouring has long since disappeared, for every Jew who passes the arch flings a stone at the head of Titus; and no son or daughter of Abraham will, under any pretext, pass under the accursed gateway.

We have remarked that the arch and its sculptures form an impressive evidence of the fulfilment of prophecy. Some have thought that the prophecies of the Old Testament, relative to the final overthrow of the Jewish polity and power, are illustrated by the arch of Titus. This is disputed by others. Declining to become arbiters in such a conflict of opinion, let us confine ourselves to our Saviour's prophecies. Here we stand upon sure ground. In His last visit to the gorgeous Temple at Jerusalem, then recently restored by the Idumean usurper, Herod the Great, He uttered these remarkable words: "O Jerusalem, Jerusalem, thou that killest the prophets, and stonest them which are sent unto thee, how often would I have gathered thy children together, even as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wings, and ye would not! Behold your house is left unto you desolate." Shortly before, He had wept over the devoted city, saying, "If thou hadst known, even thou, at least in this thy day, the things which belong unto thy peace, but now they are hid from thine eyes. For the days shall come upon thee, that thine enemies shall cast a trench about thee, and compass thee round, and keep thee in on every side, and shall lay thee even with the ground, and thy children within thee, and they shall not leave in thee one stone upon another, because thou knewest not the time of thy visitation." This language may be paraphrased: "The crisis hastens, the moment will soon arrive when thine enemies shall cast a trench about thee, and thou shalt suffer all the horrors of a siege." The word translated "trench" might be rendered rampart, for the earth and stones excavated to form a trench were used in piling up such a heap. To all these utterances the event most critically and exactly corresponded. Josephus says: "When Titus attacked the city the Jews defended themselves so obstinately that he found there was no way to gain his purpose but to compass the city round with a trench and mound. By this means he kept the besieged in on every side, cut off from them all hope of safety by flight, and consumed them by famine. The work which he undertook was indeed a matter of extreme difficulty, for the wall measured thirty-nine furlongs, or almost five miles, and the towers were thirteen in number, every one of them ten furlongs in compass. Nevertheless, the whole was finished in three days, for the soldiers in performing the task were animated by a Divine impetus."

* Burgess's "Antiquities of Rome."

When Titus and Vespasian ordered the entire demolition of the town and temple, they little thought that they were confirming the words of our blessed Lord, uttered some forty years before. "There shall not be left one stone upon another that shall not be thrown down." They were the unconscious agents in a great Providential scheme. The demolition of Jerusalem was a standing proof that our Lord Jesus was the true Christ, the Messiah; that He had already come to His temple, and that the Mosaic dispensation was for ever at an end, Christ having in every sense fulfilled the law; and that the Jewish nation was about to be scattered to the four winds of heaven. In like manner Josephus was a mere secular historian. It is doubtful if he had ever heard of the Saviour's mystical words; yet he records, with dispassionate candour, their precise fulfilment, that the great city and Temple were literally overthrown to the very foundations, the stones being excavated down to the solid rock. We are informed by Maimonides, the learned rabbi of Cordova in Spain, that the very site of the Temple was ploughed up, thus fulfilling the prediction, "Sion shall be ploughed as a field." Now, it may be asked again and again, why was all this permitted in the wise and orderly administration of Divine Providence? It is said that Titus wished to preserve the Temple, and would have punished the incendiaries that set fire to its cedar beams and hangings of Tyrian purple, but that such was the remorseless malignity of the wild factions within the city, as much against each other as against the Roman forces, that the legionaries of Titus were roused to more than superhuman rage. The infatuation, obstinacy, and purposeless atrocities of the Jews, drove them to brutalities of which the "grinding to powder" of gems of architectural beauty was only the small material type. Thus were the Lord's words, every jot and tittle of them, exactly accomplished.

But it might still be supposed desirable that some standing record of these events should be handed down from generation to generation. The narratives of contemporary writers might not improbably be lost, as the precious art of printing was not invented till many centuries afterwards. Even the works of the most eloquent and impressive authors sometimes utterly perish. The "Annals" of Livy are incomplete; the "Ecclesiastical Polity" of Hooker wants some important books. The memory of many a great event has been obscured because the written record of it has utterly disappeared; but in the arch of Titus we have just the sort of history in stone which the case requires. The great temple has been razed, but the monument erected to commemorate its overthrow still stands at the lapse of nearly eighteen centuries. It has been restored, it is true, but in so conservative a spirit that every available portion of the original building has been kept in its place. The inscription stating the occasion of its erection is unusually large and conspicuous, and is wonderfully preserved, considering that it was inscribed nearly two thousand years ago. The sculptures with which the gate is so profusely decked hand down, with singular exactness, the distinct and varied features of contemporary races, the costumes of soldiers and civilians, and, above all, the shapes of the Temple furniture. Verbal descriptions often admit of a double interpretation, but not so these delicately-carved stones. What an impressive commentary do they form upon the Mosaic Institutes, their development and their abolition! Stand out, old arch, still uttering thy silent testimony, refulgent as though built of burnished gold when the sun is at the zenith, and coldly grey in the presence of the evening star and backed by the deep blue and violet of the Italian sky! to thee shall men come, reverential pilgrims, not merely students of art and history, but loving and believing Christians, from the east and the west, the north and the south. From the banks of the Thames and the Mississippi, the Hudson and the Euphrates, they shall gaze on thee with strange curiosity, as witnessing to the truth of the inspired record, and, above all, to the claims and prerogatives of that Divine Intercessor and Mediator who is emphatically and in every point of view the author and the finisher of our faith!

T. JACKSON, M.A.

IN PERIL.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "SHAG AND DOLL," "HUGH'S HEROISM," ETC.

CHAPTER III.

AGAIN the shades of evening were beginning slowly to creep over the earth, which, after the heat of day, seemed gratefully to welcome their cooling touch; and again the little village by the sea seemed to have given itself up to the quiet enjoyment of the fair things Nature had spread around.

The busy workers in the hay-fields now rested under the shade of the spreading trees, whilst their little ones played in the sweet-scented grass, and gave out their ringing laughter to mingle with the clear song of the birds, the chirps of the grasshopper, the lowing of distant cattle, and the roar of the waves breaking upon the shore below.

Here and there, in many a trim cottage garden, might be seen a man hovering among his flowers, and tending them lovingly, with a smile of content upon his face as he watched them thriving and prospering; whilst others were busy in their allotments, cultivating the vegetables which were to form so large and so acceptable a part of their children's food. The health-giving breezes from the sea found their way everywhere, fanning the sunburnt cheeks of the tired labourer and putting new strength into him, brightening the rosy faces of the children, which deepened into a yet more healthy glow at their touch, and rustling through the leaves of the honeysuckle which drooped and clustered round the porch of that little cottage below the church—played upon the pale cheek of the patient watcher, who once more sat in her favourite seat, gazing out over the calm deep blue waters.

Suddenly she raised her head and listened. She had heard a sound which made her heart leap until she was obliged to press her hand upon it to still its beating. For this was the sound for which she had waited five years; daily, almost hourly, praying that she might hear it once again, and sometimes hoping, sometimes fearing, whether she ever should do so. And now there it was—a sound so sweet that it thrilled through her—the voice of her long absent son softly breathing the long unspoken word, "Mother!"

She rose tremblingly from her seat, and stood at the entrance of the porch, with the sprays of honeysuckle and deep red roses drooping round her calm pale face, which looked almost beautiful, lighted up as it was with the unutterable joy of that moment.

For there he was, her only son, leaning over the gate, with a pleading entreating expression on his face, and eyes softened and dimmed by the starting tears, as once more the lips uttered the word, "Mother!"

"My son, my son!" and the two were clasped in each other's arms.

"Mother, fergive me!"

She could not speak; she could only lay her head upon her son's shoulder, and weep in silence there.

"Mother, say you forgive me!" he pleaded; and then, taking her face between his hands, he held it long as he gazed into it, and read therein her deep unchanging love for himself, her joy, too great for expression, at her long-lost son's return.

They sank down upon the rustic bench, and there they sat hand in hand gazing out over the peaceful landscape, or turning to look into each other's faces, which beamed with joy and love and tenderness.

"Mother, you forgive me; then God will too."

"Aye, He will, He will; He does, He has!" and she clasped her hands as though to still the tumult of her joy.

"Yes, He has," said the young man, in a low, almost solemn tone. "He has; I came to Him and said I had wandered very far; but it seemed as if, before I had confessed one half, 'He came and fell on my neck and kissed me,' as it says He did to the prodigal son."

"'From the uttermost part!'" murmured the mother, amidst her tears, which fell softly and silently, and relieved the heart burdened with so great a weight of gladness—"'from the uttermost part!' Oh, my son, He has then gathered thee home! has sought for thee and found thee at length! How can we ever praise Him enough for His great goodness!"

And she glanced upwards at the deep blue heavens overhead, whilst the breeze rustled in the leaves of the trees, and bowed the heads of the flowers, and then floated upwards laden with sweet scents and charged with the evening song of the birds, which mingled with the softly breathed "Amen" that escaped from the lips of the young man. And a deep peace stole down into his heart as silently as the dew which was even then falling around them, and as refreshingly: the peace which God gives to those who have given up all—both sins and their own self-will—for Him.

They ate their frugal supper outside their cottage door; and then sat on until the moon had risen and cast her soft silvery light in one long stream of shimmering whiteness over the waters, when the only sound to disturb the deep stillness was the never-ceasing murmur of the waves, which seemed to those two to speak of the boundless ocean of the mercies and the love of God.

Then James Forrest told his story to his mother. A sad story it was, full of ever darkening shadows of sin and evil, until he came to the plan of robbery which he had formed with his neighbour, and which in a few hours he would have carried out, had it not been for the restraining hand of God upon him. They both shuddered as they thought of the brink of the precipice upon which he had stood; but it only served to deepen their gratitude to Him who had saved and snatched him from that fearful peril. And then James repeated the words of the preacher—words which had made so deep an impression upon him, and had opened his eyes, as with a lightning-flash, to the sin and the danger of his evil courses.

"So you never went back to London at all that night?" said Mrs. Forrest.

"No. Perhaps it might have been cowardly; but I felt it would be all up with me if I once trusted myself back in the wretched court, with Peter Bell persuading and edging me on. I knew I should never have strength to resist, and so I thought the best way was to fly from temptation. Besides, the longing for you, mother, grew so great, that I turned my face in this direction, and walked on and on—for I'd no money in my pocket for a railway fare—and though I've been a good bit of time upon the road, here I am at last." And the words were uttered with a sigh of infinite relief.

"Thank God!" murmured the mother.

"I hadn't much to leave behind me at my miserable lodgings, and, such as it was, I thought 'twas better to give it up than run any risk by going back for it."

"Ah yes, indeed; and all that I have is yours, my son."

"Oh mother, how good you are to me! and what happiness it is to be sitting here once more beside you!"

"And then to sit together in heavenly places! Think, James, what that will be hereafter!"

There was a pause, and then the mother spoke again. "And you are come to stay here for good, now? You have grown tired of your wanderings?"

"Aye, that's true, mother. I hope nothing will ever part us now till death comes to take one or other of us."

"One or other!" Mrs. Forrest started. The idea of her own departure was one often present to her mind; but upon the possibility that her son might be the first to go she had never dwelt.

She turned and gazed again more searchingly into his face, and a pang shot through her as she perceived how worn and pale and weary was the countenance that when she last had seen it wore all the freshness and brightness of early manhood. Those years of sin and self-indulgence had left their traces on him; but as she marked the humbled yet steadfast hopeful expression which had replaced the restless one of bygone days, she rejoiced, and felt that, even should it be her portion to look on and see him pass away before her, she could joyfully yield him up to the Father who had sought and brought home again His long-lost child.

But she was spared that trial. Some years of tranquil undisturbed happiness were granted to the two; and when at length the aged head drooped in the sleep of death, it was the son's hand which closed the eyes whose last look, full of deepest tenderness, had been fixed upon himself; and it was the tears of the erring, prayed-for, repentant one, that rained so thick and fast upon the calm still face. But there was a sweetness in his sorrow which healed whilst it purified. She had but gone before whither he humbly hoped one day to follow; and meantime life was full of blessings and duties; and the remembrance of the happiness of those last few years spent together would serve but to make him long for and ever keep in view the deeper fuller happiness reserved for those who have attained to the rest above.

As time passed on a smiling young bride was brought home to the pretty cottage; and then, after a while, children's voices filled the air, and young forms flitted to and fro in the garden, or ran a little way along the road to meet "father" on his return home from work.

And every Sunday they all paid a visit to "grandmother's" grave; though often, at other times, the figure of a man might be seen standing beside it, apparently lost in thought—thoughts that evidently were calming and soothing, for a look of peace always settled upon the face at those times.

"THE QUIVER" BIBLE CLASS.

205. What is stated in the Book of Revelation concerning the "Tree of Life?"

206. What words of Jeremiah would imply that he was very young when he began to prophesy?

207. Where is it mentioned that the earth is God's footstool?

208. Quote a passage which would seem to show that distinct prophecies were given to the people of David's victories against the Philistines and of his future greatness.

209. To what king did our Lord refer when He said "Go ye and tell that fox?"

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS ON PAGE 496.

193. "He took him aside from the multitude, and put His fingers into his ears, and He spit, and touched his tongue" (Mark vii. 33).

194. While the flesh was in seething he took a flesh-hook of three teeth in his hand, and struck it into the pan or kettle; all that the flesh-hook brought up the priest took for himself (1 Sam. ii. 13, 14).

195. Mark ix. 3.

196. "It was the ninth month, on the twentieth day of the month; and all the people sat in the street of the house of God, trembling because of this matter, and for the great rain" (Ezra x. 9).

197. St. John the Baptist (Matt. iii. 7).

(Drawn by TOWNELEY GREEN.)

"GOOD-BYE"—i.e., "GOD BE WI' YE."

HOW sweetly sound the words "Good-bye,"
When spoken from the heart,
Though tears are falling from the eye
Because dear friends must part.

It may be that a sad farewell
Such parting has in store;
Because in life, ah, who can tell,
That we shall meet once more?

It may be when we say "Good-bye,"
This thought will bring relief,
That when we meet right merrily
There'll be no cause for grief.

But "God be with you" (such the prayer Conveyed by each "Good-bye")
Will tell that He is everywhere,
A present God, and nigh.

And where God is, bliss there may be,
We need not fear nor cry;
For though our God we cannot see,
We hear Him in "Good-bye."

Paglesham. JAMES HARRIS, M.A.

THE BRIDGE BETWEEN.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE TROUBLES OF CHATTY AND MOLLY," "THE DINGY HOUSE AT KENSINGTON," "QUEEN MADGE," "AGAINST HERSELF," ETC., ETC., ETC.

CHAPTER XXII.—DOROTHY A HYPOCRITE.

IT came about that Tom escorted Dorothy to her lover's tea-party the next day. Mrs. Woodward was not well, and, to Dorothy's relief, Netta excused herself, on the plea of expecting visitors at home. A change had come over Tom lately. What it was Dorothy did not know; but he seemed more taken up with himself, and a little preoccupied, and almost selfish. He used to be so very unselfish at one time—ready to buy her anything he could afford out of his pocket-money, and to help her in a bit of fun, or sympathise with her in any of the trifling troubles that came to her, in the old happy days.

"I suppose as we get older we get more selfish, all of us," she thought, as they trudged along, "and more taken up with our own individual troubles and pleasures. I am. I used to think of all sorts of things once, and now all my time is taken up in thinking how much I would give if my life were different."

"What an awful 'gig' you look, Dorothy!" said her hopeful brother, arousing her with a start from her reverie, and recalling her to the terrible ordeal before her—i.e., the first visit to her future home (as she supposed it would be), and the meeting of the maiden aunts.

"Do I?" she exclaimed, ruefully; "and I have got on all my best things. Netta made me put them on, and they are so uncomfortable."

"Made you do it on purpose, you may depend. This is Blakesley's house, Doll. Awfully prim-looking crib, isn't it? and you have no idea what it's like inside—all spider-legs and crockery, chairs you can't sit upon, and clocks that won't go—a get-up which he calls Old Style. He'll make you get up like a Dresden china image when you are married, to complete the picture."

It was a prim-looking house—a square, squat little place, standing under the shelter of a much larger house which was next to it, and enclosed on three sides with a neatly-kept garden. There was a rustic porch—"so make-believe countrified," she thought, as they entered. A middle-aged servant opened the door, and showed them into a peculiar-shaped drawing-room, which was reached by ascending a steep little staircase, lighted by a diamond-paned window. It was a quaint room—only a man of culture and refinement could have collected and arranged the things in it—and yet it had a hard uncomfortable look everywhere, save in one corner by the fire, where there was a large old-fashioned easy-chair, into which Dorothy longed to creep and hide herself.

"The old cats haven't arrived, that's evident," said Tom, with his usual want of politeness.

There was no one in the drawing-room when they entered.

"Oh Tom, don't——" she began; but George Blakesley entered, and Dorothy stood shyly before him, awkward with the weight of her best clothes and the shining glory of the bracelet Netta had given her long ago, and some additional ornaments which the Beauty had insisted upon lending her (to do her justice, Netta had tried to make her sister look nice, and had succeeded), and shrinking from the ordeal of meeting strangers as the acknowledged fiancée of the master of that house.

"How pretty we look!" he said.

The words would have given such new pleasure to her once, no matter from whose lips they fell, but now she hardly cared. The faint sound of a door-bell was heard, then a rustle of silk, and Dorothy retreated into an uncomfortable arm-chair in a corner (there were lots of arm-chairs), just half a second before the door opened, and three ladies entered. From her corner and the arm-chair, from which she suddenly realised that it was impossible to rise, Dorothy first looked at her future relations. Tom was perhaps the only self-possessed person in the room for a moment.

"Aunt Milly," George Blakesley said, when he had saluted the elderly spinsters, "this is Dorothy; and this is your Aunt Milly, dear."

She was the eldest of the three—a kind old lady, with a bright sunshiny smile, and a voice as crisp and clear and sweet as the chirp of a bird.

"I am very glad to see you, my dear," she said; but Dorothy hung her head, and had nothing to say in reply to her.

"I feel such a dreadful hypocrite!" she thought.

"This is Aunt Josephine."

And the second lady (she could not be called old yet) came forward; but she only bowed. A handsome woman still was Josephine; she had been a beauty in her day, and she carried the conscious remembrance of it about with her. She was not a sunshiny happy-faced thing, like her elder sister, nor was she as gentle, though her heart was every bit as kind, perhaps. But she was stiff and proud, and sometimes perhaps a little hard when she meant to be only just. Then Dorothy was introduced to the third aunt, Minnie, who was not more than forty-five; she was a smaller woman than the others, and had a nervous little laugh. She came forward and kissed Dorothy.

"I am so glad to see you, dear," she said; and Dorothy sank back into the ugly chair again, quite relieved.

Tea was brought up, and some more people arrived. George Blakesley had quite a party, and every one looked at Dorothy, who felt herself getting more and more frightened.

"I only wish I dared make a face at that man sitting on the sofa!" she thought. The man on the sofa was handsome, but looked miserable (it was a way he had Dorothy found out afterwards); "and I would give all the world to do something outrageous, and horrify every one. Of course, they all think I'm dreadfully in love, and I'm not—not a bit; I'd give the world to go away and never see any one again as long as I live!" Then a half sad, half comic train of thoughts came floating through her brain. Never to see any one again! why, she must be a Robinson Crusoe to accomplish that! And she thought of Mr. Fuller, and the summer day on which he had told her, carelessly enough, that she should be "Man Friday," and the tears came into her eyes. "I shall never be so happy again," she thought; "never, never, as long as I live!"

"I have brought you some tea, dear," a low voice said; and she looked up.

It was the man to whom she was engaged, whom she ought to love more than any one in the world, and whom, oh sorrowful thought! she did not love even the least bit. Presently the miserable young man rose, and went, and the other visitors followed his example, all but the aunts, each pointedly shaking hands with her, to show that they recognised her position.

"Tom," said George Blakesley, "I want to show you some fossils I have in my study." Dorothy rose to her feet also, but he went over and put his hand upon her shoulder, and wondered why she trembled so. "I dare say she is nervous, poor little thing," he thought. "No, dear," he said, in the kind voice her ungrateful heart would not answer; "you stay and talk to our aunts a little while."

And he vanished with Tom, and left her to their tender mercies.

CHAPTER XXIII.— TABBY, TORTOISESHELL, AND BLACK-AND-WHITE.

So they gathered round her—those three stiff spinsters, in their old-fashioned rustling silk gowns; the youngest (Minnie) did not wear silk either, but something soft and clinging, with a dead white collar about her throat.

"And are you very happy, my dear?" began the eldest, in her purring sort of way.

"Yes—I don't know—I suppose so, Miss Mil.—" stammered Dorothy, feeling that she was about to undergo a cross-examination, and fearing lest she should betray what a rank impostor she was.

"You must call us all aunts, my dear; I am Aunt Milly, you know," the old lady said, kindly.

"You must let me tell you, Dorothy," said Josephine, grandly, "you have every reason to congratulate yourself. I can assure you I do not know a more worthy young man than our nephew George. A most clever, upright, conscientious——"

But Minnie (among their friends they were always addressed by their Christian names, preceded by the title of Miss) interrupted her sister with a nervous little laugh. "You mustn't frighten her, dear Josephine," she said; and then, feeling it was her turn to put a question, she asked, "and when do you think it will be, Dorothy?" They all carefully called her Dorothy to show that she was considered a future member of the family.

But Dorothy only looked still more afraid, and said she didn't know, but "not for a long time she hoped;" and they thought it only natural that she should be shy.

Then they asked her if she was musical, and if she was fond of reading, and how long she had known George, and all sorts of questions, which poor Dorothy answered to the best of her ability till Tom and the hero of the occasion appeared, and the aunts got up to go.

"You must let us see you often, Dorothy," Josephine said; "I dare say George will bring you to dine with us one evening next week," and she swept grandly out of the small room, ruffling a tiger's skin, and nearly upsetting a valuable and singularly ugly old china vase on her way.

"Good-bye, dear!" said Miss Milly, kindly, and she whispered, "Be a good little wife to my George; he has always been my boy since he lost his mother, and now you must belong to me, too," and when she looked up, surprised at receiving no answer, she saw two wistful brown eyes, and so sad an expression on the sweet girl-face, that it haunted and puzzled her for many a day afterwards. She stooped and kissed her, and the third sister followed her example, and then they vanished, and the dreadful tea-party was over.

The September days were drawing in when Dorothy and her brother and George Blakesley left the prim cottage.

XUM

"We'll go and make Netta sing to us in the twilight," the latter said, as an excuse for returning with them; and then he asked, "well, how did my little girl like the aunts?"

"They were very kind," she began.

"Nice old cats!" said Tom, approvingly.

"Tom!" exclaimed Dorothy, horrified.

"Well, so they are; I don't mean it disrespectfully, do I, Blakesley?"

"No, of course not!" he answered.

"Do you know," continued the youth, blithe at finding himself encouraged, "the eldest makes me think of a nice kind old purring tabby. I like cats," he added; "so does Dolly; I remember she blubbered like anything over Venus's funeral two or three years ago."

"I'm sure I didn't, Tom!" said his sister, indignantly; and then she added, "do you know, I think Aunt Minnie is something like what Venus was—so very gentle and soft, and all black-and-white."

"And what is Aunt Josephine?" asked Blakesley.

"Tortoiseshell, of course!" said Tom. "She's handsome and grand, and wags her tail just like a tortoiseshell."

"Very well then, we'll call them Tabby, Tortoiseshell, and Black-and-white, in future," he said; and thus, without one spark of disrespect, and in no uncomplimentary spirit, the aunts were generally spoken of afterwards.

"Now I shall trudge on," said Tom, obligingly, "and give you two a chance to spoon in the twilight."

Dolly tried to hold him back (being alone with her fiancé always distressed her), but he said he wanted to get on faster, and left them to their fate.

(To be continued.)

THE SEVEN LAST WORDS OF THE LORD JESUS.

BY THE REV. T. M. MORRIS, IPSWICH.

VII.—THE WORD OF DEATH.

"And when Jesus had cried with a loud voice, he said, Father, into thy hands I commend my spirit: and having said thus, he gave up the ghost."—ST. LUKE xxiii. 46.

WE who have been contemplating the successive events of Calvary are now called upon to witness the closing scene of the great tragedy; and having listened to the ever-memorable words uttered by our Saviour in His passion, it is ours to listen to the last word of all—the word of death—wherewith He commends His spirit into the hands of His Father, saying, "Father, into thy hands I commend my spirit;" having said which, He gave up the ghost.

The first word—that of intercession for His murderers—was probably spoken by Christ while He was being affixed to the cross, or immediately after He was uplifted upon it. The next word—that of promise and kingly majesty—was elicited by the petition of the malefactor who was dying at His side, and was spoken by the Saviour at the time when His kingly character and claims were most completely the subjects of mockery and derision. The next word—that of filial affection—was spoken shortly before the descent of the preternatural darkness; and then, from the sixth hour to the ninth hour, was the entire scene veiled, which period was a period of silence as well as of darkness, the termination of which was almost simultaneous with our Saviour's cry of desertion. From the utterance of that cry does His soul gradually emerge from that lowest depth of humiliation and suffering to which it had descended, and now also, with the return of light to the soul of Jesus, does the material darkness roll away!

The last three words follow one another in swift succession. Wearied by His mighty conflict, and by His solitary endurance of unutterable agony, Christ says, "I thirst;" the vinegar is offered and received; the one outstanding prediction of Scripture is fulfilled, and then is heard the word of victory. With a loud voice the announcement is made to all that the work he came to do is finished—is completed; and now it only remains for our Saviour to utter the last word—the word of death, which is the word of victorious faith—"Father, into thy hands I commend my spirit."

This period of consummation is signalised by certain concurrent phenomena—the earth quakes, the rocks are riven, the veil of the temple is rent in twain, the graves open. The symbolical significance of these remarkable events is so obvious that there is no need to dwell upon it. The only point to which we would refer in passing, as occasionally misapprehended, is the opening of the graves. Owing to insufficient carefulness in reading the narrative, this difficulty has occurred to some:—Do we not read that Christ is the first-born from the dead, the first fruits of those who believe? how are we with this to reconcile the statement that at the time of Christ's death certain saints or holy persons came forth from their graves? In Scripture all we are told is this: that at the time of Christ's death the graves were opened, probably by the force of the earthquake which is here referred to, and herein have we the symbolic declaration that the power of death was broken; that Christ by dying had destroyed him that had the power of death; but the graves, though opened, did not yield their contents till after the resurrection of Christ, and then these long-buried saints arose, and appeared unto many.

We have a remarkable proof of providential arrangement if we consider the time of Christ's death. Regarding this event as that of which all the prophets had spoken, and to which all the arrangements of the ritual economy had pointed, there is an obvious and striking appropriateness in the time of the offering of the great world-sacrifice.

It was the month Nisan, the first month in the Jewish ecclesiastical or sacred year, and the appointed season of Passover. It was the fourteenth day of the month, the day regarded above all other days of the great festival; it was at this period of commemorative and predictive solemnity —in the evening of this great feast day, or, as it was denominated, the hour between the evenings, about three o'clock in our afternoon, the very time of the slaying of the paschal lamb, that Christ our Passover was slain for us. According to our reckoning of time, at about nine o'clock in the morning Christ was affixed to the cross, at noon the darkness descended, and about three o'clock in the afternoon Christ uttered these last words, and gave up the ghost. We cannot regard this as a mere coincidence, but as a proof that God would have it so; that not only in that very way, but that at that very time, Christ the Lamb, who had been potentially slain from the foundation of the world, should offer Himself in actual sacrifice once for all. And very impressive is the scene suggested to the mind by this conjuncture of events. At that very time—the ninth hour—the priest in the temple must have been slaying the appointed sacrifice, not knowing that within a short distance of him, and in part through his criminal instrumentality, Christ, the great Passover, was being slain. But so, in the wonder-working providence of God, it was. And at the very moment that He who is both priest and victim, sacrifice and altar, gave up the ghost, the Temple rocks in the earthquake, the veil is rent in twain from the top to the bottom, the recesses of the innermost shrine are disclosed, the mercy-seat becomes visible and accessible to all; and thus signs were afforded, little understood at the time, which indicated the passing away of the old and the coming in of a new and better dispensation.

But we must return to the last word of Christ—the word of death—"Father, into thy hands I commend my spirit." These words, spoken by our Saviour in the very moment of death, are words which remind us of those which David used long before, and which the proto-martyr Stephen used not long after. They are a quotation or rather an adaptation of words which we meet with in Ps. xxxi. 5, "Into thine hand I commit my spirit: thou hast redeemed me, O Lord God of truth." Into the hands of this God, in whom he professes to have such strong confidence, the Psalmist commends his spirit—"He gives it over into His hand as a trust or deposit; for whatsoever is deposited there is safely kept, and freed from all danger and all distress. . . . . The language of the prayer lays hold of life at its root, as springing directly from God, and as also living in the believer from God, and in God; and this life it places under His protection who is the true life of all spirit-life. It is the language of prayer with which the dying Christ breathed forth His life. The period of David's persecution by Saul is the most prolific in types of the passion, and this language of prayer which proceeded from the furnace of affliction through which David at that time passed, denotes, in the mouth of Christ, a crisis in the history of redemption in which the Old Testament receives its fulfilment." (Delitzsch.)

As we listen to these words, which fell from the lips of the dying Saviour, we are reminded of the way in which the Lord Jesus did die, and of the way in which every believer in Jesus may die.

1. These words remind us of the way in which the Lord Jesus did die.—This last word spoken from the cross sets a seal upon all the rest. With tranquillity and child-like confidence does He commend His spirit to His Father's keeping. "A text of Scripture was the torch which lighted Him in the valley of the shadow of death. As he had always lived in the Scripture, so did He die with its words upon His lips." As we look upon our Divine Redeemer at the very moment He is yielding up His spirit, as we listen to this His last word, we feel that His death is not less full of significance than His life.

As we read these words the impression produced upon us is, that the death of Christ was voluntary, spontaneous, unconstrained. When He gave up the ghost, it was not because He could not retain it, but because He was willing to lay down that life over which He had absolute power. When men die they yield to an inevitable necessity. What we call death is but the final outworking of a law written in their members. When the appointed moment comes no man hath power over his spirit to retain it. Death is the result of causes which ordinarily have been long in operation, and which result, however much we may dread and dislike it, we are powerless to avoid or postpone. The utter helplessness of man never appears more evident than when we see him gradually subdued or suddenly smitten down by the resistless might of the King of Terrors. Even where man voluntarily submits to, or even inflicts upon himself some fatal blow, the deadly injury having been received, the consequence, which is death, must be endured. When we contemplate the death of Christ, we see something altogether different. We see Him voluntarily submitting to death, dying with a perfect sense of freedom; no man taketh His life from Him, He layeth it down. As by a mere volition He might have saved Himself from the cross, so, down to the time of His uttering this final word, He might, had He been so pleased, have descended from the cross in kingly might and majesty. But no! it was for this very thing that He came. He was made for a little while lower than the angels for the suffering of death; to this fiery baptism He had been looking forward from the very first, and felt straitened till it was accomplished. He hangs upon that cross a perfectly voluntary sufferer, and at last, knowing well that even then He might avoid the supreme crisis, He says, "Father, into thy hands I commend my spirit; and having said thus, He gave up the ghost."

As we look upon this perfectly voluntary death of Christ, we see Him laying down His life for others—for us. He dies for sins not His own. His death is sacrificial and substitutionary. He who has been representing us in life and suffering, now represents us in death.

It is unnecessary to refer to the way in which this wonderful and voluntary death of Christ is ever represented in Scripture as the point around which all interest gathers. If we look to the ritual mysteries of the Old Testament we see this; if we listen to many of the most remarkable utterances of the New Testament we hear the same thing. Now, this death of Christ can never appear intelligible to us; we shall never learn the true lessons of the cross till we regard the death of Christ as sacrificial and substitutionary. "He gave Himself for our sins." "Christ loved the Church, and gave Himself for it." "He gave Himself that He might redeem us from all iniquity." Alluding to His own death and the greatness of His love manifested thereby, He says, "Greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friends." He "hath redeemed us from the curse of the law, being made a curse for us." He "in His own body bare our sins upon the tree." Yes! He gave Himself for us. This is the one foundation of our faith and hope. Christ on the cross took the sinner's place. We see Him suffer there, we see Him die there, as our representative and substitute.

2. Here at the cross we not only see how Jesus did die, but we see how the believer in Jesus may die. The believer, in his degree, may make the dying experience of Jesus his own. Our Divine Redeemer not only sets before us the example of a holy life, but He reveals to us the secret of a peaceful and blessed death. He lived and suffered and died as He did that we might be able to die as otherwise we could not. By dying He has overcome him that had the power of death—that is the devil—and delivered them who, through fear of death, were all their lifetime subject to bondage. He has taken away the sting from death, and victory from the grave. If, as believers, we are interested in Christ, death is despoiled of its terrors. He suffered and died for us, that we might be able to make His words our own, and when the end comes say, in a spirit of filial confidence, "Father, into thy hands I commend my spirit." We must all die, in some way or other, at some time or other; happy are we if we are able to die as Jesus died. He lived, He died, He ever liveth, that this might be possible.

Now, the soul can only find its true rest and place of safety in God, and in this emergency the believer at once thinks of God—of God not in Himself, but as He is made known in Christ Jesus. Unless we can thus look to God—to God in Christ—there can be no comfort, no confidence in death. Not long after Christ died on the cross we are presented in the sacred narrative with an account of the way in which a believer in Christ did die. We allude to the evangelist and proto-martyr Stephen. His was a rough and cruel death. We see him in the midst of an excited and angry mob; we see his bruised and battered body falling to the earth, its proper resting-place, under a hail of heavy and ragged stones; though not insensible to pain, he is not much concerned about the fate of the fleshly tabernacle, which is being so roughly unpinned and beaten down; he is thinking rather of the immortal, the undying tenant, which, presently enfranchised, shall speed away from earth and all earthly scenes and sufferings, and, thinking of it, he cries out, "Lord Jesus receive my spirit." In thus commending his spirit to Jesus, he is but confiding in that best and truest friend, who has loved him and given Himself for him. May we be able, like Stephen, in the awful and trying hour of death, to rest simply in the power, and faithfulness, and love of Jesus; then in that very last hour of all we shall be able to say, with undisturbed tranquillity and the much assurance of faith, "Return unto thy rest, O my soul, for the Lord hath dealt bountifully with thee." "Father, into thy hands I commend my spirit."

SCRIPTURE LESSONS FOR SCHOOL AND HOME.

SCRIPTURE STORIES. First Series. No. 30. St. Paul at Rome.

Chapter to be read—Acts xxviii. (part of).

INTRODUCTION. The long voyage and shipwreck safely over, where is Paul left? What good has he done at Malta? What an example to travellers! He never forgot whose servant he was. Like Christ, always seeking opportunities of doing good. Detained three months in Malta, till ship arrives bound for Rome.

I. The Journey to Rome (read 10—16). Contrast the arrival and departure. Arrived destitute, friendless, stranger: departs laden with gifts; friends with all, from the governor down to the boatmen; quite sorry to part with so many kind friends. What made the difference? God's servants, who honour Him and work for Him, sure to be honoured. Now the journey to Rome begun once more. Let the teacher trace it for the children on a map. Embarks on the ship; what was its name? Perhaps painted on stern. See how minutely St. Luke notices things. From Malta nearly due north to Syracuse, capital of Sicily; north again to Rhegium; thence north-west to Puteoli, chief port of Italy at that time. Here the voyage ends. Once more they stand on dry land, and now begin the last part of journey on foot. How long do they stay at Puteoli? Everywhere friends are found, so many have heard of the great apostle. Now once more start, along the celebrated Appian way; each step brings nearer Rome. For what purpose is he going? Was to "bear witness," as he did "in Jerusalem" (xxiii. 2). Picture him as he walks along, weary with long journey, downcast at thought of what lies before him: still to have work, and suffering. What is the work? How can he, a poor prisoner, do any good in the great city Rome? How can he get to the people as he used to in the synagogues? Perhaps, too, will have more suffering—can he bear it? doubtless from time to time raises his heart in prayer! How is he cheered? Who come to meet him? How kind of his friends to come so far as Appii Forum (forty-three miles) to meet him! He is not alone then. God has much people in this city too; is cheered, and goes on his way rejoicing. At last arrives at Rome; the prisoner given up to the captain; but what a privilege! he is not treated like a common prisoner! is to live in his own house. Is indeed still a prisoner, always chained to a soldier (ver. 29); still will have much privacy, and can see his friends and others. Always is some mercy in all trials.

II. Paul's Work in Rome (read 17—31). How soon does he begin? Only three days' rest! To whom will he speak first? Remind how had been rejected, persecuted, delivered up by the Jews, and was especially sent to Gentiles (xxii. 21). Still cannot give up the Jews, all his own countrymen, he longs for their salvation; so, once again, summons them first. Begins with the chief; if can convince them, they will preach to the others. Picture the scene. St. Paul's hired house—probably inside the barracks of the Emperor's own guards (Phil. i. 13)—the prisoner bound to the soldier, in his eagerness raising his hand showing the chain (ver. 20), the Jews listening with curiosity. They have heard no harm of him, only that the sect of the Christians is always spoken against (ver. 22). What can it all be about? will St. Paul tell them? They are quite curious to hear. So a day is appointed for going into it. The day comes; St. Paul tells his tale. What is it all about? The same "hope of Israel," the same "kingdom of God," which they profess to care about. But what can they not believe? That Jesus of Nazareth is the hoped-for King who should deliver Israel. How does Paul try to convince them? Not by his own arguments, but by Word of God. Therefore, if they do not believe, are rejecting God and not him. What is the result? Just the same then as now—same Scriptures, same Word, same Saviour, believed by some, disbelieved by others. So Paul dismisses Jews with Isaiah's solemn warning. Now turns to Gentiles, and for two years preaches to all who will come to him the same story of the Lord Jesus Christ, no man forbidding him.

III. Practical Lessons. Have now finished the life of St. Paul; can find some general lessons for ourselves from his life and work. (1) What a noble thing is a life given to God! All must admire him; whether travelling, working, studying, among friends, in prison, is always thinking and working for his Master. Are we doing so? (2) The honour put on such a life. St. Paul always making friends and converts—kings, governors, captains, sailors, boatmen, all touched by his loving manner and bold words. Is God honouring us in like manner? If not, whose fault is it? (3) The solemn responsibility of rejecting Christ. We, like Jews, are always hearing, profess to believe, but do we act upon it? Are we leading a life of faith and repentance? Those who reject Christ now will be rejected by Him hereafter when He comes to visit us in power and great glory.

Questions to be answered.

1. Describe the journey to Rome.
2. How was St. Paul cheered?
3. Describe his imprisonment.
4. For whom did he send first, and why?
5. What was his message to the Jews?
6. Name some general lessons from his life.

STILL AND DEEP.

BY F. M. F. SKENE, AUTHOR OF "TRIED," "ONE LIFE ONLY," ETC.

CHAPTER XXIII.

AS Bertrand spoke these words, impetuously, holding her fast all the time, Laura slowly turned round, and looked up at him with the sweetest expression possible softening all her winning face.

"Come and sit down," he said, "and I will give you the fullest details of my position; it will be a great relief to myself to do so, I have been so completely alone in my perplexity."

And then he told her how, as Mary grew up in her fair stillness in his home, he had always loved her with a true and deep affection, and how, when his dying father had adjured him, both by word and letter, in the most urgent manner to make her his wife, he had been very willing and pleased to do so—"because, not then, sweet Lorelei," he added, "had my heart ever been roused to any warmer feeling, as it has been unhappily since."

"But your father could never have wished you to marry a woman you did not love," broke in Lurline, impatiently.

"No, he expressly said that he did not, but I did love Mary in a calm and reasonable manner then, and he had a most solemn reason for wishing that I should marry her, almost as an act of justice."

"What was it? Tell it me, dear Bertrand," said the soft caressing voice.

And he did tell her all the history of Robert Trevelyan's fatal accident, and its consequences in Mary's utter orphanhood and Mr. Lisle's life-long anguish of remorse; for it did not seem to him that in so doing he was failing in care and reverence for his father's memory, as he did not consider that he was in reality at all to be blamed for the terrible catastrophe, or that one of less sensitive conscience would have considered himself in any real sense the cause of it."

Laura caught eagerly at the expressions he used as to his father's morbid scrupulosity and exaggerated sensibility.

"Yes; and can you suppose, Bertrand, that in the clearer light where he sees all things now, he could wish you and Mary alike to sacrifice yourselves to a marriage in which there would be no love on either side, simply in the attempt to repair a fault which he never really committed?"

"If I could be sure that Mary has indeed no love for me!" said Bertrand, flushing as he spoke. "My father on his death-bed wrung from her an avowal that she did love me—and me alone."

"Ah!" said Laura, composedly, "we know how much that is worth. People will, even in a general way, do anything to soothe a dying man's last hours, and I believe there is nothing Mary would not have said to please your father at that sad time."

"But Laura, Mary is true. She could not speak falsely, even for his sake."

"No, perhaps not; and I dare say she could say with truth that she liked you better than any one else because she literally knew no other; but she has no love for you now, Bertrand. I can tell that, alas! by the feelings of my own heart. At the same time, she glories in the martyr spirit, and if you were to press her to marry you because your father wished it she would very likely sacrifice herself and do it. But is my noble beautiful Bertrand to have a wife on such terms as that! oh, it drives me wild to think of it!" and Laura sprang to her feet, and paced to and fro, as if unable to control herself.

"Stay, Lurline!" said Bertrand; "you need be in no fear that I will consent to take a wife on any such terms as these; let me but have the proof that Mary does not love me for myself, and would only marry me out of reverence to the dead, and I shall consider myself free as the winds, so far as she is concerned. I can secure her material comfort otherwise than by a marriage with me, and then I shall no longer hesitate to seek my own happiness where alone it can be found; but this proof, Lurline, how am I to obtain it?"

"From her own lips if you choose. Will that satisfy you?"

"Surely it would, if quiet silent Mary could ever speak to me on such a theme!"

"Her silence and quietness might be your proof if you chose to accept it, Bertrand, for true love cannot hide itself or be silent, as to my cost I know," and the Lorelei drooped her head, apparently shame-faced, but speedily raised it, to say, with flashing eyes, "however, I will undertake that she shall remove your needless scruples herself to-morrow; for this I can tell you: ever since you have been here Mary has been making all sorts of schemes for her own future, wholly independent of you."

"Schemes? of what nature? Not marriage with Charles Davenant, Lurline! I cannot believe that!"

"Not now, perhaps; though I believe it will come later. But for the moment the sober Mary seems to be aspiring to a saintship, and to an emulation of Florence Nightingale. She has some plan of philanthropic self-devotion in her head, I believe."

"That is more like Mary, certainly!" said Bertrand.

"Ask her yourself to-morrow what her purpose

(Drawn by W. SMALL.)

"Mary started as if she had received a stab."—p. 540.

for the future is, and she will tell you. But Bertrand," continued Laura, bending her eyes keenly on his face, "tell me if Mary knows that you are aware of what she said respecting her love for you in order to quiet your father on his death-bed?"

"That I cannot tell, but I should think not; for so far as I know she never spoke to him again after he told me. He died next day."

"But she knows that you heard from him what his wishes were?"

"Yes, that she certainly does, for I told her so myself, and there it is, Lurline, that I consider my chief difficulty to lie. If I were to know certainly that she loved me, I should hold myself morally bound to her, because I told her in so many words that I knew his wishes, and that they were mine also, and I hoped they would be hers."

"When did you say that to her?" said Laura, frowning.

"On the night before we left our old home, standing by my father's new-made grave."

"And what was her answer?"

"She made none."

"What! do you mean to say she remained silent?" exclaimed Laura.

"Perfectly silent," he answered.

"Oh, Bertrand! and can you for a single moment imagine that she has any love for you if she could receive such a speech as that in silence. Ah, if it had been me!" and the Lorelei hid her face in her hands.

"My Lurline," he said, tenderly, "you and Mary are as different as fire and water."

He remembered as he spoke how his father used to quote the proverb, "Still waters run deep," with reference to Mary's character, and a misgiving crossed him whether he were not mistaken in the impression he had gradually been acquiring under the Lorelei's subtle influence, that Mary's disposition instead of having any depth, rather represented the shallow waters which most speedily take a coating of ice, and he said, somewhat anxiously—"At least, Laura, you see now how it is that I cannot, with any peace of mind, follow the bent of my own inclination, until I am well assured that I am not acting a dishonourable part towards her whom my father left in my care; but if she were indeed to tell me, of her own accord, that her hopes and wishes have all been turned quite away from me, I should be only too thankful to release myself and her from a mistaken bond, and feel that I was free to realise to the uttermost the glorious hope of happiness which has opened out for me this day."

"Then ask her yourself to-morrow, and you will be amply satisfied," said Laura, triumphantly; "you will find that her ambition is not to make one noble heart happy, as mine would be if I had a hundred lives, but to be known as a heroine of charity, like the lady-nurses in the Crimea. I should have thought you might have seen already that she wished to detach herself from you, if she could do so consistently with her desire to obey your father's wishes in all things, by the persistent manner in which she has avoided you, and the care she has taken to leave you alone with me, in the hope, no doubt, that you would come to prefer my society to hers."

"As I have done, most assuredly!" said Bertrand, with a rather bitter smile.

"Well then, till to-morrow I must leave you," said Lurline, turning round to him with a lovely, half-pathetic smile; "till then we can be no more to each other—at least, in outward appearance—than we have been, and after that, however it may be with you, for me it will be either perfect brightness or an endless gloom."

Then, bending her graceful figure towards the dangerous waters whence Bertrand had rescued her, she said, softly, "Good-bye, little lake! You very nearly were my resting-place to-day, and perhaps you will be soon."

"Lurline, no!" exclaimed Bertrand, almost angrily; "it is wicked to entertain such a thought for a moment!"

"I did not mean anything wrong, dear Bertrand," she said, looking up to him, pleadingly. "I was thinking of the dark waters of death. Do you think, Bertrand, after all that has passed to-day—I may say it—do you think it would be possible for me henceforward to live without you?"

Then, as if scared at her own words, she started from his side, and fled away through the trees, her beautiful white-robed form, with the floating hair streaming behind her as a shining veil, appearing and disappearing among the branches, while Bertrand stood watching her, entranced, till she vanished altogether from his sight like the fairy vision of a dream.

Now we must explain that the sole foundation for Laura's assertion that Mary Trevelyan contemplated going out as a lady-nurse or in some similar vocation of charity, was simply this: two or three weeks previously, at a time when Mary was already conscious, almost with despair, of the fascination Laura Wyndham was exercising over Bertrand Lisle, she heard Lurline, with a scornful laugh, read out to Mrs. Wyndham an advertisement she had found in the newspaper. It was to inquire for some lady who would voluntarily give her services for three months in an hospital for sick children, in order to allow the person permanently in charge there to obtain a season of relaxation and change of air. Laura had scoffed at the idea of any one born a lady being willing to undertake such a task, and said, contemptuously, that it would suit no one but an old woman out of the workhouse. Mary remained perfectly silent while these remarks were being made, but a little later she went up to Mrs. Wyndham, and asked her if she would allow her to cut that advertisement out of the paper. Mrs. Wyndham gave her leave with a silent look of surprise, but Laura, who had overheard her, came bounding forward, and said, eagerly, "What, Mary, are you thinking of applying for such a delightful post?"

"Not now, certainly," she answered; "but if I have to seek a home for myself when I leave Chiverley, I should be glad to find one where I could make myself useful. I know nothing of this place, of course, and it would require much consideration before I even thought of it; but I think it is work I should like."

"I wish you joy of it!" said Laura, shrugging her shoulders, and there the matter dropped, and had never again been alluded to from that day till the moment when the Lorelei so deftly made use of it. She well knew how to weave every stray thread that could serve her purpose into her intricate web.

CHAPTER XXIV.

It was the night following that day when Laura had made her final and most successful attempt to enthral Bertrand Lisle absolutely and for ever, and the inhabitants of Chiverley Rectory were supposed to be all tranquilly slumbering away the hours of darkness, but there was neither rest nor sleep in Mary Trevelyan's little room: she was kneeling by the side of her bed, with her arms stretched out across it, and her head laid low between them, in an attitude which betokened a complete abandonment of herself to thoughts too sad with their weight of grief almost to be borne.

There had been a time when Mary Trevelyan thought she had almost attained the summit of earthly happiness; when, standing on the little bridge beneath the shade of the summer trees, with her hand in Bertrand's, she felt that he was about to utter the words which would have linked her life to his for evermore, and then, just at that crisis of her fate, had come the mournful melodious sound—the wail of anguish in the voice she knew so well, the voice of the syren, who, by every art, had been trying to lure him from her—and instantly it had been to him as though she existed not, and he had fled away from her to follow the beguiling sound, and she knew, she felt, that he would return to her as her true lover never more! for she had easily recognised that the cry, half-musical, half-sad, was no true shriek of terror drawn forth by some sudden danger, but rather the studied expression of some bitter sorrow, some dark foreboding, more like the poetical idea of the death-song of the swan than any real outcome of trouble or distress, and she well understood what it all meant for her. Somehow the subtle Lorelei had discovered how near in that instant she was to losing Bertrand altogether, and forthwith she had sent out the sweet appealing wail which drew him so quickly to her side.

And long they had lingered in the lonely wood, those two—hours and hours—while Mary kept her watch upon that deserted bridge, unwilling to leave the spot where he had stood with her, though no hope lingered in her heart, prophetic of its future, that he would ever seek her there again; and morning had ripened to noon, and noon faded to the sun's declining hours, and twilight came, but still she was alone; then slowly, wearily, she had returned to the home which sheltered them all alike, and there she had seen Bertrand with eyes that never quitted Laura's radiant face, and looks averted from herself, and manner constrained and cold. And now night had come, and she was alone with the dark terrible shadow that enfolded her, precursor of the deadliest evil her life could know, even now very close at hand; for weeks she had dreaded its coming, and had seen the danger, but hope had never quite left her, and it was hard to lose it altogether, even in this the saddest hour her life had known; but she was trying to steel herself for whatever might be coming upon her; she was trying to give herself up to her merciful God, that he might work His will upon her in any way He pleased. Mary Trevelyan was herself too single-hearted and pure-minded to be able to imagine that Laura had been influenced by motives of worldly ambition only, and although she could not but be aware of the absolute determination with which the Lorelei had set herself to win Bertrand, she yet believed that she did love him truly; and Mary was schooling herself to feel, as she lay there, that if indeed her Bertrand had given to Laura all his heart's love in return, she ought for his sake to be glad and thankful that they had learnt to know and prize each other; for surely Bertrand's happiness was that which she desired most in all the world; and if he was to find it best with Laura, and not with her—alas, not with her!—then ought she to rejoice that Laura was his own, that with her he would walk through sunny paths in life, while the poor Mary, who having loved him could never love another, went on to her distant grave ever and ever joyless and alone! It was a hard lesson to learn, and Mary's chest heaved with sobs, and her face was wet with bitter tears under the veil of her long dark hair, while her lamp burnt low and cast a dim light on her prostrate figure, when suddenly the door of her room was opened by a quick impatient hand, and shut again as rapidly, leaving the intruder by her side, while a voice clear and musical, but with a ring of sharpness in its tone, said authoritatively, "Rise up, Mary Trevelyan, and prepare to listen to me, for I have much to say to you, which is of great importance to us both."

Then slowly Mary raised her wan face, and looked round, to see Laura Wyndham standing before her, holding a lamp in her white hand, which sent a strong glow over her beautiful face, more brilliant than ever from the light of triumph which glittered in her eyes, and the proud happiness which curved her lips in a meaning smile.

Without a word, Mary raised herself from her knees, gathered the white garments round her, which contrasted strangely with the scarlet robe over which Laura's fair hair waved in free luxuriance, and having placed a chair for her unwelcome guest, she sat down herself, and said, "I am ready, Laura; say whatever you will."

"I shall do that, even without your permission, Mary, for I have come to do for you an act of friendly kindness, which none have ever done for you before: I have come to tell you the truth."

"Has no one ever told me the truth before?" said Mary, raising her sad eyes calmly to Laura's bright face.

"No one," answered Lurline, "at least, in respect to that which most concerns you. Old Mr. Lisle deceived you, unconsciously perhaps, and Bertrand, scarce knowing what he did, has done so too; but the time has come when your delusions must no longer be suffered to exist, lest they wreck for ever a life that is too precious, even to yourself, to be so ruined."

"Of whom do you speak?" asked Mary, with lips calm as ever, but from which all colour had fled.

"Of Bertrand Lisle," answered Laura, and then she added, in a soft, clear voice, "who loves me, and whom I love."

Mary did not utter a syllable; it might have seemed that she did not hear the words which came to her laden with the weight of her own life-long misery, but for the convulsive movement with which she gathered her loose dress closer to her breast, as if to shield herself from the arrows which were about to pierce her heart. The Lorelei's keen eyes noted it all. She had seated herself immediately opposite to Mary, so that she might read each changing expression on her face, and she now went on, with a composure resembling the judicial calmness of a judge when summing up the case against one who is about to be condemned to death.

"I have said that I am come to tell you the truth, Mary Trevelyan, and, to show you that I have indeed a perfect knowledge of it, I will first go over the matter on which I wish to undeceive you, as I know it appears to you, and then I will reveal to you the real state of the case. You had lived for twenty-one years in Bertrand Lisle's home, without there ever having been the faintest hint of any idea of a marriage between you. On his death-bed Mr. Lisle told you that such a marriage was his dearest wish, that he believed or hoped you were beloved by his son, and in reply to his questions you distinctly said that you at least loved Bertrand."

At these words Mary Trevelyan started as if she had received a stab, and buried her face in her hands, while she said, in a tone of unspeakable pain, "Laura, who told you this?"

And the Lorelei answered, "Bertrand Lisle, who heard it from his father's lips."

And she knew that in uttering the cruel sentence she had laid the corner-stone of that edifice of her own happiness which she hoped to build up on Mary Trevelyan's ruined life.

Her victim remained silent, with her face hidden, praying in her heart that she might have grace not to blame one lying in the helplessness of death for his breach of confidence.

Lurline continued. "You were aware that Bertrand had a long conversation with his father the night before the old man died, and you could not doubt, after his statement to yourself, that he had told his son his desire for a union between you. When Bertrand therefore uttered some cautious words to you respecting his father's wishes, in the passing excitement of grief, at the new-made grave, you interpreted them as a sort of proposal of marriage."

"Laura, no!" exclaimed Mary, letting her hands fall from her burning face. "I did not! I could not! I never for an instant considered that Bertrand had bound himself to me."

"I only know," said Lurline, "that you managed to impress him with the idea that you wished and expected him to marry you, and he came here to see whether he could make up his mind to do it, as a duty his father had laid upon him."

"How could even his father's wishes make such an act seem a duty, Laura? Are you not mistaken?" said Mary, with trembling eagerness.

"Not in the least," said Laura. "I will now give you the true history of this affair which has been cruelly hard on Bertrand. Mr. Lisle imposed this duty upon him as an act of reparation to you."

"Of reparation to me? How? Why?"

"Because he had killed your father," was Laura's answer.

She could be absolutely heartless where her own interests were concerned, but she was not prepared for the piercing cry which burst from the pale lips usually so calm, as Mary, starting to her feet, shrunk back to the wall, and stood there trembling with horror-stricken eyes, as if she had seen a spectre.

Lurline rose, and drew her back to her seat, saying, "Don't mistake me, Mary; Mr. Lisle caused his death, but not wilfully. There was a quarrel and a struggle on board the ship coming home from Madeira, in which your father, trying to escape Mr. Lisle's violence, fell overboard, and was drowned. Your mother died that same night of her grief, leaving you a destitute infant, orphaned through the fault of Bertrand's father; therefore he adopted you and cared for you all his life, and therefore, when death took his protection from you, he imposed on his son the duty of giving you a home as his wife."

"And this was Bertrand's reason—this only?" asked Mary, faintly.

"Yes—good son that he was!—he tried to obey his father; but, Mary, he had never loved you or any woman enough to make him wish for a union till he came to Chiverley, and then he met his fate in Laura Wyndham. He has told it to me this day with bitter anguish, because he feared you would hold him bound to accomplish his father's reparation. He told me that he loved me, and me only; that a life spent with me would be perfect bliss, and without me utter torture, and I love him—with all my heart I love him!" Laura spoke now with genuine vehemence. "Oh, Mary! will you hold him to his bond? will you ruin his life for ever, and mine along with it? will you force him to marry you?"

"Laura, stop!" said Mary, rising, with quiet dignity, "you have no right to use such words to me; Bertrand Lisle is perfectly free from me. Since his happiness consists in a marriage with you, I will do all I can to promote it."

"But, Mary, you must tell him so yourself," said Laura, eagerly, "or he will not believe it. I told him you intended to be one of those noble heroines of charity—a lady-nurse, or something of that sort; but he was so convinced you wished to marry him, that he will only be at ease if he hears it from your own lips. He means to ask you, to-morrow, what are your plans for your future life, and all our happiness in this world depends on the answer you give."

"Then you may be quite at rest, Laura," said the low, calm voice; "you and he shall be made perfectly happy if words of mine can ensure it; and I thank you for telling me the truth. And now, may I ask you to leave me? I must be alone."

Something there was in Mary's manner which subdued even Laura Wyndham. She stooped silently, and kissed her on the forehead, and then, without another word, turned and left the room. Her work was accomplished, her victory complete!

(To be continued.)

TWO-EDGED PROVERBS.

BY THE REV. P. B. POWER, M.A., AUTHOR OF "THE 'I WILLS' OF THE PSALMS," "THE FEET OF JESUS," ETC.

"ALL'S NOT GOLD THAT GLITTERS."

A SHORT time ago we tried to show our readers some of the truth, both as regards this world and the next, of the common proverb, "Gold may be bought too dear."

It were well if that proverb were as common as some others, but it is sadly crowded out of sight and hindered in beneficial operation by the hurry, worry, and bustle of this greedy and unresting age, when men hasten to be rich and "fall into a snare," and "pierce themselves through with many sorrows."

Now as one coal helps another in the fire, so one proverb may help another to perform its mission. Accordingly, we now, continuing this subject of gold, shall try to point out that much for which man frets and toils, and vexes, and wears himself out, is not gold, nor as valuable as gold at all, but a mere make-believe and sham—a mirage, and breath, and nothing else.

Now, to begin with, we live in a world of deceptions. In one sense this world is a terribly real world—a world of iron, and hard knocks, and naked, stern facts; but in another it is a world of glitters, sunbeams which you may chase but never catch; Will-o'-the-wisps, which you may follow only to be bogged up to the chin; make-believe diamonds which are only glass; glittering pinchbecks, which pretend to be, but are not gold.

Oh, the pinchbecks of the world, my spirit is weary of them! their glitterings are their only stock-in-trade, and a roaring trade they do.

Don't run away with the idea that you are a philosopher because you pick out the gloomy scenes of the world; and even, without the help of a pair of green spectacles, see the world a many-shadowed place. If you want to be a philosopher all round, you must go out into the world's sunshine, and look at its bright spots, and people, and things; you must have an ear for its fifes and fiddles and drums, as well as for the deep wailings of its orphaned and widowed homes—an eye for the dancings of the living, as well as for the stark cold outlayings of its dead.

Come away, then, into the glitters; they are dazzling and confusing, but we may be cool and steady, and see through them, nevertheless; paste set in pinchbeck, instead of diamonds set in gold, the world is full of it—"all's not gold that glitters."

And, first of all, what is "glitter?" It is the bright and outward show of things, that which is on the surface, what meets the eye, but what has not of necessity any relation of importance to what is immediately underneath. You may rub a piece of brass until it glitters like a piece of gold, or you may gild a piece of stick with so fine a wash of gold as to be valueless, and yet when burnished it may look as if it were all the real metal. The whole thing is surface—it catches the eye, but there its value ends.

Now it will never do, if we want to estimate the reality of things, to pooh-pooh this glitter, and say, "We see through the whole thing, there is no more to be said about it;" for that is not the truth—there is a great deal to be said about it. This glitter is one of the strongest motive-powers in the world; it leads people of all ranks and professions and degrees by the nose; and how little it is to be dismissed as of no importance one can see from the terrible fact that it is able to blind men's eyes, so as to prevent their having a clear view, or indeed any view, of heaven itself. Dazzled, confused, lost, may be said to be the history of many a soul.

Glitter has many advantages; it starts with sundry things in its favour. And one of these things is, "the present"—the little speck of time which is considered of such importance in our little speck of life, and by our little specks of selves.

It is nothing that the glitter can shine but for a few moments, that in the very nature of things it must soon go out; it glitters now, and that is enough. And then there is the general unthinking verdict in its favour. Everybody says it is bright and beautiful; everybody sets value upon it; everybody says the person is to be envied who has it. The glitter of the star upon the veteran's breast has its admirers, so also has the glitter of his patent boots; it is enough for many that the thing shines, entirely irrespective of what the thing is.

It is hard to go against public opinion; and the public have gone in for glitter; therefore glitter twinkles and radiates, and flickers and dazzles, and, generally speaking, has it all its own way.

Then glitter has this important advantage—men often want it; they gild and varnish and electro on purpose to get it. They don't care for anything solidly good underneath it; and they have what they want—only they have it, and nothing more.

Glitter, then, being a mighty power in the land, and therefore by all wise men to be recognised as such, it behoves us to see what kind of power it is, and also what it does. It creates false opinions; and from those false opinions all the mischief flows.

There is glitter in wealth. Display, out-doing others, exciting the admiration (and perhaps there's no objection to the least touch in life of the envy also) of one's neighbours—servants, carriages, entertainments, clothes, being talked about, are all so much of the glitter of wealth.

But power is in the eyes of many much more glittering than wealth. It seems such a solid, substantial thing.

And in truth power does glitter. It enables us to carry out schemes, and confer favours, and it secures homage; and it sets the man who has it up upon a hill, and he becomes a somebody—one of the great ones of the earth. But unless a man uses it for carrying out designs of the truest good—lives above its accidents, its accompaniments, its glitter—it, too, is glitter and no more.

Many a man in power has lived to rue the day he yielded to its fascinations; and, surrounded with thwarted schemes, ungrateful friends, and spiteful enemies, has lamented that he allowed himself to be deceived by what was but so much outward show.

So in love; how often are men taken by the merest glitter! A man wants a wife; he sees a pretty face, perhaps he hears a song sweetly sung; he is taken just by some accomplishment which lies on the surface of education; he falls in love, as we say, and nothing will persuade him but that he has, as they say in mining countries, "struck gold." Now surely he has found the great nugget itself; henceforth, whatever may betide him in the world, he must be accounted amongst the richest of men.

Now this gold nugget has to wear. It is not to be put under a glass case on the drawing-room table; and the wear and tear of daily life will soon reveal the make-believe beneath. No doubt there are many real nuggets—women, yes, even girls, who are true to the heart's core, and who will be as excellent and attractive in daily life as ever they were in the matter of mere appearance or accomplishment—but the "many" in the abstract are but "few" when speaking by comparison. Alas! life in all its grades, from the homes of peers down to those of peasants, is full of once-glittering things with the shine all gone, and disappointment and indifference left as the sad real underneath.

Thus, women have been deceived in men, and men in women; and there remains for only too many married folk, with the glitter all gone, nothing but a dull toleration of each other; the miserable feeling as they look at each other—I married a sham; I was dazzled by a glitter, and find that it is not gold.

Follow out worldly position, worldly admiration and applause, and all such things, and you will find the proverb only too true, that "all is not gold that glitters."

The fact is, this power of glitter produces little else than evil in whatever direction it works. From it comes neglect of the real, the solid, the abiding; from it comes disappointment, often at the end of life, when the temper is soured, when opportunities of repair are gone; when the sham which was underneath must prove a burden for the remainder of our days. Effort in the wrong direction springs from it; the greater the effort, the more lamentable and unsatisfactory the result; like the pursuit of the Will-o'-the-wisp, the more energy that is shown in it, the deeper a man becomes bogged.

And so we are taught what a precious thing it is to discern the solid, and to pursue it; not in all cases to walk by sight; to feel the weight of things, and be sure they are real gold.

And we are taught the value of measuring others by this standard. There is much which we may admire because of its brightness, its glitter; but when we come to the matter of serious personal dealing with it, that is another affair; then we must price things; we must estimate them as we would the no doubt dull-looking bars of metal in the vaults of the Bank of England, and not the gilded trifles we see in the shop-windows.

And as regards the other life, this proverb is tremendously, almost universally, true. The world is full of alluring glitters, dazzling the soul, filling it for a few moments with make-believes of happiness, and then leaving it to find out in the great hereafter of realities how easily it was befooled.

Whatever is the value of things here, they are but glitters as regards the great hereafter; and, taken with a show, men lose eternal life. If men put this question to themselves from time to time, Is this gold as regards eternity? they would escape many a snare which brings them sorrow, if not ruin itself.

In character, and religious profession, how many are there who are mere glitterers! they have a name to live whilst they are dead. They stand no tests; they will not depress the beam in any heavenly scale. The shine will pass muster here, but only the more surely to be proved worthless there, where all is seen in light.

No mere glitter can stand by-and-by; nor should we wish it so to do. Eternity to be happy must be real—Heaven, and the people and things in it.

May we be real in all things, pre-eminently in those of the soul; then, when the trial time comes, we shall shine with Heaven's own light. Then shall the righteous shine forth in the kingdom of their Father—"shine like the stars for ever and ever!"

CAGED.

PART I.

"DO, Lina, like a good girl, tell me where you found the goldfinches' nest!"

"Why do you want to know, Maurice?"

"Because there's a boy at our school would give anything for a young bird. He would train it to lift a bucket full of water—in a thimble you know—and do lots of other tricks."

"But I don't like to show you the nest if you're going to rob it. After all the poor mother's care and trouble it would be very cruel."

"You don't understand, Lina," replied her brother, impatiently; "I only want to take one young one out to give Jem for a pet."

"But the little bird would be much happier flying about in the air than shut up all its life in a small cage. You wouldn't like to be imprisoned yourself, Maurice."

"I must say, Lina, you're very ill-natured, and if I find the nest without your help, I'll take every young one in it!"

However, his sister would not tell him where the nest was, and Maurice went off to consult with his younger brother how they might discover the secret.

"I have a guess," said Edmund. "Lina goes nearly every evening up the river walk, and I heard her complain the other day that the little wooden bridge was greatly broken, and hard to cross. You may be sure the nest is on the island."

"More likely it is in the garden, for finches build in fruit-trees."

"Yes, and in shrubs too; there are plenty of places round the old hermitage."

"Well, if you think so, let us try; suppose we get up early to-morrow morning and search the island before school-hour; we can take our breakfast with us, so as not to bring the young birds home if we get them."

"Remember, Maurice, I must have one for a fellow I know, who would give a splendid knife, nearly new, for a pet goldfinch."

"Yes, yes, we'll divide fair when we see how many are in the nest; never fear, we'll easily dispose of them all; but if they're not fledged we'll have to wait a while."

According to this plan, the boys got up an hour earlier than usual the following morning, and, taking some bread in their pockets, left word they were gone for a walk and would not be back till after school.

"I say, Eddy, I don't like the look of the sky, the clouds are black and angry, and I never saw the river so high."

"That's because of all the rain for the last few weeks. I declare it's a regular flood; see how the current dashes on. I hope the old bridge is standing."

The stream ran for more than a mile through meadow and pasture land, until gradually widening into considerable breadth, a picturesque little island appeared in the centre, planted with a few shrubs and trees which, when in full leaf, concealed from view a half-ruined rustic hermitage, where Lina and her brothers spent many happy hours long ago, playing "hermit" turn about, and paying one another visits.

"It's all right!" shouted Maurice, when the boys arrived within sight of the island; "the bridge is still standing; let us cross!"

"It's tottery enough then," replied his brother, when they were half-way over; "it won't be able to stem the force of that torrent long."

"Never fear, it was there before we were born, and has stood many a flood since. Come on, 'twill do our time."

On reaching the island, the two boys were soon engaged in a careful search amongst the small shrubs for the goldfinch's nest; and so absorbed and interested were they in the occupation, that they neither heeded nor perceived the increased roar of the torrent, until some large drops of rain drew their attention to the state of the weather.

"I say, Maurice, if we don't look sharp we'll be soaked through, and have to sit in our wet clothes at school. Come into the hermitage till we see if there's any chance it would clear up."

"Stop, stop, Eddy; I have found the nest!"

"Really! and where?"

"In this thick branch of Tartarian honeysuckle; and there are four young birds just in right order for training!"

"Well, take it quick, and run for shelter, the rain's coming on awfully fast."

Ruthlessly Maurice tore the beautifully formed nest from the fork of a branch where it lay concealed by the light green leaves and clustering pink flowers of the Tartarian honeysuckle, and followed his brother to the ruined hermitage, without a thought of the grief he was causing the parent birds, or of the four bright little creatures he intended consigning to life-long solitude and captivity—creatures formed by their Divine Maker to "fly above the earth in the open firmament of heaven."

Edmund eagerly examined the prize. "We have them now!" he exclaimed, in spite of Lina's precautions. "Put the nest down, Maurice, near the door, where the little ones will have air and shelter. Listen how they're chirping; I'm sure it's with hunger. When the shower's over we'll go out and look for worms, 'tis such fun to see the bills gaping."

"Shower, indeed, Eddy! I tell you it won't be over to-day!"

Seating themselves on a broken bench, the boys gazed at the gloomy sky, and disputed about what they had better do, for school-hour was drawing near, when Maurice, raising his finger to impose silence, and pointing to the nest, exclaimed, under his breath, "I declare the mother-bird has found it out already, and here she comes with breakfast for the family!"

It was a great amusement to the boys to see the parents fly back and forward with food for their young ones, and drop it into each little gaping throat turn about; when, just as this entertainment was over, they were startled by a loud crash!

"What can it be?" whispered Eddy, turning quite pale.

"A tree blown down, I suppose," said Maurice.

"Oh no! there's not wind enough for that; let's go out and look what's the matter."

"But the young birds will escape, for I see they're able to climb the edge of the nest. Put your hat over them."

Eddy did so, and, hastily rolling his handkerchief round his head, rushed out after his brother, heedless of the rain, which, however, had considerably lightened. The same dreadful idea had occurred to them both, and making for the bridge their worst fears were confirmed, for the frail supports had been swept away by the furious torrent, and now, broken by the fall, it drifted rapidly down the stream!

The boys gazed at each other with a blank look of horror! "Oh, Eddy!" exclaimed Maurice, "this is a precious fix; a nice trap to be caught in!"

"Sure enough," replied his brother, as he watched the fragments of the old bridge floating down the current, "we're fairly caged now!"

(To be concluded.)

"THE QUIVER" BIBLE CLASS.

210. What people are stated to have been most clever in ancient times in "cutting down timber, &c.?"

211. What passage of Scripture was the Ethiopian eunuch reading when St. Philip joined him in his chariot?

212. Mention any prophecy of Elisha's which was delivered with an accompaniment of music.

213. Quote any passage which shows the prosperous condition of the people in the beginning of Solomon's reign.

214. What peculiarity of dress was much used by the Scribes in our Lord's time?

215. How many years was Solomon in building the Temple?

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS ON PAGE 512.

198. The mention of it by the man of God who came to Eli (1 Sam. ii. 27, 28).

199. Fifty thousand pieces of silver (Acts xix. 19).

200. Seven years and six months (2 Sam. ii. 11).

201. "Let all things be done decently and in order" (1 Cor. xiv. 40).

202. "From Dan even to Beersheba" (1 Sam. iii. 20).

203. The preaching of Christ crucified (1 Cor. i. 23).

204. He bade them teach the children of Judah the use of the bow (2 Sam. i. 18).

(Drawn by H. C. Selous.)

THE EVIL DREAM.

THE sewers were choked, on either hand the wall
Was green with damp, and clammy with the steam
Of exudation; where the stones might fall
No thrifty hands replace them, ev'ry beam
In every squalid house was black with rot,
And ev'ry door was open to the rain,
That fell not plenteously upon this spot,
But in unwholesome mist of scanty drain.

Ever about the place there hung a fume
  Of fearful palpability, the sense
Grew sick upon it, and the dreamer, whom Grief there had driven, sought to fly from thence,
But somewhat held him now to wander on Thro' lanes unholy, under arches vile,
With that green damp, that foully hung upon
  Stone, brickwork, wood, and shatter'd house-top tile.

But worse was there, for, as the dreamer dreamed,
  The habitants would sometimes pass him by,
Wretches that in their woeful aspect seemed Fit only for such place—the sunken eye,
The haggard gaze, and hunger-stricken cheeks,
  The form that sickness bowed, and ague cramped,
The sullen carelessness that would not speak,
  The brow that want and ignorance had stamped.

Huddled about the doorways women sat,
  Bereft of woman's softer gentler mien;
Love's light had faded from their eyes, and that Sweet nurturer, fair Hope, no more was seen
To dwell with them; the little children, pale
  With hunger and disease, were crouched around,
And infancy in long and mournful wail
  Made the place sadder with the doleful sound.

But suddenly came one who brightened all
  The dismal faces, and the women cease
Their harsh repining, little children crawl
  Forward to share his greeting, which is peace
And helpfulness combined; "God bless you, sir!"
  The mothers say, and then the squalid place
To give him joyful welcome is astir,
  As tho' he brought them riches in his face.

And I, the dreamer, knew him for their friend
  And mine; for when I heard his quiet voice
Tell me my evil dream was at an end,
  And when I heard them for a time rejoice,
When on their gloominess the sunshine fell,
  Shining more brightly for his presence there,
The dream was o'er, and broken was its spell,
  And I awoke to bless the morning air.

T. H. S.

THE BRIDGE BETWEEN.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE TROUBLES OF CHATTY AND MOLLY," "THE DINGY HOUSE AT KENSINGTON," "QUEEN MADGE," "AGAINST HERSELF," ETC., ETC., ETC.

CHAPTER XXIV.—"DOROTHY."

"WE might take a walk," George Blakesley said.

"No," she pleaded, humbly.

"Yes, come a little way," he said, and they passed the house, and went on under the dim trees. "I want to ask you something. Can't it really be this year, Dorothy?"

"No, no! oh no!"

"Why not?"

"I don't know; I can't tell you. Let me be free a little longer. And I must go in. Turn back, oh do turn back, George!"

She had hardly ever called him by his Christian name before, and he gave in to her immediately on hearing it. Yet when they reached the house he was still loth to enter.

"Will you come into the garden and talk there?" he asked.

"Yes, if you will let me go in and speak to them all first," she answered.

She wanted to see what they were doing.

"Then I will wait for you under the sycamore-tree;" and he passed through the house and out into the garden.

Dorothy opened the door of the sitting-room, and walked in. It was dark, and yet there was the sound of some one within.

"Netta," she said.

"It is I," said a voice, that, in her present mood made her almost shiver. "Come in, Dorothy." It was Mr. Fuller. "I am alone," he said. "Your father is in the study, and has called Netta to him for a minute or two, and your mother has a headache, and is lying down. Come in, child, and don't stand like a frightened ghost by the door!"

"It is so dark," she said; "and I am going into the garden; Mr. Blakesley is waiting for me."

"Never mind him," he answered, impatiently; "I want to know how you like your new relations?"

"Very much," she said, awkwardly, thinking how strange his manner was.

"Come in," he said again, impatiently; "do you think I am going to eat you? Or are you afraid Blakesley will if he catches you talking to me?"

"No," she answered; "I am not a bit afraid."

"Well then," he said; and going up to her, he took her hand, and drew her further into the room, till in the grey light he saw her pale face and flashing eyes. "Come and tell me how you got on with your new relations. You have quite forgotten me. I said Blakesley would cut me out, you know, dear."

"No, he never did, never!" she exclaimed. "You forgot me, and liked Netta better because she was beautiful and——"

"No," he said, "remember how I kept your rose."

"I don't care," she answered, proudly; "that was no sign you remembered me; perhaps you merely forgot to throw it away, and afterwards, you know, you liked Netta."

"How can you be so silly, child! I only wanted her to sit for me because she was pretty. You were always my friend. Don't you remember what chums we used to be, Dorothy? You were quite fond of me till the interloping Blakesley came and cut me out."

He had roused the fire sleeping in the girl's nature at last, and she turned round and faced him.

"I was very fond of you when I was a child!" she exclaimed. "You were very kind to me, and the dearest friend I ever had, and I shall never forget you as you were then." Her voice softened as she spoke of the old days; but she put her hand to her throat for a moment, as if to steady it, and then went on as hard as before. "But when you came back, though I was the same, you had changed. I had the old feeling still, and you pretended to be the same, though you were not. And then you told, or as good as told me, that I was in love with you, and you told Netta so as well, and tried plainly to make me understand that it was hopeless. I wonder you dared! If it had been true!"—she could not say that it had not been; but this he never guessed—"if it had been true you should have died rather than said so—it was mean and cowardly and contemptible!"

"Dorothy!"

"So it was. I have never forgiven you for it! I never shall! I shall never like you again as long as I live; I could not; and you have given me the bitterest remembrance of my life. It has spoilt my world too; for I used to think you such a hero, Mr. Fuller; and when I lost my faith in you I lost it in all others as well; you dragged down everybody in your fall."

"Why did you tell me this to-night? I have——"

"Why, because you dared to talk to me in a manner to which you had no right, forgetting that I am engaged too, and perhaps shall be married soon;" she felt cold at the very thought; "and that you are in love with my sister."

"No——"

"Yes you are, you are, and engaged too, I believe!"

"Dorothy, your sister will be married to Sir George Finch in less than a month, and is going out to India. She told me so to-night, and I am waiting here to say good-bye to her."

"Netta going to be married, and going to India!" exclaimed Dorothy, the meaning of his strange manner flashing on her now.

She stood dumb with surprise.

"Yes."

"But she doesn't care for him. Why, I heard——" she hesitated. She did not like to confess what she had overheard.

"He is rich," he said, scornfully; "and she cares for that." It was such a pained voice in which he spoke, though he tried to steady it; and the girl before him understood his feelings better than he imagined.

Things had been altogether rough on Adrian Fuller that evening.

"I am so sorry for you, Mr. Fuller," she said, simply.

"You need not be, child. I dare say it is much better. She will be here again directly, so say good-bye to me, Dorothy; you won't see me again for many a long day. I shall go abroad for a couple of months, or a couple of years, if I can get anything to do."

"Good-bye," she said, the old feeling rushing back for a minute; "I am sorry I told you what I did to-night; but I didn't know of this then."

"No, Dolly, of course not," he answered, using the old pet name, which only Tom gave her now, "I have been a great scoundrel to you. Perhaps we shan't see each other again; good-bye;" and he shook her hands, and then, unable to say more, Dorothy turned and went; but when she had got to the hall he spoke, and she stopped, and he came out. "I shall keep the rose," he whispered; "I shall keep it as long as I live, Dorothy."

And all this time George Blakesley was in the garden waiting for her.

CHAPTER XXV.—THE BEGINNING OF AN END.

"Dorothy," called Mr. Woodward, as she passed the study door, "I want you."

"Yes, papa; but Mr. Blakesley is waiting for me in the garden."

"Never mind, dear, I will not keep you a moment."

She entered, and found her father sitting before a pile of papers, and with a careworn look upon his face. Netta was there, and looked as if she had been crying; but after a minute she rose, and left the room.

"What is the matter?" she asked, a feeling of fear creeping over her.

"When are you going to be married, Dorothy dear?" he inquired, kindly.

He was a dear old man, and fond of his children, little as he troubled about them—fonder far than his wife was of them.

"Oh not yet, papa dear; let me stay at home a little longer!" She was quite distressed; everybody seemed conspiring to hurry her into the bonds of matrimony.

"I want you to let it be soon, my dear," he said, almost entreatingly. "Netta is going to be married to Sir George Finch next month, and I should like you to have Blakesley the same day, if possible." The tears came into her eyes, and rolled slowly down her cheeks. He looked at her in surprise; he, as is so often the case with fathers, knew nothing of the state of his daughter's heart. "What is the matter, dear?"

"I want to stay with you a little longer," she pleaded.

XUM

"No, dear, it is much better you should be married. The fact is, Dorothy, I fear things are going very badly with me; the paper is not doing at all well; nay, worse, I think, since it was altered and enlarged. I hoped we should make a fortune," he said, in a pained voice, that touched his daughter sorely; "and that I should be able to provide for your mother and all of you—I don't want to lose you—and instead of that I have ruined you all."

"But mamma's money?"

"All lost, I fear. Two thousand pounds go a very little way in a large speculation when everything goes out and nothing comes in, and we have had two actions for libel, and unless things take a great turn for the better a crash must come; and it would be a great relief to see you and your sister married."

"Not both of us," she said.

"Yes, Dorothy dear; for Netta is going to India, and seems terribly afraid lest Sir George should find out that we are likely to be poorer. But I think you would be different, and Blakesley is a good fellow, so that if the worst came about you could give Sally a home for a little while." She looked up at him in surprise. "Yes, dear," he said, in answer to her dumb inquiry, "we may have to leave here."

She stood still, staring blankly at him, then she thought of the garden and the underwood in the bygone summers, and she looked round at the cosy room, which Netta's influence had never altered or disturbed, and at her father—a kind, careless father, who had never said a cross word to his children in his life. How bitter it would be for him to go away from the dear old house, and to see his home broken up, she thought! She stooped, and put her arms round his neck, and kissed him.

"Very well, dear papa," she said, softly, and clung a little closer.

(To be continued.)

THE OCCUPATIONS OF HEAVEN.

BY THE REV. JAMES SPENCE, D.D., AUTHOR OF "HOURS WITH DANIEL," ETC.

"They serve Him day and night in His temple."—Rev. vii. 15.

OUR ideas of heaven, to be at all intelligible to us, must be taken from our views and experiences of this earth by way of resemblance, or comparison, or contrast. Every view or vision of it which we have in Scripture gives us the notion of a place or definite locality. "I go," said the Saviour to His disciples, "to prepare a place for you." It is an actual region, not a dream or a fiction, not a land of shadows or of echoes only, not a voiceless vacancy, but a "better country," a "city which hath foundations." Go forth in some starry night and look up into the heavens, and as you behold the stars in groups and constellations which bedeck the empyrean like distant lights hung out by God to illumine the abyss of darkness, you get some idea of the immensity of the universe. Somewhere in this immeasurable span is He who spoke to His friends on earth the words we have quoted, adding, "And if I go and prepare a place for you, I will come again and receive you unto myself, that where I am there ye may be also." Wherever Christ is, then, there His people will be. Astronomers begin to speak of some central globe, or system, some region in the bright effulgence of the milky way, which, perhaps, may be regarded as the imperial capital of the universe. But though science may not have discovered it, and though it may be vain for us feeble creatures to conjecture where, yet we are sure that heaven is a locality in the universe of God, and the faith which looks at things unseen can in a sense realise it from the descriptions given of it in Divine Revelation, and from the fact that THE MAN CHRIST JESUS is there. The thought that heaven, our future home, is a defined region in immensity is necessary to the satisfaction of our faith and the clearness of our hope. "The spirits of the just made perfect" are now also with Christ waiting for the redemption of the body. Just as truly as He was in a place when He tabernacled on earth, suffered, died, and rose again, so truly did He ascend to a place whence He will come again to receive His people unto Himself that they may be with Him for ever. Let it then be settled in our thoughts, for the encouragement of our faith, that the home of our future life will be a region worthy of our coming glory—worthy of Him who is gone to prepare the place for us—"New heavens and a new earth wherein dwelleth righteousness"—as definitely real and local as those which now are. This truth is manifestly involved in all the splendid imagery used by St. John in his descriptions of the "new Jerusalem," the "city of the living God," with its foundations and its gates, its walls and its streets, its river and its trees, when he records the visions of the Apocalypse. It will bear the same relation to our spiritual being and our perfected manhood as Jerusalem in Palestine or any other city, as a present home, bears to this earthly life.

Another thought demands our consideration and remembrance. The words of our Lord when He said, "In my Father's house are many mansions," suggest the idea of home, and home involves the further idea of society. The saints in heaven, therefore, will not be merely an aggregate mass of souls like a multitude of separate atoms. There will be order and organisation. It will be "the general assembly and Church of the first-born," with "an innumerable company of angels," a multitude of redeemed men "which no man can number, of all nations, and kindreds, and people, and tongues." Everywhere in Scripture the idea of numbers is associated with heaven. "The chariots of God are twenty thousand, even thousands of angels." The voice of the inhabitants of heaven is as "the voice of a great multitude, and as the voice of many waters, and as the voice of mighty thunderings." Thus we reach the idea of a vast family at home, angels and saints together, principalities, authorities, and powers, all in order, all perfectly happy, all in union and pervaded by love—for sin, the disturber of peace and the destroyer of harmony, has no place there—and all occupied. Occupied, but how? The question is interesting and not unimportant, though it would be easy in attempting to answer it to go beyond what is written. Let us try to avoid this mistake, while endeavouring to find some truths which shall help our thoughts and stimulate our hearts in relation to this inquiry.

We sometimes speak of time and eternity as if they were in absolute antagonism. In the abstract it cannot be so. Eternity is the endless duration of time; and in heaven, wherever it is, there must be a past, a present, and a future—the succession and duration of time. What then will be some of the occupations of the saints in glory? That they will be many and various I think cannot be doubted, but all suited to our redeemed nature and our renewed powers. God loves variety. This truth is most impressively taught and most beautifully illustrated on earth; and as the Divine Being is "without variableness or shadow of turning," His delight in variety will be continually manifest in the activities and occupations of heaven. True, toil for daily bread belongs only to this sin-stricken world, and all the handicrafts by which man gains a livelihood here will end with this life and this world; but occupations suited to our perfect tastes and emancipated powers in all their variety will employ our time in our Father's house above.

1. There will be intellectual occupations. We can be in no doubt that the Divine life in man, begun through regenerating grace in this world, will have its elements, activities, and pursuits continued hereafter. Here the Christian has to grow in knowledge and grace, pre-eminently in the knowledge which makes wise unto salvation—"the knowledge of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ." This intellectual and spiritual exercise will be continued in heaven. And what a field of intellectual and spiritual attainment and exercise is before us, in the personal glory and redemptive work of that Lord "in whom are hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge." The power of thought here is a marvellous thing; it is the men of thought who govern the affairs of the world and promote the advancement of mankind. So in heaven there will be the study of truth, glowing and growing spiritual research, progressive acquaintance with the attributes, the works, and the ways of God. We are assured that even now the angels are learning, that they "desire to look into" the things connected with the sufferings and glory of Christ (1 Peter i. 12), and that the principalities and powers in heaven know from the redeemed Church "the manifold wisdom of God." And if angels are so occupied, we may well believe that the saints will share in these exercises. Indeed, we know from the subject of converse between Moses and Elijah on the occasion of our Lord's transfiguration, that the spirits of the just made perfect find themes for meditation, research, and highest converse, in the wondrous ways and glorious workings of their King in Providence and Redemption. It must be so. The saints must learn, in varied degrees, with their varied powers; and the science of heaven, or rather we may say the sciences of heaven, will form fitting study and high occupation for beings redeemed from evil and freed for ever from all carnal tendency. Will there, for instance, be nothing equivalent to flowers in the Paradise of God? We know that there is the tree of life on either side of the river of the water of life, with its leaves and its twelve manner of fruits; and to contemplate the works of beauty, power, and wisdom in every department of the Creator's dominion will be the delight of all His children in their eternal home. We know that there is music there—"harpers harping with their harps," representing what we know as instrumental music here, and accompanying the choral swell of angelic and human voices which sing the new song as the voice of many waters, and in majestic roll, as the voice of mighty thunderings, saying, "Alleluia! for the Lord God Omnipotent reigneth." The exercise of memory there will be marvellous, as, without any fear to haunt us or any reminiscence to trouble us, we survey all the way our Father led us, and see the solution of difficulties, and the beauty, harmony, and mercy of Providences and experiences which were mysteries to us here. There we shall see, as it is impossible for us now to see, how in this life all things were arranged to work together for good to us; and the study of this will be an exhilarating exercise and a high delight. Nor can we conceive now what disclosures of truth will be made, what discoveries we shall reach, to what elevations of knowledge we shall soar; but that we shall be occupied in learning—when there will be so much to know about God, His ways, and His works—there can be no doubt. There will ever be depths in the Divine nature unfathomable by us, and heights of wisdom and power in the Divine works which will make us always learners; and the thought is an attractive one that in heaven, where we shall know as we are known, the pursuit of the knowledge of the things which our Father has made will be one of our high and holy occupations. And all such exercises will be blessed through perfect all-pervading love; for there knowledge will not exist as a separate or independent attainment, but vanish into devotion and life. Thus will love itself be strengthened and holiness confirmed; and every fresh discovery of the Divine perfections in the works of creation, the evolutions of Providence, or the grandeurs of Redemption, will fit us for higher attainment, and lead us to loftier adoration.

2. The occupations of heaven will be reverential, and largely take the character of worship. In a sense every act and every engagement will be worship; but much of the time in the heavenly life, if we may use the terms, will be spent in adoring homage. In the visions of the Apocalypse, which disclose to us so many aspects and exercises of the celestial state, how much is there of adoration and song and thanksgiving to God and to the Lamb. The praises of God are ever being celebrated in some way and form; the elders, representatives of the redeemed Church, cast their crowns before the throne, and ascribe glory to the Lord; saints and angels unite in the new song, and the choral swell of the holy universe in worship and adoration will be in majesty, "as the voice of many waters and as the voice of a great thunder." How blessed will it be to engage in that worship, to sing that song, to mingle our voices in that mighty concert which fills heaven with the harmonies of perfect praise!

3. The occupations of heaven will be also ministerial. There will be service—ministry of various kinds, adapted to the tastes and capacities of the redeemed. "One star differeth from another star in glory. So also is the resurrection of the dead." So also it must be in the future home of the blessed. Angel means messenger, and we are assured that often in the history of redemption have angels been sent on messages from heaven to man. We are informed that they are "ministering spirits sent forth to minister for them who shall be heirs of salvation." Nor are such services limited to the angels. Once and again in the Revelation St. John informs us that the messenger who told him the things which he was to write—"the true sayings of God"—said, when the apostle was about to worship him, "See thou do it not; I am thy fellow-servant and of thy brethren the prophets" (Rev. xix. 10; xxii. 9). Saints in glory, then, as well as angels, were employed in such service. And will it not be so hereafter? We cannot doubt it. The law of Christ's kingdom here on earth is, "To every man his work;" and this will be the law of His kingdom in heaven for ever. For high and holy service in Paradise, the activity as well as the suffering of the present life is intended as a preparation. Very different in some respects will our employments there be from what they are on earth. As flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of heaven, all material handicrafts will have for ever ceased; there will be no toil there for daily bread, and no wants to be provided for as here. But all moral and spiritual activities must be the same, only perfected in their exercise and changed at least in some of their objects.

Interesting thoughts are here suggested. The population of heaven, as far as human beings are concerned, will be immense—"a great multitude, which no man can number." And of this mighty throng a great proportion will necessarily be those who left this world in infancy and childhood. "Of such," said the Saviour, "is the kingdom of heaven;" "in heaven their angels do always behold the face of my Father which is in heaven." How delightful the occupation to teach and train these youthful human spirits! The duty of training them while they lived on earth devolved not on angels, but on men; and in heaven to the extent that they will require enlightenment and education, it is most consonant with all that we know of God's dealings to believe that they will be committed to others of their own race, of wider experience and higher attainment. What a vast difference must there be now in Paradise between the attainments of the apostle Paul, and, indeed, many of whom we have known in the Church on earth, and the young Christian only a few months "in Christ," who has just, through fatal illness, been removed to the home above? Can you conceive any occupation in heaven more attractive, happy, or delightful, than for the more experienced to instruct the young and less experienced in the ways of God, unfolding to them mysteries which have been solved to themselves, and leading them on and up to still higher attainments in the knowledge of truth by the ever-flowing waters of the river of life? Christ Jesus as a child here on earth, though perfect in His childhood, grew in wisdom and in stature, and was subject to His earthly parents, who instructed Him and brought Him up at Nazareth. So will childhood grow in heaven. There will be ever diversity there—a diversity which suggests a vast field of occupation and exercise, each one of the saints contributing in some way to the felicity and progress of all. The very idea of a home and a family in heaven in the Father's house with its many mansions indicates order, inter-dependence, and help. The stronger will aid the weaker, and those with higher attainments will instruct and teach those who have had fewer opportunities or have smaller powers; and the varying gifts of Nature, the diverse discipline of experience, and the distinctions of grace, will fit all the saints for different and delightful employment.

Further: the visions of the Apocalypse in their revelations of battle and conflict between the hierarchies of heaven and the powers of principalities of darkness, seem very much to show that we belong to a militant universe. "And there was war in heaven: Michael and his angels fought against the dragon; and the dragon fought and his angels, and prevailed not" (Rev. xii. 7). And whatever may be thought as to the exact meaning of the vision of the Rider on the White Horse, clothed with His vesture dipped in blood, and His name written on His vesture and on His thigh, KING OF KINGS AND LORD OF LORDS, with the armies in heaven following Him (Rev. xix. 11, 16), there cannot be a doubt that Christ Jesus is this Leader, Captain, and King; and in the armies which follow Him are numbered saints who have been good soldiers of His cross on earth. They are co-workers with God, engaged with Christ in the conquest of evil. And even after its final subjugation in our own world, there may be other worlds to be conquered, and the redeemed, who have themselves triumphed through grace, may be engaged among the hosts of the Lord and on His side. In the very last visions of our future home and of heaven given us in the Bible, we read of the gates of the celestial city being left open, not that the redeemed may go out, for they go no more out; but it may be that other fallen or wandering races of created beings may come in. Also we read that the tree of life in the celestial city flourishes, and that its leaves are "for the healing of the nations," as if healing there had to be, and would be, extended to other populations of the universe. Wonderful, diversified, and glorious then will be the occupations of the saints of God after they have entered their heavenly home; in the presence of their Lord fashioned like unto Him, and co-workers with Him, world without end!

STILL AND DEEP.

BY F. M. F. SKENE, AUTHOR OF "TRIED," "ONE LIFE ONLY," ETC.

CHAPTER XXV.

BERTRAND LISLE had not, of course, the smallest suspicion that any conversation had taken place between Laura Wyndham and Mary respecting himself; nor could he ever have conceived it possible that revelations of so terrible a description could have been made to the adopted daughter of his father, especially in such cruelly-distorted shapes. He could not therefore in the least account for the peculiar impression made upon him by Mary Trevelyan's appearance, when he saw her for the first time on the following morning. It was in the breakfast-room, where all the rest of the family were assembled, that they met, and there was nothing in Mary's manner, or in the few words with which she answered those who spoke to her, that was at all different from her usual gentle stillness; and yet it was with a strange shivering sense of pain that Bertrand gazed at her, for it seemed to him precisely as though he were looking on the face of one newly dead. Dead, surely, in some sense, she was to him. The heart, the soul, where, once at least, he felt that he had reigned supreme, were now, he was conscious, wholly locked away from him, as if the grave itself had consummated their separation. What it was, so like to death, that had passed over her, he could not tell; but, as his glance rested on the set immovable expression of her face, and noted how the dark eyes, that ever had turned to him with such soft tenderness, were now fixed and solemn under the shadow of some heavy thought which held her wholly in possession, he felt, with a conviction none the less sure that it was indefinite, that for him at least Mary Trevelyan lived no longer. He had scarce time, however, to dwell on the impression thus unaccountably made upon him, before the Lorelei flashed into the room, all brightness and joy; and, as his eyes turned with delight to her radiant face, the quiet figure of Mary Trevelyan seemed to fade away from his thoughts as completely as he felt she had even now passed out of his life.

It was a lovely summer morning, and as they all passed into the hall when breakfast was over, they saw through the open door the sunlight streaming on the green lawn and waving trees, seeming to invite them into the sweet fresh air; but it was with no small astonishment, in the case of all save Lurline, that Mary Trevelyan was seen to pass, with her noiseless step, through the little group, till she found herself face to face with Bertrand; and then she said, in tones which were perfectly distinct, though soft and low,

"Bertrand, will you come and walk with me in the garden for a little time? I wish to have your advice on some arrangements I propose to make."

XUM

Such a request from the silent retiring Mary seemed very strange, for she had never sought Bertrand in any way since he had been at Chiverley; but he could only agree at once, with ready courtesy, to her request; while the others went their ways in different directions. Laura, so far from manœuvring, as she generally did, to prevent Mary and Bertrand from being alone together, now did her best to facilitate their interview. Only, with the subtle instinct of that artfulness which was her fatal gift, she turned to John Pemberton, and whispered, "Dear old John, it is a long time since you have had any music; shall I sing to you this morning, while those two are out?"

With trembling delighted eagerness he implored her to do so, for she had greatly neglected him of late; but, deceived and betrayed as he was, Pemberton never dreamt that her object was simply, by this expedient, to maintain her influence over Mr. Lisle throughout his interview with Mary. And so it was, that during all the time that Bertrand spent with Mary Trevelyan, in the very crisis of her fate, the Lorelei's voice of haunting sweetness rose and fell upon the summer air, wafted to him through the open window of the music-room, and beguiling him ever with the memory of her loveliness and genius, even while the noble heart of the gentle girl who walked by his side, was almost breaking in the anguish of uttering words that were to part them for ever.

As Bertrand and his companion walked down the steps from the hall-door, to go out into the garden, Mary Trevelyan raised her eyes to the heavens with one long earnest appealing gaze, while she asked, with her whole heart, for strength to accomplish the dread task that lay before her. She had laboured all night long, after Laura's visit, to steel herself for its performance with a composure which should prevent Bertrand from feeling one shadow of remorse or pain, in seeing himself freed from her wholly and for ever. And she knew that not only must she have courage to go bravely and calmly through their final interview, but she must brace herself for days, and perhaps even weeks, of endurance, while she would have to stand by and see his happiness with Lurline; for, much as she longed to escape even then from Chiverley, she knew that her flight at such a moment could not fail to reveal to him and to all that very truth, as to her own feelings, which she most wished to conceal.

But who has ever cast so much as one feeble glance to the Father's throne in vain? The eyes which Mary Trevelyan raised to heaven grew bright and calm, and the strength and peace of pure self-sacrifice filled all her heart, when she found herself at last alone with Bertrand Lisle in a retired part of the garden, while the sweet voice of the Lorelei floated round them in soft entrancing strains.

"Bertrand," said Mary, "I have asked to speak to you because, as you are soon going to leave us, I wish to have your approval of the plans I have made for myself when I shall leave Chiverley. I know," she continued, quickly, as she saw that he was about to speak, "that your dear father, in his care for me, made you in some sense responsible for my welfare; but, whatever schemes he may himself have formed for my future, his one wish certainly was that I should do that which most commended itself to my own inclination and feelings—is it not so?" And she lifted her eyes calmly to Bertrand's.

"Doubtless it is," he answered, hesitatingly; "but Mary, he very much wished you to have a safe and happy home."

"I know he did," said Mary, "and that is just what I have provided for myself, in the way that suits me best. I have a great desire to try and be of some use in relieving however small a proportion of the suffering which is so rife in this sad world, and I have found a post where, I think, I could carry out this wish effectually; it is in a hospital for sick pauper children, where the managers are in want of help, and they would no doubt be willing to accept mine."

"But, Mary, is this really the life you would prefer to any other?" said Bertrand, uneasily; "it would be arduous work, and you would be alone, away from all your friends."

"I have not many friends, as you know, Bertrand," she answered, with a sad smile.

"You have me," he said, in a low tone, and for a moment the ring of tenderness in his voice almost overthrew her composure; but at that instant Lurline's soft singing came more distinctly to his ears in the silence, and Mary saw his eyes light up, and his lips part in a fond smile, as he turned his head to listen.

When Mary's answer came, it was perfectly calm. "Yes, dear Bertrand, I have you as a friend, and as such I am sure I shall have you always; and I hope, when I am at the hospital, that I shall hear from you, sometimes, that you are very happy, for you know well that your happiness is very dear to me; and therefore you will forgive me if I speak of that which concerns your future, as well as my own."

She paused for a moment, breathing hard, and gathering up all her courage; then she turned, put her hand into his, and, looking up to him with a faint sweet smile, she said, softly, "Bertrand, my first and dearest friend, I hope and pray that you may have with Laura Wyndham every joy this mortal life can give you!"

"Oh, Mary!" he exclaimed, grasping her hand forcibly; "who has told you this? what is it you know?"

"I know that you love the beautiful Lurline, and that she returns your affection to the fullest extent," she said, still smiling. "As there is nothing to prevent your marriage, I trust it will soon take place, and that you will find in it all the happiness even I could wish you."

(Drawn by WILLIAM SMALL.)

"She put her little hands against his breast, and pushed him back."—p. 555.

"Listen, Mary!" he exclaimed, vehemently; "I do not deny that I love her, but it has been—strange as it seems to say so—almost against my will. She has dazzled and bewitched me, and taken me captive irresistibly. But, believe me, I came here with very different thoughts and wishes. Mary! indeed I was sincere when I spoke to you at my father's grave, and still even now——"

He stopped abruptly. Lurline's lovely voice still softly singing was thrilling through his heart. He could not say that he had any wish but to make her his wife as speedily as might be. Mary understood him; but her earnest prayer had earned for her great grace, and she was able to answer very gently, "Dear Bertrand, I ask this one favour of you—that you will wholly forget the past, except as regards our childhood's friendship, which I hope may continue between us to the end. A new life is opening out before us both; give me your good wishes, as I have given you mine. I trust your married life may be most brilliant and most happy; and I pray that my own in loneliness may be blameless and peaceful."

"Yours will have the blessing of the great God upon it!" he burst out, passionately; "I think you are an angel, Mary, and it will be well for me and Laura if you give us your prayers out of the holy home where you will spend yourself for others."

"That you may be very sure you will have, ever and ever while I live," she answered, with a bright sweet look, which glorified all her face. "And now, dear Bertrand, that all is settled, you must go to Lurline, and set her heart at rest. Some other time I will tell you all the details of my future work."

And gently bending her head, while in her heart she gave him a last farewell as her one love, her Bertrand, who should have been her own, she passed away from him with her soft tread and her graceful movements, and soon had vanished from his sight among the trees.

Bertrand watched her till the last fold of her dark robes had disappeared with a sense of aching regret in his heart, even amid all the joyful exultation with which he felt that Laura was now his own. He strove to stifle the mingled remorse and tenderness which Mary had roused in him by resolving to force upon her half his fortune, which yet he knew well she would never consent to touch, and an expression of uneasiness and gloom was still upon his face, when there was a rush of light feet down the gravel path, two little white hands seized his half-frantically, and the beautiful bright eyes of Lurline plunged their gaze into his own, while her sweet voice rung out in beseeching tones, "Oh, my Bertrand! Tell me: is all well? Have you discovered that she does not love you? and are you free to make me all your own?"

"Yes, darling Lorelei!" he exclaimed, forgetting all but that he saw her lovely face before him. "All is settled, and you are my own now—wholly and for ever. Soon, very soon, you shall be my precious wife."

Then Laura breathed a long sigh of relief, and let her head fall down upon his hands—her end was gained, and all her long toil was over.

CHAPTER XXVI.

As Mary walked away through the garden (after the conversation with Bertrand), so gay in its summer brightness, it seemed to her as though a darkness that could be felt had fallen over all the world. She raised her eyes in meek serenity to the cloudless sky, and murmured, "Yes, the sunshine has all died out from earth, but the love of God shines ever bright in heaven!" And thither, thenceforward, she resolved to turn her heart and soul, striving to serve her dear Redeemer in His suffering children on the earth, and looking on through the long, dim, cheerless life, and the shades of death, to the day when she should pass the last deep waters, and find Him waiting her upon that other shore.

When the family came out on the lawn, after dinner that day, Mr. Wyndham, drawing Laura forward, placed her hand in that of Bertrand, who had formally asked his consent to the marriage, while Mary stood a little apart in the shade, and looked with a gentle sweetness at the brilliant Lorelei, whose rapturous smiles and joy-lit eyes gave added radiance to her beauty, and absorbed Bertrand's attention so exclusively, that he never even noticed the quiet figure in her dark robes with the shadows from the trees beneath which she stood falling all around her. Lurline saw her, however, and exulted in the thought of the prize she had won from her, to the full satisfaction of her highest ambition. Strange would it have been if, in that moment, she could have been given a glimpse of an hour that lay yet far in the dim vista of the future, when she herself, so bright, so brilliant now, would cling, heart-broken and penitent, to her over whom she had triumphed, and find in her pure teaching of a higher wisdom than the subtle Lorelei had ever known the only consolation of the life her own selfishness had poisoned and destroyed. Neither of them dreamt of such a possibility at this time; but it may be that even now it was Mary Trevelyan who was most to be envied, for there was in her quiet spirit a depth of peace full of a sweetness Laura's exulting joy could never know.

It was far otherwise, however, in the case of one who was much more truly Lurline's victim than high-toned Mary Trevelyan. John Pemberton, standing also a little apart, looked on at the scene of betrothal with a bewildered expression, half of terror, half of anger, which, however, was directed rather against what he held to be Bertrand's senseless presumption, than to any idea that there could be faithlessness towards himself on Laura's part. The poor honest fellow's implicit trust in this artful woman was very touching; he believed her to be simply incapable of falseness or wrong-doing of any kind; and he kept saying to himself, with pain and astonishment, as he saw Bertrand assuming the manner of a successful lover, "Why does not my Lurline tell him that she is mine; that we shall be married if ever it is possible; and if not, we shall still belong wholly to one another?"

After a time Mr. and Mrs. Wyndham sauntered away, Mary having already disappeared; and when John Pemberton saw Bertrand drawing Laura closer to him, as one having an exclusive right to her, a hot indignation took possession of him, which he could not repress, and he took two or three hasty strides forward, intending to call Mr. Lisle to account for his unjustifiable boldness. But Lurline saw his movement, and understood it. An explanation between Bertrand and John was the very last thing she desired; so she broke suddenly away from her future husband, and running with her light steps up to Pemberton, she put her little hands against his breast, and pushed him back, saying, "Dear old John, don't be foolish! I will explain everything to you. Go quietly away now, and you shall hear from me to-night."

"But, my own Laura, I cannot leave you with that insolent man! By what right does he——"

"Hush, hush!" she interrupted; "you do not know what you are saying; wait till you understand it all. Dear John, you do not want to make me unhappy, do you? and you will, if you stay here now; go in the house now, and I will see you again."

"Make you unhappy! Oh, Lurline, I would rather die!"

"That is right; then leave me now altogether, and trust me to make everything plain to you."

His faith and loyalty towards her were so entire that he obeyed at once. He pressed her hand tenderly, turned, and walked into the house; while Laura flew back to Bertrand, as if she were a bird released.

"That poor old fellow," she said, laughing like a happy guileless child, "I shall have to train him into better habits—he is so used to being always with me."

Bertrand had witnessed her short interview with Pemberton in no very serene mood, and he now said, frowning darkly, "Laura, tell me the truth, have you ever given that young man reason to think you would marry him?"

"Marry my adopted brother! how is it possible, Bertrand? It is unkind of you to say that," she added with a charming look of pretty vexation; "if you loved me as well as I love you, I do not suppose you would fancy I could ever have seriously thought of any one but yourself."

Of course this amply satisfied Bertrand, and the two walked away together into the garden to enjoy their first hour of freedom since their formal engagement.

That night, when John Pemberton went to his room, he saw a letter in Laura's bold characteristic handwriting on his table. He looked at it with a strange feeling of dread before he touched it. The Lorelei was not a person who committed herself to paper, and it was almost the first time she had ever written to him. He carried a lighted candle in his hand, but the window was wide open, and the moonlight streamed in upon him as he set it down and took up the ominous missive. He opened it at last, and stood reading it, while the pure silvery light from without struggled with the red glare of the flame within the room. Lurline began with many expressions of endearment to her beloved adopted brother. She liked to think, she wrote, how certain it was that their sweet fraternal affection would never diminish or fail—how entirely they were one in thought and feeling—how sure she was now, and always, of his sympathy and approval in all that she thought and did. She was delighted, therefore, to feel at the present moment quite secure of his willing agreement in what she proposed to do. She knew how earnestly he desired her happiness, and since it was but too plain that they could never be united, as dear John had wished, she well understood that he desired nothing so much as to see her safe in the love and protection of some good man, and this conviction on her part of John's wishes, coupled with the fact that it would be wrong needlessly to break a heart that was devoted to her, had decided her to become the wife of Bertrand Lisle; but she need hardly tell her beloved John that she had only given her consent on the condition that she was allowed by her husband to continue all her affectionate intimacy with her adopted brother, and thus there would be no difference whatever in their happy relations together; this being the case she was sure that dear John would not distress her by manifesting the smallest dislike to her change of position, and she relied on his delicacy of feeling to meet her future husband next day with all the cordiality of feeling which Mr. Lisle was ready to bestow on him. Then she concluded by saying that she was ever and ever his most loving sister, Lurline—all the adjectives in the last sentence being strongly underlined.

Twice John Pemberton read this cruel and heartless letter slowly through to the very end, then he let it fall from his grasp to the floor, and, sitting down on the side of his bed, he buried his face, white and cold as with the chill of death, within his trembling hands. He felt that he must think this matter out, till he had arrived at a complete comprehension of what the words written on that paper meant for Laura and for himself in connection with all his existence, both here in this mortal world and in that which was to come. There was no question of the actual sense of the carefully-chosen language which announced that Laura Wyndham had engaged herself to marry Bertrand Lisle, but he had to ascertain whether the inner meaning, lying hid beneath all the subtle sentences, was simply this, that Lurline—his almost worshipped Lurline—his ideal of perfection, was false to the very heart's core, had been false from the first, and that to a designing unscrupulous woman, clothed in a form of wondrous beauty, he himself had delivered up all that had been life to his heart and soul before. Could it be possible? he asked himself, as he sat there trembling from head to foot; for an earthquake upheaving all the earth around him, and flinging the house down in ruins about his head, could not have given him a greater shock than the sudden revelation of the terrible delusion—terrible indeed in its consequences to him—under which he had been living. It had come upon him like a thunderbolt, for his simple loyal nature always led him to have entire faith in the goodness of others till a contrary opinion was absolutely forced on him, and Laura, in particular, he had set on a pinnacle of virtue where he scarce thought even the ordinary weaknesses of human nature could have any place in her soul.

This for Laura Wyndham, well named after the beguiling syren of the legend, but what of John Pemberton—John Pemberton, once dedicated to the ministry of Christ?—once, with the pure enthusiasm of a true devotion, anxious to offer up his whole life and strength and power in willing sacrifice to bring the light and knowledge of his Master's name to those who sat in darkness, and who had cast away all the noble purpose of his highest love to spend year after year in demoralising worship at that false woman's feet—what of him?

(To be continued.)

"ABOUT MY FATHER'S BUSINESS."

BY THOMAS ARCHER.

WITH THE POOR AND NEEDY (continued).

STILL threading our way through those dim alleys, where each one looks like a cul-de-sac but yet may be the devious entrance to another more foul and forbidding, we leave the "Hope for All" Mission Room resounding with infant voices, all murmuring the simple lessons of the day. That room is seldom empty, for there is also an evening school where a large class of older pupils are taught reading, writing, and arithmetic; there is also an adult class, and a "mothers' meeting," to which poor women are invited that they may be taught to make clothing for themselves and their children from materials furnished for them at wholesale prices in such quantities as their poor savings can purchase. The visiting "Bible woman" is the chief agent in these works of mercy, since she brings parents and children to the school, and reports cases of severe distress to be relieved when there are funds for the purpose. Not only by teaching and sewing, however, are the hopeful influences of the place supported, for in this big room the people of the district are invited to assemble to listen to lectures, readings, and music, to see dissolving views; and in the summer, when fields are in their beauty and the hedgerows are full of glory, there is an excursion into the country for the poor little pallid children, while, strangest sight of all, a real "flower show" is, or was, held in Chequer Alley. One could almost pity the flowers, if we had any pity to spare from the stunted buds and blossoms of humanity who grow pale and sicken and so often die in this foul neighbourhood.

But we have strange sights yet to see, so let us continue our excursion in and out and round and round, not without some feeling of giddiness and sickness of heart, through the "Pigeons"—a tavern, the passage of which is itself a connecting link between two suspicious-looking courts—round by beershops all blank and beetling, and silent; past low-browed doorways and dim-curtained windows of tramps' kitchens, and the abodes of more poverty, misery, and it may be crime, than you will find within a similar space in any neighbourhood in London, or out of it, except perhaps in about five streets "down East," or in certain dens of Liverpool and Manchester.

One moment. You see where a great sudden gap appears to have been made on one side of Golden Lane. That gap represents houses pulled down to erect great blocks of building for warehouses or factories, and it also represents the space in which above 4,000 people lived when the population of this square quarter of a mile of poverty and dirt was 22,000 souls. This will give you some idea of the consequences of making what are called "clean sweeps," by demolishing whole neighbourhoods before other dwellings are provided for the evicted tenants. One result of this method of improving the dwellings of the poor is that the people crowd closer, either in their own or in some adjacent neighbourhood, where rents are low and landlords are not particular how many inmates lodge in a single room. Remember that whole families can only earn just enough to keep them from starving, and cannot afford to pay more than half-a-crown or three-and-sixpence a week for rent. They must live near their work, or they lose time, and time means pence, and pence represent the difference between eating and fasting.

"The model lodging-house!" See, there is one, and it is nearly empty. How should it be otherwise? The proprietors of such places, whether they be philanthropists or speculators—and they are not likely to be the latter—can never see a return of any profitable per-centage on their outlay while they enforce necessary sanitary laws. The top rooms are half-a-crown a week each, and the lower "sets" range from about six shillings for two to eight-and-sixpence for three rooms. The consequence is that the few tenants in this particular building are frequently changing their quarters. Some of them try it, and fall into arrear, and are ejected, or want to introduce whole families into a single room, as they do in these surrounding courts and alleys, and this, of course, is not permitted. Imagine one vast building crowded at the same rate as some of these two-storied houses are! Ask the missionary, whose duty takes her up scores of creaking staircases to places where eight or ten human beings eat, drink, sleep, and even work, in one small room—where father, mother, children, and sometimes also a brother or sister-in-law, herd together, that they may live on the common earnings; places where children are born, and men, women, and children die; and the new-born babe must be clothed by the aid of the "maternity box," and the dead must be buried by the help of money advanced to pay for the plainest decent funeral.

I do not purpose to take you to any of these sights. You could do little good unless you became familiar with them, and entered into the work of visitation. Even in the published reports of the organisation to which we are now going the "cases" are not dwelt upon, only one or two are given from the experiences of the missionary, and she speaks of them simply as examples of the kind of destitution which characterises a district where deplorable poverty is the result sometimes of drink, or what, for want of a word applicable to the saving of pence, is termed improvidence; but frequent also because of sickness, and the want even of poorly-paid employment. "In such cases," says the report, "almost everything is parted with to procure food and shelter outside the workhouse."

One of the two "ordinary" cases referred to was that of a poor woman who was "found lying on a sack of shavings on the floor, with an infant two days old; also a child lying dead from fever, and two other children crying for food. None had more than a solitary garment on. The smell of the room was such that the missionary was quite overcome until she had opened the window. Clean linen was obtained, and their temporal and spiritual wants at once looked after." This was in the Report to the autumn of 1873; but cases only just less distressing occur daily still. This foul and neglected district, which lies like a great ulcer upon the great opulent city, the centre of civilisation and benevolence, seems to be as far from us as though it were a part of some savage or semi-heathen land under British influence. Indeed, in the latter case, there would be a probability of more earnest effort on behalf of the benighted people, on whose behalf meetings would perhaps be held, and a committee of inquiry and distribution appointed. Still, let us be thankful that something is done. Twenty-nine poor mothers have had the benefit of the maternity fund and clothing, the Report tells us. "They are very grateful for this assistance in their terrible need. Frequently the distress is so great that two changes of clothing are given to mother and babe, or they would be almost entirely denuded when the time arrived for returning the boxes. Our lady-subscribers at a distance may be glad to know that blankets, sheets, flannel petticoats, warm shawls, and babies' clothing will always be acceptable." Thus writes Mrs. Orsman on the subject, for the mission is known as the Golden Lane Mission, and more popularly as "Mr. Orsman's Mission to the Costermongers." Perhaps these words scarcely denote the scope of the work; but costermongers must be taken as a representative term in a district where, in an area of a square quarter of a mile, there are, or recently were, eighty public-houses and beershops, and a dense mass of inhabitants, including street-traders or hucksters, labourers, charwomen, road-sweepers, drovers, French-polishers, artificial-flower-makers, toy-makers, with what is now a compact and really representative body of costermongers, working earnestly enough to keep to the right way, and, as they always did, forming a somewhat distinctive part of the population.

Fourteen years ago Mr. Orsman began the work of endeavouring to carry the Gospel to the rough-and-ready savages of this benighted field for missionary enterprise. He held an official appointment, and this was his business "after office hours." About the results of his own labour he and his Reports are modestly reticent, but at all events it began to bear fruit. Others joined in it; a regular mission was established, and, with vigorous growth, shot out several branches, so wisely uniting what may be called the secular or temporal interest with the spiritual and religious, that the Bread of Life was not altogether separated from that need for the bread which perishes. These branches are full of sap to-day, and one of them is also full of promising buds and blossoms, if we are to judge of the rows of ragged—but not unhappy—urchins who fill this large room or hall of the Mission-house.

It is only the first-floor of two ordinary houses knocked into one, but a great work is going on. The parochial school was once held here, and now the room is full of children who might still be untaught but for the effort which made the Ragged School a first consideration in an endeavour to redeem the whole social life of the district. Wisely enough, the School Board accepts the aid which this free day-school for ragged and nearly destitute children affords to a class which the Education Act has not yet taught us how to teach.

In four years, out of ninety-five boys and girls who entered situations from this school only one was dismissed for dishonesty, and it was afterwards found that he was the dupe of the foreman of the place at which he worked.

Well may Mr. Harwood, the school superintendent, be glad in the work that he has learnt to love in spite of all the sordid surroundings. There is life in the midst of these dim courts—a ragged-school and a church, which is poor, but not strictly speaking ragged. In fact, "the patching class" for ragged boys, which meets on Thursdays, from five to seven in the afternoon, remedies even the tattered garments of the poor little fellows, who, having only one suit, must take off their habiliments in order to mend them. Occasional gifts of second-hand clothes are amongst the most useful stock of the schoolmaster, as anybody may believe who sees the long rows of poor little fellows, like our juvenile guide, with two odd boots, which are mere flaps of leather, and attire which it would be exaggeration to call a jacket and trousers.

The school-room is also the church and the lecture-hall. It will hold 300 people; and the Sunday-evening congregation fills it thoroughly, while, on week-nights, special services, and frequently lectures, dissolving views, and attractive social gatherings, bring the costers and their friends in great force.

The chief of the costermongers is the Earl of Shaftesbury; and here, standing as it were at livery in a quiet corner of a shanty close to the coal-shed, is the earl's barrow, emblazoned with his crest. This remarkable vehicle, and a donkey complimentarily named the "Earl," which took a prize at a Golden Lane donkey show, designate his lordship as president of the "Barrow Club," a flourishing institution, designed to supersede the usurious barrow-lenders, who once let out these necessary adjuncts to the costermongering business at a tremendous hire. Now the proprietors of the barrows, going on the hire and ultimate purchase-system, are prospering greatly. There are free evening classes, mothers' meetings, a free lending library, a free singing class, a penny savings bank, dinners to destitute children, numbering more than 10,000 a year, a soup-kitchen, tea-meetings, and other agencies, all of which are kept going morning, noon, and night, within the narrow limits of these two houses made into one. It is here too that the annual meeting is held, an account of which every year filters through the newspapers to the outer world—"The Costermongers' Annual Tea-Party." The records of this united and earnest assembly have been so recently given to the public, that I need not repeat them to you as we stand here in the lower rooms, whence the big cakes, the basins of tea, the huge sandwiches of bread and beef, were conveyed to the 200 guests. But as we depart, after shaking Mr. Harwood by the hand, let me remind you that it has been by the hearty human living influence of religion that these results have been effected. The stones of scientific or secular controversy have not been offered instead of food spiritual and temporal. The mission-hall has been made the centre; and from it has spread various healing, purifying, ameliorating influences. From this we may well take a lesson for the benefit of another organised effort which appeals to us for help—that of the London City Mission. This institution is trying to effect for various districts and several classes of the poor and ignorant in and about London that introduction of religious teaching which Mr. Orsman began with amongst the costermongers and others in the benighted locality where now a clear light has begun to shine.

At a recent meeting of the promoters of the City Mission work, held at the Mansion House, it was stated that the 427 missionaries then employed by the society were chosen without distinction, except that of fitness for the office, from Churchmen, Presbyterians, Congregationalists, Wesleyans, and Baptists, while the examining and appointing committee were composed of thirteen clergymen of the Established Church and thirteen Dissenting ministers.

Anybody who is accustomed to visit the worst neighbourhoods of London will know that these missionaries go where the regular clergy cannot easily penetrate, and where even the parish doctor seldom lingers. Every missionary visits once a month about 500 families, or 2,000 persons. They read the Scriptures, exhort their listeners, hold prayer and Bible meetings, distribute copies of the Scriptures, see that children go to school, address the poor in rooms when they cannot persuade them to go to church, visit and pray with the dying, lend books, hold open-air services, endeavour to reclaim drunkards (1,546 were so restored during the last year), admonish and frequently reclaim the vicious, raise the fallen, and place them in asylums or induce them to return to their homes, and work constantly for the great harvest of God to which they are appointed.

Then there are special missionaries appointed to visit bakers, cabmen, drovers, omnibus men, soldiers, sailors, and foreigners of various countries. They also go to tanneries, the docks, workhouses, hospitals, and other places; and there is a vast harvest yet without a sickle to reap even a single sheaf. When will the time come that, to the means for carrying the sustaining comfort of the Word to men's souls, will be added some means of helping them to realise it by such temporal aid as will raise them from the want which paralyses and the degradation which benumbs?

CAGED.

PART II.

AFTER the brothers had seen the last of the old bridge, as it floated down the stream, they walked slowly and silently round the little island; not, indeed, with the expectation of finding a way of escape—knowing already only too well there was no possibility of crossing any part of the river, even when less swollen than at present—but in the forlorn hope of seeing some one on the opposite bank who might help them out of their dilemma.

Alas! there was no house near, and few people passed along that lonely path.

"This is an awful fix!" said Maurice, after they had made a tour of their prison.

"We shall be late for school, that's certain!" replied Eddy.

"School, indeed! I tell you we're lucky fellows if we ever get off this weary place. Why, days—aye, weeks—often pass without any one going through these fields!"

"Farmer Brown will take a look at his meadow before long, you may be sure."

"No, no, Eddy; 'tis not near fit for cutting; by the time it is mown our bones will be bleaching here in the sun!"

Edmund shuddered at this terrible suggestion; then exclaimed, with a smile of hope, "You forget, Maurice, that Lina comes every evening to look at her bird's-nest."

Oh, don't talk of that wretched nest; it got us into all this trouble!"

"I'm afraid it was our own fault; and you see, we have been caged in place of the birds."

For several hours the boys wandered round the island, stopping occasionally to gaze at the opposite bank and strain their eyes over the distant fields; but all was silent and desolate. At length another heavy fall of rain drove them back to the hermitage for shelter.

"Look at the old finch perched on my hat," said Eddy. "Oh, she's flown away! I suppose she wants to feed the little ones again; I may as well let her at them." And lifting the hat with which he had covered the nest some hours before, he found all the poor little birds quite dead—their bright young lives ended! Yet better so than to have endured the fate intended for them of endless captivity.

"Smothered!" exclaimed Maurice, gloomily, as he threw himself on a seat at the far end of the hermitage.

Eddy followed his example, and there they remained, brooding over their strange condition, while the rain plashed on the broken roof, and the sky grew every moment darker and more dismal.

Then the mother goldfinch flew in with a worm in her mouth, and lighting on the edge of the nest, held the tempting morsel, turning about, over the heads of the young ones, wondering why they did not gape as usual. This process she repeated several times, then, letting the worm fall, gently stirred the poor dead birdies with her bill, and finding them still and cold, gathered them under her wings, and lay down, trying to bring back life and warmth by covering them with the soft feathers of her downy breast. Even the boys could not help feeling touched at the sight, and silently watched what the poor mother would do next. After a long time she rose, and flying off, returned presently with more food; but finding this as unsuccessful as the last attempt, fluttered over the nest a while, as if to consider the matter, then, seeming to understand it all but too well, she hovered mournfully round, uttering the most plaintive notes.

"Eddy," said his brother, "I can't stand this any longer; it's too melancholy! It puts me in mind how mother will lament when she hears that we died on this island!"

"No doubt we'll be found before that time, Maurice, so keep up your heart; but, indeed, I'm sure poor mother will fret enough about us when we don't go home this evening."

"Come, let us throw away the nest of dead birds, for I can't bear to see the way the old one is going on."

And Maurice got up, and running to the river, flung the nest into the stream as far as he could reach. Away it floated, bearing along the memorial of their cruelty.

"I'm getting frightfully hungry," said Eddy; "but we won't give up hope, Maurice, till after Lina's hour for coming."

At home no question was raised as to the absence of the boys till dinner-hour; and even then, as they were often late, it was not considered anything remarkable.

In the evening Lina set off for her usual visit to the goldfinch's nest, and had just reached the river path when her attention was attracted by some object floating down the stream, and on examining more closely, she perceived it was a nest, half upset, with one little dead bird tangled amongst the wet lining, so delicately woven of hair and down. "It is my nest, I am sure!" she thought. "Oh, who could have been so cruel!" Hoping to find herself mistaken, she hurried on, when, turning into a field, she met Farmer Brown, and told her story, pointing to the floating nest.

"No use going on, Miss Lina," he replied, "for the bridge was carried away in the great flood last night. I saw the broken pieces of it this morning down a good way below this." Then, seeing Lina's look of disappointment, he added, "But we'll throw a good broad plank across for you some day, soon, and I'll warrant you'll find your pet birds safe enough. There's many another finch's nest in the country besides that one."

Lina had to content herself with this comfort, and retraced her steps homeward, little thinking how anxiously her visit was expected by the poor prisoners on that desolate island.

Darkness approached, and as the boys had not yet returned, their mother became anxious, and sent to the school-house in the hope of obtaining tidings of her sons; but when the answer arrived that neither of them had been there that day, her uneasiness was changed into alarm. Messengers were despatched in every direction to make inquiries, but nothing was discovered. All sorts of real and imaginary dangers presented themselves to the mind of the poor mother, and her agony during that long night could only be alleviated by placing her loved ones in the care of One "who slumbereth not, nor sleepeth."

Lina, who had been wandering about restlessly during the early part of the night listening for the sound of returning footsteps, came to her mother's side, and said, softly, "I have been asking God to tell us where the boys are, and I am almost sure I have found out, for an idea has just occurred to me." She then related how she had seen the floating nest, and what the farmer had told her about the bridge.

"But, Lina dear, if the bridge is gone, how could your brothers have got to the island?"

"Just what I thought, too, mother; but now I remember the farmer could not tell exactly when it was swept away. Perhaps they crossed over in the early morning, and could not get back."

"What you say is possible, dear; we will try."

They did so without delay, and as soon as the light had sufficiently returned, Farmer Brown's plank was thrown across where the bridge had been, and the boys were found stretched on the cold damp floor of the old hermitage, exhausted with hunger and misery, for all their hopes of rescue were gone; and yet, in the stillness and gloom of that solemn night, many thoughts, unheeded before, had forced themselves on their minds. They had sought protection and pardon from their Heavenly Father, and offered up from the heart their first real prayer. In short, a new life commenced for these two boys, which their friends always dated from the memorable time they had spent "caged" on the island. S. T. A. E

"THE QUIVER" BIBLE CLASS.

216. It is stated in the Book of Leviticus that when a man was recovered from leprosy he should show himself to the priest and offer a sacrifice of thanksgiving to God. On what occasion did our blessed Lord order this to be done?

217. Where is the earliest mention of salt as used for flavouring food?

218. What was it Herod desired the wise men to do for him?

219. Quote a passage in which our Lord tells us what is the greatest proof of human love.

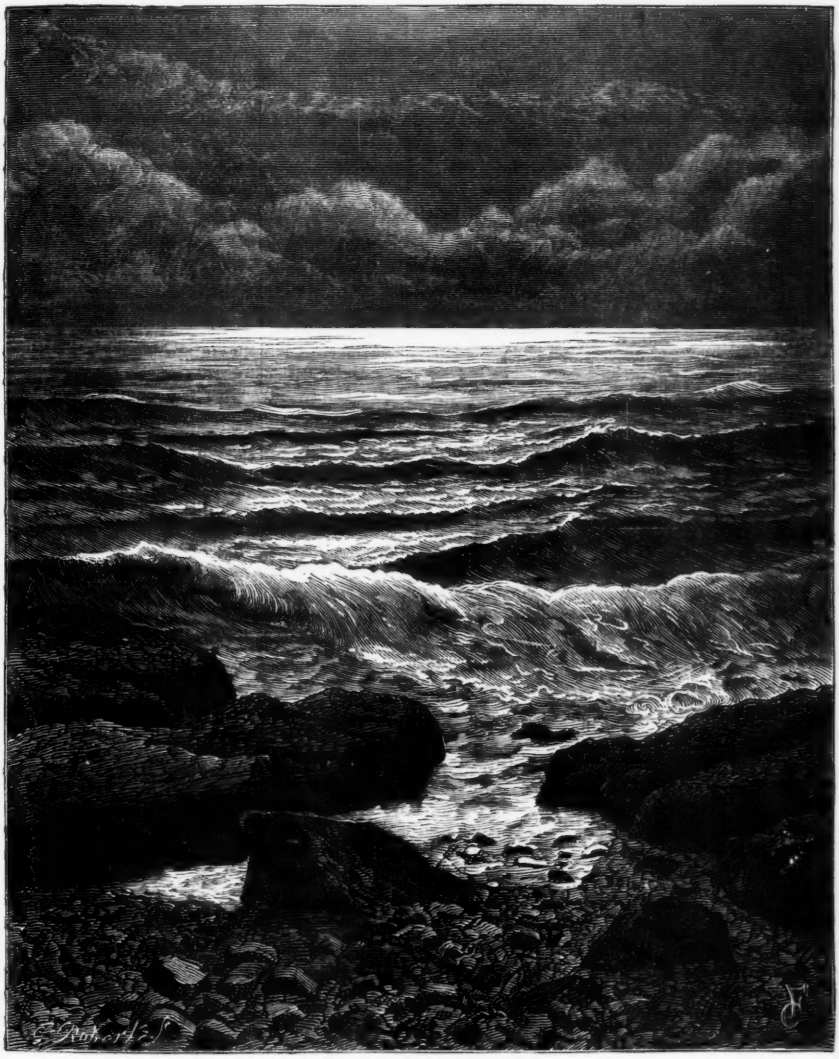
220. Where do we find the expression, "The lines are fallen unto me in pleasant places?"

221. What proverb does our Lord mention, as being in use in His days?

222. What great work was undertaken by King Hezekiah in order to provide a more abundant supply of water for the city of Jerusalem? Quote passage.

223. What two persons are mentioned as having denied the doctrine of a future resurrection?

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS ON PAGE 528.



205. "It bare twelve manner of fruits, and yielded her fruits every month" (Rev. xxii. 2).

206. "Then said I, Ah, Lord God! behold I cannot speak: for I am a child" (Jer. i. 6).

207. "Swear not at all; neither by heaven; for it is God's throne: nor by the earth; for it is His footstool" (Matt. v. 34, 35).

208. "For the Lord hath spoken of David, saying, By the hand of my servant David I will save my people Israel out of the hand of the Philistines, and out of the hand of all their enemies" (2 Sam. iii. 18).

209. Herod (Luke xiii. 32).

(Drawn by FRANK CARLESS.)

MUSIC AND POETRY.

HOW wondrous is the power, how wide the reign
Of the angelic spirit that commands
Forth issue from the lifeless lyre the strain
Obedient to the touch of mortal hands!
And powerful and mystical as she,
A sister spirit, rules the human heart,
Tuning its million chords in harmony,
Which murmur to the Æolian breath of art.

And, twined in flowing wreaths, these sisters smile
Upon the earth, and glad its busy throng;
E'en in the shade of ocean's farthest isle
Are felt the spells of poetry and song.

For the great ocean, in its free career,
Sings a wild song in concert with the winds,
Breathing a poetry of mystic fear,
Which in the human heart an echo finds.

Whispering sweetly to the gentle breeze
That steals across its bosom, and doth bear
Its message to the shade of forest trees,
Its secret to the lovers wandering there.

That mighty ocean with its music tells
Its harmonies to heav'n, and when the storm
Bursts from the caves of air, its language swells
To bolder tones, and prouder grows its form.

And the great voices of the air and sea
The noblest hymn of all creation pour,
Worthy the symbols of eternity
And Him their Maker, whom we all adore.

Then borne to land, upon the pebbly beach,
The breeze and ocean, as twin children, light,
And unto man a tale of love would teach;
But chiefly in the silence of the night,

When all the turmoil of the world is hushed,
And all the sorrows of mankind are stilled,
As though the mighty human soul were crushed,
And that the earth, as one vast tomb, were filled;

When no rude murmur from the toiling herd
The hallowing sense of Nature's courtship mars,
When scarce a leaf in azure space is stirred,
And the sole watchers are the peeping stars;

Then steals the distant surges of the sea,
Kissed by the breeze and kissing in return,
Then rolls the alternating melody,
The laughing shrieks and the low sighs that mourn;

The echoing murmur of the waves that wake
The thunder of the cliff and damp its brow,
Mingled with whispers when the ripples break
In dancing foam upon the sands below.

Oh, that omnipotence would raise the veil
From human eyes, and open mortal ears
To the grand hymns that load the midnight gale,
Unselfish music to the heavenly spheres!

Oh, that the heart of this too selfish world
Were one with Nature's, generous and free,
That all its cares were on the shore unfurled,
And blended with and buried in the sea!

Would that o'er every human sorrow, lost
Deep 'neath the billows, from mankind estranged,
The winds might sing, as joyously they crossed
From land to land where late the spectre ranged.

Then were the sleep of weary eyes unslept,
The rest of toil unsought, and pain no more;
Then were the tears of bitterest woe unwept,
For joy that reigned for man on every shore!

J. T. N.

THE BRIDGE BETWEEN.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE TROUBLES OF CHATTY AND MOLLY," "THE DINGY HOUSE AT KENSINGTON," "QUEEN MADGE," "AGAINST HERSELF," ETC., ETC., ETC.

CHAPTER XXVI.—OUT IN THE GARDEN.

DOROTHY went out into the garden at last. This had been such a long strange day, she thought; but, thank goodness, it would be over soon, and then she could creep away, and, in the darkness, think it all over. She walked up to George Blakesley, in a dazed sort of way, and stood before him.

"I thought you were never coming," he said.

"I have been talking to Mr. Fuller and papa," she answered, "and now I have come;" she sat down on the rickety seat beside him; "and it shall be—what we were talking about to-night—whenever you please," she added, meekly.

"My dear child, my dear little child!" he said, trying to draw her to him, but she shrank back.

"Oh no," she said, "don't do that; and I'm not a child any longer. I feel like an old woman. There is something all wrong in my life," she added.

"It will be right presently," he said, hopefully. "What made you change your mind so soon, Dorothy?"

"Papa wished it," she said, frankly and gravely.

"I see—I fear things are going wrong. He has made some mistakes over the paper lately. He is quite right to wish to see you safely married."

He said the words to himself, not to her, but she heard them, and they stung her pride; she said nothing, only turned her face a little more away, and began absently making pictures in the shadowy outlines beyond the garden. It was very dark; she could scarcely define a single object beyond the fence, and the sycamore-tree above her waved gravely to and fro in the breeze. It was a warm night, but she shivered with cold and wretchedness, and looked down longingly at the garden, and thought how terrible it would be to leave it. And then to be married! To go away from home and her dear old father, over whom a sorrow was stealing, and from Tom and Will and Sally. Will was getting on so well with his studies, and Sally could draw figures in a way that was quite wonderful, and then there was Mr. Fuller. She did not even want to see him any more, she thought, she felt so angry with him, and so ashamed of herself and all that had passed between them. To go away from home and from the dear old garden, to be married to George Blakesley for ever, to take this for her life and all her hopes and dreams, and never to look for anything more! Oh, it seemed dreadful! she would give the world to be free. She should never care for Mr. Blakesley, never.

"Dorothy!"

She woke from her reverie with a start.

"Yes;" and she did not look round. Suddenly she felt a hand put softly over her eyes.

"You are crying, Dorothy." He had been thinking of the future also, and building up air-castles just as Dorothy once had built them; but they fell with a crash when he felt the tears upon her cheeks. "Look round at me," he said, kindly. "Don't be afraid of me. Now, tell me what is the matter. Are you crying because you are going to marry me, my child?" She hung her head, and hesitated; but she could not tell a falsehood. "Does the prospect distress you so very much, Dorothy?"

"Yes," she said.

"Why did you ever accept me?"

"I don't know. I was very unhappy. Oh, please forgive me, George, I have been very wicked," she broke out; "I will marry you now, and papa wishes it; but, oh, I would give the world to die!"

"Rather than marry me, dear?"

"Yes," she said, sadly. "But it's too late; now, too, when I have seen your aunts, and everybody knows. Let it go on now——"

"No," he answered, gravely; "you shall be free, my child. It is no use caring for what people say in a matter of right and wrong. I have been wrong to force you as I have done. But I'm so fond of you, my dear little girl!" and the tender voice touched her a little, as it always had done.

"Oh, forgive me!" she said.

"Yes, I quite forgive you," he said, softly. She never dreamt how much he suffered. "You cannot help your feelings, my child. There, there," he said, soothingly, as he felt her tears fall upon his hand, "don't be so distressed. You are quite free; and I will go away and never worry you more. I think it will be much better for you." She began to doubt him almost, he was so calm.

"Do you love me, then, so very much?" she asked, wonderingly.

"With all my heart," he answered in a low voice.

"Yet you give me up?"

"Because I love you so much that your happiness is more to me than my own."

"Oh, how good you are, George!" she said, passionately; "I can't think how it is I don't love you, but I don't, and I believe I have no heart; I think I'm made of stone, and I don't believe we ever love the right people." The last words slipped out almost before she was aware of it, but he heard, and stood silently considering them over.

"I will not worry you any more," he said; "and when we meet again we will be friends."

"Yes," she said, eagerly. "Don't go altogether."

Then he looked round at the old familiar garden, and stared once more at the girl's troubled face.

"Good-bye," he said; "will you kiss me before I go, dear? you never did in your life." She put up her lips and kissed him, gratefully; yet in the readiness with which she complied there was a hopelessness of any stronger feeling, that saddened him more than all before. "Good-bye," he said again; "my Dorothy, my dear little girl," and he went, and left her alone under the sycamore-tree.

She stared after him, almost dazed, and listened till the last faint sound of his footsteps died away, and then she put her hands over her face, and bent it down upon the other side of the seat. She could scarcely realise that she was free, that after all she was not to marry George Blakesley, and have the door of her dream-world shut on her for ever. He would never come again, or talk to her about their future life, and where they would live, and what they would do, and she should never see the faded beard coming down the garden-path any more, and reflect that she must walk beside it through every day to come, and that she must like no other face so well as that one Tom had so often called "washed-out." It was a great relief to be free, and yet she gave a long sigh, and was a little sorry. Had he not loved her better and more than any one else had? and now she might go through the world alone, and without any one to care for her. Her encounter with Adrian Fuller that evening, too, had made her long never to see him again. Oh, she was so thoroughly alone in the world, and the old question came back once more, and with a bitterness she had never felt that it held previously, "What do we live for?"

Then suddenly she remembered her father's position, and that he had said that if she married she could take care of Sally, and now that was impossible. She started, and stood upright, considering what she should do, and how she should tell her father what had happened, and what would become of Sally. Now that she was free, all her old love for her brothers and her quaint little sister came back with a rush.

"I will take care of Sally, I will!" she cried passionately to herself.

"Dorothy!" called Mr. Woodward, out of the study window, "I want you;" and she went, half-trembling, and fearing to tell him the news.

(To be continued.)

DAVID RAISED TO THE THRONE.

BY THE REV. WILLIAM HANNA, D.D., LL.D., EDINBURGH.

IF asked to picture David at the lowest ebb of his earthly fortunes, we would take him as he stood weeping over the ruins of Ziklag, casting a bewildering look of astonishment, if not of terror, around upon his band. He had been dismissed from the Philistine army at Aphek, as one meditating treachery; and could he well acquit himself of the charge? The words of Achish, as he sent him off, laid all the blame of his dismissal on others, and indicated the absence of all suspicion of David's faithful allegiance on his own part—"I know that thou art good in my sight, as an angel of God." These words must have stirred strange feelings in a breast so open and ingenuous as was that of David. He may have wondered at it—been glad and grateful for it—that, at the very crisis of the affair, when he was shut up to the alternative of being treacherous either to Achish or to his country, such a singular mode of deliverance had been provided; but those who saw him lead his band away from Aphek, would notice no elation of spirits in him? He had lost self-respect; that foundation of conscious rectitude and purity of purpose on which, in all his dealings with Saul, he had so securely reposed, had given way. He had played the part of the hypocrite, and could not but despise himself for doing so. It would be but a dull journey the three days' travel down to Ziklag; and at its end what a fearful sight! That city of habitation, into which, after the houseless wanderings of so many years, he and his companions had gathered their wives and their children and all their goods, towards which they had already begun to feel as towards a second home, was then before them, a mass of smoking ruins, their wives and their little ones gone they knew not whither, all trace of the spoilers lost. "Then David, and they that were with him, lifted up their voice and wept, until they had no more power to weep." Not slight the pressure that forced such men to weep, and that wept out of them all their strength. But there was something more to pain David than the spoiling of Ziklag—his loss of Abigail and Ahinoam. For the first and only time his band showed sudden signs of mutiny. Dark looks were thrown upon him, bitter words were uttered; they spake even of stoning him to death upon the spot. Cast out from his own country, dismissed by the Philistine, deprived of those nearest and dearest to him, of whose fate he was left uncertain, to be treated thus at last by the very men who had placed themselves voluntarily under his command, and who had hitherto exhibited such a deep and unfaltering an attachment, it made David's desolation complete and overpowering. There was open to him but one resource, and on it he threw himself—"He encouraged himself in the Lord his God."

But while turning penitently and trustingly to God, he did not fold his arms in indolent despair His band's wrath against himself he turned off by rousing them to instant action for the recovery of their own wives and families. Encouraged by the response got from God, he and his six hundred set out, and, getting on the track of the spoilers, pursued them with such exhausting speed, that two hundred of their number were knocked up and left behind. The Amalekites were overtaken, and surprised. It was a nearly wholesale slaughter, and the entire spoil that they were carrying away was recovered.

It was on his return from this successful pursuit that David heard of the bloody battle of Gilboa and its results. The death of Saul and his three eldest sons removed all legal obstacles between David and the throne to which he had been divinely designated. That throne was now his by right; it remained only that he should make it his by possession and occupancy. It had been upon certain well-defined conditions that Saul had originally been placed upon it: these conditions he had broken, and so incurred its forfeiture. Not only was this forfeiture openly proclaimed by the great prophet, but Saul himself, and ere he died all Israel, knew that his successor had already been selected by him in whose hands, according to the theocratic constitution of the new kingdom, the election lay, and had been solemnly anointed to that office. At the first institution of monarchy in Israel, not the slightest hint had been given that it was to be hereditary, that it was to descend from father to son. Saul, once dead, no son or descendant of his, by any plea that the Hebrew constitution recognised, could claim the vacant throne. It was true, that in other lands the principle was admitted and acted upon, that the eldest son should in ordinary circumstances succeed his father; and as one of the main elements in the Israelites' desire to have a king was that they might be like the nations around them, they may have been quite prepared to give effect to that principle, and, had no divine interposition taken place, might have been ready at once to recognise Saul's grandson as his successor. Such interposition, however, had taken place, and by it such predisposition on the part of the people had been over-ruled. Besides, and independently of this, Jonathan, when standing next in the natural succession, had, for himself and for his children, by solemn oath and covenant, denuded himself of all his rights, and transferred them to David. Had matters taken the same course in Judea that they did in Egypt or Assyria at Saul's death, the son of Jonathan, Mephibosheth, should have inherited the throne. His father's voluntary renunciation barred that claim. There was no one who, on the ground either of sacred or civil right, could offer any competing claim as against that of David. Let us put ourselves, then, in his position, when the tidings of what had happened upon the bloody field of Gilboa were communicated to him, and imagine how we would have acted. The Philistines had triumphed in the north, the wreck of Saul's defeated army had fled across the Jordan; disorganised and terror-stricken, the whole land lay panting for a leader who could revive her spirit, reorganise her forces, and raise her once again to union and to strength. Even though he had had no divine right to plead, how tempting the opportunity to such a man as David, placed as he then was! Had he seized the favourable moment, had he put himself at the head of his chosen and well-tried troops, had he, without a day's delay, announced himself as Saul's successor, it had been an easy thing for him to place himself on the vacant throne. The prestige of his name would have told widely in his favour; the terror of his fierce band would have overawed opposition. He could easily have been at Mahanaim before Abner had had time to rally the routed Israelites, or to concert any plan as to the future. There might have been reluctance in some quarters to receive him at once as king, there might have been opposition in others; but the hostility that his wisdom, gentleness, and generosity failed to disarm could easily have been repressed by force; or, if the great talent and generalship of Abner had raised up in the north and east an opposition with front and head enough to meet him in open battle, who can doubt what the issue of that battle would have been? Easily, as it appears to us, by a few weeks' or few months' efforts, David might at first have made the throne his own. And he might have defended his doing so on the ground that he only used the power his position gave him to make good the ordinance of Heaven. And had the sovereignty of Israel been a thing that David ambitiously coveted, had his great aim been to get the power and use it as other tyrants did — conquering enemies, rewarding friends, extending boundaries, keeping royal state, exacting tribute, requiring homage—this would have been the part that David had acted, this the course he had pursued.

But what, instead of this, do we see? The first hours after the sad intelligence from Gilboa, instead of being given to instant action, are consecrated to grief. The hand that should have grasped the sword laid hold of the harp, and from heart and tongue and instrument there flowed that dirge which, so long as there is an ear on earth to relish rhythm, and a heart on earth to beat responsive to generous pity and true and tender love, shall survive to tell how David mourned the death of Saul and Jonathan.

But there was action too. The very first step however taken by David at this time was to inquire whether he should go up to any of the cities of Judah; and if so, to which. But what made him ever hesitate? Why feel the need of divine guidance here? One would have thought the way was very plain before him. There might be doubts and difficulties as to what he should do when once in Judah, to resolve which priest and oracle might fitly be called in, but about the propriety of his at once forsaking Ziklag, and showing himself openly among his countrymen, there surely could be little hesitation.

Two motives may have prompted David's conduct upon this occasion. The great epoch in his life he felt had come. The great change in his position and responsibilities was at hand. He was to cease to be a private citizen, to cease to live for his family alone, his friends alone. He was to live for his country, to live for it by ruling it. He could not take one step in the course that led to a position so sacred in his eyes—no, not even the first and most obvious one—without seeking and obtaining the direction of Heaven. That direction, in direct and most explicit form, it was in his power to get. The high priest, with the ephod, was by his side. Before, therefore, he took any counsel with his warriors—before perhaps he had taken any serious counsel with his own spirit—he applied to Abiathar, and asked him to inquire for him of the Lord.

Yet another motive may have been at work, one which, if we are right in attributing it to him, does him infinite honour. David knew that in the public inauguration of Saul as king of Israel there had been the conjunction, the happy blending together of the two elements—the primary designation by God, the after approval of the people. Samuel, who presided over the installation of the new monarchy, did not suffer Saul to assume the title or act in any way as king till the original nomination was ratified by the popular consent. There was no Samuel living now to whom David could go for counsel, no prophet of the Lord to present him in the Lord's name to the people as the nominee of Heaven. Was David to do this for himself? Was he to summon the tribes, and plead before them his right to the throne, grounding it upon his early anointing to that office by Samuel, which they would have to take upon his own testimony? His delicate sense of propriety forbad it. The tribes knew well enough about his choice as Saul's successor. It was for them now, and not for him, to make the first movement. He hesitated even about presenting himself among them. It might look as if he were inviting them to act; or, if he went up to Judah, accompanied by a powerful band of warriors, it might look as if he meant to awe them into submission, or was even prepared to make good his claim to the throne by force of arms. This was what David would never do. He was prepared, though still with a trembling sense of his own insufficiency for executing so high a trust, at God's call to undertake the government of the country. But he was not prepared to employ coercion, to plant or support his throne by the vulgar appliance of brute force. So it might be in other lands, but he was not prepared to set up such a despotism in Israel, and to play the part of a tyrant. He would reign over a willing and united people, who spontaneously and without physical constraint accepted him as their king, or he would not reign at all.

The first question, therefore, that he put to the divine oracle was, whether he should go up to Judea at all or not. Not content with the reply that he should go, he then put the further question, 'Whither shall I go?" We are at first somewhat surprised at the particularity of the inquiry. It was not a usual thing to ask for directions so minute and specific. Generally they were the broad questions of peace or war, advance or retreat, putting the hand to, or withholding it from, such an action, that were submitted; and yet a slight reflection may satisfy us that it must have been a very difficult and delicate question to decide, supposing he was to enter Judea, toward what part of it he should in the first instance go. The course that would naturally have suggested itself, as that most likely to secure the concurrence of the great body of the Israelites, would have been a rapid march to the northern and eastern districts. On the adhesion of his own tribe, that of Judah, he could safely count. It was almost certain that if opposition arose anywhere it would be headed by Abner, the bold and able general of Saul, and be fomented by the tribe of Ephraim. A rapid march to the north, a quick passage of the river, the securing the favour of the trans-Jordanic tribes, before they had been dealt with by the friends and adherents of Ishbosheth, was the course that a wise and selfish policy would have adopted, but, though he held in his hand a title to the crown, David had no ground to think that it was the will of God that he should make good that title in such a way as this. He asked, therefore, and he got the required direction. He was told to go up to Hebron, one of the oldest cities of Palestine, the central town of his own tribe of Judah. He did so, and on arrival there, the men of Judah, of their own accord, came forward and anointed him as king.

PRIVATE AND CONFIDENTIAL.

BY THE REV. W. M. STATHAM.

"LUCK."

"WHAT'S that you say, Alfred, "Some fellows never get on because they never get a chance, and other fellows are always having jolly good luck?" So you are beginning to put down your failures, are you, to the score of chance, comforting yourself with the foolish idea that the goose that lays the golden eggs has never laid any in your particular garden; and that you have had no opportunity of making even the proverbial mistake of killing the said renowned old goose? I tell you what it is, my dear fellow, you are mightily mistaken about this same luck. If you take the trouble to study human life, you will find that God helps those that help themselves. If you go on as you are doing now, you will be a second Micawber, waiting for something to turn up. While rolling about on the meadows of life in your hours of ease and stargazing, you will be like a precious old sheep that gets on to its precious old back, and can't manage to get up again without somebody's special aid and intervention. Life is not like a game at whist, where you don't know what will turn up trumps, for duty faithfully followed always turns up a good trump, and always holds a good hand. Circumstances may indeed sometimes favour an idle loafing set of waiters on Providence; but what value are the circumstances if the man is not right himself? Money may only help him to a quicker ruin of his digestion and his reputation. A more prominent position may only be what Young calls "the height which is the gibbet of his name." Freedom from the claims of industry may only feed a longing which tempts into unlawful indulgences a mind which is not toned up to work. Happiness does not consist in what a man has, but in what he is. Make yourself an earnest, educated, well-trained man, and you won't sing a miserable ditty to the goddess of Fortune. You would think it lucky, perhaps, Alfred, if some distant relative left you a large fortune, or if some plenty-crowned merchant gave you his mercantile business and belongings. Not at all! There is an old philosophical distinction between cause and condition, which I would have you very carefully ponder. If you put a marble into the ground instead of a melon-seed, not all the rain and dew and sunshine and good soil can ever make other than a marble of it. The conditions are there, but not the cause! And if you surround a lazy indifferent man with all the best opportunities which the golden favours of Fortune can give him, you cannot alter him through them! It is the old story of a bramble-bush from which you cannot gather grapes, and of a thistle that will not supply you with figs. If a man is not an able commander, it is of no use to give him well-trained armies to lead to battle. It certainly did not make a man a true bishop when, in the olden days, at Milan and elsewhere, some popular favourite had the mitre conveyed to him by the acclaim and shouting of a wild mob. Fitness, that is the great lesson of all life, and then, when the door of opportunity opens, you can enter her palace with a smile. Place a man in the foremost position of the forum, let the audience all turn attentive to his presence, but is he an orator? Clothe him with professional robes, and put him in the academic chair, but can he teach? Open all the doors of opportunity, is he fit to enter any of them, and claim his place? Luck indeed! How many have been ruined by this self-same so-called good luck! Was the German war won through good luck? or the occupancy of the woolsack? or the poet laureate's wreath? The fact is simply this, Alfred, when you see another man's success, envy sometimes says, "What a lucky fellow!" But study says there must be secrets of power, perseverance, skill, and will, that you have not noticed. Fancy Turner's supremacy in painting attributed to good luck! Look, too, at Reynolds, who stayed sometimes thirty-six hours before the canvas at a sitting! Good luck may raise a man to a false position, but it does not keep him there, or even if it does do that, it makes him ridiculous wherever he is. Yes, there is a law of compensation in the universe, and the poor soul pays heavy penalty for this same good luck. His bad grammar would not have been noticed much where he was, but now that he is knighted by what you call "a lucky fluke," his friends nearly choke over their wine when they try to hide their sense of ridiculosity. With simpler surroundings ignorance would have been hidden, but framed in gold the picture is too prominent to be passed by. Luck! Does a man ever learn navigation by luck? or a language? or self-restraint? or water colour drawing? or the way to be happy? Certainly not! Character, culture, a good conscience, and a good name—these are not the gifts of your "jolly good luck." No, and I can think of nothing more contemptible than the expression a man is "down on his luck." In nine cases out of ten, or ninety-nine out of a hundred, the real fact is that he is "down on his laziness," or "down on his ignorance," or "down on his conceit," or "down on his imprudence," or "down on his fickleness." Oh, it's all very well, you say, to declaim against luck, but there is a such a thing as luck. Even the Scriptures say, "By chance there came down a certain priest that way," and "Time and chance happeneth to all." Exactly, Alfred! But a very different meaning has the word "chance" in those passages from that which you attach to it; and, remember, my argument is not that opportunities do not vary in quantity and value, for it is evident that they do. Some persons find a hundred gates open to ten in other folks' lives. And probably these very persons would tell you that their difficulty lay in choosing amid these varieties. But of what use are a hundred gates opening to admit the racer unless he can run? or the warrior unless he can fight? or the painter unless he can paint? or the physician unless he can cure? or the leader unless he can lead?

When Peter the Great learnt ship-building, he did not believe in luck; and when Palissy found out the art of white pottery, he did not worship luck; and Paganini did not play the violin by luck! The fact is this, that young men who don't rise, might rise, only they are not ready. The young clerk can't take the foreign correspondence simply because he hasn't chosen to spend his spare time in learning French or German. Don't let him, therefore, complain of low wages, for probably he gets as much as he is worth.

If the dentist can't take out my teeth skilfully, I'm not going to say, "You, my dear sir, are a dentist, and that's enough for me." Certainly not! If I can afford it, I'll give a guinea to the man that takes the tooth out well, rather than a shilling to the man that "screws" it out. If a youth applies for any situation, and makes his appearance with a dirty collar and smelling of bad tobacco, don't let him lay the loss of the place to bad luck, but to "other than that."

There is a large class, especially at the present day, of youths who are "loungers;" and one wonders, as one looks at them, what the world wants with them at all. Who are you, my young sir? and what does the world want with you? How much would the world be poorer without you? You think many things that have good honest hard work in them are "borish." But are you not the bore? People that are giddy think that everything they look at goes round. And people that are useless enough in themselves think everything a bore, except ease and pleasure. Luck! I warn you, Alfred, to look at the results of this same belief in luck. It often means sweepstakes and gambling, and a sulky sort of belief that you are a more valuable article than you are. Look around you at the enormous waste of force in this England of ourselves; undeveloped science, invention, skill, art, and industry, and do not let us be listening again to any more talk about chance. Mr. Ruskin tells us that "Turner got in his earlier years half-a-crown a day and his supper, and he learned to paint upon that." Exactly, and I believe that there is no hope of our exorcising the contemptible spirit of envy and desire for other people's "luck" till we face fairly and candidly the fact that the first great call of God and the nation to us is that we be faithful to the powers within us, and then to await the possibilities, or chances if you like, without us. The happiest noblest lives have not been what the world calls "lucky" ones. We have to remember, after all, that to do God's will, to render faithful service in our day and generation, and, above all, to be true Christian men and women, valiant for purity, integrity, and right, to be unselfish and brave, to be thankful and contented, to be ready for the best possible here, and to be matured for the everlasting best hereafter, these constitute the aims of every worthy spirit, and are matters not of chance, but of faith, and duty, and integrity, and loyalty.

STILL AND DEEP.

BY F. M. F. SKENE, AUTHOR OF "TRIED," "ONE LIFE ONLY," ETC.

CHAPTER XXVII.

SALLY, the red-cheeked housemaid of Chiverley Rectory, had one great virtue to which possibly her healthy complexion might be attributed, she was an early riser; and on the following morning, even the summer dawn—so swiftly overtaking night—had scarce filled the sky with crimson light, when she was already to be seen on her hands and knees, busily engaged in cleaning the steps at the front door. In the course of this operation she was suddenly startled by hearing a step coming along the hall at that untimely hour, when, generally speaking, all the inmates of the house were buried in slumber. She looked up, to see Mr. Pemberton, with a face almost livid in its paleness, and with dark lines under the eyes that evidently had been sleepless all night; he had a travelling bag in his hand; and Sally rose to her feet, feeling terrified, she scarce knew why; he had always been civil and kind to her, and she had a great respect for him, and felt pained to see how dismally ill he was looking.

"I hoped to find you here, Sally," he said; "I want you to do me a service. Will you tell Mr. Wyndham from me that I have been obliged to go away very suddenly, and that I will write to him fully on the subject in a day or two? My luggage is all ready packed in my room, and I should be much obliged if you would have it sent to the station by the carrier. Good-bye, Sally, I wish you well!" and he gave her a piece of gold, which she almost dropped in her dismay.

"Dear heart, Mr. Pemberton!" she exclaimed; "surely you are not going away for good, you as has been one of the family, so to speak, for such a time; the house would seem quite strange without you."

"Yes, Sally, for good or for evil, I am going right away; no one will ever see me here any more!" and shaking her rough hand, he went past her down the steps, through the shrubbery to the gate, and then took the road that led direct to the station. It was a lovely morning, with exquisite freshness in the air, and dewdrops glittering on every blade of grass; but John Pemberton walked with his head bent, feeling unworthy so much as to raise his eyes to the pure cloudless sky, for he counted himself nothing less than a renegade from the true fealty and devotion he once had vowed in such sincerity to his crucified Lord. "I will arise and go to my Father!" he had said to himself that night, when all the piteous record of his faithlessness seemed to have been rolled out before him; but he did not feel that he could dare approach even to that most merciful God, until, by some hard service, some sharp discipline, he had proved himself now to be sincere, with a deathless truth, which no human hand could touch or mar The first step assuredly was to put away from himself for ever the sight of that face whose bewitching beauty had beguiled him to such fatal loss; and though he knew that it would be like tearing asunder his very heartstrings to leave the roof which sheltered Laura, he resolved that the morning sun should not find him still within the walls of her home. Like Lot fleeing from the city on which the vengeance of God had been denounced, John Pemberton went his way for the last time from Chiverley; but the thought that bowed his head with shame, and held back his soul when it would have risen in swift progress to God, was the bitter knowledge that he only left Laura now when she was already lost to him, that it was too late for him to make the sacrifice of her love for the dear Lord's sake; he had been put to the test, and failed, and never more perhaps would the opportunity be given him of making a worthy sacrifice to the cause of his Divine Master. Thankful he might be, and was, that the strong hand of his God had plucked him out of the snare in which his feet were set, and flung him down, wounded and bleeding, where he was free to turn once more to holiness and truth; but the power to give the first fruits of his young heart freely to his Maker was gone beyond recall, for they had all been lavished on one who was false to her God as she had been to him. And so it was that on this fair summer morning John Pemberton walked away from that fatal house, heart-stricken and ashamed, with all the beauty and glory of his life reft from him for ever by the selfish cruelty of a heartless and designing woman. Well for him that He who bade us forgive until seventy times seven is ever watching for the wandering soul's return, and, a thousandfold more merciful than man, is ready to crown his faintest aspirations with a love that cannot deceive or fail.

(Drawn by WILLIAM SMALL.)

"Mary's soft voice whispering soothing words into her ear."—p. 572.

Sally delivered her message to Mr. Wyndham when the family were seated round the breakfast-table, which he received in blank astonishment. He was too apathetic and depressed ever to take note of what was going on in his household, and he did not in the slightest degree connect John Pemberton's unexpected flight with Laura's intended marriage. His wife, woman-like, was quicker-witted, and she said, with unusual energy, "I do hope John Pemberton has not left us altogether; we cannot afford to lose a pupil."

Bertrand, meanwhile, was looking at Lurline with no very pleasant expression of face. He had never been able to divest himself thoroughly of an uneasy suspicion that she had not dealt fairly by this young man, whom she chose to call her brother; and as he glanced from her to Mary's sweet pure face, he could not help reflecting how impossible it would have been for him ever to have had such a suspicion of her. So soon as breakfast was over he drew Lurline out into the garden alone with him.

"Tell me the truth, Lurline," he said, with much greater sternness of tone than had ever been used to her before; "can you assure me that your past conduct with John Pemberton has had no share in his sudden departure."

"Oh, you darling Bertrand!" she exclaimed, flinging herself upon his arm in the most caressing manner, and clasping both her hands round his, "can you not understand that the poor fellow loved me too tenderly, whether as a brother or not, to be able to see me with complacency wholly monopolised by you. I dare say he was afraid he would not always be as cordial to you as he would wish to be to my future husband, so he thought it best to go away for a time, till he got accustomed to the change. I think he was quite right, and I am very glad we shall have no one to disturb us."

"But would he have felt thus if you had not at some time given him hope? I must know, Laura."

"You know that I told him he should be my adopted brother, you do not call that giving him hope, I suppose? I think it is very hard, Bertrand," added Laura, with a movement of her bright eyes, as if she were winking tears off their long lashes, where, however, no moisture was to be seen; "I have told you that I never loved any one in all the world till I saw you, and I think that ought to be enough for you, it is not my fault if other people loved me more than I wished; why do you blame me for it?"

Her aggrieved tone touched Bertrand's chivalrous nature at once, and he was too completely enthralled by her to retain even the lightest suspicion against her after her denial, so in a very few minutes John Pemberton was as entirely forgotten by them both as if he had never existed, and it was not long before his name ceased to be ever heard at Chiverley Rectory. Two days after his departure there arrived a letter from him to Mr. Wyndham, enclosing a year's payment in advance of the sum for which he was received as pupil, and merely saying that circumstances had obliged him to alter his plans for the future, so he should be unable to return to the Rectory. He then thanked Mr. and Mrs. Wyndham for their kindness, and begged to be remembered to Miss Trevelyan. He was too honest to speak of Laura as a mere ordinary acquaintance, so he did not mention her at all; and as his letter was read out by Mr. Wyndham before Bertrand Lisle, she bore him no grudge for the omission. Perhaps the only person who thought of poor John Pemberton with regret, or with anything like appreciation of the misery that had fallen upon him, was Mary Trevelyan, for she remembered what Charlie Davenant had prophesied of the fatal result of his love for the Lorelei. It was becoming almost impossible for her to believe now in Laura's goodness and truth as she had done so long; the reality of her selfishness and intriguing disposition was beginning to force itself even on her pure mind as an unmistakable certainty, and one of the sharpest pangs she had to endure in the dreary days that preceded Bertrand's departure was in the growing conviction that he—to win whose happiness she would willingly have died—was about to join his fate to one who was in no sense worthy of him, and therefore but too likely to cause him disappointment and distress. Terrible days these were indeed for poor Mary; she had steeled herself to endure them without taking flight, as John Pemberton had done, lest she should betray her real feelings, but she found them very hard to bear. Laura was absolutely determined that Bertrand Lisle should not leave Chiverley till every arrangement for their speedy marriage had been made, and all day long Mary was doomed to hear discussions on this subject, and to listen to Lurline's exulting plans for spending their honeymoon in Paris, as being the place where she could have the most unceasing amusement. There was some little difficulty in fixing the time of the wedding, as Bertrand was uncertain when he could get leave, but after some correspondence with the Foreign Office he found he could be allowed two or three weeks in September for this special purpose, provided he returned at once to his post. He determined therefore to leave Chiverley the morning after the receipt of this letter, which had settled all their plans so definitively that there was no longer any occasion for his remaining. And so it was that on just so fair a morning as that which had witnessed his arrival, Mary Trevelyan rose from her sleepless bed to the full consciousness that the visit from which she had anticipated such unutterable joy was over; that the last day was come, and that the result to her had been simply the crushing out of all hope of earthly happiness from her loyal and faithful heart.

Bertrand was to start immediately after breakfast, and, of course, Lurline was going to drive with him alone to the station. There was no question of Mary having any claim to join him now; but she felt that it was more than she could stand to take leave of him in presence of Laura and the others. As he went up-stairs, therefore, after the meal was over, to make his final arrangements before starting half an hour later, Mary suddenly came swiftly and noiselessly towards him from the other end of the passage. Putting her hand in his, she said, with her low voice tremulous in spite of her efforts, "Dear Bertrand, I shall not see you again; let me say now how unceasingly I shall pray that you may have every blessing and happiness this life can give you!" and before he could answer, before he could even speak a word, she was gone. He tried to follow her, but her light steps carried her quickly away, and she had disappeared completely before he could reach her. When he went down to the pony-carriage she was nowhere to be seen, and he drove away without looking on her face again. Little, indeed, did he dream of the strange scene in which it should be given him to see Mary Trevelyan once more.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

Most of us must remember the 15th of July, 1870—that day fraught with such tremendous consequences—when over the restless waters, where many of us have passed on business or pleasure, that terrible war-cry sounded which was in truth the death-knell of such myriads of our fellow-creatures. Aliens to us in race and nationality as both the contending powers were in the Franco-Prussian struggle, yet probably there were few homes even in England where some sympathetic note of terror or grief was not struck by that ominous heading to the foreign telegrams, "Declaration of War." To many an English heart it brought a dire prophecy of evil for friends and relatives in sunny France or kindly Germany; and assuredly, if it sounded the knell of unnumbered lives, far more did it ring the dirge of all the joy of life for thousands upon thousands, who have even yet to mourn the sacrifice of precious lives, the destruction of happy homes.

The news was known nearly all over the country early on that day, but Mary Trevelyan was one of the few who did not hear it till late in the afternoon. We find her again in a very different scene from that in which we left her. She is in a long lofty room, with large windows letting in the air and sunshine, and rows of little white beds down either side, each one of which is tenanted by some poor child, suffering all of them more or less in body, but patient and cheerful in the atmosphere of kindness that surrounds them. Mary Trevelyan is moving about from one to another with her noiseless step and sweet smile. She wears a simple grey dress of some soft material, whose folds make no rustling sound, with a little white muslin apron, but no cap or veil hides her smooth dark hair, folded plainly round her pretty head, for she has joined no society or religious order whatever, but has merely taken charge of the little hospital for three months, while the Lady Superintendent recruits her health at the sea-side. The period of her stay has already almost come to a close, and in another week she resigns her charge to the established authority.

Mary had offered herself for this temporary work immediately after Bertrand Lisle's departure from Chiverley, and her services had been gladly accepted, with a request that she would enter on her duties at once. She had been only too thankful to do so. She had gone through the ordeal of the few days that Bertrand had remained at the rectory after his engagement, from the delicate consideration for him, and maidenly pride as regarded herself, which prompted her to conceal from all the utter waste and ruin he had brought upon her happiness, by looking on with apparent composure at his devotion to his future wife; but when he was gone, and the necessity for this cruel self-restraint was over, the companionship of Laura, in whose sincerity it was impossible for her any longer to believe, became simply terrible to her. Every word the false-hearted Lorelei said, only served as a fatal proof to Mary how certain it was that she would never make Bertrand happy, for her whole conversation turned on the gaiety and amusements outside her home, in which she intended to spend her married life. Mary could not sympathise with such unhallowed visions, and took refuge in silence, which irritated Laura, to the discomfort of the whole household; and when the proposal came for her immediate departure, to enter on her new work, she saw readily enough that it was welcomed with satisfaction by every inmate of the rectory. Charlie Davenant had not returned, and nothing more had been heard of John Pemberton, and poor Mary, with all her quiet strength, could not help feeling dreary enough on the day when she left the house where none regretted her, and where she had endured the loss of all that made life dear to her. She went for that first night to the house where Mrs. Parry lived, and when, at the close of her long solitary journey, she found herself in the arms of her faithful old friend, and heard her exclamations of dismay at seeing how ill and wan her dear child looked, then all poor Mary's long-continued self-control gave way, and clinging to the familiar hands that had tended her infancy, she cried aloud, in utter abandonment of grief, "Oh, nurse, my heart is breaking—my heart is breaking—how am I to bear it!" Then Mrs. Parry broke out into vehement indignation against the Wyndhams. What had they done to her darling, her sweet lamb? She knew they were a cruel heartless set! She had hated leaving her there, and she could see they had well-nigh driven the life out of her, and so on, with many strong words, till Mary wearily implored of her to stop.

"Do not blame any one, dear nurse, and do not ask me any questions; only let me rest my head on your lap a little while, as I used to do when I was a tiny child," and slipping down from the good woman's hold, as the nurse sat in her easy-chair, she laid her head on her knees, and there let herself weep silently, but unrestrainedly, till she was quite exhausted. Mrs. Parry asked no further questions, but soothed Mary with gentle caresses and tender words, till the paroxysm of grief had subsided. Then she persuaded her to go to bed, and gave her a good-night kiss, as she used to do in her childhood's days, and finally watched by her till she saw her fall into a slumber of complete exhaustion. It was Mary's last exhibition of weakness; when the next day dawned she had recovered her composure and her strength, and no word as to her own trials ever again passed her lips. Mrs. Parry continued to cherish a secret and most bitter rancour against the Wyndhams generally, which she was wont sometimes to confide to the ancient cockatoo, when the sight of Mary's sweet patient face made it impossible for her to keep silence; but the quiet dignity of her child, as she called her, effectually closed her lips in any other way.

After one day spent with her old nurse Mary had come to her post at the hospital, and she had found in her duties, fatiguing and often irksome as they were, a degree of solace and consolation which she could hardly have believed it possible anything on earth could have given her. The suffering children, whose pain she soothed, whose spirits she cheered, and whose little grateful hearts she completely won, soon learned to cling with touching tenderness to their dear Miss Mary—they had found her surname so hard to pronounce that she had willingly taught them to call her by the simpler name—and, young as she was, no mother could have entered more entirely into all the wants and troubles of these forlorn little ones, than she did before she had been many days in charge of the home some good Samaritan had provided for them. She has not had the heart yet to tell them how soon she is to leave them, and she is thinking how hard it will be to part from them as she walks down the ward, speaking a few bright words to each, till she reaches the bed of a poor little girl of four or five years old, whose broken limb she proceeds to arrange in preparation for the examination of the doctor, whose afternoon visit she is expecting. The little one is frightened at the idea of the damaged foot being touched, and tears begin to gather in the round blue eyes, which Mary notices without making any remark; but she immediately begins to tell her a charming story of the gambols of a kitten, who is the plaything of the ward, and who has been performing wonderful feats with a bandage roll, and gradually the innocent lips relax into a succession of smiles, and the two little arms are thrown round her neck, while the child exclaims, "Tottie loves Miss Mary!"

"Dear Tottie," says Mary, "I am sure I love you," and while these tender words are passing between them, the door of the ward swings on its well-oiled hinges, and the hospital doctor comes in—an elderly man, with a shrewd, kind face, and a decided and rather sharp manner, which softens to a beautiful gentleness when he addresses the suffering children. For no fee or reward does he minister to their necessities, save the answer of a good conscience, and Mary and he feel equal respect for each other, and are excellent friends. She follows him from bed to bed, giving a clear concise account of what has occurred medically in each case since his last visit, and then, note-book in hand, she takes down all his directions for the hours which must elapse till he comes again. Tottie's foot is made more comfortable than it was before, at the cost of a little temporary pain, which she bears bravely, with Mary's hand clasped tight in hers, and Mary's soft voice whispering soothing words into her ear; and when all the cases have been examined, Miss Trevelyan moves down the ward with the doctor, hearing his closing directions. He has reached the door, and shaken hands with her, when, just as he is going to descend the stairs, he looks back over his shoulder and says, "Perhaps you have not heard the great news: war is declared between France and Prussia." He nods to her, and is gone before she has time to ask a question, but she has heard and understood the full import of the one brief sentence. She turns back, and walks slowly down the ward to the other end, where a large window looks out on one of the London parks, and as she passes through the rows of white beds some strange change must have taken place in her aspect, which makes itself felt even to the uncomprehending consciousness of the children, for the little hands that are stretched out as usual to catch hold of her dress and bring her nearer to them, are drawn back instinctively, and while their eyes follow her with wondering glances, they let her go unmolested on her way. She stands before the window, and looks out on the summer sky, which is calm and bright, as if no thunder-clouds could ever darken its serenity, and watches, without hardly being aware of it, a bird cleaving its way swiftly through the impalpable ether, as if on some hasty errand; but swifter far even than the passage of its light quivering wings, has been the flight of her own true spirit to the presence of him for whom, in her silence, she cares with an ever-loving sympathy, day by day, and hour by hour—Bertrand—her Bertrand no longer—but still the one love of her life. What will this momentous news be to him? She knows it all well, by the instinct of her true affection, as none other upon earth can know it, and her heart sinks within her with a leaden weight of terror, for she understands that the very fact of an enemy confronting France will raise up all his patriotism, stifled rather than slumbering, like a giant in his strength, and that he will fling himself into a convulsion of anxiety to share the perils of his own true country. His duties as an employé of the English Government will seem to him like the galling fetters of an iron chain, but his strong sense of honour may lead him to consider himself still bound by them if France is triumphant, and seems to have no need of aid from any save those who are outwardly, as well as in heart, her sons; but if she should prove unfortunate, if reverses should befall her, and her mighty foe should wound her to the heart, then Mary knew that it would be to Bertrand Lisle as though a blow had been struck at his mother, and that all other considerations would be flung to the winds in order that he might fly to her aid, and give her his single life at least, if he could do no more. Mary looked up to heaven, and her lips moved in an earnest prayer for his safety, the first of the unceasing supplications for his preservation which were to rise from her heart night and day through all the trying time to come. Then she thought of Lurline. The marriage would have to be postponed, that was certain, whether Bertrand joined the French army or not. He would certainly not entangle himself with such a binding tie while France was in peril; but, except the immediate anxiety for his safety, it ought to make little difference to Laura; if she loved him truly she would be ready to wait for him as long as might be necessary, and to marry him ultimately, under whatever change of external circumstances. How earnestly did Mary pray that Lurline would now give him all the heartfelt sympathy she would herself have accorded to him had she stood in the place of his future wife, letting no thought of herself or her claims upon him add a feather-weight to the anxieties which would at once oppress him. Mary knew nothing of what was going on at Chiverley; none of the Wyndhams had taken the trouble to write to her, and she had received but one letter from Bertrand. It had come only a week or two after she had left the rectory, accompanied by a business-like dispatch from his solicitor, and it was written to tell her, in the most delicate manner, that he had settled upon her a part of his income, and that the lawyer enclosed her the deeds which secured it to her. She answered it by declining gently, but most absolutely, to receive even the smallest amount of money from his hands. She returned the legal documents, and assured him that she required nothing whatever, as all her wants were supplied in the new life she had chosen for herself. It might be that her determination had offended him, but, anyhow, he had never written to her again, and she knew nothing whatever of his movements. Many sad and anxious thoughts disturbed poor Mary's faithful heart as she stood there looking out on the tranquil sunshine; but suddenly an idea passed into her mind which woke a light of fervent joyfulness in her dark eyes. Remembering how women were allowed to go out from England to help the victims of the Crimean War, it occurred to her that some similar organisation might be employed in aid of the wounded in France. "If so I shall go," she said to herself; "I shall go to help Bertrand's countrymen—perhaps—perhaps himself!"

(To be continued.)

SCRIPTURE LESSONS FOR SCHOOL AND HOME.

SCRIPTURE STORIES. SECOND SERIES. NO. 1. BIRTH OF A PRINCE.

Chapters to be read—Matt. i.; Luke i., ii. (parts of).

INTRODUCTION. All persons fond of birthdays—children especially; marks an event in our lives; shows we are older, and ought to find us wiser and better. In this lesson will speak of a birthday—whose? Promised so long before: first to Adam and Eve (Gen. iii. 17), then to Abraham (Gen. xxii. 18), afterwards more definitely by Isaiah (Is. ix. 6), even the place of his birth mentioned (Micah v. 2); now time for his birth at last come. What is to be born as? Prince, as foretold by Isaiah. Saviour, friend of all. King universal. Surely will be great preparations for such a wonderful event. We shall see.

I. THE ANNUNCIATION TO THE VIRGIN. (Read Luke i. 26—38.) Who was the last prophet? nearly 400 years since Malachi prophesied. God's voice been silent. Now at last silence broken. Angel or messenger descends. What was his name? To whom did he go first? Where was Zacharias at the time, and what was Gabriel's message to him? (Luke i. 17.) Now again sent not to announce the forerunner, but the Prince Himself. Picture the scene: the Virgin in her little room behind the carpenter's shop at Nazareth; the appearance of the angel, his salutation, highly favoured, i.e., graciously accepted; his wonderful message, even the name of the Son given, and His title, office, and kingdom. No wonder she asked, "How shall this be?" Is reminded how that all is possible with God. What does she answer? (ver. 38). Notice the following points in her character for imitation. She was (1) Humble. Not flattered by the angel's dignified salutation, but rather troubled by it. They that humble themselves will be exalted. (2) Believing. She asked for information, without doubting the truth of what she was told. At once accepted the statement as true, because coming from God. Let her be an example to girls especially. Lowly in her own eyes, like St. Peter's model woman (1 Pet. iii. 4), believing without questioning, because believed in God. Was thus honoured by becoming mother of Jesus.

II. Annunciation to Joseph. (Read Matt. i. 18—25.) How was he told of the wonderful event? Remind how often God used dreams to announce coming events, such as Joseph's and the butler's dreams, Nebuchadnezzar's, and many others. By whose power was Christ conceived? Having no earthly father, was indeed the Son of God—so a divine name given to Him, meaning "God with us"—just as a human name, Jesus or Saviour, announced to His earthly mother. What did Joseph do after this message? What did this show? Wonderful faith seen in ready obedience. What a happy home that cottage at Nazareth must have been. What a pious, simple, believing carpenter, and humble, believing wife! A home which the Lord hath blessed!

III. The Birth. (Read Luke ii. 1—7.) What had the prophet Micah foretold as to the place of Christ's birth? But where did Joseph and Mary live? How, then, was the prophecy to come true? What proclamation was there? Who was Cæsar Augustus? So, because Roman emperor wished to take a census, Mary and Joseph must go—where? Why to Bethlehem? Let the children notice the mean circumstances of Chist's birth: no pomp, or display; no courtiers in waiting, as when a prince is born; no friends to congratulate; no beautiful clothes ready; no nurse; but the manger for a cradle, the cattle around, the stable for a lodging. What does all this show? (1) Poverty is no disgrace. Jesus was born as a poor child, though Lord of all. Our true worth is not the amount of money, but of goodness that we possess. (2) The lowliness of Christ. He wanted to come as a man; to go through all the stages of man; might have come in any way—as God in majesty on Mount Sinai, as an angel in human form to Abraham, Elijah, and many others. Chose rather to begin life just as we do—with pain and suffering and hunger and want. This His own deliberate choice (Phil. ii. 6) and shows His wonderful condescension. (3) The sympathy of Jesus. Children sometimes fancy that they cannot understand; that grown-up people forget their feelings as children, &c. Christ was a child—a perfect child—man and yet God. He cannot forget; can therefore feel for all, sympathise with all, and help all children.

IV. Practical Lessons. (1). Contentment. All sometimes disposed to complain of lot in life. So poor, friendless, uncared for. Who could appear more so than Christ at His birth. Therefore bear patiently. (2) Thanksgiving. Who was this babe? Therefore is my Saviour. God with me. What must I do to Him? Love and adore the Father who sent and the Son who came to save the world.

Questions to be answered.

1. Name any prophecies of Christ's birth.
2. Describe the visit of the angel to Mary.
3. What was her character?
4. What two names were given to Christ, and what do they mean?
5. What lessons do we learn from Christ's birth as regards Him?
6. Name two practical duties for ourselves.

"OUT ON THE HILLS, AWAY."

"COME out and see what Tom has brought you, Mabel; 'tis something you'll like very much, I am sure!" And, helping his sister to rise from her seat—for Mabel, poor child, had been lame all her life—Frederick led her to the hall-door, where the gamekeeper's son stood, holding in his hand a basket, the lid of which moved up and down mysteriously.

"What have you got? Is it alive, Tom?"

"Yes, Miss Mabel; I caught this little leveret out on the moor, and I said to father, 'What a good pet it would make for Miss Mabel, because she's not able to run herself.'" And Tom opened the basket as he spoke.

"Oh, thank you! I like it so very much! Dear, soft little creature!'" exclaimed Mabel, lifting the leveret tenderly, and gently stroking its long ears, while she returned to her couch.

No need to seek amusements any more for the lame child, for the new pet was an endless source of pleasure, as it lay in her arms, or frisked round the room playing all kinds of funny pranks. She fed it with her own hands; and Frederick supplied a wonderful variety of delicacies from the garden.

Tiny—for so Mabel had named the little hare—as he grew older displayed a good deal of sagacity and affection for his young mistress. He seemed perfectly to understand that she was not able to run after him like the other children, and his plays with her were always of a quiet nature.

When the weather permitted, Mabel spent a good deal of time in the garden, where, seated in a sheltered position, she watched the gambols of her favourite with almost as much delight as if she could join in the races and scampering.

Yes, Tom had judged rightly in his choice of a pet for the lame girl.

Frederick, who was a great carpenter, surprised his sister on her birthday with a pretty little wooden house, which he secretly placed in a corner of the garden, for Tiny's comfort, where he could sleep or find rest and shelter at any time; and Mabel was very particular to have a nice soft bed of hay always spread there fresh and clean. Under these circumstances one might suppose that Tiny had everything hare could wish, surrounded by luxuries, and loved and petted by his young mistress, but

> "Nature works in every breast
> With force not easily represt,"

and the narrow confines of a garden, pleasant as it was, did not satisfy Tiny's roving propensities. Why should he not see a little more of the world, like the rest of his race—now, too, when he was old and strong enough to exercise his own will, and follow his inclinations?

One day, while these longings were strong within him, he perceived the back door of the garden open, a thing which had never happened, in his memory, before. No one was near, for he had wandered a long way from Mabel's seat. He could hear her gentle voice calling, "Tiny! Tiny! where are you?" but knew full well she was not able to follow. The opportunity was too tempting to be neglected; affection and habit did, indeed, make him hesitate a moment whether to obey the call and return, or not; but one look at the green field outside decided the matter, and quickly passing the threshold, he set off full speed across the smooth sward—on, over hill and dale, until he reached his native heath once more.

Meantime Mabel, surprised that the hare did not run as usual to attend her summons, continued to call, until the name of "Tiny" resounded from every corner of the garden.

At length her mother came out, attracted by the unusual cries, and found the poor little girl lying on the grassplot, exhausted by the efforts she had made to leave her seat, and crying as if her heart would break. Raising her tenderly, the mother anxiously inquired what was the matter.

"Mamma, mamma!" she sobbed, "he is gone! my Tiny is gone! If he were in the garden he would surely come, for he knows my voice so well."

"Sarah must have left the back door open when she carried in the vegetables."

"Oh, mamma! why did he leave me? I am afraid he could not have loved me, although I did all I was able to make him happy." And here a fresh burst of tears gushed from her eyes at the idea of Tiny's ingratitude. All efforts at consolation were useless until the violence of Mabel's grief had exhausted itself, and even then, though apparently calmer, she felt Tiny's loss more and more each day. No one but a child deprived of the usual sources of amusement and companionship can imagine how the heart clings to a pet animal. Mabel pined for her hare; all its pleasant frolics and affectionate ways came continually before her, as she sat in the now solitary garden, or lay on her couch, alone, hour after hour, while Frederick was at school, and her mother necessarily occupied with household matters.

Months passed on, and the little girl, whose life was always, more or less, one of pain and weariness, was now entirely confined to bed by an unusual accession of illness. Everything that care and affection could suggest was done to alleviate her sufferings; while for weeks she lay hovering between life and death. However, notwithstanding her weakness and delicacy, God was pleased to spare Mabel's life through this dangerous illness; and though her strength was long in returning, yet before the fine autumn weather had quite departed she was able again to sit under her favourite apple-tree in the garden, and be wheeled occasionally in a small Bath-chair through the fields and lanes.

One day, about this time, Frederick was given an unexpected half-holiday, and running home in high spirits, found his sister on her couch near the window, looking pale and languid.

"Mab," he exclaimed, bursting gaily into the room, "call Sarah to get you ready quickly; I came home on purpose to take you for a long drive in the little chair. We will go far away to the moor which you used to like so much long ago."

"Oh Fred, how nice!" she answered, her pale cheek flushing with pleasure. "I shall be ready very soon, and we will gather lovely flowers on the heath.

The day was bright and breezy. Wild bees hummed, and butterflies hovered over the latest-blowing branches of heather, harebell, and stately foxglove, which here and there adorned the narrow path through the wide moor. Every now and then they stopped for Frederick to gather the flowers eagerly pointed to by those thin white fingers, and soon Mabel had her lap full of the choicest, and was enjoying her expedition thoroughly.

"Fred," at length she said, "I think I hear voices. What could bring people to this wild place?"

"I hear them too, Mab; and now I can see men and dogs at a distance. It must be a coursing match.

Tom told me there was to be a great one some day soon. We shall come in for the sport."

"But I don't like to see dogs hunt and kill poor little hares. It makes me think of Tiny. I do hope they will not find him!"

"Not much fear, Mab; there are plenty of hares in the world besides Tiny. Here come the greyhounds in full chase." And Frederick ascended a hillock the better to see, but Mabel hid her face in her hands.

"Fred, tell me when it is over," she said.

"How the hare does turn and double! Still the dogs are gaining on it. Now—now it is caught and killed! and here they all come in this direction!"

"I am so sorry the little hare did not get off, Fred!"

"They have found another already, Mab, and quite close to us, too! Such a splendid course! with a fresh pair of greyhounds; do look!"

Mabel raised her head, as the the poor hunted animal, having exhausted every device of turning and winding, took a direct course across the moor, straining every muscle, and gasping painfully for breath, while the dogs bounded on, gaining rapidly at each stride. A few moments more would have ended this contest of speed, when the tired hare, seeing the Bath-chair exactly in the path, made a spring, and took refuge in Mabel's lap. It was the work of a few seconds to cover up the panting creature with wild flowers, and gather up her dress so as to form a complete screen. The dogs, not seeing their prey any longer before them, were at fault—for greyhounds hunt by sight, not scent—and wandered up and down in a restless, puzzled manner. Just then some of the gentlemen belonging to the coursing party approached.

"What shall we do, Mab?" asked her brother; "for they will surely ask if we have seen the hare."

"We must only tell the truth, Fred; but I won't give it up to be hunted again."

She had scarcely ceased speaking when they were saluted by several of the neighbouring gentlemen, who expressed pleasure at seeing Mabel out again after her long illness.

"And so you have come to see the sport?" said one. "Now, perhaps you could tell us something of the hare; for it disappeared just here, as suddenly as if the ground had opened and swallowed it up."

"Look at the poor little thing," replied Mabel, as she removed some of the wild flowers; "it came to me for protection, and I think it must be my own pet Tiny."

"Like enough," muttered Tom, who was standing behind holding the greyhounds, "the very same leveret, grown big; for wouldn't it be afraid to go to Miss Mabel if it didn't know her?"

The whole party looked with surprise and interest at the little animal curled up so snugly and confidingly in Mabel's lap, and congratulated her on the recovery of her favourite. Indeed, a happier little girl could not be, as she was drawn home by her brother through the flowery fields—brighter to her now, in the grey of evening, than when the morning sun shone so brightly and the gay butterflies sported and the bees hummed.

"Do you know, Fred," she said, "that all this reminds me of the story of the sheep that wandered off—

"'Away on the mountains wild and bare,
Away from the tender Shepherd's care

—just as we do from God. It did not love Him well enough to stay in the fold, but He loved it all the time, and went to seek it 'out on the hills,' where it would have perished had He not saved and brought it back; and then there was such joy!"

"But, Mab, you did not go out to look for your pet."

"No, for I couldn't know where it had strayed to. The Good Shepherd can always see His sheep—that is the difference; but I loved Tiny all the while he was away; and now I feel such joy at having found him!"

By this time the hare had ceased panting, and in a few days regained its usual health and sprightliness. The house in the garden was once more inhabited; and though Tiny frisked about the walks and grass-plots, he never again attempted an escape to his native hills and moors. S. T. A. R.

"THE QUIVER" BIBLE CLASS.

224. What present was given to Gehazi by Naaman the Syrian?

225. Why did St. Paul boast so much of the liberality of the Church in Achaia?

226. Where is it stated that adders are poisonous? Quote passage.

227. By what means did Rahab aid the escape of the spies sent to Jericho?

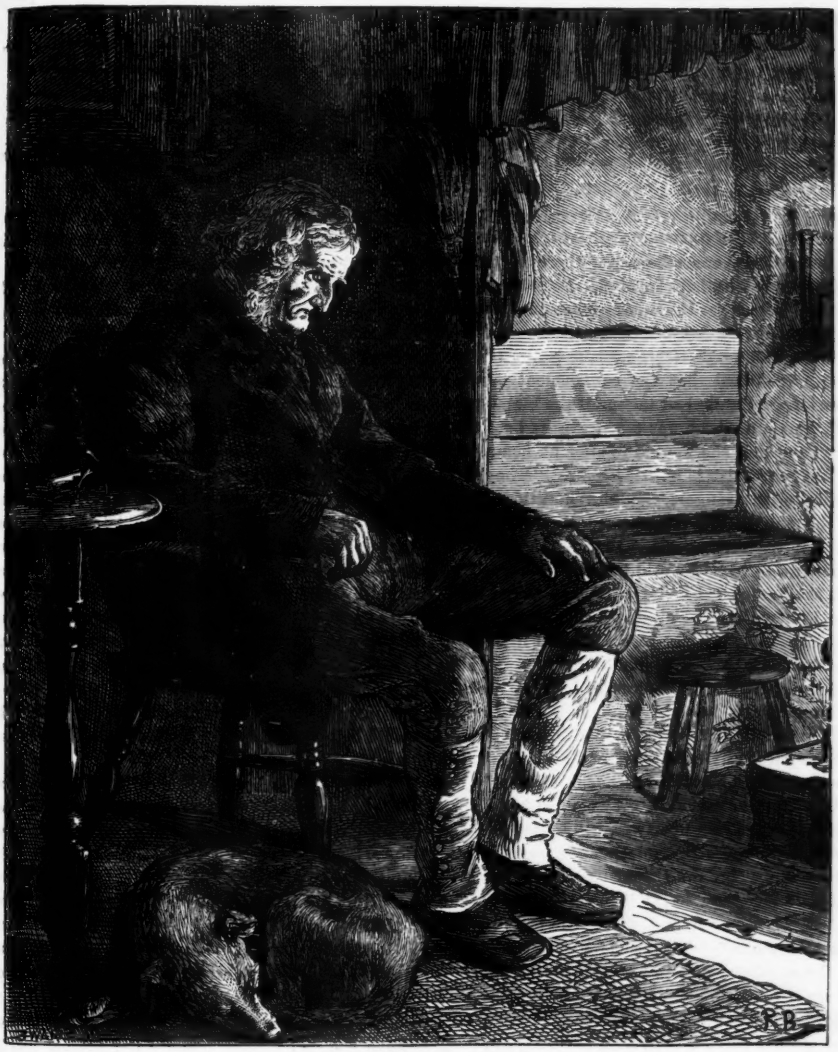
228. Which of the Apostles were present at our Lord's transfiguration?

229. What two kings disguised themselves before entering into the battle, and were both slain by archers?

230. Quote a passage in which St. Paul tells us how to know his Epistles.

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS ON PAGE 544.

210. The Sidonians (1 Kings v. 6).



211. "He was led as a sheep to the slaughter; and like a lamb dumb before his shearer so opened He not His mouth, &c." (Acts viii. 32, 33).

212. 2 Kings iii. 15—19.

213. "Judah and Israel were many, as the sand which is by the sea in multitude, eating and drinking, and making merry" (1 Kings iv. 20).

214. The wearing long robes (Luke xx. 46).

215. Seven years (1 Kings vi. 38).

(Drawn by ROBERT BARNES.)

FOURSCORE AND FIVE.

FOURSCORE and five! and in my chair I sit;
The dying embers flicker and grow red;
And busy shadows in the firelight flit,
Shades of the happy years long past and dead.

I see her face, who 'neath the daisies sleeps,
Bride of my youth, loved wife of fifty years;
A recent grief oft o'er its loved ones weeps;
But I! ah, no! mine lies too deep for tears.

The smoke curls upward, and again there throng
About me faces soft, and young, and fair:
Kate with her merry burst of mirth and song,
And blue-eyed Nellie with her golden hair.

My boy, my cherished first-born, who hath lain
Forty long years beneath the Atlantic wave,
From those red ashes smiles at me again,
Speaks to his father's heart from out his grave.

Fourscore and five! The scene is closing fast;
Lonely I muse, for time hath o'er me flown,
Plucked the green branches, o'er the old tree passed,
And left the withered trunk to die alone.

A. H. BALDWIN.

THE BRIDGE BETWEEN.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE TROUBLES OF CHATTY AND MOLLY," "THE DINGY HOUSE AT KENSINGTON," "QUEEN MADGE," "AGAINST HERSELF," ETC., ETC., ETC.

CHAPTER XXVII.—DOROTHY ANSWERS HER OWN QUESTION.

"HOW generous he was; there never was any one half so kind," Dorothy said to herself, as she went to her own room at last.

She was thinking of George Blakesley. He had told Mr. Woodward that the engagement between them was over; but he had taken all the blame upon himself, saying that he was too grave and staid for Dorothy, and that she wanted to stay at home with her brothers and sisters a little longer. "They were not going to be strangers, though," he said, and he hoped he should still be allowed to come to the house.

"Poor little girl!" he said tenderly to himself, as he left the house; "I believe she has lost her heart to that Fuller, though I always thought that he was after the Beauty. I wish she would put a little more earnestness into her life, and think of something beyond the garden and her story and poetry books."

"How generous he is!" thought Dorothy again. And she sat down by the window, and looked vacantly out at the garden and the trees, and all she loved so well, and soon might have to leave. Presently she looked up at the clear hard grey sky, with the stars shining brightly down upon her. "I used to think they were little holes in the sky once, and the light of heaven shone through them. I should like to go to heaven," she thought; "it must be so beautful there. I might just as well die. I'm sure I am of no use to any one." Then suddenly, almost with a start, the question came to her lips—"But should I get there if I did die?" and it was a long time before she answered it, with sad bitter tears chasing each other down her cheeks. "Why, I never did anything good in my whole life, never! What right have I to heaven? I am very selfish, I have always lived to please myself, and thought of myself, and had dreams and hopes all for myself. Oh, what shall I do!" She went away from the window, and sat down beside the bed on which Sally was sleeping. She thought of all George Blakesley had said by the fire-light on the evening he had first told her he loved her; how some great man, she did not remember his name, had said that we should regard the world as a workshop, in which we should make something good and beautiful; and the longing she had felt at the time, and forgotten ever since, came back. He had said, too, that work was the noblest of all occupations, and that there was always plenty to do to make life better for others; and that if we did not make some one the happier or the better for our being in the world, we were only so much human lumber, taking up light and life and room to no purpose whatever. "I can't think what he ever loved me for," she thought; "he must have seen how selfish I was. I would give the world to be better, and to make something beautiful!" and then suddenly she heard Sally breathing, and remembered her father's wish that she should take care of her. "And I will," she said, firmly, to herself; "I will learn to work and to take care of her and of others too, and in trying to make their lives better I shall make my own so too. Oh, how wicked I have been!" and she burst into tears again, and, almost without knowing it, sank on her knees, and prayed that God would help her, and make her hands and heart strong to work.

"I believe that is the secret of it all—I have not thought enough of God. George said half the teaching of Christ was summed up in working and in helping others." Suddenly it flashed upon her, "Perhaps this is what we live for—to make other lives beautiful, till in their reflected light our own become beautiful also. I believe I have found out the secret at last," she thought. It seemed to Dolly as if new feelings came to her in that long hour she sat alone and made these resolutions for a new life, and she looked back almost wonderingly at the past days, in which she had fretted because her mother had not loved her very much. "I never gave her any reason," she thought; and then a longing came to go to her before she went to sleep that night.

She knew that her father was still in his study, and her mother alone in her room, so she slipped softly along the short corridor, and listened for a moment at the door. There was a faint sound, as of some one sobbing.

"Mamma!" she said, opening the door gently.

"What is the matter?" Mrs. Woodward asked, surprised.

Her children had never been very demonstrative towards her, and she never dreamt of Dorothy's errand.

"Mamma! dear mamma! what is the matter?" and with all the pent-up longing for love which still was in the girl's heart, and the aching feeling of all the past still strong upon her, and all the disappointment it held, she went forward and flung herself down by her mother's side. "Oh, dear mamma, tell me what it is!"

"We are ruined, Dorothy, quite ruined! Your father has lost all the money, and will be in the bankruptcy court soon, and we shall have to go away from here. He has lost my money, and all——"

"But don't grieve so, dearest mother," she said, kissing her as in all her life she had never kissed her before. "We are all with you, and we will work."

"Oh, what can you do, dear?" asked Mrs. Woodward, touched by the tenderness of the daughter whom she had always neglected for her prettier sister.

"I can work, and I will. I'll teach, or beg, or go to service, if you like. Mr. Blakesley says I write a nice hand; perhaps I can do something with that."

"But you are going to be married, you forget that," she said, sorrowfully, for she was beginning already to lean upon this girl who had only just resolved to bear the burden of other sorrows besides her own.

"No, mamma, I am going to stay with you, and take care of you and Sally and papa."

Dorothy was right—she was no longer a child, but a woman. Then her mother turned to her, and caressed and thanked her for her kindness, and told her she had always neglected her for Netta, who had been quite angry when she found that ruin stared her parents in the face.

"But it will not hurt her," said Dorothy. "She is going to make a grand marriage, and going to India."

"Yes; but she is so ashamed that Sir George should know we are poor, and that she cannot have her friends here any longer, or have a grand wedding."

"But Netta has money of her own."

"Only the interest of a thousand pounds, and she has to buy her trousseau. You had better go now, dear, and I am so grateful for your kindness," and she put her arms round her daughter's neck, and kissed her. Then Dorothy went back to her own room, and sat down, and though she cried again that night, they were not such bitter tears as before; and she woke in the morning with the keen sense of having found something new and strange — the answer to her own long-weariful question, "What do we live for?"

CHAPTER XXVIII.—DOROTHY AND NETTA.

"NETTA," asked Dorothy, as she helped the Beauty to look over her garments, a few days later, "are you happy?"

"Yes," she answered, shortly.

"Do you love Sir George?"

"Oh, I don't know, I suppose so; don't talk nonsense, Dorothy!" she answered; "I'm going to marry him, and that's enough."

"Should you have had him if he had been poor?"

"No, certainly not," and the tears came into the Beauty's blue eyes, though she tried to hide them from her sister. "But I can't bear poverty, and I am not fit for it—it would kill me."

"Netta, I want to tell you something. It was not my fault, but once I overheard you talking to Mr. Fuller, and he called you 'darling.' Did you love him?"

"What right have you to ask?" Netta was trembling and pale, not angry, as Dorothy had expected.

"Because I think I should like you better if you really did care for him," she answered in a low voice.

"Then, I did—I do still, though I hate myself for it. I began to flirt with him, to tease you, Dorothy, and then I fell in love with him. I never meant to marry him, unless he got rich, and I soon saw he never would. He would have dreamt of his love for me for ever, but he would never have found strength to work for me. I hate your dreamers," she flashed out, "who pass their time dreaming dreams they have not strength to realise, and who blend all their lives into their foolish musings until all realities that are not hard, and do not touch their sense of pain, become a part of them."

"Yet you loved him, Netta?"

"Yes, I did. I took him from you, I know that, but it is a good thing. He would only have made you a dreamer like himself, until you woke to hard realities. I did love him, Dorothy, but I always despised him a little too. I always shall. And I could not face poverty. I am very selfish, I know that, yet my selfishness did you good. He was very certain that you were in love with him, too, Dorothy, quite sure of it, and he has the worst kind of vanity, which prides itself on not being corrected.

"Oh, Netta, how can you speak so of a man you say you love?"

"I don't know. Perhaps I don't love him; not so much as I do myself, that is certain, for I could not give up luxury for any man living. I can't think how you can be content to stay at home and face poverty—it is such a terrible thing!" Then suddenly she got up. "You forgive me, don't you, Dorothy, and, see here, I will give you this ring."

It made Dorothy think of the bracelet she gave her nearly three years ago.

"No," she said, and refused to take it, but Netta made her, and afterwards Dorothy always wore it in remembrance of the day on which Netta had asked her forgiveness.

"Mr. Blakesley," said Dorothy, when, a week later, he paid them an awkward visit—he had so wanted to see her again—"I want you to help me in something." She felt so shy and hesitating in telling him what she had to say.

"Yes, what is it?"

"I want—I want to know, do you think I could earn money in any way? I want to work."

He gave her no approbation, which she had half expected he would—expressed no surprise, only answered, in his usual quiet manner, "Yes, of course you can work, if you wish to do so."

"But do you think I can earn any money?" she asked; "and what can I do?"

"Why are you in such a hurry for money?

"Because we are poor."

"I see. Yes, you could work; you know French, and you play pretty well, or you would make a good reader or amanuensis."

"And how should I set about this?"

"You might advertise, for one thing. I'll ask all the people I know, too, if they know of anything."

That was all he said. He seemed no longer to take any vivid interest in her. She was a little piqued and angry, but still she did not falter, she had made a step in the right direction, and she meant to persevere.

"Mr. Blakesley," she said one day, "I wish I could get out of the way of dreaming so much."

"Dreams are good in a way," he answered; "we may grope on in a dream, seeking for an idea that is worth realising, and finding it at last."

"But perhaps we have not strength to realise it.

"Then the fault is ours," he answered.

A fortnight later and Netta was married, and sailed for India almost immediately afterwards.

"Dorothy," the Beauty said, "I shall never see Adrian again. If you ever marry him—and you may, for I think, unfortunately, he liked you, and you will never care for George Blakesley—tell him some day that, heartless as he thought me, he spoilt my life. If he had loved me better than his ease, he might have made me a different woman."

"What a terrible thing it is!" thought Dorothy. "I see now that, by not trying to do some good in the world, we are not merely passive, but are letting wrong grow up under our feet;" then she caught sight of her face in the glass, and thought how it had aged lately, and she felt that her heart had aged much more.

(To be continued.)

MAN'S WAY NOT IN HIMSELF.—I.

BY THE REV. JAMES SPENCE, D.D., AUTHOR OF "HOURS WITH DANIEL," ETC.

"O Lord, I know that the way of man is not in himself."—JER. x. 23.

THESE words may be understood in either of two ways, both of which are true and important. They may refer to man's providential path in life, the ordering of which is in the hands of God, who alone knows what is best for us; or they may refer to man's moral and spiritual path through the world, the keeping of which was lost by our first father Adam, and the direction or safety of which is not now in the hands of man. The design and idea of the prophet seem specially perhaps to refer to the former of these truths. He acknowledges the supreme controlling power of Divine Providence in the affairs of men, and particularly with regard to its bearing on the military march of the Babylonian monarch. Nebuchadnezzar was at that time contemplating an expedition, to chastise the Egyptians for venturing to approach his dominions with hostile intentions. Such was his purpose; but the design that Jehovah meant him to accomplish was the punishment of the Jews for departing from His service and worship. Accordingly, in the context, the Jews are called upon to prepare for their migration as captives to Babylon, with the announcement that Nebuchadnezzar did not come of himself against them, but by direction of the providence of God.

Sacred history affords many illustrations of this view of the truth, that man's way is not in himself. The way of Abram was not in himself when summoned to leave the country of his nativity and kindred; he went out, not knowing whither he went, that he might be the father and founder of a wonderful people, and that in his seed all the nations of the earth might be blessed. The way of Moses was not in himself, when taken from the ark of bulrushes; he was reared by Pharaoh's daughter, amidst all the luxury and learning of the Egyptian court, that he might be fitted to be the leader and lawgiver of God's chosen nation. The way of David was not in himself when feeding his father's flocks on the plains of Bethlehem; he was being trained to be raised to the throne, and to become the sweet singer of Israel. The way of Saul of Tarsus was not in himself, as he sat at the feet of Gamaliel, and was receiving all the culture of a well-born Jew, and the education that became a free Roman citizen, to fit him for his future career as the apostle of Christ to the Gentiles.

On the other hand, the words of the prophet may refer to the fact, that man has wandered from God, and cannot of himself now either find or walk in the way that rightfully should be occupied by his true nature. Thus, the Jews had departed from God, and had unmistakably shown that their true way was not in themselves. It really matters very little as to which of these views of this text of Scripture we take, for the one fact in relation to man is based on the other. His way, providentially, is not in himself, mainly, if not exclusively, because his way spiritually and morally is not in himself. He cannot direct his own steps or guide his own course, because he has thrown himself out of harmony with God, and severed the tie which bound him to perfection and safety as an obedient and dutiful child of the Infinite Father.

I. This language may be viewed as an acknowledgment on the part of man—"O Lord, I know that the way of man is not in himself."

1. It is manifestly implied that man has a way,—that there is a way belonging to his manhood, a way at once peculiar to it and worthy of it, a way in which he should walk before God, and in relation to Him. No one doubts this. Every creature which God has made has a way. To what department soever of the animal creation any creature belongs, there is a way or manner of existence in accordance with its nature, a way for which it was formed and fitted, and in which alone it can reach the highest good and the full enjoyment of its being. There is no exception to this amidst the multitudinous forms of life with which the Almighty Creator has filled the universe. In the fishes that move in the water, in the fowls that wing their flight in the airy empyrean, in the cattle that browse in the meadows, in the wild beasts that roam the forests and jungles in search of prey, you find in each species a way consistent with its nature, a way more or less clearly defined, in which the creatures reach the design of their being, and the true enjoyment of their existence. The way of the leviathan that plays in the deep is not identical with the way of the horse, that "paweth in the valley and rejoiceth in his strength;" nor is the way of the eagle, that "makes her nest on high," and "dwelleth upon the crag of the rock," to be confounded with the way of the ostrich, "which leaveth her eggs in the earth and warmeth them in the dust;" nor is the way of the butterfly, that has sprung from the worm, the same as the way of the bee, which gathers honey from the opening flower. Nor, surely, is the way of man to be confounded with the way of any mere animal, however marked may be the attributes of its sagacity or instinct.

No; man has a way which belongs to himself, and characteristic of his true manhood, a way peculiar to his nature, just as the ways of the lower creatures are peculiar to them. But how different and how superior his must be! According to the nobleness of his origin, capability, nature, and destiny, will be the distinction and peculiarity of his way. Remember his origin, and in the fact that he was created in the image of God, a living, rational, responsible being, you may see that which will indicate the nobleness of his way. Remember his capability, with a mind that can soar through the universe in quest of wisdom, and a heart that may throb with the pulsations of a Divine affection, and a conscience that may echo the voice of God in his soul, a finite being fitted to hold converse with the Infinite, and you may judge somewhat as to the elevation of his way. Remember his position, as lord of the lower creation, with dominion over the creatures, with power to replenish and subdue the earth, and you see that which points out the majesty of his way. Remember his prospects, with a destiny before him for weal or for woe, which time does not measure and which death cannot close; and you will be convinced that the way of his manhood cannot be exclusively or chiefly amid the secular, sordid, or social interests of this changing state.

2. With such relationships, capabilities, and prospects, then, the way of man must be an elevated and noble way. It will be the way of a godly allegiance in the uprise of his spirit, the homage of his mind, the love of his heart, and the obedience of his life, to God his Creator and Father. What other way can be worthy of manhood, but that in which the centre of its attraction, the source of its power, and the object of its devotion and hope, are found in the living God? "The spirit of man is the candle of the Lord." And with such grasp of thought and force of affection in his being, should not his way be the way of reason and spirituality, giving to his rational and moral nature its rightful supremacy? If he were made to be ruled by impulse or instinct, then sensuous delights and carnal gratifications might be the chief good of his life, but with an intellect that is as the candle of the Lord, and a heart that may heave with the life of Divine love, and a conscience that may rule him as with the voice of God, and a will that may bend the very elements to do his bidding, surely man's way must be spiritual, if it is to be natural, amidst the realities of the invisible and under the shadow of the Almighty. And should it not be the way of royalty, of a manly dominion, the path of a king, not of a slave, a way in which he shall show that he is the vicegerent of God and the intelligent priest of the great temple of Nature?—a way never to be confounded with unreason, mere animal instinct, or brute disposition or force. Surely, in him the rational shall not succumb to the sensual, nor the spiritual to the carnal, nor the attribute of dominion to the bonds of corruption and sin. And with such a destiny before him, born to live for ever, must not his way be the way of wise forethought, making the present a preparation for immortal honour, a becoming portico to a temple that shall be luminous with Divine glory and vocal with Divine praise for ever and ever? With such a prospect, surely the way of man will not be the way of reckless and improvident thoughtlessness; there will be no forgetfulness of the future in the passing interests of the present, no denial of the powers of the world to come in absorption by the concerns of this world.

Such should be the way of manhood—the way of godliness, spirituality, royalty, and holy anticipation; the way of a king, I repeat, not of a slave, the only way worthy of his position and powers and prospects. And when he came forth from his Creator's hands at first, this way was in him.

3. But now the way of man is not in himself. Here is the proof of his degeneracy, and moral degradation, the evidence of his fall. There was a period in human history when man's way was in himself, but it was very brief. Though made at first upright, he has "sought out many inventions," and now his way is no longer in himself.

Other creatures around him have their way in themselves. Instinct or impulse directs them unwillingly, so that following their nature is really the mode and law of their existence. This is manifestly the case, to whatever department of the mere animal creation we look. The bee that flies from flower to flower in the garden, or amidst the blooming and fragrant heather on the mountain side, and returns to its hive laden with honey, to build its cell, according to true mathematical principles, has its way in itself. The lark, which, in the dewy morning, soars aloft from its nest in the grass to greet the rising sun with its grateful song, has its way in itself. The cattle that feed by the water-courses, and the lambs that play in the green fields, and the coneys that dwell among the rocks, and the beasts of prey that roam the desert, have all their way in themselves, in which their instinct and nature guide them safely, happily, and surely. But alas! it is not so with man, the loftiest and most important creature of God on the earth. His way is not now in himself, so that, in this sense, he may be said to be the lowest.

Further, you see that these lower creatures, when left most to themselves, will most surely go in their own proper way. The birds that sing among the branches and make the groves vocal with their melody, do not find their true way when placed in the cage, that they may fill the parlour or the drawing-room with their pleasant song. The lion, that finds his real life in the forest or the wilderness, living on his prey and roaming at large as the king of savage beasts, has not his true way when caught by the snare of man and made in fierce restraint to pace an iron cage in the menagerie or zoological gardens for our instruction or amusement. No creature on earth can fairly or happily live out of its own allotted course. All have their way in themselves, and most impressively show that way when they are free and left most fully to themselves.

But it is very different with man; for when he is left most fully to himself, he is most likely to go farthest astray. His way is not in himself; and the history of the world proclaims that man, when left to himself, becomes most unmanly, and the human being becomes most inhuman. Professing himself to be wise, he becomes a fool, and shows that the worship and service of the creature are more attractive to him and mightier over him than the worship of the Creator.

SCRIPTURE LESSONS FOR SCHOOL AND HOME.

SCRIPTURE STORIES. SECOND SERIES. No. 2. VISITORS.

Chapters to be read—Luke ii. Matt. ii. (parts of).

INTRODUCTION. Remind how friends always like to be told of any happy event,—like to come and see a new-born babe. But had this poor mother many friends? Few would trouble much about the birth of a child to a poor woman in a village. Still, some there were to take an interest: who were they? Yes, the angels knew of the birth; knew who He was, and why He was coming into the world; they proclaim the news—to whom? We shall see.

I. THE SHEPHERDS OF BETHLEHEM. (Read Luke ii. 8—20) (a) The place. Ask whose city this was said to be. Remind of Jesse, David's father, living there; of David minding his flocks in perhaps the same fields; killing the lion and the bear; watching the stars by night, and composing a Psalm on the subject; the heavens telling God's glory and the meanness of man; made lower than the angels, and then crowned with glory. Compare Psalm viii. 3—5, with Heb. ii. 9, to show how the prophecy was fulfilled by Christ. In these fields are shepherds. What are they doing? Wild animals still about by night (see John x. 12). What do they see? what can it be? The moon? it is stronger than that. Picture them gazing with wonder and awe at the light getting clearer and brighter each moment. Now a bright form emerges, it is coming towards them; it is beginning to speak. Picture them holding their breath for fear; keeping close together; straining their ears to listen. What does he say? Fear not; good news to you and all—a Saviour, the Lord. A sign that it is not all fancy—a babe in swaddling clothes, lying in a manger. Then the whole air seems full of angels; a whole chorus of sweet soft voices in the midnight air. They can catch the very words; what are they? Glory on high, peace on earth. What do they propose to do at once? Of course, they must go and worship this Saviour. They set off, too excited to trouble about the sheep. They find it all true. They quickly go about, telling every one the good news, just as it was told them, and do not forget to "praise God, from whom all blessings flow."

PRACTICAL LESSONS. (1) God comes to His people, as Christ to the world, as the angel to the shepherds while doing their duty, so to all. Christ comes before we can come to Him. He first loves us; is held out to us; preached to us. Do we then come to Him, believe in Him, accept Him as our Saviour, worship Him? If not, perhaps He will leave off coming and calling to us. (2) We must make Him known, as the angel to the shepherds, they to those near them, so must we. All cannot preach, but all can do something. Begin with those nearest, teach little brothers and sisters, then may be permitted to teach others. What an honour to make Christ known! —work of angels.

II. THE WISE MEN. (Read Matt. ii. 1—12.) Ask the name of the chief city, not far from Bethlehem. Who held his court there? One day there arrives a party of strange travellers. Who are they? How far have they come? Point out Persia. How would they be known as strangers? Picture the cavalcade—camels, servants, &c., large train of attendants on these Persian princes. What question do they at once ask? perhaps through an interpreter, like Joseph (Gen. xlii. 23). How strange it must seem that no one can tell them! They ask the king for information; he must know where the infant prince is. What made them come at all? Were studying stars, and saw a new meteor. Had read of a star to be seen in Judah; so determined to follow it; have done so, and are brought to Jerusalem. What does Herod do? Explain that the Scribes being employed to write copies of the Scriptures would naturally be familiar with its contents; so they answer at once. What does Herod tell the Magi to do? But does he really intend to worship Him? See what jealousy leads men to—trickery, falsehood, malice, and design of murder. Now follow the Magi, after leaving Herod. As soon as they start, what do they look for? Is the star there? How they must rejoice! Now they come to Bethlehem. Where are the Child and His mother? No longer in the stable—the census over—most of the people have returned, and the inn is no longer crowded. They enter, these rich princes; and see! they kneel in holy reverence before the little babe! What do they see in Him? —a King? Yes, and more; they recognise the Son of God. Now they offer their presents; what are they?—gold, as to a king; frankincense, as to a prophet and priest; while the myrrh may typify His future sufferings, and embalmment as a man in the grave. Remind of the prophecy, that kings should fall down before Christ and bring Him presents (Psalm lxxii. 10, 11).

PRACTICAL LESSONS. The wise men showed (1) Earnestness. Undaunted by prospect of long journey, set out to seek Christ. He is near us. Do we seek Him with equal zeal in prayer, His holy word, &c.? (2) Faith in the guiding star. They believed it would bring them right, so they acted on their belief till it brought them to their journey's end. So does God guide and direct all who trust in Him. We are guided day by day by His counsel, His Spirit, &c. and shall be even to death (Psalm xlviii. 14). (3) Devotion. They gave Christ worship, recognising in Him the Son of God. We worship often with our lips; do we give Him heart-worship? i.e., love Him above all; seek His smile of approval before any one else? (4) Self-sacrifice. They spared not their best, but poured it at His feet. What do we give Him in return for all His gifts to us? We have time, money, influence. Do we give Him these, or spend them only on ourselves? If copy the wise men, shall, like them, find Christ precious, and go on our way rejoicing.

Questions to be answered.

1. State all you know about Bethlehem.
2. In what Psalm is Christ's birth referred to? Give the passage.
3. What lessons may we learn from the shepherds?
4. How were the wise men received at Jerusalem?
5. What did their gifts represent?
6. What practical lessons may we learn from them?

STILL AND DEEP.

BY F. M. F. SKENE, AUTHOR OF "TRIED," "ONE LIFE ONLY," ETC.

CHAPTER XXIX.

LAURA WYNDHAM'S first proceeding after the departure of Bertrand Lisle from Chiverley had been to compel her father to agree to a plan she had formed, of spending the interval before her marriage in London. Chiverley had become more hateful to her than ever now that she no longer had even the society of John Pemberton to enliven her, and she declared it was quite impossible that she could procure even the scanty trousseau which was all they could afford in any shops less fashionable than those of the West-end of London. There was but one way by which Mr. Wyndham could gratify Laura in her wish without incurring an expense greater than he could bear, and that was, by making an exchange of duty with some London clergyman for the time he wished to be absent from his own parish; he was much too inert to undertake the arrangement himself however, and it was Lurline who put advertisements in the papers, and managed the correspondence which ensued. It was not very difficult to find an incumbent glad to escape from the dust and heat of London for the months of July and August, and one such was induced to enter into arrangements with the Wyndhams, which resulted in their having been established in his house in town two or three weeks before the declaration of war had broken over France like a thunder-clap, which reverberated, with its ominous peal, through every country in Europe.

To Laura Wyndham the news was a matter of the most perfect indifference. Although she had caught Bertrand's fancy sufficiently to make him wish to marry her, she had never in the slightest degree won his confidence, and she knew nothing of his deep hidden love for the native land of his fathers; nor was it possible for her selfish worldly nature to comprehend the generous enthusiasm which could sacrifice personal interests to any cause whatever. She went on, therefore, making arrangements for her wedding, which she was resolved should take place in London, and at a time when every one was looking forward with dismay and dread to the wide-spread suffering which was certain to result from the war, the chief subject of the Lorelei's thoughts was the expected arrival of a set of jewels which Bertrand had promised to send her as his present before their marriage.

About ten days after war had been declared, however, she received a letter from Bertrand which threw her into a violent state of indignation and disquiet: he wrote evidently under the influence of great excitement, assuming that she would at once understand how for him, by birth a Frenchman, the fate of his native country in this tremendous war must needs supersede every other consideration, and absorb his whole soul with feverish anxiety till the probable results of the struggle were known. Bertrand seemed to have been so accustomed to Mary's ready sympathy all his life long, that it had never occurred to him to doubt that Lurline would feel for and with him in his present emergency, as entirely as would have been the case with his early friend, and he went on to pour out to her all the conflicting feelings that had plunged him in the most painful perplexity: the longing to fly at once to fight for France against her foes; the unwillingness to seem to act in the smallest degree unfairly by the country of his adoption; the check put upon his strong impulse to give up all at once for the defence of his native land, by the certainty that as his single arm could avail France but little, he should, by doing so, for a mere sentiment wreck his whole career, lose for ever the position to which he had only attained by years of steady progress, and reduce himself to a state of comparative poverty; all these contending feelings warred in his mind, he said, night and day, depriving him completely of calmness and rest; but the question would soon be decided: if France were victorious, and surely her arms could not fail, it would probably be absolute madness to ruin his prospects for life in order to offer her that which she neither needed nor desired—but if she were unfortunate—ah, then!—(he did not finish his sentence, he seemed certain that Lurline would understand him). He ended by saying that his darling Lorelei would, he was assured, feel with him that in any case their wedding must be postponed for a time; it would make no difference to their mutual love; his heart should be with her wherever he was; and he trusted it might be but a little time before he could come to claim her.

Laura Wyndham read this letter to the end, then flung it to the ground and stamped upon it in a fit of ungovernable passion. One of her best natural qualities was an even temper, which was not easily ruffled, but the contents of this most unwelcome epistle were too much even for her equanimity; her own self interest was her first and last thought always, and it was clear that her plan of becoming the wife of Bertrand Lisle, which she had brought to a triumphant success by so much wily astuteness, was not only thrown back to an indefinite period, but absolutely endangered altogether. It was not love for Bertrand himself, as we know, which made her wish to marry him, but only for the sake of his position, his large income, and the gay world to which he would introduce her; and she knew that if he once joined the French army, all this, which she alone desired, would be put out of her reach for ever; he must, of course, instantly quit the office he held under the English Government, with its generous emoluments and many advantages; and as she had taken care to inform herself as to his means, she knew very well that if he did so he would be reduced to the mere pittance he derived from his mother, and she as his wife to an even more impoverished condition than that under which she had so long suffered at Chiverley. The bare idea of such a disappointment just when she had attained the summit of her hopes was not to be endured for a moment, and she paced up and down the room in angry agitation, while she thought out the best mode of holding him back from the fatal act of resigning his post; not the faintest response did her cold heart give to all the feelings for which Bertrand claimed her sympathy—patriotism and self-devotion were incomprehensible names to her, into the meaning of which she could not enter, and she simply scorned him for what she held to be the miserable folly of thus ruining his own career.

(Drawn by WILLIAM SMALL.)

"Twisting a long spray of ivy among her bright curls."—p. 587.

Finally, a letter was sent off, which contained a wild passionate appeal to him for her sake not to leave his home of safety and peace to enter on so dangerous a campaign. She told him it would kill her if she were to know him to be in all the perils of war—that he had won her love, and therefore she had a claim on his life, and that if he did not wish her to die of terror and distress he must give up all idea of volunteering for the defence of France; then she added that the very idea of such a calamity had given her so great a shock that her nerves were completely shaken, and that she should have neither rest nor peace now so long as he was out of her sight, and therefore she was driven to beg that he would shorten the interval which was to have elapsed before their marriage, and come at once to take her back with him as his wife to his Italian home, where they might dwell safely together while this terrible war raged at a distance, unseen and unheard by them in their happiness. The Lorelei had a triumphant smile on her lips when she closed her letter, for she had never yet failed to master Bertrand's truer nature, and she believed that she would do so now, but she had somewhat overreached herself, for although the letter was calculated to convince Bertrand more than ever of the truth of her love for him, yet her entire want of sympathy with his most sacred feelings could not fail to jar on him, and, unconscious as he was of the deceit and cunning which had dictated it, he could only gain from it an impression of her shallowness and weakness, while in spite of all her efforts her selfishness pierced through every line of it.

It was a stifling afternoon in August, a few days after one of the worst defeats of the French army, when a cab drove up to the door of the house inhabited by the Wyndhams, and a gentleman alighted from it, and, going up the steps, rang the bell for admittance. It was not Bertrand, however, but a man in every way unlike him. He seemed about forty years of age, with a somewhat portly figure, and attired with the most scrupulous correctness. He had strongly-marked hard features, a sallow complexion, and small keen black eyes; his hair also, was black and very smooth, and his face close shaven. He had a look of great decision and self-possession, and his manner, when he spoke to the servant who opened the door, was full of quiet authority. Was Miss Wyndham at home? he inquired. The maid thought he said Mrs. Wyndham, and answered that she was lying down, but Miss Wyndham was in the drawing-room. It was Miss Wyndham he wished to see, he answered, and straightway walked into the house. Being asked his name, he replied, "Mr. Brant."

CHAPTER XXX.

Mr. Brant is an individual of whose previous career it is necessary that we should give some account, in order that his share in the events yet to be recorded in this history may be better understood. The son of an English father and an Italian mother, he possessed some of the characteristics of both nations. He had the courage, coolness, and self-possession of an Englishman, with all that disregard of truth and reckless unscrupulousness which often are to be found among the inhabitants of the soft and sunny south. At the present moment Mr. Brant was established as one of the prince merchants of the town where Bertrand Lisle held his diplomatic post, and he had in that part of the world the reputation of enormous wealth; certainly his mode of living supported such a view: he inhabited there a vast mansion that was almost a palace, enriched with marble and gilding externally, and with the most costly fittings of velvet and silk and splendid furniture within its walls; carriages, horses, servants, everything that money could procure, was there in rich profusion; and, when Mr. Brant's wife was alive, no lady went to Court with such magnificent diamonds, or gave such grand entertainments at her own house. She had been an Italian lady, whom he had married when very young, and her manners and character had not been altogether satisfactory to the more fastidious portion of the society with whom precisely Mr. Brant was anxious to stand well. He made up his mind that his second wife should be an Englishwoman, and although it was not more than a year since Mrs. Brant's death, he was, just at this time, exceedingly anxious to replace her. There were uncomfortable rumours as to Mr. Brant's financial position: he was known to be always engaged in gigantic speculations, and some of these had certainly proved failures of late, so that it had even been said he must be on the verge of ruin; but he himself carried matters with a high hand, and declared his successes so far exceeded his losses that they were a matter of perfect indifference to him. Nevertheless, persons watched him and his house very narrowly, with a view to discover how his affairs really stood, as the reputation of his colossal fortune had gained him unlimited credit, and if it should ever happen that Richard Brant became really bankrupt it would involve the ruin of thousands. It was, therefore, for many reasons, a matter of the deepest importance to him that the public mind should be reassured on the subject of his solvency, and he could not better do so, as he imagined, than by keeping open house, and launching out into a still more profuse style of expenditure; but he was childless, and the immense business transactions in which he was always engaged rendered it impossible for him to enter so much into society as would be necessary for the attainment of his object. It was necessary, therefore, that he should have a wife to represent him at the fêtes he intended to give, and at the houses of others, and it was mainly with the view of finding a suitable lady for this position that he was making the journey to England, though he had not the least idea that he was taking quite the most favourable step for the accomplishment of his purpose when he agreed to perform a commission for Bertrand Lisle in London.

It was, however, in the performance of his promise to him whom he had known as the English chargé d'affaires, that he now found his way to the house of the Wyndhams. Sally, who had accompanied them to London, and whose rustic manners did not quite meet the requirements of civilised life, went on before him to the drawing-room door, which she opened, and then, standing back, she made him a sign to go in, and closed it upon him when he had obeyed her, without having dreamt of announcing him. In consequence of this proceeding Mr. Brant stood for two or three minutes within the room, before the only person who occupied it was aware of his presence. He was by no means sorry to have an opportunity of contemplating at his leisure the most beautiful vision he had ever beheld.

Lurline, with all her shining hair floating loose on her shoulders, was standing before a little toilet mirror, which was placed on the table in front of her, and she was engaged in trying on, one after another, various wreaths of artificial flowers, which she intended should form part of her trousseau. At the moment when Brant entered the room she was twisting a long spray of ivy among her bright curls, with crystals gleaming on its leaves in guise of dewdrops. It suited well with her fantastic beauty—the dark glossy leaves enhancing the effect of her dazzling fairness and brilliant eyes. She was in a most graceful attitude, with her white hands raised above her head, holding the green glittering wreath, and her bewitching face lit up with smiles at the sight of her own successful loveliness, while the position showed her lithe slender figure to the best advantage. She wore a charming summer dress of light muslin, set off with ribbons and white lace, and all around her were scattered gay-coloured silks and other materials, from which she had apparently been making a selection. Richard Brant had a keen eye for beauty in any shape, and he took in at a glance the peculiar charms of Laura's appearance in all its effective brilliancy. "What a sensation she would have made in our salons if Lisle had brought her out to us!" he said to himself; "but there is an end to any chance of that of course." Probably he made some movement which attracted Lurline's attention, for suddenly she turned round and brought the light of her flashing eyes full on his face. She started when she saw a stranger, and stood for a moment looking at him, still with her hands upraised, and the long locks of her burnished hair straying over them in picturesque confusion. He came forward instantly, and, with perfect ease of manner, apologised for what seemed to be an intrusion, as the servant had left him to introduce himself, which he did by giving her his name.

"But I have my credentials here, Miss Wyndham," he continued, taking out a letter and a small parcel from the breast of his coat; "Mr. Lisle charged me to deliver these to you, and to give you all such further explanations of his present position as you may wish to have."

"Is he not coming? is he not here?" she exclaimed, with breathless impatience.

"No, indeed; I fear he is in a much less safe and satisfactory place."

"You do not mean that he has gone to this odious war, after all?" she exclaimed.

"I grieve to have to tell it you, Miss Wyndham, but it is only too true," said Brant, gently, expecting to see her overcome with distress; instead of that a scarlet flush of indignation flamed into Lurline's delicate cheek, and she stamped her dainty little foot on the ground as she said, with unmistakable irritation, "What utter folly! what moonstruck madness! he ought to be put in a lunatic asylum! it is too bad. I declare I won't read his silly letter, full of sentimental rubbish about France, no doubt!" and she flung it out of her hand on to the table with a scornful gesture. Lurline never gave herself the trouble to conceal her sentiments where no end was to be gained by doing so, and it was evident to Mr. Brant, who knew the world well, that she was speaking with entire frankness now.

"It does indeed seem madness to leave so fair a bride for any cause whatever," he said, aloud; "Mr. Lisle shows more self-denying patriotism than I could have done in his place."

XUM

"Patriotism! bah! what does patriotism mean? it is a mere name; and he never considers me, who was to have been married to him next week, and off to gay Italy; and now I suppose it will never be. It is odious conduct, and I feel inclined to hate him for it. Of course he has resigned his post?"

"Naturally; it was not in his power to retain it under the circumstances. That was done a fortnight since, and he started for the seat of war even before his successor was appointed, for which he will undoubtedly be censured; he can never take office under the English Government again."

"No, I should think not; it is the most irretrievable senselessness I ever heard of. I suppose he has not left himself a loophole of escape?" and she took up the letter and tore it open. It was long, and she sat down to read it, making a sign to Mr. Brant to take a seat also. Poor Bertrand had written a noble, manly, touching letter, which must have melted any heart less cased in selfishness than Laura Wyndham's. He told her all that he had felt as day by day brought in the news of the terrible reverses of the French army, and how, dearly as he loved her, he felt that he must not sacrifice, even to her, his duty and his honour. He was a Frenchman, and he could not remain at a luxurious post in the service of another country while France was bleeding at the heart, and requiring the help of every arm to which she had a right. He must go, and his Lurline need not doubt what it cost him to postpone his marriage, and how it wrung his heart to give both her and himself the pain of even a temporary separation; but in presence of such gigantic disasters and miseries as those which had fallen upon his native land, it would indeed be cowardly and selfish to give any weight to private sorrows, and after all he trusted their happiness was only delayed a little time. It was said on all sides that the war could not last long, and unless he lost his life he would return to claim his darling Lorelei the very first moment it was possible to do so. It was true he should no longer be able to offer her the position she would have graced by her beauty, but they would have a pittance which would enable them to live, though in a very humble manner, and love such as theirs could brave poverty and privation. Perhaps they might live at Chiverley with her father; anyhow, if he survived the war he should very speedily come to claim the promise she had made to him in happier days.

Lurline's lip curled scornfully as she flung down the letter, and she turned to Mr. Brant, detecting at once that he was watching her with undisguised admiration.

"Mr. Bertrand Lisle makes a little too sure of his prize," she said; "he asks me to marry him when he can offer me a suitable position and a prospect of a happy life, and then when he has impoverished himself and ruined all his prospects, he coolly tells me that if he comes alive out of the butchery into which he has plunged for no reason whatever, he shall come and claim my promise to marry him, and thereby enter on an existence of pauperism and degradation; he will find himself mistaken."

"He has indeed made a great mistake," said Mr. Brant, softly. Although I have only the honour of so short an acquaintance with you, I can see that you are one fitted to shine in society, and to be at once its ornament and its delight; our brilliant city would have been the very place for you; life is indeed made joyous there."

"Yes, I know; and, oh, how I longed to go! it is enough to drive one wild to be disappointed at the last! You live there always, do you not?"

"Yes, it is my home, and I think I may say, without vanity, that I possess one of the finest of the old palaces as my abode, fitted up of course in modern style."

"It must be charming," said Lurline; "those grand old Italian houses seem made for fêtes and receptions."

"Yes, mine is especially adapted for them, as it has splendid gardens attached to it. We gave many successful entertainments there when my late wife was alive, but since I have had no lady to act as mistress of the revels, I have been unable to do so." He looked at Lurline as he spoke, and met the full gaze of her keen bright eyes. He put up his hand to conceal a smile, and in order to change the conversation, he said, "All this time you have not looked at your jewels, Miss Wyndham."

"Jewels! has Bertrand sent them? I am glad of that, anyhow!" and snatching up the parcel, which she had forgotten, she opened it hastily, and found a case containing a set of very fine emeralds and pearls. "Oh, these are pretty!" she exclaimed; "I remember Bertrand always said that emeralds would suit my complexion."

"Diamonds would suit you better," said Mr. Brant; "these are poor stones," he added, contemptuously.

"I will do myself the honour of waiting upon you very shortly," he said, rising; "and I will not intrude upon you longer at present."

"Tell me, is it possible to communicate with Mr. Lisle?" she asked.

"I can hardly tell," he answered; "it will at least be very difficult; but I could try to get a letter conveyed to him if it is a matter of importance."

"I do not know that it is," said Lurline; "for I shall act quite independently of him now, whether he hears from me or not; but I should like just to write and tell him that I have done with him for ever. I will never be a poor man's wife."

"It would indeed be a thousand pities if you were," said Mr. Brant. "I will let you know when I see you again if a letter can be sent."

And so they parted.

(To be continued.)

"ABOUT MY FATHER'S BUSINESS."

BY THOMAS ARCHER.

GIVING THE FEEBLE STRENGTH.—I.

I HAVE had occasion lately to take you with me to some of the "worst parts of London." The phrase has become so common, that there is some difficulty in deciding what it means; and we are obliged to come to the conclusion, that in every quarter of this great metropolis, large and lofty buildings, splendid mansions, gorgeous shops, and even stately palaces, are but symbols of the partial and imperfect development of true national greatness, and can scarcely be regarded as complete evidences of genuine civilisation, if by that word we are to mean more than was expressed by it in heathen times, and amidst pagan people. Perhaps there is no more terrible reflection, amidst all the pomp and magnificence, the vast commercial enterprise and constantly accumulating wealth of this mighty city, than that here we may also find the extremes of want and misery, of vice and poverty, of ignorance and suffering. Side by side with all that makes material greatness—riches, learning, luxury, extravagance—are examples of the deepest necessity and degradation. "The rich and the poor" do indeed "meet together" in a very sad sense. It would be well if the former would complete the text for themselves, and take its meaning deep into their hearts.

There is reason for devout thankfulness, however, that here and there amidst the abodes of rich and poor alike, some building with special characteristics may be seen; that not only the church but the charity which represents practical religion does make vigorous protest against the merely selfish heaping up of riches without regard to the cry of the poor. There are few neighbourhoods in which a Refuge for the homeless, a soup-kitchen, a ragged-school, a "servants' home," an orphanage, a hospital, or some asylum for the sick and suffering, does not relieve that sense of neglect and indifference which is the first painful impression of the thoughtful visitor to those "worst quarters," which yet lie close behind the grand thoroughfares and splendid edifices that distinguish aristocratic and commercial London.

I have said enough for the present about those poverty-haunted districts of Shoreditch, Spitalfields, and Bethnal Green, to warrant me in taking you through them without further comment than suffices to call your attention to the poorly-paid industries, the want and suffering, and the too frequent neglect of the means of health and cleanliness which unhappily distinguish them and the surrounding neighbourhoods lying eastward. The weaver's colony can now scarcely be said to survive the changes wrought by the removal of an entire industry from Spitalfields to provincial manufactories, and the vast importations of foreign silks, and yet there is in this part of London a great population of workers at callings which are scarcely better paid than silk weaving had come to be previous to its comparative disappearance.

Marvellous changes have been effected in the way of buildings and improvements during the last thirty years, but much of the poverty and sickness that belonged to these neighbourhoods remain. The looms may be silent in the upper workshops with their wide leaden casements, but the labour by which the people live seldom brings higher wages than suffice for mere subsistence. The great building in which treasures of art and science are collected is suggestive of some kind of recognition of the need of the inhabitants for rational recreation and instruction, and what is perhaps more to the purpose, it is also a recognition of their desire for both; but it cannot be denied that the recognition has come late, and has not been completely accompanied by those provisions for personal comfort, health, and decency, which a stringent application of existing laws might long ago have ensured in neighbourhoods that for years were suffered to remain centres of pestilence.

The greatest change ever effected in this quarter of London was that which followed the formation of Victoria Park. That magnificent area, with its lakes and islands, its glorious flower-beds and plantations, its cricket-ground and great expanse of open field, made Bethnal Green famous. There had always been a fine stretch of open country beyond what was known as "the Green," on which the building of the Musuem now stands. A roadway between banks and hedges skirted wide fields, led to the open space where a queer old mansion could be seen amidst a few tall trees, while beyond this again, across the canal bridge, were certain country hostelries, one of them with what was in that day a famous "tea-garden;" and, further on, a few farms and some large old-fashioned private residences stood amidst meadows, gardens, and cattle pastures, on either side of the winding road leading away to the Hackney Marshes and the low-lying fields beyond the old village of Homerton. It was on a large portion of this rural area that Victoria Park was founded. Tavern and farmhouse disappeared; the canal bridge was made ornamental; and just beyond the queer old mansion that stood by the roadway, the great stone and iron gates of "the people's pleasure-ground" were erected.

Now, the mansion, to which I have already twice referred, was in fact one of the few romantic buildings of the district, for it was what remained of the house of the persecuting Bishop Bonner, and the four most prominent of the tall trees—those having an oblong or pit excavation of the soil at the foot of each—were traditionally the landmarks of the martyrdom of four sisters who were there burnt at the stake, and buried in graves indicated by the hollows in the ground, which popular superstition had declared could never be filled up.

That they have been filled up long ago, and that on the site of the ancient house itself another great building has been erected, you may see to-day as we stand at the end of the long road leading to the entrance of "the people's park."

The abode of cruelty and bigotry has been replaced by one of the most truly representative of all our benevolent institutions. The graves of the martyred sisters might well take a new meaning, if the spot could now be discovered in the broad and beautifully planted garden, where feeble men and women sun themselves into returning life and strength in the gentle summer air blowing straight across from the broad woods of Epping and Hainault miles away.

The people's playground is fitly consummated by the people's hospital. That the City of London Hospital for Diseases of the Chest, Victoria Park, might well be called "the people's," is shown, not because it is supported by state aid or by charitable endowment, on the contrary, it depends entirely on those voluntary contributions and subscriptions which have hitherto enabled it successfully to carry on a noble work, but yet have only just sufficed to supply its needs, "from hand to mouth." Yet it is essentially devoted to patients who belong to the working population. Like the park itself it attracts crowds of visitors, not only from the City, from Bethnal Green, Mile End, Poplar, Islington, Camden Town, and other parts of London, but even from distant places whence excursionists come to see and to enjoy it. This hospital receives patients from every part of London, and even from distant country places. There were seven inmates from York last year, as well as some from Somerset, Hereford, Derby, Lincolnshire, Lancashire, Norfolk, Suffolk, Huntingdon, Northampton, Wiltshire, and other counties; so that in fact the districts of Bethnal Green, Spitalfields, and Shoreditch, represented only a very small proportion of the 781 in-patients and the 13,937 out-patients, who were admitted to medical treatment during the twelve months. More than this, however, amongst the contributions which are made for the support of this hospital, there must be reckoned those collected by working men of the district in their clubs and associations, in token of the appreciation of benefits bestowed by such an institution to failing men and women, wives and shopmates and relatives, who being threatened or actually stricken down with one of those diseases which sap the life and leave the body prostrate, require prompt skill and medical aid, even if they are not in absolute need of nourishing food and alleviating rest.

Standing here, in front of this broad noble building, with its many windows, its picturesque front of red brick and white stone, its central tower, its sheltered garden-walks, and pleasant lawn, we may well feel glad to hear that the work done within its wards is known and recognised. What a work it is can only be estimated by those who remember how fell is the disease from which so many of the patients suffer, and how great a thing it has been, even where cures could not be effected, usefully to prolong the lives of hundreds of those who must have died but for timely aid. Nay, even at the least, the alleviation of suffering to those on whom death had already laid his hand has been no small thing; and when we know that of 240,000 out-patients who have received advice and medicines, and 10,400 in-patients whose cases have warranted their admission to the wards, a large number of actual cures have been effected since the establishment of this hospital, we are entitled to regard the institution as one of the most useful that we have ever visited together. Let us enter, not by the handsome broad portico in the centre of the building, but at the out-patients' door, in order that we may see the two waiting-rooms, where men and women bring their letters of admission, or attend to see one of the three consulting physicians. Of these three gentlemen the senior is Dr. Peacock, of whom it may be said that he is the organiser of the hospital, the efficiency of which is mainly due to his direction. This is no small praise, I am aware, but there are so many evidences of the thorough unity and completeness in all the details of management that, considering how great a variety of cases are included under "diseases of the chest," from the slow insidious but fatal ravages of consumption to the sudden pang and deadly spasm of heart disease, and the various affections of throat and lungs, it may easily be seen how much depends upon the adoption of a system initiated by long study and experience. The perfect arrangements which distinguish this hospital are doubtless rendered easier by ample space and admirable appliances. Plenty of room and plenty of air (air however which has been warmed to one even temperature before it enters the wards and corridors where the patients eat and drink, sleep and walk) are the first characteristics of the place, while a certain chaste simplicity of ornament, and yet an avoidance of mere utilitarian bareness, is to be observed in all that portion of the structure where decoration may naturally be expected.

The Board-room, the secretary's room, and the various apartments devoted to the resident officers on the ground-floor, are plain enough, however, though they are of good size and proportions, the only really ornamental article of furniture in the Board-room being a handsome semi-grand piano, the gift of one of the committee, and a real boon to such of the patients as can come to practise choral singing, as well as to those who can listen delightedly to the amateur concerts that are periodically performed, either in the hospital itself or in one of the wards. For they have cheerful entertainments in this resort of the feeble, where, to tell the truth, food is often the best physic to cure, and sympathy and encouragement the most potent remedies to alleviate.

As to the actual physic—the employment of medicines—it is only in some of the large endowed hospitals that we can see such a dispensary as this large light room, with its surrounding rows of bottles and drawers, its two open windows, one communicating with the men's and the other with the women's waiting room, its slabs, and scales and measures, on a central counter, where 380 prescriptions will have to be made up to-day before the alert and intelligent gentleman and his assistants who have the control of this department, will be able to replace the current stock out of the medical stores.

These small cisterns, each with its tap, occupying so prominent a place on the counter, represent the staple medicine of the establishment, pure cod-liver oil, of which 1,200 gallons are used every year, and they are constantly replenished from three large cylinders, or vats, containing 800 gallons, which occupy a room of their own adjoining the dispensary and the compounding room, the latter being the place where drugs are prepared, and the great art of pill-making is practised on a remarkable scale. (To be concluded.)

FLOSSY'S LITTLE SHOE.

"MAMMA, I have just got the sixpence papa promised me for weeding a bed in the garden, and I am trying to find out how to spend it best. I wish I knew some one who wants it very much!"

"I don't think, my dear, you will have far to seek; there are a great many poor people in the village."

"Oh yes! but you or others help most of them. I would like to do good with my money to some poor little child."

"Well, Zoe, if you ask God to guide you, I am sure He will show you the right person."

"Yes, if I had more; but could I ask Him how to spend only sixpence?"

"Certainly; there is nothing too small to bring to God. A sparrow cannot fall to the ground unknown to Him; He clothes the lilies of the field; and how much more will He attend to anything concerning His own people, however trifling it may appear to us!"

Next day Zoe was asked by her mother to take little Florence out for a walk, as nurse was busy. This was an unexpected pleasure, for Zoe made a great pet of her youngest sister, and was proud of being trusted to take charge of the little one all by herself. They amused themselves for some time in the fields, making cowslip balls, and blowing off the downy dandelion-seed to find out what o'clock it was, or playing "cocks" with tough black heads of the rib-wort plantain; then, when tired of these sports, they crossed a stile and came out on the road near a group of small cottages. Just at this place, Florence began to lag a little behind her sister.

"What is the matter, Flossy? Come on!"

"Feet won't walk any more, Zoe."

"Why, are you tired?"

"Yes, hard road hurts Flossy's feet."

"Shall I carry you for a while?"

"Oh yes, yes!" And Zoe took her little sister in her arms for some distance along the hard dusty road; then, setting her down on the soft grass at the edge of the path, she said, "Run on now, Flossy, your little feet won't be hurt here, and we'll soon get into the fields again." But when Florence attempted to walk, it was found that one of her shoes was gone. The child looked up in her sister's face, and laughed merrily.

"Zoe must carry Flossy all the way home," she said, triumphantly.

"But I can't, dear, for my arms ache already; you are grown such a great big girl now, sister is not strong enough."

"Flossy can't walk with one shoe."

"Well, we must go back and look for the other; I dare say no one has passed this way since, and we'll be sure to find it." And lifting up the little one again, she retraced her steps, but the missing shoe was nowhere to be seen. Zoe was now seriously perplexed. She could not leave her sister alone while she went home for help; true, there were several cottages near, but she knew well their mother would not wish Florence to be left in any of them; and to carry the heavy child the whole way home was quite impossible to Zoe's slender form and weak arms.

While pausing to think what was best to do under the circumstances, a slatternly-looking woman put her head out of one of the cottage-doors.

"Are you searching for anything, Miss?"

"Yes, my sister has dropped one of her shoes; have you seen it?"

"I saw a little girl come out of that far house, and lift something off the road-side. I suppose if you could find her she'd give it up, for one shoe is no use to any one."

Zoe went immediately to the cottage pointed out, and tapped gently at the door. Presently a girl of about her own age, having also a child in her arms, appeared, and looked at her inquiringly.

"Have you seen my little sister's shoe?" she asked; "it must have fallen off her foot about here," and she held up Florence's plump shoeless foot, to show the size. In doing so, for the first time she glanced at the child in the poor girl's arms, and the contrast between the two little ones struck her forcibly—Flossy so chubby and healthy, with bright merry eyes and rosy cheeks, the other, worn and pallid, with attenuated limbs and thin bony feet hanging from under her faded torn frock.

"I did find a little shoe," answered the girl; "and put it by inside the house, for I didn't know whose it was," and turning away, she reached from the top of an old cupboard the dainty little leather shoe, which she held a moment to admire, then replaced on the child's foot with a sad look, for she could not help feeling deeply the wide difference between her pale sickly little sister, dying for want of the bare necessaries of life, and the healthy comfortably-dressed child before her, so full of joy and spirits. Half-sighing, half-smiling, she said, "'Tis a pretty little shoe, and a nice little foot too."

"Is your child ill?" asked Zoe, compassionately.

"Yes, Miss; very bad indeed; but the neighbours say she might get well if she had plenty of new milk."

"And why don't you give it to her?"

"I haven't any, Miss."

"Is she your sister? and where's your mother?"

"She's my only sister, and mother's dead. We're living with an aunt here, but she has plenty of children of her own, and not enough to feed them all, much less us. She does her best though. They're out at work now, and I'm minding baby that's asleep inside the house, and my own little one, that cries and frets every time I lay her down."

"I never saw you about here before," said Zoe; "have you been long with your aunt?"

"No, mother died only a short time ago. The last words she said were—'Nelly, take care of your little sister, and God will take care of you both; be sure to trust Him in every trouble, for He has promised to be a Father to you.'"

"And so he will," answered Zoe; "my mother says He is always watching over and minding us; and we may ask him about anything, no matter how small."

"Well, Miss, this morning, after the woman next door told me baby would die unless she had milk, I asked God to send us some, or show me a way to earn a little money to buy it; and he hasn't answered yet."

"Don't be too sure of that, Nelly, for I asked Him this morning also to show me how I could help some one very much with sixpence my papa gave me, and He has answered us both at the same time. See, here is what will buy milk for your sick baby for the next day or two at least, then He may send you more if you still trust him;" and Zoe, having placed Flossy on the ground, searched her pocket, and at length drew out the sixpence for which she had been so anxious to find a good use.

All this time Florence had been gazing with an unusually thoughtful and surprised expression at the pale worn face of the other child, but now, taking Zoe's hand, trotted pleasantly home by her side, in the recovered shoe, chatting gaily about the poor white baby in the girl's arms. And they had quite an adventure to tell mother on their return.

Let me end my story by saying that Nelly's baby throve rapidly on the milk and other good and nourishing things which Zoe and Florence were given by their mother and allowed to carry to the cottage daily. S. T. A. R.

"THE QUIVER" BIBLE CLASS.

231. Who is it likens the ungodly to chaff?

232. How many lepers are mentioned as being outside the gates of Samaria, and who gave notice of the flight of the Syrians?

233. How many days had Lazarus been dead before our Lord raised him to life again?

234. What event took place near the city Adam?

235. Who was the wife of Felix, the Governor of Cæsarea?

236. What was the only condition upon which Nahash the Ammonite would make peace with the people of Jabesh-gilead?

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS ON PAGE 560.

216. When he healed the leper in Galilee (Mark i. 44). See also Leviticus xiv. 3, 4, 10.

217. Job vi. 6.

218. To search diligently for the young child Jesus, and bring him word again when they had found him (Matt. ii. 8).

219. "Greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friends" (John xv. 13).

220. Psalm xvi. 6.

221. "Physician heal thyself" (Luke iv. 23).

222. "This same Hezekiah also stopped the upper watercourse of Gihon, and brought it straight down to the west side of the city of David" (2 Chron. xxxii. 30).

223. Hymenæus and Philetus (2 Tim. ii. 17).

(Drawn by M. E. EDWARDS.)

THREE ANSWERS TO THE SWALLOW.

(The Child speaks.)

"TWEET, tweet, tweet!"
The birds cry out of the sky.
Tweet, tweet, tweet,
Mother I want to fly,
Up and up, and up above the poplars tall.
Mother if I had wings
I would fly and never fall.

(The Mother speaks.)

"Sweet, sweet, sweet!"
So the swallows are here again,
Wheeling over the village street
And out to the open plain.
"Sweet, sweet, sweet!"
As they cried three springs ago,
When Hans led me through the fields,
Down to the church below.
Sweet, sweet, sweet! through warm summer and winter cold,
I have carried the grass from the field,
And led the cattle to fold;
Three years have come and gone,
And my child is just two years old,
And the swallows are crying again, "Sweet, sweet!"
And my tale is told.

(The Grandmother muses.)

"Fleet, fleet, fleet!"
Are those the swallows I hear?
The sound came sudden and sweet,
And this is the spring of the year.
To my dim eyes they seem
But a sudden light as they pass,
But I know how they skim o'er the stream,
And over the churchyard grass.
Their wings are a sudden light,
My time will not be long,
For my spirit is nearer its flight
Than that of the young and the strong.
Fleet, fleet, fleet!
The days are wearing fast,
I hear them cry, far out of the sky,
"There are wings for the soul at last!"

AGNES MACDONELL.

THE BRIDGE BETWEEN.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE TROUBLES OF CHATTY AND MOLLY," "THE DINGY HOUSE AT KENSINGTON," "QUEEN MADGE," "AGAINST HERSELF," ETC., ETC., ETC.

CHAPTER XXIX.—DOROTHY REFLECTS.

"IT is such a lovely morning!" sighed Dorothy; "no one would think it was the end of October; and I should so like to go and sit a little while in the garden, with a cloak round me. I am so tired of trying to work, and getting nothing to do. And, after all, I never shall like work, and I cannot see its wonderful virtue, unless I gain money by it to help poor papa. Somehow," she said, with a sigh, "I think Mr. Fuller's idea of happiness was the right one—just enough to live on, and nothing to do."

She gathered a shawl round her, and looked out at the sunshiny garden, and then struggled against her longing to go and be quiet, and the feeling that she ought to find other things to do.

"I am very selfish," she said, presently—"very! I wish I could cure myself. I wonder what George Blakesley saw in me to love! It is so odd, too," she thought; "but since I have tried to work and to do better, I don't think he has cared so much for me. His love seems to be dying out, and I do not wonder at it. I am very, very selfish."

"Dorothy, will you come into my study?" called Mr. Woodward. "I want to speak to you, my dear! I am not well."

So she laid down the book she had taken up, and threw aside her shawl, and went.

"Come here," he said, as she entered, "and sit down. You have been such a good girl lately, dear; I don't know what we should have done without you!"

And Dorothy's heart gave a throb of satisfaction.

"I want to talk to you, you know, about how things have gone lately at the office: I fear they are worse even than we imagined. Hunter, the manager, in whom we trusted thoroughly, has been playing us false, and the paper has gone altogether to smash. I thought perhaps something might be saved, but I see now it is impossible. I shall be in the Gazette next week, I suppose, and these things will have to be sold."

"Sold?"

"Yes, dear; I have been thinking that perhaps you and your mother had better go into some cheap lodgings before the crash comes. You must comfort her as well as you can, dear, and manage everything, for there is no money. The lease of this house will be sold, of course."

"And shall we never come back here?"

"I suppose not," he said, and turned sadly away; and she saw that there were tears in her father's eyes. "I wish I had settled your mother's money on her, and never risked it in this business. I shall never forgive myself as long as I live, but I did it for the best, and of course I have my children to think of, and I wanted to make some provision for you."

The words fell on Dorothy's heart like a reproach. He had ruined himself, hoping to provide for his children, and she had been dreaming her life away, and Tom had been spending his money in pleasure. She would make no promises, she thought, but things should be different in future, and she gave a long sigh, and thought how different her life might have been.

"I could never separate my dreams from my realities," she thought, "and sufficiently realise the latter."

"Do you think you could find some cheap lodgings, dear?" Mr. Woodward asked. "I want your mother to be out of this place by Saturday. It would distress her so to see all our things sold. You must get some furnished rooms for us, as cheaply as possible, and get all your clothes away, and you and your mother and Sally and the boys must get there as quickly as possible. I wish Will could go on with his school a little longer. There, that is all, dear. I am very unwell; I wish I was not obliged to go out!" he sighed.

Then Dorothy kissed her father tenderly, and went to think about how she should manage all he wished.

"And while he was in all this sorrow," she thought, "I was thinking of going to read my book and idle about in the garden. I wish I could see Mr. Blakesley, he would help me. Oh, to think we must leave this house!" and she tried vainly to keep back her tears. "It will seem like the end of a life to us all; for we shall never have such happy days again!" And she thought of the early summer days, and all the happy hours she had spent with Mr. Fuller. "Those were the happiest days of my life," she thought, "and they are all gone for ever."

CHAPTER XXX.—DOROTHY IN THE WORKSHOP.

Dorothy went out an hour later, and, after a long search, found some furnished rooms which she thought would do, and took them, subject to her mother's approval. They were shabby dreary-looking rooms, near to St. John's Wood, but the best she could get at the price.

"I wonder if Mr. Blakesley will come and see us this evening," she thought again. "He promised to try and get me something—among his friends, too."

It was strange how she was learning to lean on the man she did not love. Suddenly, as she passed a shop, she saw, written on a card displayed in the window, "Wanted, a governess. A young lady required to teach three children English, French, and Music; inquire," &c.

"I wonder if I should do for that," she thought. And, after a long deliberation, she determined to go and try. The address given was only a little way off, and so it was not far to go. "I don't know what to say," she thought; and her hand shook as she knocked at the door, and her feet lagged painfully as she ascended the stairs to the little showy drawing-room to which the servant conducted her. Then she remembered how often George Blakesley had said that work was always honourable and noble, and all her courage came back, and with it a thought that almost made her joyful—she, going to try and work in earnest now, and help her poor weary father! She had found something to live for!

There was something in the manner and the face of the quiet brown-eyed girl that interested the lady of the house, when she appeared. Dorothy was no longer the frightened dreamy child, as she sat and told what she could do, and explained that she had never been out before, but that circumstances had arisen which made her wish to work, and she was ready to do so.

"But I should only want you to come for three hours in the morning, and I only thought of giving twenty pounds a year," Mrs. Gibson said, half afraid that the dignified lady-like girl would scarcely condescend to teach the three children of a poor doctor's wife, who had a struggle to make things look better than they were. But Dorothy said she would willingly undertake the office, and so, when she left, after playing some snatches on the piano to the mother of her future pupils, it was with the knowledge that if, on inquiry, Mrs. Gibson found that all Dorothy said was true, she was forthwith to be installed, for three hours daily, as the governess of the small Gibsons. One thing she had stipulated—i. e., that she should be paid weekly.

"It will be a comfort to me," she said, frankly, feeling it neither shame nor a sin to confess what so many try to hide—poverty; "for I am very poor, and this money will be a great help."

How she walked home that afternoon Dorothy never knew. It seemed as if she trod on air, as if her heart danced so wildly that her feet could scarcely help keeping time, and walking was a trial, when she longed to run, as she would have done a year ago, reckless of all appearances.

"I am so thankful," she cried to herself, "I am going to work. I am no longer human lumber, as Mr. Blakesley said. I am going to work, and to be of use."

This was the burden of her thoughts. She had a right now to the light of the sun, and to watch the falling leaves, and to breathe the fresh air of that glorious autumn day, and to walk over the world's pleasant paths; for was she not one of the world's workers, a part of its great machinery, necessary to others, and entering into their views, and making them, or having now the power of making them, better? "And I will!" she thought, while the tears came into her eyes; "and if I cannot make one thing good and beautiful, I may make many others just a little better, and doing this, I shall be satisfied."

Yes, Dorothy had found something to live for at last, and, unconsciously, she was beginning already in the world's great workshop to make one thing beautiful, and that one her own life. She caught sight of her home, and all the light died out of her heart, for she remembered the shabby lodgings to which they were to remove. Her father was out when she entered, and her mother was sitting sadly alone, grieving, as was her wont.

"Do you know we are going to leave here next week, Dorothy?" she asked.

"Yes, dear mamma!" and she told her of the rooms she had taken, and Mrs. Woodward's tears began to flow.

"I am sure it will kill me!" she sobbed, "and your poor father too. It is such a pity he was so thoughtless, and he is not well either. It is breaking his heart as well as mine. He is so scrupulous, too; he will give up every stick we have, and won't let me keep a thing back, excepting our clothes."

"He is quite right, dear mamma."

"Yes, but I don't know what will become of us," her mother said, sadly. "We shall be starving when the winter comes."

"Oh no, mamma; oh no! we will all help. And, oh, dear mamma, I have got work already," and she threw herself down on her knees, and put her head down on Mrs. Woodward's shoulder, and told her about her pupils.

"And so I will help papa, and we all will, and take care of you, dear, dear mamma!" and the pent-up feeling in her heart gave way, and the tears rained down her cheeks, as she felt her mother clinging to her; but yet it seemed as if the old self whispered and reproached her with all the past idle years.

"How could I be so selfish! oh, how could I!" she thought, bitterly. "Oh, if I could only become better!" she longed, till, in her eagerness, the words became almost a prayer.

"Oh, Dorothy dear!" said Mrs. Woodward, an hour later, "I forgot to tell you that Mr. Fuller came while you were out. He has been in the West of England, but is going abroad soon, and came to say good-bye. He said he should write to you."

(To be continued.)

THE TRIPLETS OF THE BIBLE.

BY THE REV. J. HILES HITCHENS, AUTHOR OF "THE FURNACE," "THE FACE OF THE KING," ETC.

VI.—THE THREE GRACES.

"Now abideth faith, hope, charity, these three; but the greatest of these is charity."—1 Cor. xiii. 13.

HERE have here a created trinity, three vital principles which together constitute true religion, three glorious graces which co-exist, but are not co-equal, which, though distinguished one from another, are not divided. Each of these is indispensable to the Christian's life and joy and development. If one of these graces fail, all three vanish. It is sheer presumption to be influenced by hope when we are devoid of faith; it is cheerless killing despondency to possess faith without hope; and it is mere hypocrisy to profess charity where faith and hope are absent. Neither of these graces is known to men of the world—men who are unregenerate, men who keep away from the open arms and sympathetic heart of Jesus. Hence it may be well just in a word or two to define the nature of these excellences.

Faith—the faith here alluded to by the apostle, is that of which he writes in another place as the bestowment of God, "By grace are ye saved through faith, and that not of yourselves, it is the gift of God." It is not simply the mental reception of revealed truth; it is the heart appropriation of that truth. It is not credit only; it is trust.

Hope—divine hope is begotten of faith. It anticipates the glories, the promises of which faith accepts. It dwells with pure delight upon the joys disclosed to the steady eye of faith. It expects and desires, and so ever animates the believer in duty, and sustains him in difficulty.

Charity needs careful consideration, because it has been so frequently misunderstood. "St. Paul's word," says John Wesley, "is αγαπη, exactly answering to the plain English word love, and accordingly it is so rendered in the old translations of the Bible. This third grace is not almsgiving. That we may daily practise where divine love is unknown. St. Paul says, "Though I bestow all my goods to feed the poor, and though I give my body to be burned, and have not charity (love) it profiteth me nothing." Neither is it merely human affection. Precious though that is, it is far inferior to this grace. There may exist the truest, deepest, most sincere and enduring attachment between one friend and another without either being experimentally acquainted with divine love in the heart. It is love to God for His own sake, and love of man for God's sake. It is love to fellow saints as brethren of the same family, and love to unbelievers as bearing the marred image of God, and capable of being renewed by divine grace. It is filial toward the Infinite One, and fraternal toward our companions in life's highway. In relation to God it is the state of heart which leads us to say with the Psalmist, "There is none upon the earth I desire before thee," or with Solomon to our beloved, "O Thou whom my soul loveth!" or with Peter on the occasion of his heroic confession, "Thou knowest all things, Thou knowest that I love Thee." In relation to man it will lead us to act the part of the good Samaritan who had compassion on the poor Jew lying in Jericho's highway, and went and bound up his wounds, set him on his own beast, brought him to the inn, and carefully provided for him. Toward man love "suffereth long, and is kind; love envieth not; love vaunteth not itself, is not puffed up, doth not behave itself unseemly, seeketh not her own, is not easily provoked, thinketh no evil; rejoiceth not in iniquity, but rejoiceth in the truth; beareth all things, believeth all things, hopeth all things, endureth all things." Such are these three graces.

Now, though faith, hope, and charity are stars of the same brilliant constellation, yet one star differeth from another star in glory, and charity is of the first magnitude. Last here in order, it is first in importance and pre-eminence.

Why does the apostle say, "The greatest of these is love?" I answer:—

Because love peculiarly participates of God's nature.—It bears a closer resemblance to the divine image than either of the other graces. The eternal, self-existent, independent, and all-wise Being has no faith, no hope; nor does He stand in need of either. Of finite souls alone are these predicable. Faith and hope are expressions of dependence, and indications of ignorance. Faith and hope are specially and solely the property of creatures. It cannot be said of the Creator that He believes this or that to exist, or that He hopes this or that will be, for all things are naked and open to His eye; all things are before Him as one eternal now. But the Divine Being has love. Aye, He has taught us in the inspired page that love is His very nature. Every other attribute is at the bidding of love. Love is the genus, and all the other perfections of the Deity are the species. Every work of God in the universe, every word of God to the human family, and every dispensation of God that concerns the race of man, has been prompted and performed by love. When then we feel the welling up within our hearts of this holy grace we have a stream of which God is the spring, we have a reflection of the glory of the Divine nature. By faith and hope we depend on God; by love we resemble God; and, as conformity is superior to dependence, love is greater than faith or hope, as the luscious fruit and perfumed flower are superior to the branch or stem.

The influence of love is of wider extent.—Faith and hope are between ourselves and things unseen; but love is between us and things seen and unseen. Faith and hope link me to the throne of the eternal; but love binds me to the whole family in heaven and on earth. Faith and hope have respect to the future; love embraces present and future. Faith fixes its eye on glory, and hope casts its anchor within the veil, but love throws open its God-like arms to clasp the whole world in its fervent throbbing burning heart. As the wisdom, justice, and power of God are under the direction of His love, so all our purposes and thoughts and acts should be guided by this holy principle. With some, Christian love is a mere impulse when it ought to be abiding. Like the reservoired water that is conveyed to your home ready for use in an instant, and for use in every conceivable direction, so love should be in us, and abound for every good word and work. Well do the apostles enthrone love among the graces, and place the crown of supremacy upon her brow; well has Paul said, "Above all things put on charity—love!" Well has Peter said, "Add to" the different excellences of the Christian character love; and "above all things have fervent charity among yourselves." Faith and hope are fine flowers in the bouquet of graces, but love binds them together. Faith and hope are important, aye, indispensable, constituents in the edifice of a Christian life, but love is the essential girder, rendering them safe and strong. Faith and hope are necessary portions of a believer's attire, but love is the uppermost mantle thrown over the other robes, "adding the crowning dignity" and preserving all in their appropriate positions.

Love is the evidence of the existence of the other graces.—By the presence and operation of this excellency we may judge of our spiritual condition before God. Do we desire to know whether we may cherish within us the childlike confidence of relationship to heaven? Do we desire to know whether we have obtained a new heart, a right spirit, a divine gift? Do we wish to satisfy ourselves whether we are on the way to the city of rest and renown proffered to the ransomed? Then we must see what love there is in our hearts. By this means multitudes have been not only satisfied, but fully assured. To this simple issue John brought the question of a man's standing in the sight of God: "We know that we have passed from death unto life, because we love the brethren." As the expanding aromatic flower is sufficient indication that the plant is living, as the beating of the pulse informs the skilled examiner as to the condition of the physical functions, as the movement of the hands is an index of the regularity or irregularity of the watch, as the pointer in a barometer reveals the state of the atmosphere, and as the ascending or descending drop of water in the glass tube indicates to the engineer the amount of pressure on the boiler of the locomotive, so love is an evidence of the strength of our faith, the security of our hope, the development of our religious life. There is something amiss in the soul of the man who has not Christian love in full exercise. The man who can look with perfect indifference on the woes and wants of his fellow-man, the man who forbears to exercise forgiveness to his erring brother, the man who is ready to hunt to the very death another who has offended against the laws of propriety or truth, the man who never speaks of a compeer without using the caustic, sour, withering words of intense jealousy or hatred, may well question his right to the name of "Christian," if indeed he presumes to wear that title. If the presence of love proves the heart right, the absence argues the soul to be altogether wrong, unlike God, unfit for heaven.

XUM

Love is the most powerful of all motives.—It is not a sickly sentiment, a momentary emotion; it is one of the strongest, bravest, most enduring powers known upon the earth. Neither is it an inactive or idle force. It is one of the most untiring and working principles with which mortal is acquainted. What will it not do in self-denying labour? What will it not bear in privation and suffering? This grace "seems to resemble the cherubic figure, having the courage of the lion, the patience of the ox, the wing of the eagle, and all directed by the intelligence and will of the man." Where it exists it must exert itself. Like its great heaven-sent embodiment, it "cannot be hid." The strength of Samson lay in his hair; the strength of a Christian lies in his love. Love makes the heaviest burdens light, and the roughest road easy; love sings all the day, and knows no such word in its vocabulary as sacrifice. Pleasure, ambition, avarice, novelty, may make a man zealous in a good cause for a season, but ingratitude will chill that zeal. But if the torch of zeal be lighted at Calvary, if the flame be one of love, it will burn with growing strength and increasing lustre amid all the disappointments of life. Many waters, wide, deep, and rough, cannot quench love; it is stronger than death itself, surviving the grim presence and icy grasp of the King of Terrors.

In search of this grace go at once to Calvary. Press through the crowds surrounding that central cross, and approach Him who died for you. Upon that cross is written, "Herein is love." From that cross a voice proclaims, "If any man love not the Lord Jesus Christ, let him be Anathema, Maranatha." There, by the cross is the spring of that copious and clear stream of love which, flowing into the human heart, will cleanse every desire and purify every motive.

SCRIPTURE LESSONS FOR SCHOOL AND HOME.

SCRIPTURE STORIES. SECOND SERIES. No. 3. THE CIRCUMCISION AND PRESENTATION IN THE TEMPLE.

Chapter to be read—Luke ii., 21—40.

INTRODUCTION. Have seen Christ while a babe receiving visitors—two sets—who were they? Of what nation were the shepherds? would represent the Jews: who would be represented by the Wise Men? Therefore these two sets of men would typify the worship of Jews and Gentiles, i.e., whole world. To which was Christ sent? (John i. 2). So far "His own" did receive Him, i.e., the Jewish shepherds worshipped the new-born King. Now must Christ observe all the ceremonies of the Jewish law.

I. THE CIRCUMCISION. (Read Gen. xvii. 9—14). Draw out from the children the time of the institution of circumcision, viz., when Abraham was 99 years old: also its object—to be an outward token of the covenant between God and His servant Abraham. The promise of the covenant referred to three things—(a) the promise of a numerous seed; (b) of the land of Canaan for their habitation; (c) that by his seed all nations of the earth should be blessed. Now show how all these promises were fully fulfilled by Christ. Of whose seed did he come? therefore He, like all Abraham's seed, must enter into the covenant; so He must be circumcised. How old was He at the time? Obeyed the law in its minutest detail: what name was then given Him? the name above every name (Phil. ii. 9, 10), meaning "the Lord my Saviour." Now, how did He fulfil the promises connected with the covenant? (a) He is the head of His Church. His seed includes not only Jews, but Gentiles (Eph. ii. 12); all men are drawn to Him (John xii. 32); and He is the head of the Church, His body (Eph. i. 22). (b) He provides a country for His people. Canaan always been regarded as typical of heaven reached by crossing the Jordan, a figure of death; the enemies all conquered—man's great enemies of this world the flesh and the devil—the wilderness of this world safely passed, His people reach the land prepared by Him for them (John xiv. 2). (c) He blesses all men. Remind how His first words were those of blessing (Matt. v. 3); His last words blessing His disciples (Luke xxiv. 51). Now, in heaven, He blesses us by turning us away from our sins (Acts iii. 26) and sending down His Spirit. So the blessings of circumcision all fully fulfilled in Christ.

II. THE PRESENTATION IN THE TEMPLE. (Read Luke ii. 22—24). Now again Christ brought to the Temple. Another Jewish rite to be performed (from Lev. xii. 2, 6, 8); it will be seen that this took place thirty-three days after the circumcision. The Child and His mother come to the Temple—the House of Prayer. The mother offers a sacrifice; why? as a sin-offering to the Lord. And also the Child is solemnly presented to the Lord as His Child. So Christ, in very deed God's Son, is yet, as the Son of Man, dedicated to God. So far the Holy Child has been seen by companies of people. Now individuals are to see Him and worship Him. Who are they?

XUM

(1) Simeon. (Read ii. 25—35). What was his character? a devout worshipper of God, i.e., a man of prayer. For what was he praying and looking out daily? (ver. 30.) Had for years been praying to be allowed to see the expected Christ. Now, this day, comes as usual into the Temple, but what specially took him to-day? (ver. 27). How his heart must have throbbed with excitement! At last is to see Him for whom he has been looking so long. Picture him looking about amongst the various groups: at last sees the Holy Family—Joseph and Mary and the Babe. Can this be the Messiah? this infant? Yes; taught by the Spirit, he believes. Now he takes the babe in his arms, and blesses God. What does he ask to do? why die in peace now! Whom has he seen? Who is God's salvation? and for whom was He sent? To lighten and teach the Gentiles as well as Jews. No wonder that Joseph and Mary marvelled at these words. But some one else saw the babe—who was she? (2) Anna. (Read ii. 36—39). She, like Simeon, was old; had been daily looking for the Saviour; lived in or near the Temple, always praying and fasting: now she hears the news, comes in, joins the little group, sees the Babe, worships, and gives thanks, not only so, but tells the tale abroad; cannot keep it to herself; goes round to all her friends—all looking for redemption—tells of the Saviour come at last to set His people free.

III. Practical Lessons. (1) The benefit of being in covenant with God. Those received as His children are blessed by Him with forgiveness, pardon, peace, and a future home of glory; but this involves corresponding duties: they must, as Jesus, increase in wisdom, be obedient, teachable, loving, &c. Is this true of us? (2) All may come to Christ. Jews and Gentiles, males and females, boys and girls, old and young, all are invited. What is wanted? Willingness, such as these had (see Is. lv. 1, Matt. xii. 32); worship, such as these gave: the homage of a life spent in looking to Christ. (3) Others must be told. No selfishness about true religion. Anna at once told all about Christ. So did the shepherds. So should we. The news of a Saviour so joyful must be spread all over the world: all can help: do we do what we can?

Questions to be answered.

1. When was circumcision instituted, and why?
2. What are the three promises connected with circumcision?
3. How did Christ fulfil these promises?
4. Say what you can about Simeon and Anna.
5. Write out Simeon's song.
6. What lessons may we learn?

STILL AND DEEP.

BY F. M. F. SKENE, AUTHOR OF "TRIED," "ONE LIFE ONLY," ETC.

CHAPTER XXXI.

MARY TREVELYAN also received a letter, written by Bertrand Lisle just when he was on the point of starting for the war. It was a much more unconstrained and natural letter than that which he had written to Laura, for he knew well that from Mary he would have the most entire sympathy, and that she would fully enter into the feelings which drove him so imperatively to offer himself for the defence of his native land. He spoke to her of all he felt in this respect, freely and fervently, seeming to find a relief in doing so; and then he told her that he was of course aware how probable it was that he should never come alive out of that terrible campaign, and he could not risk to leave a world which she, more than any other, had brightened for him all his lifetime, without thanking her for her past goodness, and assuring her that the remembrance of her and of all their happiness in the days that were gone would lie very near his heart in the hour of death, come when it might. The last words of his letter, however, referred to Lurline: he spoke of the answer she had sent him when he had first told her of the possibility of his joining the French army, and of the grief and terror she had seemed to feel in the prospect. "Poor, pretty Lurline!" he added; "she has never been taught to take serious views of life in any way, but she does love me well, at least, and she is my one care in throwing my life into this dreadful lottery; if I should fall, sweet Mary, I trust you, for the sake of our happy days in the peaceful time that is past, to do what you can to comfort my tender little Lorelei."

But for the moment her tender heart could not fail to feel wounded at the closing words of his letter—"His one care is for Lurline!" she thought, "Lurline, who, at least, can be very happy without him, for certainly she was joyous as ever when he left us, and I—and I——" She covered her face with her hands, as she remembered how every moment of her existence had been filled with him in silent suffering since the day she had believed him parted from her for ever; at length she dropped her hands and looked up—"His care is for Lurline, but I will care for him," she said, softly—"for him! or if I am never allowed to come across him, at least for his brethren in the great struggle; my feet shall stand like his on the blood-stained soil of France; I will try to take bravely my little part in that great agony; and if he finds a grave there, so will I."

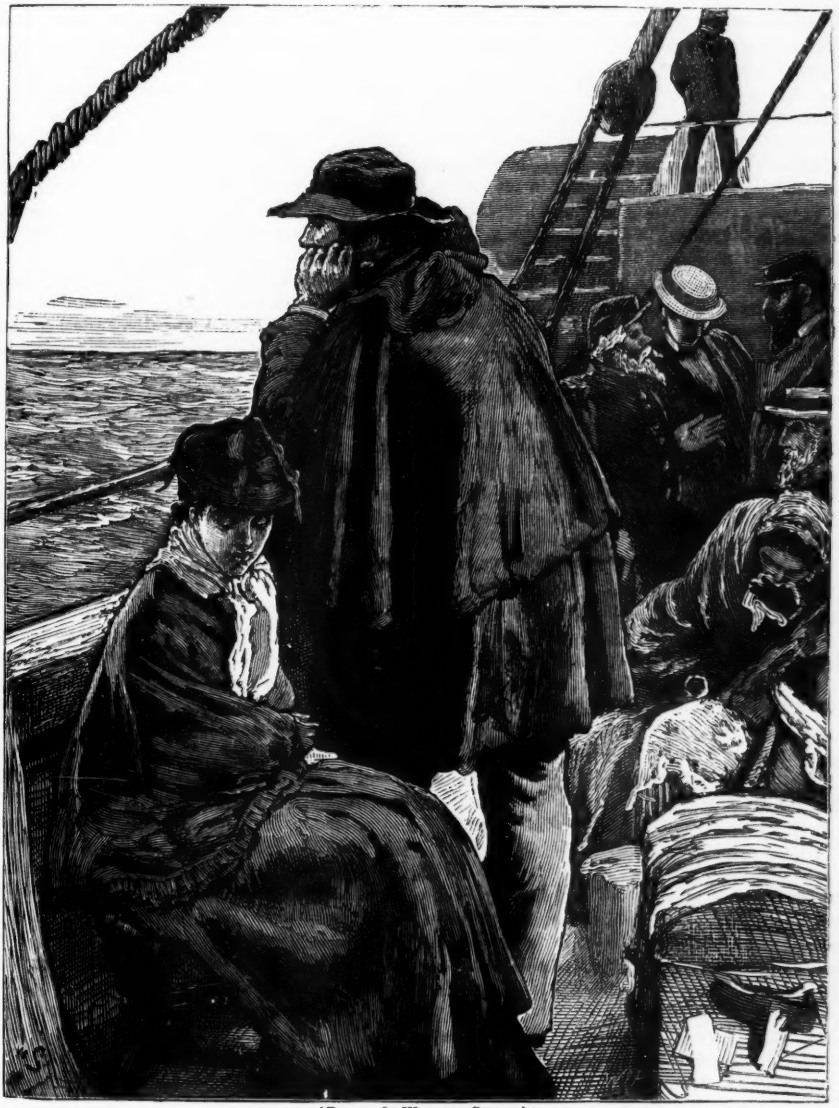
Mary Trevelyan had been resolved, from the first day when the tidings of the war reached her, that she would offer herself as a nurse to the International Society for the Succour of the Sick and Wounded, and she had already taken the first step in ascertaining that her services would be accepted. But it is in the nature of every true and ardent affection, especially in the heart of a woman, to feel a sort of craving and necessity to extend help and protection to the object of it, if in any way it be possible; the desire to shield those it loves from every evil, and to be itself the means of doing so, is the imperative demand of every faithful heart, and Mary felt this so strongly as regarded Bertrand, anomalous as it seemed that the fragile young girl should dream of giving help to the stalwart man, that she could not bring herself absolutely to decide on her own destination till she should know distinctly what he meant to do. His letter at once put an end to any further hesitation. At the time when she received it, which was only a day or two later than the date of Mr. Brant's arrival in England, she knew that he was already in France—already, it might be, lying on the battle-field of Wörth or Gravelotte, and her only desire now was to make her way as speedily as might be to the scenes of carnage and suffering that were desolating his unhappy country.

Mary hastened at once to the office in London, from whence the Society carried on their operations, and begged to be sent without delay to whatever spot in France most required help for the sick and wounded. She was told that several parties of surgeons and nurses had already been dispatched to the seat of war, but that in a few days a small number of volunteers, chiefly men, but including one or two nurses, under the direction of an English doctor, were going to Paris to offer their services to the authorities of the Society there, for any post to which they might be appointed; and in view of the approaching siege of Paris, which was even then imminent, it was thought that most likely they would be retained for work in the capital; if she chose, Miss Trevelyan might join them: she at once agreed, and received the red-cross badge in token that she was enrolled in the Society. She was told the hour at which, six days later, she was to join the party at Victoria Station, and went away feeling thankful that, whether she ever saw Bertrand Lisle again or not, she would have a glorious opportunity of following in the steps of that Divine One who came on earth for the relief of suffering, physical and mental, wheresoever He might find it.

Mary's next task was to go and tell Mrs. Parry of her intention, and here she was met by an unexpected difficulty. Her kind old nurse said not a word to dissuade her from her dangerous purpose, for she knew the resolute self-devotion of her child too well to hope that she could be shaken in it; but after she had overcome the nervous trembling which seized her when she first heard that her pale delicate Mary was going into those dreadful scenes, and had winked away the tears which dimmed her twinkling eyes, she said, "Very well, my sweet lamb, if you must go, may heaven protect and save you; but I am going too."

"Oh no, dearest nurse; impossible!" exclaimed Mary; "at your age, and with your infirm health you could never stand the fatigues we shall have to endure; and you know I shall not need any protection. I shall be with the other members of the Society."



"I know, my dear, and I can well understand that the Society would not choose to be encumbered with a worn-out old woman like me; so I shall not go to be actually with you, nor will I even travel with you, but I shall go to Paris, and be at hand if you want me."

Mary flung her arms round her neck.

"You good dear nurse! thank heaven for your love, at least, though it is all I have on earth; but I cannot bear to think of your leaving the peace and comfort of England at such a time as this: you know Paris is likely to be besieged, and there will be great misery and suffering there, I fear."

"All the more reason why I should go, as I think I can be of use quite independent of you. You must know I have a friend there—she is the wife of a man they call a colporteur, a sort of missionary, who goes about selling Bibles to the poor benighted heathen French. His wife lives in Paris, and he travels about. He is away just now, she does not know where. He may have been killed, for anything she knows, in all the massacring that has been going on, and she is very ill, all alone there with seven children, the youngest a new-born infant; and she made some one write a letter for her to me, saying how lonely and helpless she was, so it is my clear duty to go and help her, and you need say nothing more, my pretty Mary, for I can be obstinate as well as you. I shall start to-morrow morning, and be ready to receive you, if you should want me the first moment you come, or at any time. So now make yourself satisfied, and, help me to find a nice home for my dear cockatoo, for that is more on my mind than anything else."

Mrs. Parry had talked herself out of breath in her eagerness, and Mary saw it was no use attempting to oppose her further, so she gravely entered into the question of "cockie's" lodgings, which was happily settled by the offer of the landlady of the house to take charge of him, and on the following morning she saw her kind old nurse off by the tidal train for Paris, after having had the address of the colporteur's wife duly impressed on her.

(Drawn by WILLIAM SMALL.)

"Mary sat at the side of the vessel near the helm."—p. 604.

A few days later, and the evening before Mary herself was to start had arrived—she had been allowed to remain at the Childrens' Hospital after the return of the Lady Superintendent until she should decide on her own plans—and she was alone in the sitting-room, while every one else was engaged in the wards, making her final arrangements for the journey next day, when the neat prim-looking portress came to tell her that a gentleman wished to see her. She could not guess who it might be, but thinking it was probably one of the travelling party, desired him to be shown in. There was a quick step in the passage, and, brushing past the staid servant in his excitement, Charlie Davenant came rushing in, and seized her hand in both of his with so vehement a grasp as almost to crush it.

"How thankful I am that I am still in time to see you again!" he exclaimed.

"And I am very pleased indeed to see you, but quite surprised; I did not know you were anywhere near London."

"Nor should I have been had I not heard that you were going, like a saint as you are, to give your dear beautiful life to help all those poor sufferers over the water!"

At that moment one of the nurses appeared at the door, and said that "Tottie" refused to go to sleep till Miss Mary came to give her a good-night kiss.

"Will you wait for me a few minutes," said Mary to Charlie Davenant, "I shall be back almost immediately, but I cannot refuse this poor little one on my last day."

"I will wait for you all night, if you like," he answered, impulsively, "but you must come back, for I have a great deal to tell you which you must hear."

"I shall come," she said, smiling, and followed the nurse from the room.

CHAPTER XXXII.

MARY TREVELYAN soon came back, leaving sleepy Tottie quite willing to let her round eyes close when once she had seen her dear lady, and she found Charlie Davenant contemplating with a rueful face the various preparations for her departure, which were to be seen around him.

"Oh, Miss Trevelyan, how I wish you were safe back again!" he said, with a great sigh.

"We are safe everywhere, you know, if we would only believe it," she answered, "since whatever happens is by the will of Him who knows what is best for us; but now may I hear what it is you have to tell me?"

"It concerns Laura Wyndham," he answered, gravely. "I think you ought to know that she is likely to prove as false to Mr. Lisle as she has been to poor John Pemberton."

Mary turned round, and looked at him quite aghast at his words. "It is impossible," she said.

"I believe it to be certain, knowing Lurline as I do," he answered; "fate has thrown another man in her way, who will suit her far better, at the very time when she was becoming convinced that her engagement with a soldier who had joined the French army was an exceedingly bad speculation. I suppose you know she has had another letter from Bertrand since he entered on the campaign?"

"No, I have heard nothing," said Mary, breathlessly. "Has there been news of him? oh, tell me!" and as he saw how her chest heaved, and her faint colour went and came, his heart burned with mingled pity and indignation at the manner in which her happiness had been stolen from her.

"The letter had been sent by the field-post, and it had only reached her a day or two before I saw her yesterday: it was short, and Mr. Lisle had written it apparently with much difficulty, and with his left hand."

"Is he hurt?" Mary's blanched lips could scarcely frame the question.

"He is hurt, but not vitally. It seems he was enrolled in the French army as Bertrand de L'Isle, just in time to take his share in the dreadful battle of Gravelotte. He has been fortunate in escaping from it with his life, and without a fatal wound; but he has had a serious and painful injury to his right arm, which has completely incapacitated him from using it, the elbow-joint has been shattered by a bullet, and it may ultimately have to be amputated. In the meantime, however, those who are fighting for unhappy France may not stop to think of their own troubles, and as Mr. Lisle cannot go again into action in this state, he has volunteered for a service of even greater danger, and has been appointed to carry dispatches from the seat of war to the military commander in Paris. The Prussians, as you know, are said to be advancing on the capital, and Mr. Lisle felt so doubtful if he could reach his destination in safety, that he wished Lurline to know it was possible she might never hear from him again." Charlie stopped abruptly, terrified at the look of agony on Mary's white face. "Let me get you some water!" he exclaimed, starting up; "you look so faint; I ought not to have told you this."

"No, no!" she gasped, holding out a trembling hand to stop him—"I must know all! tell me, I beseech you! tell me every word you heard! I am certain that as yet, at least, he is not dead—I should have felt it if he had been. Oh, Charlie! keep nothing back from me!"

It was the first time she had called him by his Christian name, and although he saw she had done it unconsciously, he could not refuse the request she had made in such terms, even were it injurious to her to comply with it.

"Mr. Lisle wrote this letter just before starting on his perilous journey; he said that in the confusion attending the terrible battle he had lost everything he had with him, including his money, and that he now possessed nothing in the world but the horse which had been given him for all such portions of the distance to Paris as could not be traversed by any other means, and that, he feared, on account of the vicinity of the hostile troops, would be nearly the whole way. He added, that he should be beholden to the hospitality of the country people where he travelled for mere subsistence, as a few stray sous, which might buy him one meal, was literally all he had in his pocket, and money was, unhappily, too scarce in the army at that moment for him to dream of asking for any. He is a brave, noble fellow!" added Charlie, enthusiastically.

"And so, alone and in pain, with his life in danger every instant, he is making that dreadful journey," said Mary, with tears welling into her eyes.

"Yes; and what do you think was Lurline's comment on this letter from the man whose wife she would have been but for this war? She said it gave ample proof of the wisdom she had shown in deciding to give him up from the moment she heard he had resigned his appointment and joined the army. 'It is pretty plain,' she said, 'in what guise he will come out of the war—if he lives to come out of it at all—as a broken down, one-armed soldier, without a penny in the world; and that is certainly not a position he will find me disposed to share.'"

"Mr. Davenant," said Mary, starting to her feet, "for very shame it cannot be that Laura ever spoke such words as these; you must have misunderstood her!" and the indignation she felt sent a glow over her white face, and dispelled the faintness which had nearly overcome her.

"I assure you I could not mistake her," said Charlie, "for she talked over the whole matter at great length and with the utmost coolness. I think, in her anxiety to be married, she might not so completely have discarded Mr. Lisle till she saw how his affairs would turn out, if it had not been that she expects the offer of an alliance infinitely more splendid than his would have been, even in his former position, and she is glad to be free in order to secure it."

Mary sat down again in silence, she was too gentle to speak the contempt and almost loathing with which such conduct filled her; but after a moment she asked Charlie if he meant to imply that Laura was likely to marry some other man.

"Certain, I should say, if the gentleman continues to be as willing as he seems to be at present; but as they have only known each other ten days I suppose he thinks it necessary to wait as long as he can before definitely asking her to marry him. It will not be very long, however, for it seems he is anxious to get back to Italy as fast as possible, and he has told Mrs. Wyndham he would like to take Laura with him as his wife. But I have not yet explained to you that he is a Mr. Brant, an enormously wealthy merchant, who has a sort of palace in the beautiful city where Mr. Lisle lived. He brought Lurline some jewels which Bertrand wished to send her, and thus made her acquaintance, and he has already given her thoroughly to understand that if she marries him she will have every luxury and pleasure which money can procure. You know what a temptation that must be to the Lorelei."

"It is terrible!" said Mary; "Bertrand loves her."

"Or thinks he does," replied Charlie, with a smile, "he was dazzled and infatuated, but I think when Lurline shows herself to him in her true colours, as she now will, he may find his love for her was much more an imagination than a reality."

"But he will suffer—he must suffer in being so betrayed."

"Lurline is not worth it if he does," said Charlie, sharply; "the man she is likely to marry will suit her far better. I saw him; he came in while I was there yesterday, and his character may be read on his face—a hard, cold, selfish man of the world, who has his own interests at heart and nothing else; if he marries the Lorelei it will be because it is convenient for his own purposes, whatever they may be. Lurline carried him off into the back drawing-room to talk to him in private, so soon as he appeared, and it was then I got Mrs. Wyndham to tell me the whole history of his acquaintance with them. She says he is very anxious to be married that he may have an English lady to manage his princely establishment abroad; but he has to return there in a very few weeks, and she believes that he will have the marriage settled and finally accomplished in time to take Lurline home with him."

"So soon! while even yet Bertrand believes her engaged to him," said Mary, slowly; "Mr. Davenant, it is inconceivable; I cannot give credit to it!"

"I believe there is another motive weighing with Lurline at this moment which I almost shrink from telling you," said Charlie, half reluctantly; "yet it seems best you should know all. It appears that Mr. Wyndham has been very unwell since he has been in town, and the doctors have told both his wife and daughter that he has an incurable malady, which is certain to end his life very soon. Were he to die the Lorelei would be completely without a home, as Mrs. Wyndham would have to go back to her own friends, and I think Laura wishes to provide an establishment for herself before that event."

"Mr. Davenant, I must hope that you are judging poor Laura too harshly," said Mary, with enough of reproach in her gentle voice to make Charlie stumble uncomfortably to his feet, saying, "Anyhow, I dare say you have had enough of me and my surmises, so I will leave you now; but let me tell you one more fact which you ought to know: Lurline wrote to you to ask for your address in Paris, did she not?"

"Yes; and I sent it to her. Letters forwarded to the care of Madame Brunot, the wife of the colporteur with whom nurse Parry is going to lodge, will always reach me safely."

"Well, Lurline told me why she had asked you for it. She said she certainly should have to write to Mr. Lisle very soon on a matter of importance, and as she had not the remotest idea where he was, or was likely to be, she should send her letter to you, and ask you to give it to him, as you would be certain to find him out." Charlie glanced furtively at Mary as he spoke, but the quiet dignity of her manner was not ruffled for a moment; she was far above the petty spite of such a woman as Laura Wyndham. She made no remark on Charlie's statement, but, holding out her hand to him, she said, "It may be long before we meet again, Mr. Davenant, if ever; let me give you my best wishes for your happiness wherever you may be."

He caught her hand, and wrung it in both of his. "And you, Miss Trevelyan, come back safe—oh, come back safe! We cannot spare such as you are out of this wicked world," and then, overcome by his emotion, he rushed from the room.

Not much more than four and twenty hours later Mary Trevelyan was seated on the deck of the steam packet which was conveying her and her associates from Dover to Calais. It was a most lovely night, so fair and peaceful that it seemed scarce possible to believe the land whose quiet shore was already looming in sight could really be convulsed by all the horrors of war, and rent from end to end by struggles not only against the common foe but amongst her own children—France was even then close on the terrible disgrace and disaster of the day at Sedan—but here there was not so much as a breath of wind, not a ripple on the surface of the Channel, which lay like a sea of glass mirroring the pure stars in its depth. Mary sat at the side of the vessel near the helm, apart from the strangely miscellaneous crowd which thronged the deck; even those under whose care she was travelling were strangers to her, and she preferred to be alone with her own thoughts; they had wandered back, although she had so much to occupy her in the present, to the night of her own birth, when her unknown father had found a grave in just such calm and waveless waters. Ever since she had known, through Laura Wyndham's heartless revelation, the share that Mr. Lisle had unfortunately taken in her father's death, she had felt a yearning compassion for the parents she had never known, but of Mr. Lisle, her kind and constant friend, she thought only with a tender regret for all the remorse and suffering he had endured by a wholly unintentional act; she knew him far too well to suppose for an instant that he had been to blame, and she well remembered how the reproaches of his over sensitive conscience had poisoned all his subsequent life. She went on to think how glad she was that he too was now at rest, so that he was saved all the misery he would have endured in the knowledge of his dear son's danger, and became quite absorbed in her recollections.

Ever since Mary had sat down thus and lost herself in these reflections, a man, enveloped in a large cloak with a broad brimmed felt hat coming down over his forehead, had been standing close to her, leaning with his arms folded on the rail of the vessel, and looking steadily back to the English coast. But she had not noticed him among the numbers round her, and she was suddenly startled by his addressing her.

"Does not this seem almost like the rest of Paradise after the battle of life is over, Miss Trevelyan?" he said, in a low deep-toned voice. She looked up at him in great astonishment. How did he know her? who was he? He saw at once that she was at a loss, and taking off his hat, he said, "I beg your pardon, Miss Trevelyan, I thought you had recognised me. She did recognise him, for the face, so strangely worn and altered, was that of John Pemberton. He looked at least ten years older than he had done when he left Chiverley, and there was a settled sadness on his heavy features, but the dark honest eyes seemed brighter thay they used to be, and met her own with a more open fearless gaze.

"Mr. Pemberton," she said, cordially giving him her hand; "I am so very glad to see you again, but how do you come to be here, are you too going to Paris?"

"Yes, I have joined the Society for the Relief of the Sick and Wounded, like yourself, though I cannot hope to be so useful as you will be; still if I can do nothing better I can fetch and carry for others."

"You will find enough to do," said Mary; "I think men are almost more likely to be useful than women; but excuse me, I am ignorant in such matters, you have not had time to become a clergyman, have you?"

"No, oh no," he said, with a shudder; "after such a career as mine for the last two years, I must put myself to some severe test before I dare to seek so high an honour; it is for that reason I am going among the victims of the war. I think I may find the means there to suffer for others."

"Alas! I fear there is no doubt that you will suffer, as all must do in the midst of such unparalleled miseries," said Mary.

"Suffering, torture, death, oh, how gladly would I welcome them all if only through the last extreme of pain I might struggle up to the feet of my forgiving Saviour!"

And as he spoke John Pemberton stretched out his arms for a moment towards the midnight sky, then letting them fall once more on the railing, buried his face upon them, and Mary remained by his side in silence.

(To be continued.)

MAN'S WAY NOT IN HIMSELF.—II.

BY THE REV. JAMES SPENCE, D.D., AUTHOR OF "HOURS WITH DANIEL," ETC.

"O Lord, I know that the way of man is not in himself."—JER. x. 23.

THE perception of his way is not in man. The very light that is in him is darkness, and with a bedimmed understanding he sees not the way of life and of peace. Blinded or beclouded with sin, he takes a false view of his powers, position, and prospects, and has no clear guiding knowledge of his duty, his deserts, or his destiny. The capabilities and faculties of his manhood will be exercised, for he is an active and restless being; but he sees not adequately what he is, he discerns not clearly what he ought to be. Having lost the knowledge of his Father and God, he cannot find his way back to virtue and glory. The perception of his way is not in him.

Nor is the choice of his way in man. It is possible for a man to be so long a slave, that slavery becomes a second nature to him; he may hug the chains of his bondage and care nothing for liberty. So the Israelites, even in the breezy wilderness, and under the immediate guidance of God, longed to get back to the flesh-pots of Egypt. Now, man, when placed in circumstances where the true path of his manhood is pointed out to him, does not of himself choose it, and does not care for it. Many things are more attractive to him than his own proper way. Although the light of Divine Revelation shines upon him, showing him what he was, what he is, and what he may become, he is indifferent to the true dignity, birthright, and glory of his own nature. To him, in this respect, the admonition has deep and suggestive meaning—"Ask of the beasts, and they shall teach thee." The lion struggles for liberty, and the bird flies from the cage of its imprisonment when the door is left open; but man, with liberty offered him, and glory too, chooses not the way in which alone his manhood can rise to its legitimate power and sacred royalty. Deep and wide is our degradation, terrible our degeneracy, and complete our ruin.

This is still more manifest in the fact that the pursuit of his way is not in man. He may be given to see it, by varied motives and mighty power he may be led into it, but he is ever prone to wander; and even when his way is again by grace put into his soul, he is apt to forget it or to neglect it. Verily, it is not in man that walketh to guide morally or spiritually his own steps. "The world by wisdom knew not God," and man by wisdom knows not himself.

How sorrowful, then, is the acknowledgment, "O Lord, I know that the way of man is not in himself." No fact is sadder, yet none more true. In this respect man stands in striking contrast to all other creatures. So soon as we begin to live, we begin to go astray. Examine the annals of the nations and the records of humanity, and you do not find a man who naturally accords to God His supremacy, or who yields to his own manhood the respect and homage that are its due. How has the gold become dim and the fine gold changed! That which brightly bore the image of the heavenly man bears the image of the earthly. The sanctions of law, the arrangements of government, the rules and conventionalisms of society, the influences of education, are all so many curbs and forces brought to bear on man to keep him within bounds, so that his path, if possible, shall be virtuous and harmless; but nothing that is the product of mere human wisdom or power can again set man right, or put the true way of his nature within him as it was at first. The acknowledgment of the text is the cry of helplessness and the wail of misery: "O Lord, I know that the way of man is not in himself." Yet the very fact that God is addressed in this acknowledgment suggests hope, for He hath said, "O Israel, thou hast destroyed thyself, but in Me is thy help."

II. The words of the prophet may, therefore, be also viewed as an appeal to God. In God above, the true way of man can be found, and the very triumph of his Gospel is in the assurance given us: "I will put my laws into their mind, and write them in their hearts."

1. The greatness of man's degeneracy shows how utterly useless is all human help. In some sense man is still a law unto himself, and his moral nature, though distorted and fallen, may still be appealed to; but vain, and worse than vain, are the theories which make humanity, as it were, a God, and capable of working out its own spiritual transformation. All history declares that this is impossible: man's help is in God alone. He alone knows our condition, circumstances, and destiny, and he alone can meet our need by putting our way again within us, so that a redeemed and renovated nature shall become the law of our being. The very language of the prophet in this passage, humbly confessing ruin and incompetence, is an appeal to God for this gracious and marvellous restoration.

From the Creator alone, then, man can expect the recovery and restoration of his way. It is not Nature, nor her teaching, which can do it. The stars in their courses, and the marvels of the world around us, have from the first been saying, "The hand that made us is Divine," but their voice cannot quicken man. No mere outward rule is sufficient, no voice of external authority can meet the case. This has been sounding in the ears of humanity for many ages, but without effect. What the law—even enforced by the thunderings of Sinai—could not do, because it was weak through the flesh, God has done in the Gospel of His only-begotten Son. Man's way may again be restored and established within him, so that he may march in all the majesty of a new nature to glory. This is the grand provision of the Gospel, and to unfold it is the great burden of revelation. It is when a man feels that his way is not in himself, when he feels that he has gone astray, like a lost sheep, that he is utterly helpless and ruined, and can find no way of peace, or purity, or true progress—it is then that he will welcome with gladness and gratitude the truth that there is all-sufficient help for him in God, "They that be whole need not a physician, but they that are sick."

2. What, then, is God's method of restoring man to his true position and dignity, and of putting his way again within him? It consists of two parts, both of which are needful to this great end. There must be redemption and regeneration; and God, in the Gospel of his Son, has provided both.

First, as to Redemption. Man, as a creature of God, is under moral government, but having departed from his Maker and lost his way, he is under condemnation as a sinner and a rebel. As a child of disobedience, a wayward and prodigal son of the Infinite Father, he has exposed himself to tremendous consequences. Guilt is upon him that must drag him to perdition, if it is not removed. Before the law of his being can be again put within him, satisfaction must be found for his wandering and his sin. He must be redeemed from condemnation and delivered from guilt. The law which he has violated must be maintained; the government which he has sinned against must be upheld; and now God is in Christ reconciling the world unto himself. Christ Jesus died, the Just for the unjust, bringing near unto us the righteousness of God, so that in Him we find acceptance and safety. Thus, although sold under sin, condemned by law, and exposed to punishment, we may be delivered. The consequence of our wrong-doing and rebellion has, in a mysterious sense, been borne by the incarnate Son of God, and the price of our deliverance was His most precious blood. Through Him God can be just, and yet the justifier of the ungodly, and he can work in the sinner according to the law of his own wisdom and mercy.

But this is not all, it is only the outward preparation for putting the law of manhood again within. It only delivers a man from the consequence of his sin and folly, and puts him in a position to receive anew the image of his God, and the true way of his own proper nature.

There must be Regeneration as well as redemption, and God has provided for this by the power of the truth, and the quickening energy of His Spirit. The new birth, the new spiritual creation, is really the setting-up of man's way once more within him, and no man can reach it without being born again. The germ of a new existence, and the element of a new character, must take possession of the soul. Old things pass away, and all things become new. The enthronement of man's way in himself is not without a struggle, and to follow this way, amid the influences of evil and the tendencies of the "old man," involves a conflict; but victory will be on the side of redeemed and renovated manhood. The old becomes crucified, and the new becomes triumphant; the soul becomes dead unto sin, and alive unto righteousness and to God. Thus, in the expressive language of Scripture, a man comes to himself. In this way, by the renewing of the mind, he proves what is the good, acceptable, and perfect will of God. That will becomes his law, unconsciously ruling him from day to day, and his walking with God in duty and devotedness will be but the outward evidence and expression of the new life within him. Is not this the highest style of being? Is not this the noblest distinction of manhood, not to be told our duty from the outside, not to be driven to it by an external authority, but to do it as the natural action of a law within us, and the spontaneous operation of a new life? The bee requires no outward teaching to seek the flowers that yield it honey, and to shun the flowers that would hurt its life; so he is the loftiest and most God-like man who is a holy law unto himself, passing through the world in the faithful discharge of every obligation, not from the authority of an external command, but from the force of a new life.

This majesty of a new nature, this God-likeness, is possible for man now only through Christ. He is at once the Mediator, the Master, and the Model of this new life. For the liberty, safety, and glory of their manhood, men are united to Christ. For their moral rescue and spiritual renovation, he urges them to trust in Him. Their help and their hope are in Him alone: without Him, and without any conscious connection with Him, they may become rich or learned, they may know much of men and things, they may travel far and wide, they may be adorned with much worldly virtue, and receive much worldly respect, but without Him they cannot be holy. without Him they cannot be good, without Him they cannot be saved. Christ alone can enable sinners to quit themselves like men, and to go forth heavenward with all the energy, liberty, and joy of a true manhood.

WHEN TO GIVE.

ON a bright morning in the month of May, Edith and her nurse were strolling on the sands at one of our well-known watering-places.

They had already enjoyed the gentle breeze from the sea, and the warm gladdening rays of the sun for nearly an hour, when the nurse exclaimed, "Look, Miss Edith, at that poor little boy under the bridge of the pier; he has nothing on him but rags, and looks so thin and pale. I wonder if he has had any breakfast!"

"Let's go and ask him," replied Edith, "he really does look very miserable; you speak, Mary, I don't like to."

But before they had time to reach the place where he was sitting, he sprung from his seat, full of life and spirits, and began turning summersaults to the very edge of the water, allowing the waves to wash right over him. The reason of this sudden animation soon appeared. A lady and gentleman were throwing halfpence down from the pier into the water, and this little boy was exerting himself for their amusement and his own profit; having picked up all he could find, he rushed back to his old seat, and began counting his gains.

Mary and her young charge just reached the spot as he was tying up his riches in the corner of an old piece of rag. Here Edith made signs for Mary to speak to him.

"Would you like a roll from the baker's, little boy?"

"I don't mind."

"But will you be very glad if I fetch you one?"

"Not much; gi'e us a penny instead."

"No, I can't do that; but if you are hungry I will buy you something to eat."

"Do it, then; I s'pose I shall want suffin' to eat before long."

"Here is a biscuit which I have in my bag, you can eat it when you like," and so saying, the two walked away.

"You see," said Mary, "I was mistaken in that little boy. I thought he was very poor and wretched."

"And so he is," replied Edith; "he's all in rags, and has no shoes or cap."

"That is nothing, my dear child. I feel sure if you gave him all new clothes to-day he would be down here to-morrow in the same plight. I remember just such a case many years ago, when I was staying at the sea-side with a lady and her children. I was very young, for it was my first place; my mistress was always kind to poor people, and one day we found a poor little boy nearly naked lying asleep on the sands; we took him up to the house where we were staying, gave him a good dinner, and sent him home with a tidy suit of clothes, boots, and cap. Well, in a few days we found the same boy with his old clothes on again, and he sat begging of every one who passed by; we asked him what he had done with his new clothes? but he not only would not tell us, but was very saucy, and ran away, laughing. Now, I think this child we pitied so much just now is another of the same kind."

"What a shame!" exclaimed Edith; "I shan't give any more pennies to poor people."

"You must not say so, dear, exactly, though I do think it is always better to pay for something done. Now look at that tidy little girl, with a basket of violets and primroses; go and give her a penny for a bunch of flowers; she must have got up very early this morning, and walked a mile at least to the place where they grow, and then she has made all these neat bunches to sell."

"Here they are, nurse; how sweet they smell; won't ma be delighted! what a nice little girl she is! did you see her rosy cheeks?"

"Yes, and not only that, but her nicely-mended frock, clean pinafore, and, though her shoes were very old, they were clean and patched; we must see, when we go home, if there is an old pair of yours done with, as they would just fit her."

"Oh yes!" cried Edith, clapping her hands with delight. "Ma said I was not to wear the buttoned ones any more, as they were getting shabby; do let me run in and fetch them now, before she goes away; and there's a frock of mine too, I'm sure."

"Stop a minute, we will go in together, and ask your mamma what we may give her."

After a very short time the boots, and a neat print frock of Edith's, were packed up, and she was tripping along in a great state of delight. Upon reaching the spot where they had bought the flowers, only the basket remained. Edith was so disappointed that she could almost have cried with vexation, when a clean tidy-looking woman, with a baby in her arms, said, "Violets, miss; only a penny a bunch."

"Where's the little girl who was selling these flowers just now?" asked Edith of the woman.

"She's gone to do some errands for a lady; she goes every day, and gets twopence for going, so I allus comes and sells the flowers whilst she's gone."

"Thank you," said Edith; and, turning to Mary, said, "let's walk up and down here till she comes back, I do so want to see how she looks when we give her these things."

They had however only gone to the end of the street, when they saw the child running along in great haste in an opposite direction. "Look! look!" cried Edith, "there she goes; let's run after her!"

"Its no use, we could not catch her if we did; she is running with all her might, and is already at the end of the next street. No wonder she is employed to fetch errands if she does them at that rate; some children would have looked about for playmates, or stopped to look at the Punch-and-Judy show across the road. You had better come and have your bath, then we shall find her back selling her flowers by that time, I've no doubt."

Edith was rather unwilling to wait so long, but not wishing to vex her kind nurse, she hastened off to the bathing-rooms, for it was too cold to bathe in the open sea.

Upon returning to the Parade, they soon found the little flower-girl, who was so busy that she did not notice Edith and her nurse watching her smiling and happy face, as she sold the last two bunches in her basket.

"And what are you going to do now, little girl?" asked Mary. "What a lot of violets you have sold to-day!"

"Yes, mum. I'm so glad!"

"I suppose you want to go and play, after your morning's work?"

"If there's time. If baby's awake I shall have to take her out; and do you know she is getting such a weight, I have to sit down ever so many times."

"And what do you like doing best?" asked Mary.

"Looking at picture-books, and reading stories."

"Can you read well?"

"I reads to father now he's ill, and he's so glad; he says it makes the time go very fast; he can't read himself, you know; his father never sent him to school, nor mother's either; wasn't it a pity?"

"I am very glad you can read. I will try and find you some books."

"Thank ye, mum, that's very good of you; I do want some fresh ones; I've read mine over and over again."

Edith stood very patiently by her nurse's side, listening to the conversation, till, fearing she had quite forgotten the parcel, reminded her of it.

"We've brought you a pair of boots and a frock."

"I don't think we can buy 'em just yet, mum."

"We don't want to sell them," cried Edith, her face crimsoning at the child's mistake; "ma has sent them as a present to you, if you like to have them."

"Thank ye, miss," said the child, deeply blushing; "may I bring you some flowers every morning for a week? father doesn't like me to get things for nothing; do let me do something for them."

"If you would like to bring some flowers for a few mornings," replied the nurse, "you will find us at that large white house on the top of the hill."

"That I will," said the joyful child, as she put the things into her basket, and, wishing her kind friends good morning, ran home in such a state of happiness as only those can feel who are satisfied that their time has been well spent.

Edith and her nurse also felt great satisfaction in having helped one who was so deserving, and who tried so hard to help herself and her parents.

M. N.

"THE QUIVER" BIBLE CLASS.

237. What were the names of the sons of Samuel?

238. Quote a passage in which our Lord sets forth the duty of forgiveness and its extent.

239. What sin is mentioned as having caused the destruction of Tyre?

240. In the parable of "The rich man and Lazarus," how many brethren does the rich man say he had still living?

241. Quote the words used by Moses at the commencement and termination of the journeyings of the Israelites.

242. Where were the bones of Saul and Jonathan buried? and by whom?

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS ON PAGE 576.

224. Two talents of silver and two changes of garments (2 Kings v. 23).

225. In order to stir up the zeal of the other Churches (2 Cor. ix. 2).

226. "They have sharpened their tongues like a serpent; adder's poison is under their lips" (Ps. cxl. 3).

227. By covering the spies with stalks of flax, and afterwards by letting them down through a window by a cord (Joshua ii. 6—15).

228. St. Peter, St. James, and St. John (Matt. xvii. 1).

229. Ahab (2 Kings xxii. 30—34), and Josiah (2 Chron. xxxv. 22, 23).

230. "The salutation of Paul with mine own hand, which is the token in every epistle" (2 Thess. iii. 17).

SONNET.

AS our good Lord, the gentle Nazarene,
Once human, vehement with sheer disdain,
Drave from the cloister of the sacred fane,
By force and scourge, the clamorous and obscene,
Together with blasphemers, and the mean
Usurers; nor less than these, the folk whose gold
Purchased the purple and fine raiment, sold
To clothe the leper-scars of the unclean;
So durst I deem to-day His anger moves
To answer them in marriage whoso deal,
As erst they dealt who haggled o'er the doves
On holy ground; and no less such as kneel
To ratify the traffic with an oath,
Which under His chastisement bringeth both.

HORACE YERWORTH.

(Drawn by LIZZIE LAWSON.)

EVIL THOUGHTS.

"Better is he that ruleth his spirit, than he that taketh a city."—PROV. xvi. 32.

WHENCE springs the evil thought?
A bat, with noiseless flight,
It enters in, unsought,
Attracted by the light;
Or like a deadly snake
Deep hidden in the heart,
Which doth its victim wake
To feel the pois'nous dart.

Indignantly he spurns
The reptile thought away;
With shame his spirit burns
To think such thoughts hold sway.
Confess them? No: nor probe
Their source with morbid care;
It will not cleanse the robe
To think how spots came there.

And yet sometimes, alas!—
Like as a cagèd bird
Before a looking-glass
At first with fright is stirred,
Then, wheedling, looks again,
And loves its imaged self—
So man will first refrain,
And then deceive himself!

But, come ye whence ye may,
This thing, O thoughts, I know:
At those who go astray
A stone I dare not throw.
Degrees there are of ill;
Some conquer, while some fall.
To master thought and will
Is noblest work for all.

THE BRIDGE BETWEEN.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE TROUBLES OF CHATTY AND MOLLY," "THE DINGY HOUSE AT KENSINGTON," "QUEEN MADGE," "AGAINST HERSELF," ETC., ETC., ETC.

CHAPTER XXXI.—TOM DECLARES HIMSELF.

IT was a chilly evening, but they had wrapped themselves up well, and stood for the last time under the sycamore-tree, Dorothy in the midst, striving hard to keep back her tears. Sally made no effort to hide hers, but let them fall freely. It was their last evening at Hampstead.

"I shall get some work to do," said Will.

"So shall I," said Sally.

"Should like to know what a shrimp like you could do!" Tom remarked, scornfully.

"I can draw men and women," said Sally.

"So you can, darling," said Dorothy; "and it is such a blessing to be able to say you can do even one thing. I wonder if Sally could earn anything. Men and women are things we like to see, even in pictures."

"Oh yes, we're mighty fond of ourselves," remarked Tom.

"Tom, how much are you going to give the dad out of your money?" asked Will.

"Mind your own business!" was the polite reply. "Dorothy, when do you begin to teach your brats?"

"You shouldn't call them brats," replied his sister. "I begin on Monday."

"Oh well, Sally and Will, you had better go in. You'll find Blakesley there."

"Mr. Blakesley there?" said Dorothy, almost eagerly.

"Yes; they'll tell him you are out here; so if he wants to see you he'll come."

She was anxious to see him to-night. She wanted to hear what he would say when she told him that she had got work; but she was ashamed to confess it, even to herself, and so she remained behind with Tom. She pulled her warm shawl closer round her, and stood waiting for him to speak; but he said nothing—only stood whistling in an uneasy sort of way to himself. So she sat down on the seat—the dear old rickety seat on which she would never sit again perhaps, and began to day-dream. It was strange how much George Blakesley entered into her thoughts, now that he had, as far as was in his power, withdrawn himself from her life. She was so anxious that he should see that she was not the mere weak girl he had thought, and that she could put some real work and earnestness into her life, when the time came that they were really needed. She did not care for him, but she knew that his praise was a thing worth caring for, because he only gave it when it had been earned; and so she waited, and tried to imagine what he would say to her first real step in a right direction.

"Doll," said Tom, solemnly and slowly breaking in upon her thoughts, "do you know I think I'm a beast."

"Tom!" she almost screamed, in her surprise.

"So I am, Doll."

"Why?" she anxiously inquired.

"Because, dear, the dad's ruined, and we are all on the highway to the workhouse, and you have exerted yourself, and are going to teach brats, and Will talks about grinding, and even Sally wants to help. And I can't do anything, though I have fifty pounds a year."

"But why can't you?"

"Because I kept that boat all the summer, and you know what a lazy lot we were, and how you and all of us used to hang about."

Dorothy winced beneath his words, though there was no thought of reproach in them.

"And so I used to get off easily, and pay another fellow to take some of my work, and he's made a lot of mulls somehow, and now I believe I shall get dismissed—sent off, you know. I owe a lot on the boat score, and here I am. I am a regular beast, Doll!

Blakesley told me as much when I began, but I wouldn't take it."

"Oh, Tom, can't you work hard and retrieve?"

"I mean to try. I'm not going to be outdone by a girl. I have got out of the boat business, that's one comfort. Look here, Doll, I shall let you manage my money in future, and I'll pay off as fast as I can, and get into something else, if I'm kicked out where I am, and make a good start. Oh, here comes Blakesley, so I'd better go. Give us a kiss, Dolly. I'm glad you are not going to be married; we should have missed you awfully."

CHAPTER XXXII.—"ANOTHER GOOD-BYE."

"Well, Dorothy," said George Blakesley, in his usual quiet voice, "are you holding a reception under the branches of your favourite tree?" Then he sat down by her side, and Tom went in-doors, and Dorothy told him about her pupils. He seemed pleased, but he gave her no praise, and she was disappointed. "You can do more than three hours' work a-day," he said," and I have heard of something that would do for you, I think, but I do not know whether you would have the courage to accept it."

"Yes I should," she said.

"It is this. Aunt Josephine is writing a book, something about the better education of women, and she wants an amanuensis. You write a good hand, and she would only want you in the afternoon or evening."

"But I should be so ashamed to go; they must think so badly of me!" and she turned her face away.

"No, they don't do that," he answered in a low voice. "I know it would be awkward for you at first; the consideration is whether you ought or not to lose the work." She sat considering for a long time, and she answered slowly, "I ought not to lose it."

"Then I will speak to her about it this evening," and he rose to go.

"Are you going now?" she asked. She thought he had meant to sit by her side and talk to her, as he used a month since, but he answered almost distantly, if not coldly, "Yes; I promised to be at my aunt's by seven; and, Dorothy"—he turned round and looked at her face for the first time that evening—"I shan't see you again for some time. I am going away for three months."

"Going away?" she said, in dismay. "What for?" He answered as if he resented the question, and she remembered suddenly that she had no right to ask it.

"On business partly," he said, "and partly for health;" and then she, looking at his face, saw for the first time how worn it had grown, and how ill he looked; how all, save the kind blue eyes, seemed changed; she darted forward, and put her hand upon his arm.

"George, have you forgiven——?" but she stopped, and did not know what to do, for he stood and looked at her in surprise, and gently enough drew her hand away from his arm. "I will go and see Miss Josephine to-morrow," she said, meekly; "but shall I not see you again before you go?"

"No; I start for Paris to-morrow week. Good-bye, Dorothy."

"But you will come and see us before you go?"

"No, I shall not have time."

"Good-bye," she said, coldly, turning away to hide the tears in her eyes.

"Good-bye," he said, and went.

She returned to the seat under the sycamore-tree, and sat down. It was a terrible disappointment to her. She thought he would have been pleased, and have praised her. She felt as if half her efforts had been made to gain his approval; "And he could not have loved me very much," she thought, "for he seems to have forgotten all the past, and to have accepted the position of an ordinary friend quite contentedly—I wonder that he ever loved me at all, though." She sighed. "Oh, my dear old sycamore, to think I shall never stand beneath you again!" And then she thought of the morning when Venus was buried, and all that had been since, and of the old vexed question. "I have answered that," she thought, "and found something to live for; but I wish life was not such a wearying thing—I am tired of it already." She was so fond of the garden—she felt almost as if she could not leave it—there were so many memories bound up with it. But when she went in-doors at last she forgot the sycamore-tree, and the underwood, and the old seat, and Venus's grave, and everything else; for there, awaiting her, was a letter.

"Mr. Blakesley took it in," said Sally, "and I told him it was from Mr. Fuller, for I know his writing."

"It is only to wish me good-bye," said Dorothy—"I was out when he came, you know." And she put it into her pocket. She executed all the little household duties which lately she had taken on herself, and waited till she escaped for the night before she broke the seal of her letter. This was what he said:—

Dear Dorothy,—You were out when I came the other day, so we did not say good-bye. I shall only be away for a few months though, and when I come back my first visit will be to Dorothy, and perhaps she may have forgotten the past, or all in it that made her so angry. I think you were quite right to be angry, and I shall never forgive myself for all I said and did; but now—now that you are free, will you try and forgive me? My dear little Dorothy, I often think of the happy days we spent before Netta came and bewitched us all, and what excellent friends we were.

There is such a wild sea down on this rough Cornish coast; you would delight in it so. We are very much alike, Dorothy; I have often thought that, and we should both be content to dream our lives away in a place like this, I believe. I wish you were here. How could you be so foolish, child—I never forgot you—I was only fascinated. Before the spring comes I shall be back at Hampstead with you, and sitting under the sycamore-tree. Good-bye, child.—Yours ever, ADRIAN FULLER.

She looked up when she had finished reading it. It had made her heart beat and her fingers tremble, and the old feeling came rushing back, and Netta's words with it, that perhaps some day she should marry him; but the new feeling conquered it. "No," she said, "life is made for something better than dreams." Then she thought, with a sigh—"And I have no heart. I only love just my home people, and that is natural, but all my other feelings seem just to consist of restless longings and wishes, and something I do not understand."

The next day they left Hampstead, and in the afternoon Dorothy went to Miss Josephine's, and became her amanuensis.

(To be continued.)

THE GOSPEL ACCORDING TO ST. LUKE.—I.

BY THE RIGHT REVEREND THE LORD BISHOP OF GLOUCESTER AND BRISTOL.

THERE is perhaps no portion of the New Testament which has more distinct characteristics, or more clearly sets forth the individuality of the sacred writer, than the Gospel which is the subject of the present article. These characteristics, and some traces of this individuality, shall now be placed before the general reader. We must, first, however, specify what little we certainly know of the outward history of the thoughtful and discriminating proselyte who has left to us this record of his Master's words and works.

The three facts which the writings of the New Testament appear to warrant our distinctly stating with reference to St. Luke are, first, that he was a companion of St. Paul; secondly, that he was not of the circumcision; thirdly, that his profession was that of a physician.

Of these the first fact is clearly of the greatest moment, and is providentially that of which we have the most satisfactory proofs. That he, whom the apostle characterised in his Epistle to Philemon as his "fellow-worker" (συνεργός), really showed himself as such by his companionship with St. Paul in his second journey, cannot reasonably be doubted. None of the speculations which of late years have been put forward in reference to the composition of the evangelist's second work have ever shaken the trustworthiness of the familiar inference from the narrative, viz., that St. Luke accompanied St. Paul on his second journey; that he joined him at Troas, and thence proceeded by way of Samothrace to Philippi; and that on the apostle's return to that city, after the tumult at Ephesus, he went with him to Jerusalem, and onward to Rome. There, from St. Paul's notice in the concluding verses of his Epistle to the Colossians, we know that he remained with the apostle during his first imprisonment; and then, too, again we find the faithful evangelist, at the close of the apostle's second imprisonment, his supporter and comforter when all others had fallen away. This latter fact, I need hardly say, is supplied to us by the concluding verses of the apostle's last writing—his second Epistle to Timothy.

The second fact in reference to our evangelist is perhaps somewhat less certain, though still so reasonable a deduction from the 10th, 11th, and 14th verses of the 4th chapter of the Epistle to the Colossians, that few critics of any reputation have hesitated to accept it as the most natural interpretation of the apostle's words in the passage to which I refer. There, it will be observed, the salutations which the apostle conveys to the Church at Colossæ are sent from friends and well-wishers, who appear to have belonged to two different sections of the great household of faith. Aristarchus, Marcus, and Justus are mentioned first, and are specified as "being of the circumcision." Epaphras, Lucas, and Demas follow next, but in a group so far detached from the one that preceded as to make the supposition in the highest degree natural that these last were not of the circumcision, and as such were separately mentioned by the apostle.

The third fact relative to the evangelist—that he was a physician—is also distinctly specified in the passage we have just noticed, where, as we all doubtless well remember, St. Luke is named by him whom he so faithfully loved and followed as "the beloved physician." It has, I am aware, been urged by Calvin that this very specification is unfavourable to the identification of the Lucas here mentioned with the evangelist. It has been said that the apostle's follower and friend would have received at his hands some more honourable title, and would have had his greeting conveyed in terms which could scarcely have failed to refer to the high estimation in which he must now have been held by the Church at large. The simple and unobtrusive title of the "beloved physician" must, it has been urged, belong to one of a far humbler position in the Church of Christ than that of St. Luke the Evangelist. The objection is not without some plausibility, but when we pause only to consider how many possible reasons there might have been why St. Luke might have been so brought to the remembrance of the Colossians, and further remember that antiquity never appears to have doubted the correctness of the identification, we may very properly abide by the current opinion.

These three facts relative to the third evangelist have received, as we might well imagine, several amplifications from the earlier ecclesiastical writers. Of these it is only necessary to allude to the direct statements of Eusebius and Jerome, that the beloved physician was of Antioch, and the indirect comment of the latter of these writers that he was a proselyte, neither of which appears in itself unlikely, or in any way incompatible with the three facts which we have derived from the notices of the New Testament. It is right, however, to notice that Irenæus, who has devoted a chapter (Hær. iii. 10.) to the consideration of St. Luke's Gospel, confines himself solely to the three scriptural statements relative to the evangelist; and it may be added that Chrysostom, whose long connection with Antioch so often and so naturally leads him to dwell upon its early associations with Christianity, has nowhere claimed the evangelist as belonging to his native city.

Reverting then to these facts relative to St. Luke—that he was a companion of St. Paul, that he was of Gentile descent, and that he was by calling a physician—we can hardly forbear at once proceeding onward to the question, how far, and in what degree, we can trace any indication of these three facts in the inspired document which we are soon about to consider? Do we in any way find the writer reflected in his works? Does the companion of St. Paul disclose himself in a Gospel that was not improbably composed under that apostle's general supervision? Does the Gentile appear in his relation of the words and works of Him who was no less the Light of the Gentiles than the glory of His people Israel? Are there any traces, however slight, of the earthly calling of the historian-evangelist in the record which he was moved to set forth of the mercies of the great Healer of the children of men? Such questions are not devoid either of interest or usefulness. They serve to connect the inspired writer with his works in a way that is both natural and reasonable, and they also suitably prepare us for a more complete appreciation of those particular characteristics which I will afterwards proceed to delineate.

The first question, how far the connection of our evangelist with St. Paul appears in his Gospel, demands very careful consideration, as it would certainly seem that the opinion of some degree of dependence of the evangelist on the apostle has found favour with early and trustworthy writers. Not to multiply quotations, which will be found in almost all popular introductions to the study of the Gospels, it may be enough to cite the following very distinct statement of Irenæus—a writer, be it observed, whom we have already noticed as at once full and explicit on St. Luke's Gospel, and yet apparently careful to make no additions from mere hearsay or tradition. His words are as follows:—"Luke, too, companion of St. Paul, put down in a book the Gospel which the latter was in the habit of preaching." If we add to this the short but equally pertinent statement of Tertullian, "Luke's digest is usually ascribed to Paul," we have two observations from trustworthy writers, dating backward, the one nearly as far as to the middle of the second century, the latter to a period not more than half a century later, which certainly cannot be dismissed without consideration. It will be observed, however, that the question with which we are most interested, and which belongs almost wholly to the province of internal evidence and criticism, the reflection on St. Luke's Gospel of St. Paul's teaching, is somewhat different from that to which the quotations we have made really were intended to form the answer. The comments rather bear upon, and probably were distinctly intended by the writers to bear upon, the general question of the authority of St. Luke's Gospel. The more clearly substantiated dependence of St. Mark's Gospel on the teaching and preaching of St. Peter, suggested probably the idea of a similar dependence of the Gospel of one who was not an apostle upon the teaching of one who was; and who, as his own words several times clearly imply, was specially informed by revelation as to some, at least, of the leading points in his Master's history. However this may be, I certainly see no reason for calling in question the fact generally, nor can I admit (with some recent writers on St. Luke) that judicious historical criticism rejects such statements as ill-founded or gratuitous. It would seem to be perfectly reasonable that there should be some degree of spiritual dependence in the case of one like St. Luke on the great apostle of the Gentiles, and it ever seems to be a subject for thankfulness to Almighty God that the connection of the evangelist with St. Paul was so close and persistent. At the same time it seems proper to separate the statements of antiquity from the question with which we are more immediately engaged, and which belongs in a great degree to the province of modern controversy. What we have now to consider is a purely literary question, which has to be answered by the results of a fair and unprejudiced examination of the contents of the Gospel now before us. Our question is not, does the third Gospel depend upon the teaching of St. Paul—but, does it, as we might be led to think from the connection between the evangelist and the apostle, reflect any of the peculiarities of that teaching? The answer cannot be made quite so readily as many of our modern writers seem disposed to imagine. It is easy enough to answer sweepingly in the negative, and it is not much more difficult to answer hastily in the affirmative, on the strength of a specious list of coincidences; but it is not quite so easy to make our answer, if we agree first to give just weight on the one hand to passages and sentiments of real and unquestionable similarity, and on the other hand to reject those coincidences which appear to have arisen merely from the oneness of the Gospel-message, and not from any marked peculiarities in the mode of delivering it. We shall perhaps be confirmed in our view that the question is not very easy, and, it may be added, not wholly free from possibilities of biassed judgment, if we just pause for a moment to consider the very opposite decisions arrived at by two critics who have investigated the present question. On the negative side we have Dr. Davidson, who, in his introduction to this Gospel, conceives the tradition of the dependence of St. Luke's Gospel on the preaching of St. Paul to rest on no good foundation, though he candidly supplies us with a list of some striking accordances. On the affirmative side we have Dr. Reitschl, of Tübingen, who, in the second part of his treatise on St. Luke and Marcion, strongly urges that the evangelist's reproduction of St. Paul's sentiments is distinctly to be traced in several passages relating to the abrogation of the law, in various comments relating to the apostles and the seventy disciples, in the recognition of the Gentiles, and his general representation of our Lord as the victor of the powers of darkness rather than as the merely Jewish Messiah. Here are two very different opinions: to which are we to incline? On which side is the weight of evidence? At first sight it would seem clearly on the side of the German critic. The list of identities in sentiment between the apostle and the evangelist, as put forward by Dr. Reitschl, is certainly large and comprehensive; the denial of Dr. Davidson is in the face of some admitted similarities. And yet a nearer inspection of the recorded similarities will almost certainly induce us to modify our judgment. Most of them are only such as an ingenious observer might produce from a comparison of any other Gospel with the Epistles of St. Paul. The few that really seem to carry conviction may be set aside by the production of dissimilarities of teaching on the very same points, fully as strong as the specified likenesses. Nay, even the general impression (the thing after all which in these matters most tends to persuade us), that there is some sort of agreement in expression between the sentiments of St. Paul and St. Luke, may be explained far more readily and satisfactorily, on the assumption of St. Luke's Gentile origin, than on that of his dependence on the apostle of the Gentiles. The result, then, at which the cautious reader and critic would arrive, after considering the evidence on both sides, would probably be nothing more definite than this: that there are a few undoubted instances—such as the account of the institution of the Lord's Supper, the relation of the parable of the two sons, and, still more clearly, of the parable of the Publican and the Pharisee, to the doctrine of justification by faith, and apparently also some scattered comments to the same effect, in which a similarity of sentiment between St. Paul and his companion are certainly to be recognised, but that these are too few to be adduced as internal illustrations of that connection between the two inspired men of which history informs us. I do not, then, venture to deny that the teaching of St. Paul may not have been permitted to guide St. Luke in his selection of some of those words and works of our Lord which he alone records; but I think it is fair to say that it has not yet been satisfactorily proved. It is one thing to believe with the writers of antiquity that there may have been some spiritual dependence existing between the "beloved physician" and St. Paul; it is another to assert that there is clear internal evidence of it in the writings which these inspired men have left for our learning.

I have dwelt upon this question, because it will be found to involve several serious considerations which reach beyond the mere literary point of view in which we have been regarding it, and because I do not think it has always been sufficiently disentangled from ecclesiastical traditions with which it does not stand in any necessary connection.

"ABOUT MY FATHER'S BUSINESS."

BY THOMAS ARCHER.

GIVING THE FEEBLE STRENGTH.—II.

CONTINUING our walk round the hospital, we notice the three consulting-rooms, where the physicians attend daily at two o'clock, each to see his own patients, and the reception-room, where an officer takes the letters of introduction, and exchanges them for attendance cards. This is the door of the museum; and though we shall be admitted, if you choose to accompany me, it is, like other surgical museums, of professional more than general interest, and not a public portion of the hospital. Turning into the great main corridor, with its peculiar honeycombed red-brick ceiling and pleasant sense of light and air, we will ascend the broad staircase to the wards, those of the women being on the first floor, while the men occupy a precisely similar ward on the second. These wards consist of a series of rooms of from two to six, eight, and twelve beds each, so as to afford opportunity for the proper classification of the cases. A day-room is also provided for each set of wards, so that those patients who are well enough to leave their beds may take their meals there, or may read, play at chess, draughts, or bagatelle, or occupy themselves with needlework. These wards and their day-rooms all open into a light cheerful corridor, with large windows, where the inmates may walk and talk, or read and rest, sitting or reclining upon the couches and settees that are placed at intervals along the wall. All through these rooms and corridors the air is kept at a medium temperature of from 55 to 60 degrees by means of hot-air or hot-water apparatus, the latter being in use as well as the former. You noticed, as we stood in the grounds, a large square structure of a monumental character, that was in fact the chamber through the sides of which draughts of air are carried to channels beneath the building, there they are drawn around a furnace, to be heated, and to escape through pipes that are grouped about the entire building. In order to ensure the necessary comfort of patients requiring a higher temperature, each ward is provided with an open fire-place.

It is now just dinner-time. The ample rations of meat and vegetables, fish and milk, and the various "special diets," are coming up on the lift from the kitchens, and in the women's day-room a very comfortable party is just sitting down to the mid-day meal. Here, as elsewhere, greater patience and more genuine cheerfulness are to be observed among the women than is as a rule displayed by the men, and there are not wanting signs of pleasant progress towards recovery, of grateful appreciation of the benefits received, and of a hopeful trusting spirit, which goes far to aid the doctor and the nurse. There are, of course, some sad sights. Looking into the wards, we may see more than one woman for whom only a few more hours of this mortal life remain; more than one child whose emaciated form and face looks as though death itself could bring no great change. Yet it must be remembered that cases likely soon to terminate fatally are not admitted. The severity of the diseases and their frequently fatal character under any condition will account for the large proportion of sickness unto death which finds here alleviation but not absolute cure; though, of course, the sufferers from heart disease, who are on the whole the most cheerful, as well as those whose affections of the lungs can be sensibly arrested, if not altogether healed, are frequently restored to many years of useful work in the world. On this second storey, in the men's ward, there are some very serious cases, and some sights that have a heartache in them, yet they are full of significance, for many of them include the spectacle of God's sweet gift of trust and patience—the mighty courage of a quiet mind. Yonder is a courageous fellow, who, suffering from a terrible aneurism, had to cease his daily labour, and now lies on his back, hopeful of cure, with a set still face and a determined yet wistful look at the resident medical officer, or the nurse who adjusts the india-rubber ice-bag on his chest. Here, near the door, is that which should make us bow our heads low before the greatest mystery of mortal life. Not the mystery of death, but the mystery of meeting death and awaiting it. A brave, patient, noble man is sitting up in that bed, his high forehead, fair falling hair, long tawny beard, and steady placid eye, reminding one of some picture of Norseman or Viking. Lean and gaunt enough in frame, his long thin hand is little but skin and bone, but it is clasped gently by the sorrowing wife, who sits beside him, and glances at us through tearful eyes as we enter. One can almost believe that the sick man who is going on the great journey whither he cannot yet take the wife who loves him, has been speaking of it calmly, there is such an inscrutable look of absolute repose in that face. He is a Dane, and the doctor tells us has borne his illness and great pain with a quiet courage that has challenged the admiration of those about him—a courage born of simple faith, let us believe, a calm resting on an eternal foundation of peace. Here, in the corridor, is a party, some of its members still very weak and languid, who, having just dined, are about to take the afternoon lounge, with book or newspaper, and, leaving them, we will conclude our visit by descending to the basement, whence the chief medicine comes in the shape of wholesome nourishing food, of meat and fish, of pure farina, of wine, and milk, and fresh eggs, of clean pure linen, and even of ice, for ice is a large ingredient here, and several tons are consumed every year. The domestic staff have their apartments in this basement portion of the building, another division of which is occupied by the kitchens and store-rooms, while lifts for coal and daily meals and every other requisite, ascend to the upper wards, and shoots or wells from the upper floors convey linen and bedding that require washing, as well as the dust and refuse of the wards, to special receptacles.

The kitchen itself is a sight worth seeing, with its wide open range, where prime joints are roasting, or have been roasted, and are now being cut into great platefuls for the ordinary full-diet patients. In the great boilers and ovens, vegetables and boiled meats, farinaceous puddings, rice, tapioca, fish, and a dozen other articles of pure diet are being prepared, while a reservoir of strong beef-tea represents the nourishment of those feeble ones to whom liquid, representing either meat or milk, is all that can be permitted. We have little time to remain in the separate rooms, which are cool tile-lined larders, where bread and milk and meat are kept, but among the records of donations and contributions to the hospital it is very pleasant to read of the multifarious gifts of food and other comforts sent from time to time by benevolent friends. They consist of baskets of game, fruits, rice, tea, flour, books, warm clothing for poor patients leaving the hospital, prints, pictures, fern-cases, all kinds of useful articles, showing how thoughtful the donors are of what will be a solace and a comfort to the patients, while not the least practically valuable remittances are bundles of old linen. Still more touching, however, are the records of gifts brought by patients themselves, or by their friends.

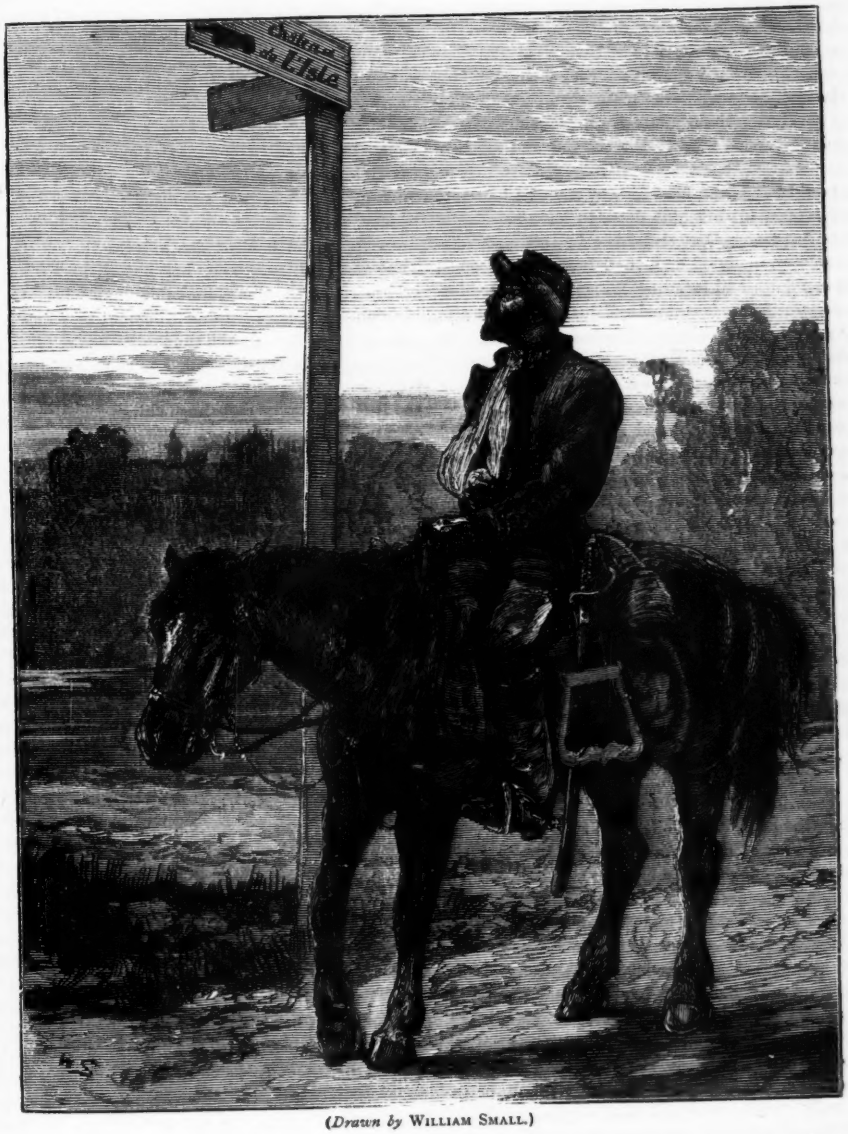
"I was a patient here four 'years ago," says a man who has made his way to the secretary's room, "and I made up my mind that if ever I could scrape a guinea together I should bring it, and now I have, and here it is, if you'll be so good as to take it, for I want to show I'm truly grateful."

"If you'll please accept it from us; my husband and I have put by fifteen shillings, and want to give it to the hospital for your kindness to our son, who was here before he died."

These are the chronicles that show this to be a people's hospital indeed, and that should open the hearts of those who can take pounds instead of shillings. In such cases the secretary has ventured to remind the grateful donors that they may be unable to afford to leave their savings, but the evident pain, even of the hint of refusal, was reason for accepting the poor offering. Poor, did I say? nay, rich—rich in all that can really give value to such gifts, the wealth of the heart that must be satisfied by giving.



There is one more adjunct to this great human conservatory which we must see before we leave. Down four shallow stone steps from the corridor, and along a cheerful quiet sub-corridor, is the chapel. A very beautiful building, with no stained glass or sumptuous detail of ornament, and yet so admirable in its simple architectural decoration and beautiful proportions, that it is an example of what such a place should be. It is capable of seating three or four hundred persons, and visitors are freely admitted to the Sunday services when there is room, though of course seats are reserved for the patients, who have "elbows" provided in their pews, that they may be able to lean without undue fatigue. The chapel itself was a gift of a beneficent friend, and was presented anonymously. One day an architect waited on the committee, and simply said that if they would permit a chapel to be erected on a vacant space in their grounds close to the main building, he had plans for such a structure with him, and the whole cost would be defrayed by a client of his, who, however, would not make known his name. The gift was accepted, and the benevolent contract nobly fulfilled. I should be glad to hear that some other charitable donor had sent in like manner an offer of funds to fill those two great vacant wards which, waiting for patients, are among the saddest sights in this hospital.

STILL AND DEEP.

BY F. M. F. SKENE, AUTHOR OF "TRIED," "ONE LIFE ONLY," ETC.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

THE glory of an August sunset had filled all the dome of heaven, as it arched bright and cloudless over the once smiling land of France, and there could not have been conceived a greater contrast than that which existed between the pure pellucid sky overhead, softened by the harmonious blending of its limpid blue with the exquisite opal tints of the western horizon, and the blackened war-racked country which lay beneath it, every step revealing some trace of the destroying legions that so lately had passed over it. Here it was a village burnt almost to the ground, with a few miserable-looking men and women wandering listlessly round the ruins of their once happy homes; there it was a vineyard trampled down by the rushing feet of horses and the wheels of artillery carriages, with all the ripe fruit crushed into the ground, and the vines torn up by the roots, giving no hope for the future; now it was a garden, desolated by the rude hands that had carried off its produce, and cut down its bushes to replenish their camp fires; here and there along the road would be seen a dead horse, which had dropped down from the severity of the march, and occasionally there was darker testimony to the terrible nature of the great struggle, in the body of some unfortunate peasant suspended from a tree because he had been suspected of being a spy or a traitor.

(Drawn by WILLIAM SMALL.)

"In the fading light he had to go quite close to distinguish what was written."—p. 612.

In the fair heaven above all was sinless calm and beauty, and on earth nothing was to be seen but the disfiguring traces of strife and ruin, rapine and bloodshed. The wondrous difference between the realm of light and purity and that of darkness and distress, seemed to have struck home forcibly to the weary way-worn man who was riding along slowly on the country road, glancing now to the golden sunset, now to the scarred and stricken land.

It would have been hard for any one who had only known him in his brighter days, to have recognised the gay handsome Bertrand Lisle in this poor disabled soldier, mounted on a tired horse, that seemed as broken down and forlorn-looking as the rider himself. His uniform was stained and dusty, his right arm hung powerless in a sling, his hair and beard had been cut short to lessen the difficulties of the toilette in his present circumstances; but the greatest change was in the expression of his countenance. The pleasant face, that used to be so bright and sunny, was grave and sad, and he looked at least ten years older then he had done but a month before, for men do not pass through such scenes as the dreadful battle of Gravelotte without bearing the mark of its awfulness with them to the grave, even if they have sustained no personal injury. Bertrand was sobered for life by the scenes he had witnessed, and years of thought could not have revealed so much of the mystery of human existence as he had learnt in those tremendous hours of carnage and of suffering.

It had taught him, as nothing else could have done, how utterly ephemeral and hollow are all the hopes and joys which seek to feed upon this mortal life alone; how helpless every human being is in the grasp of destiny, that in an instant can fling him down from the highest summit of his wishes to grovel in the dust, despoiled of all and racked with pain; but best of all was one glorious lesson which he had gained out of that appalling battle-field when the struggle was over.

Disabled as he was, he had gone over it, when the terrible struggle was over, with the surgeons and one or two of the officers, striving to relieve the sufferings of any that were lying wounded but yet alive amidst the confused masses that encumbered the reddened earth; and as he went from heap to heap of the dead, and saw the thousands that had been stricken down in their brightest prime, or in their early youth, with all the purpose of their life unfinished, all its fair promise unfulfilled, the conviction came upon him, with all the strength of an eternal verity, that it was impossible this brief precarious existence could be all for which those men had received the gift of life from the Creator of the universe. Apart from the assurances of revelation, of which Bertrand, though a true believer, had thought as little as men actively engaged in worldly business are apt to think of that which seems as yet so distant from them, there rose within him now the absolute certainty that death, swooping down suddenly upon this incomplete fragment of existence, could not be the close of all moral consciousness—all human powers of enjoyment or of progress—but rather that it must be, in truth, the commencement of that perfect and immortal life for which the Infinite Father first drew us out of the unknown void, and animated our mysterious being with the invisible power of the vital flame. There, not here, must all the hopes and aspirations—the virtues, the beauty, the powers of those he had left in mangled heaps upon the field of death, have their final outcome and fruition. They had but spent their dawn of life on earth, the glorious day must brighten to high noon hereafter; no morning out of God's creation ever saw the sun set suddenly when scarcely has he risen above the horizon, nor shall any life that God has given be quenched in final night while yet the roseate glow of early hope shines forth, prophetic of a more enduring glory.

It seemed to Bertrand Lisle, as he rode slowly onward, pondering on these truths, that all the concerns of this world, on which he had so lately dwelt with eager interest, were dwarfed to absolute insignificance before the one thought that, beyond these visible scenes the true life waits us, where all that has been so incomplete, so hollow, so disappointing here, shall have its fulfilment and consummation in bliss. Even the fervent patriotism, to which he had sacrificed so much, had for the time become merged into the one earnest hope that the living spirits of all the countless dead whom he had seen mown down by the blast of war, like forest leaves before the storm, might every one, foeman and friend alike, have passed in safety to the reality of that pure existence for which they had been created. The years which he himself, or any one, could pass in this mortal state seemed to him so fleeting, so uncertain, that he seemed almost incapable of feeling any anxiety as to his own future fate in this world. The passionate love for Lurline, which had made him long so intently to have her by his side, had, for the moment, fastened itself with disquietude only on the thought of her eternal destiny as well as his own. Had that brilliant wilful being ever given an hour's reflection to the time when even her bright eyes must be dimmed by the shades of death, and her musical laughing voice stilled in the impenetrable silence of the grave? He took out her photograph, which he always carried in the breast-pocket of his coat, and looked at it. Yes, there she was, in her coquettish attitude, leaning her pretty head on her hand, with her smiling face turned round to the gazer, and her eyes, even in the dim likeness, having a flashing keenness in their look, which gave a somewhat painful impression of her character when thus separated from the living witchery of her actual presence. Bertrand half sighed as he looked at it.

"She has never been taught to think of anything but this world," he thought, "but I shall be a different man after what I have seen these last few days, and I may be able to mould her to higher aims."

Then, as in a vision, the pure sweet face of Mary Trevelyan seemed to pass before him, and again he sighed, with a strange mixture of feeling. The remembrance of her quiet reserve and modesty was a great contrast to the look which even the photograph of Lurline wore.

"Dear Mary," he thought; "I believe she half lives in heaven already, well, she has the less need of earthly love," and he put Laura's portrait back in its place close to his heart. Bertrand was aware, however, that his present state of feeling—the result of a tremendous shock—neither would nor could endure in all its first fervour throughout the working days of life, and already even now he had to turn his mind to the problem, which had to be solved every night, as to where he was to find a lodging till the morning for himself and his horse. Since he had started on his difficult journey with the dispatches for the military commander in Paris, he had been obliged to trust entirely to the hospitality of his countrymen, and had experienced many strange vicissitudes in the reception he met with. For the most part he was made welcome as a soldier of France to a night's shelter wherever he asked it, from noble or peasant alike, and if any looked doubtfully or suspiciously at him, he had but to chant in a low voice the first verse of the popular song, "Mourir pour la Patrie," to ensure his being offered all there was to give; but the state of the country was such that with the best will possible, it was often but a sorry entertainment which could be provided for him: sometimes he found himself in a hamlet which had been almost entirely burnt down, or in a château which had been sacked from attic to basement, but on the other hand he sometimes met with a splendid welcome in a country house lying out of the line of march, and therefore untouched, or found a more modest but comfortable home in the house of a village curé.

Bertrand was now travelling through a thoroughly rural district, and he saw no sign of any human habitation far or near. Night was coming on apace, and for the sake of his poor tired horse as much as his own, he became very anxious to find some place where food and shelter could be obtained for them both. It was a picturesque thickly-wooded country; and as he trotted slowly along he came to a point where a narrower road branched off from that on which he was riding, and a tall white sign-post stood at the junction of the two with some words written on it, and a hand painted black pointing down the side-way. Bertrand rode up to this welcome guide that he might ascertain whether it indicated the path to any village, and in the fading light he had to go quite close to distinguish what was written on it; when he had read the words he gave a violent start, and remained motionless on his horse, as if petrified to stone, for the inscription on the sign-board was simply this, "Au château de L'Isle." Bertrand Lisle had heard that name before; yes, though his father had never breathed it to him nor wished that he should know what their devotion to the doctrine of the divine right of kings had cost them, yet he well remembered that it had escaped the lips of an old French gentleman who had come to visit his parents when he was a boy; he recollected how he sat unnoticed in a corner, drinking in every word this old man said about the "Château de L'Isle," his father's rightful inheritance, and the rich estates that belonged to it, which it now flashed upon him had been mentioned as lying in precisely the "Department" of France in which he at present was. Some dim confused reminiscence too he had of a relative of their name and blood who had usurped his father's place, and of the bitter scorn with which Mr. Lisle spoke of him. Bertrand had been but a child when he overheard this conversation, and though it excited him greatly at the time, it had gradually passed from his mind, but now the sight of that name seemed to have struck the key-note which revived the whole in his memory, and he sat there pondering over his recollections with the keenest interest and excitement, for many more minutes than he was aware of. He could not doubt that by a strange Providence he had been actually led almost to the gate of his own old home, and under the strong influence of the religious feelings which had so lately been enacted in his mind, he could not but feel that he must have been brought there for some special purpose. He had not the smallest idea to whom the château now belonged, or who the relative had been whom his father had so vehemently repudiated, but it did not take him long to make up his mind that he would seek a shelter that night in the ancient abode of his ancestors and nowhere else.

The resolution was no sooner formed than he put it in execution: he turned his weary horse into the side-path, and went on for nearly a mile through a wood with occasional glimpses of an open country lying beyond, till he saw before him a high wall, enclosing what was evidently an extensive park shaded by very fine old trees. It was clearly a private residence, for it was entered by a huge iron gate with a quaint little lodge set on one side of it, and two fierce-looking stone griffins guarding it from pillars to the right and left. Bertrand felt, as if by intuition, that he was at the gate of his rightful home, and, dismounting, he led his horse up to it, and pulled a massive iron bell-handle which hung at one side; it seemed rusty from age, and the sound it woke was harsh and loud, echoing down among the old trees with a discordant peal.

XUM

CHAPTER XXXIV.

As the sound of the bell died away among the trees, an old woman came out from the lodge, and reconnoitered Bertrand for a few minutes through the bars of the gate, without making the slightest movement to let him in; when he spoke to her she shook her head, and pointed to her ears as an intimation that she was deaf; finally she turned round and went off in what he supposed to be the direction of the house, and he concluded that she had gone to call some one else. In this he proved to be correct, as it was not long before a man-servant, in old-fashioned livery, came down the avenue towards him; he was a thin elderly man, with a somewhat haggard worn-out look, and he too came and peered at Bertrand through the iron bars before attempting to let him in. It was quite dark by this time, and in the gathering shadows he seemed only able to distinguish that it was a soldier who stood there with the bridle of his horse hanging over his left arm, for he said, in a suspicious tone, "Is it a Prussian?"

"A Prussian! no indeed," exclaimed Bertrand; "I am a French officer, a friend. I am travelling to Paris on a mission from the army, but my horse is exhausted, and I am disabled, and I have come to ask for a night's shelter in the château: I suppose you have shown hospitality to some of our troops before now."

"Doubtless; I will go and ask my master."

"Your master is the Comte de L'Isle, is he not?" said Bertrand at a venture, devoured by anxiety as he was to ascertain whether any of his father's family still held possession of the old home.

"Certainly," answered the man; "and, monsieur, by what name shall I announce you to my master?"

"Say that I am Bertrand de L'Isle, his relative," he replied; and it seemed to him as if a voice within him that was not his own had given the answer.

Its effect upon the servant was very startling: he uttered a great cry, flung his arms above his head, and turning round, without another word, fled up the avenue as fast as his somewhat attenuated limbs could carry him. Anxious as he was, Bertrand could hardly help smiling at the absurd position in which he was placed; but he felt convinced from the man's manner that he meant to come back, and he was not mistaken. In the course of a very few minutes he reappeared, hurrying to the gate as quickly as he could. Hastily he unlocked it, flinging back its ponderous weight with some difficulty as it swung round on its creaking hinges, while, with a very low bow, he advanced to Bertrand, and took the horse's bridle from his hand.

"Enter, sir," he said. "It is Providence who has conducted you here. Monsieur le Comte awaits you with impatience. Permit me to follow you with the horse; the avenue leads straight to the château; you cannot mistake it."

Bertrand merely bent his head, and walked on in silence between the two rows of magnificent old trees that lined either side of the way. He felt like a man in a dream. He was treading the soil that had owned the lordship of his ancestors for centuries back; he was about to enter the home of his fathers, to meet one linked to him in name and blood—by what relationship he knew not, whose very existence had been unknown to him half an hour before. How and why had he been led to this one spot on all the fair face of France with which he had any connection? Certainly, the old servant must be right, and Providence had brought him hither for some purpose yet unknown.

So he paced on silently along the sombre avenue, with the trees meeting nearly over his head, and at last the glimmer of lights began to appear through the branches, and soon he emerged into an open space, where there was a wide sweep of sufficient extent to allow a carriage and four to turn round it, while before him, showing black against the clear evening sky, rose the outline of a huge old house, with the battlements and turrets which distinguished it as one of the feudal châteaux of former times.

There were lights in many of the windows, and as the clatter of the horse's hoofs was heard on the gravel, the great front door was thrown open, casting a blaze of light on a fountain surrounded by uncouth statues which stood in the centre of the sweep, while two or three servants, bearing torches, hurried down the steps to receive the visitor. One of them took the horse from the butler, another relieved Bertrand of his military cloak and knapsack, and a third led the way into the house; but the old man who had met him at the gate pushed past the men, and waving them all aside, he gravely beckoned to Bertrand to follow him. He moved on before him through the vast hall, which was paved with stone of different tints harmoniously arranged, and lined with suits of armour, and banners hanging from the walls with all the colour faded out of them by age.

The servant opened a door to the right of this hall, and, standing back, signed to Bertrand to pass in. He did so, and found himself in a long lofty room, the floor and ceiling of which were of dark polished oak, the walls almost hidden by well-preserved tapestry, clearly of ancient date; there was a wide open hearth of stone, on which, summer though it still was, some logs of wood were blazing brightly. A table in the centre of the room supported several tall wax candles, but the space they had to illuminate was so vast that they cast but a limited circle of light around them.

Within that circle however sat the only occupant of the room, in a huge easy-chair drawn close to the flaming logs. He was an old man, with thin white hair falling on his shoulders from under a black velvet skull-cap, and a haggard worn face, almost livid in its deadly paleness. He had evidently been originally a man of small stature, but illness or sorrow had reduced him almost to a skeleton, and it was plain, from the manner in which his shrunken limbs were swathed in wrappings and supported by cushions, that he had completely lost the use of them. The upper part of his body only seemed alive, and his small piercing eyes especially appeared to glow with a lurid light from under his sharply-defined eyebrows. There was an expression of restless misery on his countenance, which it was painful to witness, and he was now gazing towards the door with an eagerness which had something almost wild in its intensity.

"Monsieur le Comte," said the servant, in a low voice, to Bertrand; and then, drawing back, he closed the door, and left him alone with his host. As the new-comer advanced towards the invalid, who was evidently incapable of rising to meet him, his face assumed an expression of mingled terror and longing anxiety; his lips parted breathlessly; his eyes, wide open and staring, fastened upon Bertrand's countenance, till, when he was within a few steps of his chair, he stretched out his thin shrunken hands, and said, with the pure French accent of the old school, which recalled to the young man the tones of his dead father's voice, "Louis de L'Isle! God has heard my prayer! It is—it must be Louis!"

"Not Louis, alas!" said Bertrand. "Louis de L'Isle was my father, and he is dead."

The old man fell back in his chair, with a look of the deepest despondency and disappointment. "If you are his true and legal representative, I may yet, so far as this world is concerned at least, redeem the past. Young man, who are you?"

"Bertrand de L'Isle, the only child of Louis de L'Isle and Caroline (née Vernon) his wife."

"Louis de L'Isle and Caroline Vernon! yes, notice of their marriage was sent to be entered in the archives of the family, and an intimation of the birth also of his son; but from that day to this no tidings of him has ever reached this place. For more than twenty years I sought none, but rather strove to lose all trace of him, and I succeeded but too well. For the last five I have sought him with anguish; but God has been merciful at the last. He has not suffered me to perish altogether in despair. He has sent you here, Louis' only son, and the true legitimate heir of our house; and I recognise the purpose for which you have been brought to me. Bertrand de L'Isle, do you know who I am?"

"Your servant told me you were the Comte de L'Isle, but beyond that I know nothing. I came here by no will or purpose of my own, but led surely by a mysterious destiny. Till I saw the name of the Château de L'Isle on the sign-post at the turn of the road, I knew not that the old home of our race still existed, nor did I know that the estates were still held by one of our name."

"Did your father, then, never speak to you of Armand de L'Isle, his uncle?"

"Never," answered Bertrand; but he gave a slight start as he heard the name, which the old man's keen eyes instantly observed.

"Louis was always generous," he said; "but who, then, has spoken to you of Armand?"

"To myself personally no one; but I once heard a conversation, when I was a child, between my father and a French friend, which I had forgotten till the events of this night revived it in my memory, and the name of Armand was mentioned then."

"In terms of bitter reprobation, no doubt?"

Bertrand did not answer.

"Young man, tell me the truth! in such terms they spoke of Armand, did they not?"

"Yes," replied Bertrand.

"And justly!" he said, with a deep sigh; "but hear me, Bertrand; the time of mercy and compassion is surely come, or you had not been here to-night; and I have suffered—ah, heaven, how have I suffered for my sins! listen, then, with gentleness and pity, not with indignation or the desire of revenge, while I tell you that I am Armand, your father's uncle, and, alas! too long his enemy and yours, but that at least I am no longer, only your kinsman now, Bertrand, in blood and name; let me be friends with the last of my race; but for you I am alone on earth; be merciful to me!" He stretched out his hand imploringly to the young man, and Bertrand, who had inherited much of his father's courtly grace, stooped and kissed his uncle's wasted hand. "The kiss of peace, thank Heaven!" said the old man, while a smile lit up his shrunken face. "Ah, Bertrand, my dear nephew, I have much to say to you; but you are fatigued, and in sore need of refreshment, no doubt; I am unable to move from this chair—my prison for five years past—but my servants will attend to your wants, and when you have supped come back to me, that I may open all my aching heart to you." He rang a silver hand-bell that stood on the table near him, and it was immediately answered by the old servant who had conducted Bertrand to the house.

"Show the Comte Bertrand de L'Isle to the best apartments in the house," said his uncle, "and let everything be provided for his comfort and refreshment, and see that no one enters the château this night but himself; I must be alone with him."

The servant bowed, and ushered Bertrand, with the greatest respect, through a suite of princely apartments, till he arrived at a room where supper had already been prepared for him in a very sumptuous style, and which opened into a bed-room where a luxurious couch awaited him that was very different from the resting-places he had found for some time past, and, with the feeling still that he was living in a dream, Bertrand prepared to take advantage of the comforts that surrounded him.

(To be continued.)

SCRIPTURE LESSONS FOR SCHOOL AND HOME.

SCRIPTURE STORIES. SECOND SERIES. No. 4. A VISIT TO NAZARETH.

Chapter to be read—St. Luke iv. (part of).

INTRODUCTION. Ask where Christ was born. Whose city was it? but did his parents live there? Their city was Nazareth; went there after the flight into Egypt (Matt. ii. 23). Christ lived there with them for thirty years; only one incident given of his life during that time. At last fully grown up. Was thirty years old (Luke iii. 24), the age at which priests began their work (Num. iv. 35); time to begin public work. Was first baptised. Then tempted in the wilderness. Then began his life work. What was that? Remind of past lessons; by miracles, parables, sermons, discourses, example of holy life and patience under suffering, to show that He was not merely a teacher sent from God but the Son of God Himself.

I. THE SYNAGOGUE. (Read Luke iv. 14—20). Picture the scene. Christ had left the village; gone to Judea; been unheard of for a time; now revisits his native country; works miracles, the first being at the marriage in Cana of Galilee, recorded by St. John (chap. ii.). Then other wonderful miracles. The news of His power spreads; all the country rings with it. Is invited to the synagogues: teaches there. Makes the round of them all. At last comes to Nazareth, where had been brought up. Visits the home of His childhood; but where will He be sure to go on the Sabbath? Can imagine the little village synagogue full: the friends and companions of His childhood—His mother, His cousins, &c., all gathered to hear Him. Now the Psalms sung; the first lesson from the law read. He stands up to read the second lesson from the Prophets; finds the chapter appointed for the day, and begins to read. What chapter was it? (Is. lx. 1, 2). When the lesson over what does He do? Compare a similar event in Acts xiii. 14, when St. Paul expounded the Scriptures at Anticch. Notice, Christ sat down to speak. What wonderful words did He say? How was it fulfilled in their ears? When did the Spirit descend upon Him? Probably the Baptism was only a few days before. What was the message of glad tidings to the poor? His very name, Jesus, proclaimed Him the Saviour. Remind how the angel told this to the shepherds, and Simeon declared it in the Temple. The work of salvation now begun. From whose power was Christ to save them? Had Himself just conquered the devil; could, therefore, now enable them to do the same. Surely they would receive this message gladly.

II. CHRIST REJECTED. (Read 22—30). What had the large congregation come together for? Yes; but what do they want besides to hear Christ speak? What did they think He would do? Had heard of miracles in Capernaum—surely He will do some in his own city. Did He gratify their curiosity? Rather seemed to repel it; quotes a familiar proverb to them. What instances does He give? Christ would not work miracles among His own people merely to please them. They must accept Him, believe on Him as the apostles did; love Him as Martha and Mary did; look to Him as the woman with the issue of blood, &c.; and then He would bless them. How did they like this? Notice, they were (1) disappointed. Had come together mainly to see some miracle. Very hard that their old companion would not gratify them. Also, they were (2) jealous that others should see His mighty works and not they; but what had they seen all these thirty years? His life: of what kind was that? holy, blameless, undefiled. That might have taught them about Him, only their eyes were blinded. Now, what do they do? actually try to cast Him down a precipice. However, His hour not yet come. How does He escape? Passes calmly through them, not afraid and is let alone. So He came to His own, and His own received Him not. He never taught in Nazareth again.

III. PRACTICAL LESSONS. (1) Jesus Christ's message is the same now. What were His disciples told to preach to all nations? (Matt. xvi. 16). People's wants, sins, natures are the same now as then. All have sinned, need deliverance from power of sin and Satan. Same message of salvation through Christ alone. (2) Christ must be received with faith. They wanted more signs. So often people say, "If I had seen His miracles I would believe." But He has given enough signs. His life and death: the spread of the Gospel: its effect upon the world: all are sufficient signs of the truth of the Gospel. We must ask for more faith. Remind how when Saul forsook God an evil spirit troubled him. How when Judas sold Christ Satan entered into him. So will he always. See awful warning in Prov. i. 24—26. Therefore, call is now to accept Christ's offered salvation, i.e., to leave off sin, confess it, mourn over it, ask for pardon, seek forgiveness through Christ, and so be saved.

Questions to be answered.

1. When did Christ begin His public work? Why at that age?
2. Describe His first visit to Nazareth.
3. What chapter did He read, and how did He apply it?
4. With what feelings was the message received?
5. What three practical lessons may we learn?
6. What solemn warning should we take to ourselves?

SURLY BOB.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "SHAG AND DOLL," "HUGH'S HEROISM," ETC.

CHAPTER I.—IN SCHOOL.

CERTAINLY Bob Saunders, "Surly Bob," as he was styled by his companions, was not an attractive boy. The Sunday scholars at St. Chad's school were as a rule rather a rough ill-looking and unruly set of lads; but foremost among them all was Bob, who distinguished himself by being more rough, ill-looking, and unruly than the rest.

Bob was always looked upon as the black sheep in the class; not that he was the only black one there, but that he was considered to be of a deeper dye than the others. For if by chance Bob was absent from his place, the lesson went off comparatively peacefully; but whenever he was present there was sure to be bad behaviour and disturbance of some sort, the blame of which was generally traced to him; for whenever mischief or quarrelling were going forward Bob was almost invariably found to be mixed up in it.

That very afternoon, on coming into school, he had found another boy sitting in the particular seat which he chose to call his, and had suddenly, without waiting to see if his comrade were willing to give it up, dealt him such a box on the ear as quite to upset the balance of the other, who was entirely unprepared for the assault, and in consequence nearly fell right off the form. Before he could recover himself, Bob, muttering "You get out of there, that's my place," gave him a vigorous push, and then slipped into the seat he had been occupying.

Tom Lane, indignant at this treatment, doubled up his fists, and returned the blow that had been dealt him; and there is no knowing to what lengths their angry feelings might have carried them, had not their teacher arrived at that moment, and managed to restore some degree of order. But the two sat for some time regarding one another with menacing looks; Tom shaking his clenched fist at Bob, by way of showing him that he was not going to submit to such treatment, but was determined to "have it out" with his enemy after school, whilst Bob's defiant glances seemed to dare him to "come on."

At length the lesson began; but Bob was in one of his sullen moods this afternoon, and refused to open his mouth; not only allowing every question to remain unanswered so far as he was concerned, but, for some reason only known to himself, maintaining a dogged silence when it came to his turn to read a verse. His teacher at length passed him by, and desired the lad next him to read it instead.

The child obeyed, after a glance at Bob, which was half wondering, half sorrowful, and read in a clear young voice the sacred words. He was a gentle little fellow, the smallest and youngest in the class, with a pale complexion, fair hair, and intelligent face; but, poor boy, he was a cripple, and as he stood to read he was obliged to support himself on his little crutch.

A stranger at a first glance would have thought it impossible that there could be any relationship between the little child with the winning face and the big bully of the class, Bob Saunders, but nevertheless they were brothers; and as the younger resumed his seat, he, either accidentally or on purpose, laid his hand lightly on Bob's knee. The other did not shake it off, he suffered it to remain there as if he had not noticed it, but he turned his head away and gazed steadfastly in another direction, as if determined not to allow himself to look at the child. Was he afraid that his sullenness would melt if brought face to face with the gentleness of the other? or was it that even he himself could see and acknowledge the contrast between them, and took shame to himself for it?

No on-looker could have decided the question; for Bob's countenance always seemed to wear but one expression, and that an unfortunate and forbidding one. No softening look, no ray of interest was ever seen to light it up, as Sunday after Sunday he sat through the lesson, apparently not listening to a single word, as his teacher often despondingly thought. For though frequently discouraged, Mr. Thornton had at different times felt some gleam of hope about the others, when he had noted signs of awakening intelligence on their faces; but Bob seemed beyond all influence, nothing appeared to reach him, nothing to touch him; he still remained the most daring, and quarrelsome, and sullen of the whole party. His character was thoroughly established: he was the "bad boy," not only of his class, but of the school.

The school broke up, and the boys streamed out; the enforced order and decorum with which they left the room flung to the winds the moment they got outside, at least by the more disorderly ones, for there were some who went quietly to their homes. But Bob and Tom Lane were not among the latter. They had their quarrel to finish before they separated; and, accordingly, choosing a favourable and tolerably retired spot, they had their fight out, not leaving off until each had given the other a black eye, by way of making an impression.

That done, and Bob feeling he had "settled" Tom, so to speak, for the time, he turned moodily homewards. But it was not much of a home he had—little more than a shelter from the rain, with food sufficient to keep life in him, though not enough to impart warmth or comfort. For Bob and Johnnie

Saunders, being orphans, were left to the care of an uncle and aunt, and they, not being provident or good managers, were always complaining of the hardness of the times, and the difficulty of providing for their own children, "let alone those of other people." So the brothers often came off with but short allowance; not that Mrs. Saunders of set purpose neglected or was unkind to them, but because, when there was not enough for all, it was a matter of course she thought that her own children should be served first.

Moreover, the cottage being small, and part of it let to lodgers, the family were rather cramped for room, and so Bob and Johnnie slept in a little sort of outhouse, which stood at the end of the small back garden. It had evidently been erected in the first place merely as a sort of wash-house or tool-house, and was a tumble-down place, flagged with rough stones, and bitterly cold in the severe weather, which had now prevailed for so long at Crossley. But thither Bob betook himself as soon as he reached the cottage.

He seemed to have expected to find Johnnie there, for though the place was so small that it only needed half a glance to scan the whole, he gave a lingering look all around, as if missing something. Then he shut the door, and remained a moment standing irresolutely, until a low sound of cooing attracted his attention, when, going to the corner whence it proceeded, he drew forth from some place of concealment a pretty little ring-dove.

(To be continued.)

"THE QUIVER" BIBLE CLASS.

243. What request did the mother of St. James and St. John ask of our Lord?

244. From what two hills were the blessings and cursings pronounced upon the children of Israel; and what tribes took part in each?

245. What two diseases did God especially threaten to bring upon His people for their neglect of His commandments?

246. What example does our Lord give to illustrate the way in which the Israelites broke the commandments of God to follow their own traditions?

247. What man of Israel was stoned for blaspheming God?

248. For what purpose was Aaron's rod, which budded, kept in the Tabernacle?

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS ON PAGE 592.

231. David (Psalm i. 4).

232. Four (2 Kings vii. 3).

233. Four days (John xi. 39).

234. The waters of the Jordan which came down from above rose up upon an heap; and those that came down toward the sea of the plain failed and were cut off, so that the people passed over right against Jericho (Joshua iii. 16).

235. Drusilla, a Jewess (Acts xxiv. 24).

236. That he might thrust out all their right eyes, and lay it for a reproach upon all Israel (1 Sam. xi. 2).

LOOKING THROUGH.

NO tear she shed, no word she said,
She made no plaint or mean;
But only leaned her aching head
Upon the churchyard stone.

For aye the bitterness is past,
Or e'er the mourner weeps.
Oh, hush! before a grief so vast How can ye speak? He sleeps.

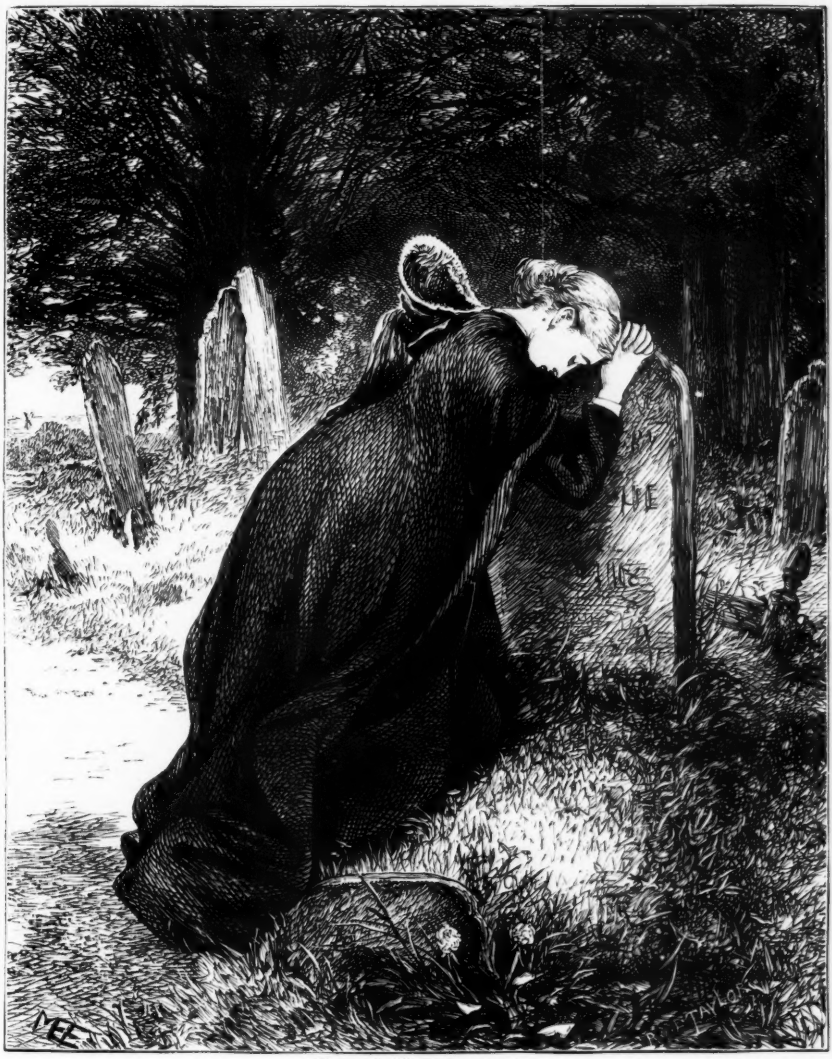
Ay, well he sleeps! no throb of pain
That silent heart shall stir;
But who will walk from church again
Along the lanes with her?

And who will come at evening-time
To make her garden trim?
How shall she look on others' prime
As she has looked on him?



She leans against the churchyard rails—
A sacred guard and true
That stern lock keeps! her thin cheek pales,
But she is looking through.

'Tis summer after lonely years—
Her Father loves her best!
And she hath found a time of tears,
A quiet hour of rest.

She thinks of morning hours that wait,
Of welcomes yet to be;
For Death may lock the outer gate,
But Jesus keeps the key.

Ah! tears have now no bitter spring,
The heaven is clear and blue;
The doves rise there on sunny wing,
And she is looking through!

ALESSIE BOND.

(Drawn by M. E. EDWARDS.)

"But only leaned her aching head
Upon the churchyard stone."

"LOOKING THROUGH."—p. 624.

(Drawn by J. McL. RALSTON.

HEATHER BELLS.

BUNCH of purple heather,
Bound with rush together,
By the little mountain maiden with sunburnt brow and hand;

Flung with Gaelic laughter,
And merry racings after,
Flung upward lightly, gracefully, as spray is flung on land.

Treasured to remind me
Of beauty left behind me;
Bright gem-like lakes that nestle 'mid the hills with sunset crowned,
Wild romantic beauty,
Tales of crime and duty,
All scenes in bonny Scotland where time hath smiled and frowned.

Deep cathedral glories,
Stained and carven stories,
Riders springing forward in bronze from stormy years,
Towers that touch the thunder,
Journeying through wonder,
And the hand that draws us onward through the dark till light appears.

Martyr-memories thronging,
Joy, and yet the longing,
Still roused and still unsatisfied by all the joys of earth.
In her mingling splendours
Broken types she renders
Of God's unbroken glory, of heaven's tearless mirth!

A. Bond.

THE BRIDGE BETWEEN.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE TROUBLES OF CHATTY AND MOLLY," "THE DINGY HOUSE AT KENSINGTON," "QUEEN MADGE," "AGAINST HERSELF," ETC., ETC., ETC.

CHAPTER XXXIII.—AFTER THEY HAD LEFT HAMPSTEAD.

"DOLL, whatever shall we do? The dad wants change of air, and better living, and lots of good things."

"He must have it too," she answered. "Let us all gather round and hold a council of war." Then Tom and Will and Sally clustered close to her. They were still in the shabby lodgings Dorothy had found for him six months before, and things had gone their very worst with Mr. Woodward; and, lastly, his health had failed, and a long illness had kept him in his bed nearly all the winter. Then it was that the children showed that, indolent and lazy and fun-loving as they had been in the old days, they could work when the time came.

Tom had retrieved his position and paid his debts, and shown such a disposition to work, that his former shortcomings had been overlooked; and, careful and generous, he regularly brought his money to his sister. Will had got into an office, but had no salary as yet, though he hoped soon to gain one; and Sally had earned a little money once, for the grotesque figures she had loved to draw had proved useful as designs for Christmas cards, and now she was studying hard to improve herself in the art she loved so that she might gain constant employment. But it was Dorothy who had been the mainstay of the family when the day of sorrow came. She put away her story-books and poetry-books, and forgot her dreams, and left off building castles, and worked in earnest, teaching Mrs. Gibson's children in the morning, and writing from Miss Josephine's dictation in the afternoon, and sometimes till late in the evening, until her hand ached and the lines danced before her eyes. She had thought it would be so difficult to go and see the three old ladies, to ask for work. But she found it less so than she had imagined, for kind thoughtful George Blakesley had made all things smooth before her, and she had been received kindly for his sake; and as the months went on they learnt to like the girl who tried so hard to work and to win bread for her sick father and broken-down mother.

Dorothy's labours did not end with the putting away of Miss Josephine's pens and paper, for of an evening she had to read the paper to her father, and to sit by his side and cheer him up as best she could. Sometimes, too, she used to play to him, for George Blakesley bought in the piano and sent it as a present to Sally, but at last he got too ill to listen to her.

"The doctor says he must have a complete change," repeated Tom.

"He and mamma must go somewhere, and we must give up these rooms and take just two little bed-rooms, one for you and Will, and one for me and Sally, and we'll live upon as little as we can." And she stopped to consider how that plan would work, while Sally and Will nestled up closer to her, and Tom looked at her with all his old boyish admiration.

"I don't know what we should have done without you, Dolly," he said; "I was an awfully selfish fellow till you stirred me up by your example"—Tom was always frank, and never ashamed to own his faults—"I don't wonder Blakesley was so spooney on you."

"But he liked me before I ever tried to work," she answered; "he doesn't care for me now;" and her face flushed as she spoke of him, and hid for the moment the careworn expression which had lately crept over it.

"I think he cares for us all now as much as he does for you," said Sally, looking up and kissing her sister's cheek; and the innocent words had a sting in them the child never dreamt.

"I don't see where we can send papa," she said; "it is so difficult to move him, and we have so little money; I think we had better consult Mr. Blakesley." And when he came that evening (he had returned a week before) they called him into the sitting-room (for he was going straight up to Mr. Woodward), and asked him how he thought it could be managed. They all had faith in George Blakesley.

"I think you had better wait a bit," he said, "and let him get stronger before you try to move him. By the way, a friend of mine has bought the lease of the old house at Hampstead, but is not going to live in it just yet."

"I hate him!" said Tom.

"Why, pray?"

"Because we all must hate any one who lives in our dear old house," said Dorothy, the tears rushing to her eyes.

"Now, I have some more news for you, Dorothy. Your friend, Mr. Fuller, has returned, and called on me to ask your address. He is coming to see you." The children brightened up at the news, but Dorothy turned away and looked quietly out of window. George Blakesley followed her up. "I thought you would be pleased to see your old friend again," he said; "and he was quite anxious to hear all about you."

"Yes!" she said.

"You won't see me so often when he comes, for I am going to get a friend to live with me, and I have a great deal of work also, and have little time."

"I see," she answered; and she thought, "He does not care to come now. He only does it out of kindness."

"You are not looking well lately, Dorothy. What is the matter?"

"Nothing much," she answered, "only papa's being ill worries me of course. Mr. Blakesley, is there anything else, excepting work and helping others, for which we may live—any happiness we may distinctly try to gain? Do you know," she went on, looking up into his face, "I get so tired sometimes, and feel as if I want some grand mental rest and sunshine."

"Talk to Aunt Milly, Dorothy; she will tell you better than I can." And he turned away coldly, and went up-stairs.

"Ah," thought Dorothy, bitterly, "once, when I did not value it, I had his love, but now that I would give my life for it, he does not care for me a bit!" And so it was in the long winter months, when sorrow came to her and she had no one else on whom to lean, Dorothy had learnt to see and to recognise all the nobleness in George Blakesley's character, to see and feel how kind and thoughtful and loving he could be, and to give him that thorough respect which is the foundation of all thorough love. He was no dreamer, who lived in long dreams of which he made himself the hero, no sluggard, pining for ease and without ambition save to earn enough to maintain himself, content to die without leaving the world one whit better for his life having been in it. No selfish weak man was George Blakesley, but a noble, upright, God-fearing one, whom to know thoroughly, and to love as Dorothy in these her days of sorrow and striving was learning to love him, was in itself an incentive to well-doing. And this is in a measure a test of all our characters, the effect which we have on those who love us; for as we are, so, in a measure, we make those who lean upon us; and a woman who cares for a man greater and better than herself cannot love vainly, for even if she does gain his love in return, yet in the mere effort to become worthy of him, she loses a part of her old self in his nobler nature, and turns away from all baser lower ones to struggle towards the height he has gained.

It seemed to Dorothy as if all George Blakesley's love for her went with his engagement to her. At any rate he had shown no sign of it since, and he had often almost pointedly spoken of Adrian Fuller, till she wondered if he knew or guessed of her old fancy for him. His manner piqued her sometimes. He could not have had a very strong regard for her, she thought, if he could so soon forget the old footing and be content with the new. "When I did not want his love, and did nothing to deserve it, I had it," she said to herself that evening. "And now that I have at any rate tried to be more worthy of it, it is out of my reach."

"My dear," said Miss Milly, the next day, "Josephine is not well enough to write to-day. She is ill and feverish, and obliged to keep to her room. Sit down and talk to me a little while, will you. I am all alone." Dorothy was fonder of her than of either of her sisters, and sat contentedly down at her feet. "Would you mind telling about yourself and George, Dorothy?" she asked; "I never liked to ask you, but I have so often wondered why it was broken off!"

Then, without any reserve, Dorothy told her the entire story. "Strange," said the old lady, when it was finished, "that he should have got over it so completely as he seems to have done. He told me this morning that you had an old friend returned from abroad, and that he thought you and he liked each other."

"Oh no, Miss Milly!" Yet the crimson colour in her face deceived the old lady. "I think you are right, George," she told her nephew next time he came, "Dorothy is in love with the artist." He made no answer, but his visits to his old friends ceased almost altogether as soon as Mr. Woodward was sufficiently recovered to be down-stairs again.

Miss Josephine was very ill—obliged to keep her bed for days, and unable to see any one. At last, when she partly recovered, she sent for Dorothy.

"I should like you to read to me," she said; and from that day, instead of writing, Dorothy sat by her side every afternoon, and read aloud.

"My dear Dorothy," she said, one evening, "I have often heard about you from my nephew, but I don't know much about your religious opinions: I should like to hear what they are."

"Oh, Miss Josephine," she answered, "I could not really explain them."

"Is religion a comfort to you? for that is what it should be."

"I don't know, Miss Josephine. I don't think I trouble very much about it, to tell the truth."

"But you should, my dear. I fancy you want a secret friend, some one to go to for counsel and help, and sympathy and love; this has often struck me. Go to your Saviour and your Bible, dear: there is no friend like Him, no comforter like His Word; all others may fail, but these never. Don't let your religion or your love for your God be a task or a mere matter of duty; make it the thing nearest and dearest to your heart, until it becomes your staff and support and strength in everything and through anything. There is no happiness like this, my dear. It takes the bitterness from every sorrow, and gives you hope no mortal has power to dim or deprive you of, and it gives you not merely something to live for but to die for. I don't think I shall get well again, Dorothy; my strength seems failing daily, and I wanted to say this to you. Now kiss me, dear." And for the first time Dorothy kissed Miss Josephine's handsome face. "I wish you had married George, dear. He will never have any one now—he seems to have given up all idea of it." From that time she failed; Dorothy never had another talk with her, though day after day she sat by her side reading to her or watching.

"Dorothy," she said one evening, "are you here?"

"Yes, Miss Josephine."

"I want my sisters."

"We are here," they answered; and she held out her hands, but could not speak.

"Dorothy," she called, faintly, an hour later, "tell George I told you of the best friend for you, your Saviour. Make Him your friend, dear."

"Yes, Miss Josephine," said Dorothy, awed, and her heart solemnly repeating the promise.

"There is none other like Him," she murmured, and then Tortoiseshell turned her face to the wall and died royally.

(To be continued.)

THE GOSPEL ACCORDING TO ST. LUKE.—II.

BY THE RIGHT REVEREND THE LORD BISHOP OF GLOUCESTER AND BRISTOL.

THE second question which we have to consider is one scarcely of less interest than the first, and equally relates to the individuality of the Gospel which we are now considering. We have seen that there are apparently but slight traces of the companion of St. Paul in the Gospel before us; we next ask, whether the second historical fact relating to St. Luke, that he was of Gentile origin, is equally faintly discernible in those records of his Master's words and works which the third evangelist was more especially moved to select. The answer must certainly be in the negative. The traces of St. Paul's companion may be doubtful, but the hand of the Gentile Christian may be recognised in so many places in this Gospel, that we might almost have drawn the inference from the evidence, which any meditative perusal of it will be found at once most readily, and, I think I may add, most persuasively, to supply to us. The Gospel of St. Luke is the Gospel of the Gentile and of the proselyte; the Gospel, on the one hand, of a writer well versed in the customs and habits of the nation to which as, according to the flesh, his Master was pleased to belong, the Gospel of one not unconscious of Jewish privileges and prerogatives, but yet, at the same time, and on the other hand, of one who seems ever impressed with the feeling that it was to the wide world of the Gentiles that the blessings of the Gospel must ultimately and principally extend.

We may illustrate the truth of this by specifying two or three characteristics of St. Luke's Gospel standing in connection with this particular question, which have been noticed and admitted by all recent expositors.

In the first place, the comprehensive spirit and, as it has been termed, universality of St. Luke's Gospel, cannot possibly be overlooked. We observe this in the very genealogy of our Lord, who in this Gospel appears before us not as the son of Abraham and the son of David, but as the son of Adam and the Son of God. We observe it again in the important notice of the mission of the seventy disciples which he alone records, a notice which gains in importance, when we remember that it appears certain that in the time of our Lord the Jews were accustomed to consider the number of all the nations of the world beside themselves as seventy. We further trace the same comprehensive spirit in the notices of the Samaritans, both in the special parable of the merciful man of that despised race, and in the miracle peculiar to our evangelist, in which gratitude alone was found in the leper, who was of the lineage of the enemy and the stranger. We find also the same sentiments throughout the Gospel in scattered texts, recurring so frequently, and expressed with such clearness, that it seems almost impossible to believe that the inspired writer was uninterested in the promises which he was recording. Thus, for example, it is St. Luke who is the relater of the aged Simeon's declaration, that the light of salvation was to lighten the Gentiles (ii. 32); it is St. Luke who, when reciting the prophecy in reference to the forerunner, specially extends the quotation as we find it in St. Matthew, by subjoining, "And all flesh shall see the salvation of God" (iii. 6); it is St. Luke who specifies the Lord's words in the synagogue at Nazareth, in which the case of the Syrian leper is contrasted with that of the many sufferers in Israel who remained uncleansed, and in which the widow of Sarepta is alluded to as specially blessed, while the widows of Israel were left to the general providence of God (iv. 25); it is again St. Luke who inserts the account of the merciful condescension shown to the despised publican in the person of Zacchæus (xix. 1); and it is the same evangelist who, on the other hand, omits the prohibition recorded by St. Matthew (x. 5), in reference to others equally hated and despised, the prohibition which forbad the early functions of the apostles to be exercised among Gentiles or Samaritans, and restricted their mission "to the lost sheep of the house of Israel."

We may trace this universality still further in the marked tone of tender-heartedness and compassion which seems so specially to pervade this inspired record. The frequent reference to the poor (xiv. 13), the touching account of the woman who was a sinner (vii. 37), the parables of the prodigal son (xv. 11), of Lazarus (xvi. 19), and of the widow and the unjust judge (xviii. 1), the noticeable repetition of the term "friend" (φίλος), and, still more, the general aspect in which our Lord is presented to us as the friend and benefactor of man, the merciful High Priest who was touched by a sense of our infirmities, and who, in the words of St. Peter, as recorded by our evangelist, "went about doing good, and healing all that were oppressed of the devil, for God was with Him" (Acts x. 38). We may substantiate this by references which present themselves almost on every chapter. We may observe it, for example, in the special mention of the passage of Isaiah selected by our Lord in the synagogue of Nazareth (iv. 18), in the unbounded exercise of mercy attributed to Him in the twice-repeated notice, that of the divers sick that were brought to Him, and even of the mixed multitude that sought to touch Him, "He healed all" (iv. 40, vi. 19), in the tenderness shown to the widow of Nain (vii. 13), in the mercy extended to the woman that was a sinner (vii. 47), in the touching address to the daughters of Jerusalem (xxiii. 28), in the gracious promise to the expiring malefactor (xxiii. 43), and in the prayer for the forgiveness of His murderers, which rose heavenward even from the cross itself (xxiii. 34).

A few special details may be added, which seem to indicate the same inclusive and comprehensive spirit on the part of the Gentile evangelist. We have already observed, that members of despised classes—the Samaritan, the publican, the needy and the sinful—come more frequently before us in this Gospel than in any of the other three. It can hardly be accidental, then, that in this same Gospel we meet with more frequent notices of that sex which, though probably somewhat more honoured among the Jews than among other Oriental nations, nevertheless occupied a position of dependence and subjection. In the opening chapters we meet with special notices of Elizabeth and Anna. As we pass onward, we find mention of the fact that, besides the twelve apostles, pious women were permitted to accompany and to minister on the Lord. We derive our knowledge of the characters of Martha and Mary principally from our present evangelist. The women of Jerusalem, who wept and bewailed the suffering Lord, and the women that came from Galilee and beheld His sepulchre, find a place in the record of one who might have known and felt with the apostle whom he accompanied, that in Christ there was no distinction of nation or sex, but that in Him all were united and one.

We may again observe, that it is almost from St. Luke alone, of the four evangelists, that we have any notices of persons or events that belonged to the world at large, and not merely to the restricted polity of Judaism. The decree of Cæsar Augustus, the name of the Roman governor, under whom it was first instituted, the carefully named, though disputed date of the fifteenth year of the reign of Tiberius Cæsar, serve suitably to remind us that the history of the Gospels has its proper place in the history of the world, and stands therewith in an accurate and demonstrable connection.

We might farther pass to the scarcely doubtful indications that the Gospel was designed for a far wider circle of readers than those of the circumcision; nay, that it was probably intended, as Origen has long ago remarked, exclusively for the believer of the Gentile world, if it did not now perhaps appear that enough has already been said to demonstrate the existence of a spirit and character in the Gospel of St. Luke that strictly harmonises with what historical inference seems to tell us was the descent of the writer. With such marked characteristics as those which we have alluded to and specified, it can scarcely be denied that the believing Gentile is faithfully reflected in St. Luke's inspired record, and that the large-hearted and observant believer of the nations is to be felt, seen, and recognised in the Gospel that bears the name of the beloved physician.

We have but one more point to consider—the supposed indications of the profession of the writer in the record that he has left us. Such a question might, at first sight, seem more curious than useful, and scarcely worthy of more than the most passing notice. Like many such questions, however, it has had this good, that it has often quickened observation, and has certainly served to direct attention to some peculiarities in the Gospel we are now considering, and to some mental characteristics of its writer, which, decide as we may on the immediate question, are by no means undeserving of our consideration. Let us, then, briefly discuss the question. With regard to the supposed medical terms that have been observed in this Gospel and in the Acts, it does not seem too much to say, that no reliance can possibly be placed on a list so short and so uncertain. The popular example, the "great fever" of St. Peter's mother-in-law (iv. 38), is certainly nothing more than an instance of the choice of an expressive rather than a technical term, and such as might easily and naturally be found on the pages of any observant writer. Much more deserving of our attention are those instances in which certain acts, feelings, or emotions are incidentally analysed and referred to what seem their true and natural causes. It is interesting, for example, to observe that it is in the Gospel of St. Luke that we find the confused wonder of the disciples at our Lord's stilling of the tempest indirectly specified as due to the greatness of their fear (viii. 25), the heaviness of the apostles in the garden of Gethsemane ascribed to their grief (xxii. 45), and the disbelief of the apostles when the chosen Lord appeared among them, referred to their overpowering joy (xxiv. 41). It is interesting, again, to remember that it is St. Luke alone who has given us the notice of his Master's bloody sweat during the agony in the garden, and who has recorded the healing as well as the smiting off of the ear of Malchus. It would seem, too, not without significance, that in the commission to the twelve apostles, and to the twenty disciples, the command to heal the sick should be so distinctly prominent. "To preach the kingdom of God," and "to heal the sick," are in the narrative of St. Luke the two great characteristics of the apostolic office. "And they departed," says our evangelist, "and went through the towns preaching the Gospel and healing everywhere" (ix. 6). Such things are interesting, and perhaps significant, but to such things we cannot appeal with perfect confidence, nor can we say more than this, that they harmonise with what we know of the calling of the writer, but that taken alone they would probably never have led us to any inference upon the subject.

Such specialities, then, we may dismiss as interesting, but nothing more. Let us, however, not overlook this general fact, that we certainly find in the Gospel of St. Luke just those characteristics which we might expect to find in the Gospel of the beloved physician—just those peculiarities which we might naturally look for in one whose daily calling taught him to observe, to discriminate, and to refer to their true causes the various facts or circumstances which presented themselves. If we seem to have any reason in tracing the effect of the earthly calling of the first evangelist, in the method and arrangement by which it is characterised, in the grouping of what is similar, and in the studied contrasts of what is dissimilar, we shall certainly find more reason for observing a similar reflection of previous habits of life in the Gospel of St. Luke. The psychological comments which appear on its pages are almost as distinctive as the graphic touches of St. Mark, and form almost as recognisable a characteristic.

Let us substantiate these observations by a few examples, arranged under two or three heads.

First, let us call attention to our evangelist as the accurate observer, as one to whom we are indebted for more of those passing comments, that at once place an event in its true light, than are found in any of the other Gospels. We may trace this characteristic in the reflective comments upon the growth of the Divine Child (ii. 40, 52), in the explanatory remark on the behaviour of St. Peter during the miraculous draught of fishes (v. 9), in the brief and incidental elucidation of the manner in which the healing powers were extended to an eager multitude (vi. 19), in the mention of the subject of the mysterious converse between our Lord and His two attendant saints on the Mount of the Transfiguration (ix. 31), in the passing notice that the apostles were not wholly unprovided with weapons when they were leaving for Gethsemane (xxii. 38), in the allusion to our Lord's looking on St. Peter after his third denial (xxii. 61), in the specification of the renewed friendship and preceding enmity between Him and Pilate (xxiii. 12); and, to name a last instance, the position of the two malefactors at the crucifixion (xxiii. 33), so simply mentioned, and yet withal so deeply meaning and significant.

Closely allied with this reflective and observant character of mind, we may notice the frequent habit of our evangelist to state, or, perhaps, more commonly to hint at the motives which gave rise to certain actions and certain courses of conduct. Our preceding list contains two or three instances which might perhaps be equally correctly referred to our present head, but, besides these, we may specify the notice of the reasonable way in which the difference between the behaviour of the multitude and of the Scribes and Pharisees was to be accounted for, when they heard our Lord's comments on the ministry of St. John (vii. 30). The one party felt themselves pledged by the baptism they had received; the other might have sought but had not received the holy rite, and so felt themselves free to disdain or to revile.

Another instance may be mentioned in the account of the perplexity of Herod, when he heard of our Lord's wondrous works. Though two other evangelists have mentioned the incident, yet it is from St. Luke alone that we discern the true reasons for the wretched man's disquietude (ix. 7). We might multiply instances, but will conclude with one which is in itself pertinent, and is further useful in suggesting a passing comment upon the whole method and principle on which parables seem to be introduced in St. Luke's narrative. This last instance shall be our evangelist's very explicit statement of the reasons which led our Lord to utter the parable of the pounds—reasons probably vouchsafed at the time, and preserved by apostolical tradition: "And as they heard these things, He added and spake a parable, because He was nigh to Jerusalem, and because they thought that the kingdom of God should immediately appear." This, perhaps, is the most distinct enunciation of the reasons which led our Lord to utter any one of the many discourses that are recorded in the four Gospels; and this we find, as we might have expected to find it, in the record of that evangelist who was moved principally to specify the reasons or motives of actions—the thoughtful and observant historian.

SCRIPTURE LESSONS FOR SCHOOL AND HOME.

SCRIPTURE STORIES. SECOND SERIES. NO. 5. HEALING NOBLEMAN'S SON.

Chapter to be read—John iv., part of.

INTRODUCTION. Ask what was Christ's first miracle, and where performed? What did he manifest there? What glory was it? So Christ shared all our social life; was a welcome guest at a feast; invited to wedding at Cana; to house of rich Pharisee (Luke vii. 36); so also was looked for at a funeral. What did Martha say when he delayed his visit? (John xi. 21.) Shared every event of life—joy, sorrow, festivity, mourning; was in all points just as we are, so showed His full sympathy. (Heb. iv. 15.) To-day read of Him as relieving sorrow.

I. THE NOBLEMAN COMING TO CHRIST. (Read John iv. 43—47.) Let children trace the steps of the last few days. Christ had talked with the woman of Samaria at the well. She told the others about Him, and many believed. At their request he stayed there two days, then finished His journey to Galilee. How did the Galileans receive Him? Why so readily? What had Jesus done at the feast? What these miracles were are not told (John ii. 23), but were quite enough to set people talking about Him. Came home and told their friends. The news spreads—reaches even to this nobleman. He hears of some wonderful man healing the sick. He has a son sick, very near death; best doctors been called in; no use, his son is dying. Hears of this new and wonderful doctor, with his marvellous cures. He will go in search of Him. Can be no harm in trying. So sets off journey of twenty miles. Takes no servant; hurries off alone to Cana from Capernaum. Picture his hurried preparations; his anxious wife urging to make haste and return; his excitement; finds where Christ was staying; his eagerly rushing into His presence; his frantic request to Him to come and heal his son, at the point of death. He pictures to himself (and perhaps Christ) his great grief, and urges Christ to come at once, no doubt offering some handsome reward to Him if successful. What is Christ's answer? Want to try his faith. Why have the other people believed? Because have seen his signs and wonders, i.e., miracles. Will the man believe without seeing? What does he beg Christ to do? Can at present only believe in His power when present. He was present at the marriage-feast. Where did other miracles? Surely He will come down to Capernaum with him now.

II. THE NOBLEMAN LEAVING CHRIST. (Read 50—54.) What answer did Christ make to his second earnest request? Thy son liveth. Not shall live, but does live. Now the nobleman fully believes. He believed before in Christ's power, now in Christ's word. He does not hesitate, but departs home. What trembling joy he must have had! the news is so good he can scarcely believe it. Will it be confirmed? What does he see in the distance? Surely he can recognise those faces—his own servants coming hastily along, with beaming faces. Picture them calling out from a distance; now hurrying up; the interview with the master; questions and answers rapidly given. At what time did he begin to get better? Just the very hour at which Christ spoke to him. He must believe now. Yes, but not only for himself, all the house must be told the wonderful news, every detail of the story, the arrival at Cana, the appearance of Christ, the conversation, the time, the meeting with the servants. Will go over it again and again. The whole house will believe in Jesus as the Almighty Son of God.

III. PRACTICAL LESSONS. (1) The benefit of sickness. Ask what caused sickness? One of the consequences of Adam's sin. Can it have any blessings connected with it? What did it make this nobleman do? But for it might never have heard of, seen, known, believed in Jesus. Now both himself, his child and household, all believe. Just so still—sickness hard to bear, full of suffering, is one great voice of God to man. Realise, then, our feebleness is blessed when leads to seek Christ; not merely to have vague belief in his power, but to seek him as a personal friend; though out of sight, still to seek Him and find Him as our Saviour. (2) The benefit of faith. When Christ spoke, this man believed, not like Thomas, who required to see. The nobleman's faith, at first weak, grew stronger, till it showed itself by its works, doing as he was bid. Such a faith must be ours. All have greater sickness than that of this child. What is it? (Isa. i. 6.) Sin more terrible in its effect. There is the good Physician. We may go to Him for ourselves and others. What has he done to heal it? What does His blood do? (1 John i. 6.) We have not seen it, but have heard His word in His Bible, saying, "Believe . . . shall be saved." (Acts xvi. 31.) If believe that, and confess sins and turn from them, i.e., repent, our soul's sickness will be healed, and we, like the nobleman, may depart in peace. But why did he go to Jesus? Do we feel our sickness? If so, seek and shall find.

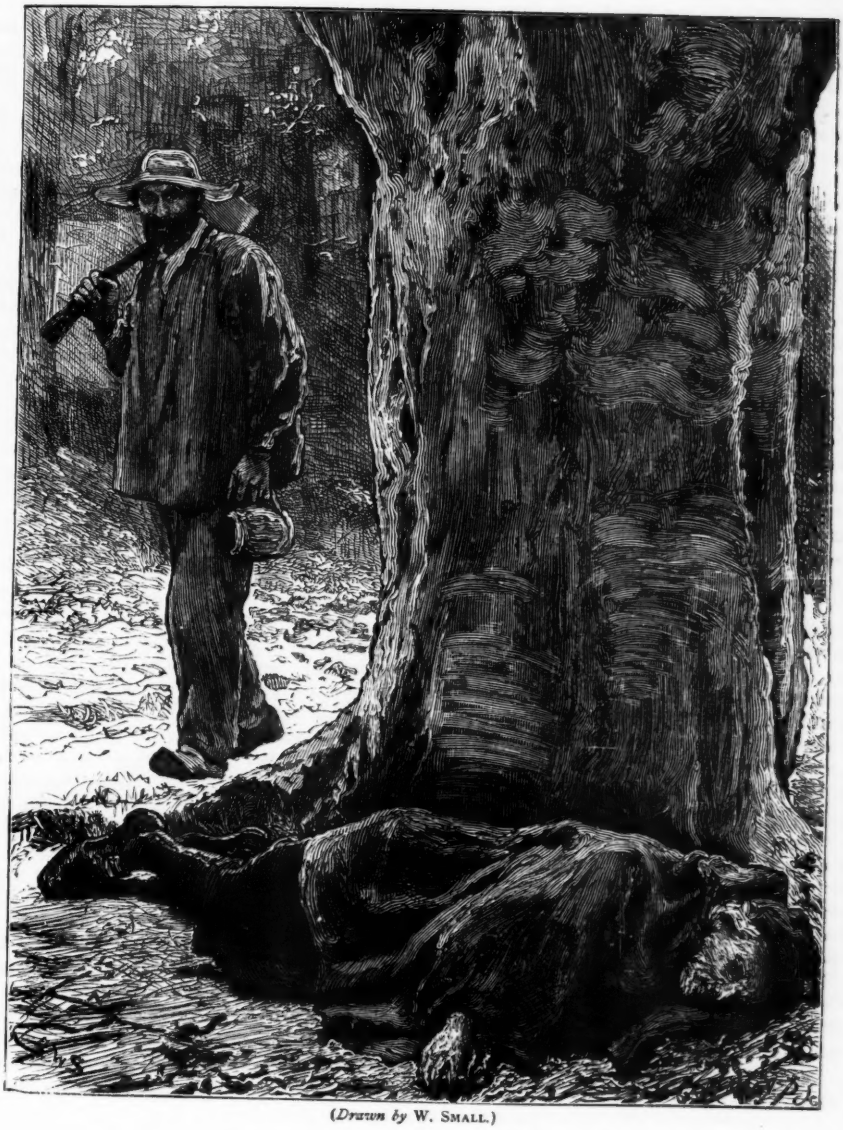
Questions to be answered.

1. Describe Christ's progress from Samaria to Cana.
2. Why did the nobleman go to Him?
3. Describe the interview.
4. Who met him on his way home, and with what news?
5. What practical lessons may we learn?
6. Of what is sickness a type?

STILL AND DEEP.

BY F. M. F. SKENE, AUTHOR OF "TRIED," "ONE LIFE ONLY," ETC.

CHAPTER XXXV.



WHEN Bertrand Lisle, having removed all traces of his long dusty journey, walked down through the great room towards his uncle, with his handsome head erect, and his eyes bright with excitement, he looked in truth a worthy representative of the old de L'Isles, whose portraits gazed down upon him from the walls, many of them bearing that strange resemblance to his own pleasant face which is often to be traced in members of an ancient family, even with an interval of centuries between them. His appearance was in striking contrast to that of the actual possessor, who still sat in his great chair with a black velvet robe folded loosely round his wasted shrivelled form, and a rich crimson silk coverlet flung over his helpless limbs; he watched the young man admiringly as the servant drew forward an old-fashioned green velvet chair with a carved wooden back, in which he seated himself close to his uncle's side.

The old Comte stretched out one of his thin white hands, and laid it on Bertrand's, not less delicate and shapely, though tanned with exposure to the sun, and said, tenderly, "You are very like your father, Bertrand; no wonder that I forgot the lapse of years, and mistook you for him.

"Ah!" continued he, "life must have been greatly embittered for Louis before he could thus seek to bring you up as an alien from our country, and doubtless I had my heavy share in poisoning it; but Providence has overruled us both—him in his nobleness and me in my unworthiness—and at the end of it all you stand in your rightful place, beneath the roof-tree of your ancestral home. You did well, Bertrand de L'Isle, to leave the stranger country that you might fight for France; and France opens her heart to you, and bids you rest on her soil for ever."

"I scarce understand you," said Bertrand, looking anxiously at the old man, who spoke with feverish excitement.

"No," he said, "how should you till you know my history. But I will accomplish now the bitter task, and tell it you from first to last." He joined his hands for a moment as if in prayer, and then went on. "Your father was my nephew, the son of my eldest brother, but we were so nearly the same age that we were brought up together as children in this old home, where I, in my orphanhood, was sheltered by your grandfather, who was in possession of the estates. Louis, his only son, was of course, by the law of primogeniture, which was always observed in our family, the direct heir of the property and all its territorial rights and titles. He was generous to me after he became the head of our house, but we were never friends, we were too unlike; he was like one of the old cavaliers of the times of chivalry—loyal to his God and to his king, pure-minded and disinterested, holding principle more precious than gold, and truth dearer than life. As for me, I cared neither for religion nor for the throne, nor for my country; I desired only wealth and worldly honours and luxurious ease, and I was bitterly jealous of Louis because he held the position of lord of this castle and estate, which I coveted for myself. I rejoiced to see his enthusiastic devotion to the cause of the Bourbons, because I knew that their tenure of the throne was precarious, and I allied myself to those who were secretly labouring to undermine it, on purpose that if they fell I might stand well with the government inimical to them, and wrest the estates from Louis should he follow them in their fallen fortunes. I well knew that in doing so I should be false to the principles of our family as well as a treacherous usurper of that to which I had no real claim, but I cared nothing even for honour and justice so that I could gain my own ends. I had married by that time a woman of low birth, for whom I never pretended to have the slightest affection, but whose wealth had become necessary to me on account of my debts, and she was full of vulgar ambition to be made lady of the castle, and urged me on in all my unworthy plans. They succeeded but too well: Charles X. was driven from France, and Louis clung to him in his misfortunes. I seized on the estates at once, and succeeded in getting my possession of them, unjust as it was, recognised by the new dynasty to whom I gave in my adhesion, till the revolution of 1848 made me veer round to call myself first a Republican and then to court the imperial favour. During all these years I did my best to lose sight of Louis. I knew well that even if he chose to remain in exile, my plain duty would have been to ask him to let me care for the estates as his representative, and to have honestly transmitted to him every farthing of the revenue, but so far from that, I succeeded in getting a sentence of exile and deprivation passed upon him, through false representations which I made concerning him, to the reigning powers, and I established myself here as in my right. I forbad the mention of his name by any of our dependents, and after that one intimation of his marriage, and subsequently of your birth, which he sent through the family notary, I never heard of him from that day to this. But Bertrand, God is just, and not for one single hour did I find happiness in my usurped position. Nothing prospered with me. My wife was a woman of violent temper, coarse in language and in mind; she rendered my life miserable, and she made enemies of all around her. Our neighbours, equal to the de L'Isles in birth, and long the friends of the family, refused to associate with her, and her violence and insolence to our tenants and household were such that I dared not leave her alone in the château. We lived, therefore, a lonely life when we were here, shut up together, without a spark of affection between us to render our position tolerable, and when we went to Paris she tortured me by her plebeian manners and reckless extravagance. We had children, but they died one after another. The greatest desire I had in the world was that a son of mine should become lord of de L'Isle and head of our house, and again and again the hope was awakened only to perish. I had four sons, who passed from their cradles to their coffins. My wife and I were left alone face to face in our misery. Age crept on apace. Rather more than five years ago she died. It was too late then for me to marry again.

(Drawn by W. SMALL.)

"Lying on the ground at the foot of a tree."—p. 634.

"It was about six months after my wife's death, when I had come down here to entertain some of my political friends who had agreed to meet at my house. They had spent a week with me, and had departed, leaving me alone; it was a beautiful summer evening, and I could not bear the solitude of these old halls; I went out, and roamed beyond the grounds, into a wood which lies at no very great distance from our domain. I did not feel well, but the fresh air seemed to revive me, and I had gone far into the recesses of the forest when suddenly a weakness seemed to take possession of me, a dimness passed over my eyes, then all became a blank, and I remained unconscious I know not how long; when I came to myself I was lying on the ground at the foot of a tree; darkness had fallen on the earth, save that one portion of the horizon was illuminated every now and then by sheet lightning, the thunder was growling in the distance, but in the wood itself all was absolute calm. I lay there for a few minutes, trying to understand what had happened to me, and I concluded I had fainted, but when I tried to raise myself to move my limbs I understood the fatal truth, I had had a paralytic stroke, and I had lost all power of movement excepting in my hands; I tried to cry out, but my dumb lips refused to make any sound: I have since regained my speech, though not the use of my limbs, but for the time even the power to ask help was taken from me, my head fell back again upon the earth, and I said to myself in despair, 'I shall die here unaided and alone. No one knew where I was, no one ever ventured into the forest after dark, where the peasants believed that the spirit of a man who was murdered years ago within its shade still walked by night; there was not a chance that any one would seek me till the morning, for my servants believed I had retired to rest. In my faintness and helplessness I felt as if I could not possibly survive through the night, stretched on the damp earth, without succour; death then, death speedy and terrible was surely before me, and as I closed my eyes in helpless despair I seemed to hear a solemn voice within me saying, 'and after death the judgment!'

"The dreadful night wore on, while my awakened conscience held me in its grasp like an accusing spectre. But still I lived; and with the dawning light a wood-cutter, passing near, through the mercy of my God, perceived me, and I was rescued. My servants were summoned. They carried me home. For days and months I lay dumb and helpless. Gradually the power of speech returned; but my limbs remain like those of a dead man.

"I believe that this much of life was given me only that I might make restitution of all my unlawful gains. I sought Louis by every means in my power, but nowhere could I hear of him. I had a deep conviction that if only I were permitted to restore these estates to the rightful heir, I might take it as a token that the pardon and mercy of God would be extended even unto me, repentant, when in actual fact I am summoned before the judgment-seat. And now, Bertrand de L'Isle," continued the old man, turning to him with a smile of ineffable contentment, "has not the good God been gracious to me indeed? He has tried the truth of my repentance by five years of anguish and almost hopeless waiting, and then he has brought you to me—you, the son and representative of Louis de L'Isle, the legitimate heir, the true and rightful lord of all this fair estate. Already have I sent for the family notary, and to-morrow, in the presence of competent witnesses, I make over to you this château, and all that belongs to the inheritance of your father. As for me, the good curé of the village will give me a lodging with him for the brief remnant of my days."

"No, dear uncle, not so," said Bertrand, earnestly; "I will never consent to your leaving this place. After all that you have told me, I dare not gainsay your will that it should belong to my father's son hereafter, if I survive this war, which is very doubtful; but while you live it is yours, and I will never deprive you of it."

"So Louis would have spoken," said his uncle, smiling. "But, Bertrand, we need scarce discuss the matter; it is but a question of a few months—the doctors have told me I cannot live longer. If you are good enough to let me linger out my days in a corner of your house, I will accept your kindness with gratitude; but all shall be made over to you before the day is many hours old to-morrow, and if you leave me here you leave me as your guest."

Armand de L'Isle carried his point; and when Bertrand rode away from the château the next day, his title to the estate was safe in the notary's hands.

CHAPTER XXXVI.

Mary Trevelyan and her associates reached Paris (not without great difficulty, from the distracted state of the country) in the first week of September, 1870; and the events of that month, so fatal to France, are matters of history with which our readers are all well acquainted. The news of the terrible disaster of Sedan and the fall of the Empire, took place the day after their arrival, and within ten days from that time Paris was encircled as with an iron ring by the irresistible force of the Prussian army, and the siege had commenced. Ingress and egress became alike impossible, and Mary knew that she, and all those who, like herself, were devoted to the relief of the sick and wounded, were finally shut in, and must needs go through all the hardship and horrors of the siege, however protracted it might be. She was well content with this fiat, so far as she herself was concerned; she had come there to help the suffering, and was prepared herself to suffer in doing so, and a very few weeks passed in the capital (fitly called in those days the "bleeding heart of France") sufficed to show her that there was more than work enough for hundreds like herself, could they have been found, to devote themselves to the never-ending task. Ambulances were at first established in connection with the hospitals, for the greater convenience of surgeons and nurses, who had thus everything that was required at hand, and into these, day after day, were poured the wounded soldiers from the ramparts, or those who had succumbed to fever from exposure and hardship, along with numbers of men, women, and children who were stricken down in the streets by the shot and shell of the ceaseless bombardment. Very soon, too, the want of provisions began to tell on the poor, and never in this world will it be known how fearful an amount of misery was endured within the walls of Paris during those awful winter months; soon the hospitals, even with their supernumerary ambulances, no longer sufficed to hold all the sufferers, and different places were utilised for the purpose, until at last the very churches were put in requisition, and turned into receptacles for the sick and wounded.

In the first commencement of the long trying siege Mary Trevelyan was appointed chief nurse to the ambulance attached to the Hospital of Notre Dame de Pitié, where wooden sheds and tents erected in the courtyard were filled with sufferers, after all the wards had been crowded to overflowing; but in agreeing to remain there, chiefly, she had stipulated that she was to be replaced by some other person, if at any time it happened that she found her services suddenly required elsewhere; for the one thought that lay ever at her heart, and filled her with anxiety night and day, was the conviction she had that Bertrand Lisle was somewhere, even now, within the beleaguered city, wounded, it might be, or dying, and in sore need of the succour which she longed beyond all words to give him; she had calculated, from what he had said as to his movements in the letter to Laura, of which Charlie Davenant had spoken to her, that he must have arrived in Paris with his despatches a day or two before she herself had reached the city, and she knew that if this had been the case, it must have been impossible for him to leave Paris again—a French officer was the last person who would be allowed to pass the ranks of the Prussian army: where, then, was he?

and how could she know whether, disabled as he already was, he might not be in some great suffering or danger? This was the question that seemed to wear her very heart out, as night and day she laboured among the sick and dying; but she spoke no word of her dreadful anxiety to Mrs. Parry, when she snatched a moment to go and see her. Poor nurse Parry had enough on her hands already, without having to share Mary's cruel suspense.

Madame Brunot, the wife of the colporteur, was in the greatest distress; nothing had been heard of her husband, and it was certain that if he were alive at all he could not return to his family till the siege was over. She was herself in a very delicate state of health, entirely confined to bed, and she had no money with which to pay the exorbitant price to which provisions were already rising. Her seven children and herself depended entirely on the charity of others, and though Mary and Mrs. Parry gave all they had, it was far from sufficient for their wants.

Their condition would have been almost desperate had it not been for John Pemberton; he had been appointed by the Relief Society to the onerous task of distributing food from the English stores to the famishing population in a large district of the city, and the work taxed his energies to the utmost, from the scenes of distress in every possible shape to which it introduced him, and which he never failed to strive most earnestly to relieve without confining himself at all to his special department. The Brunots lived in the quartier which had been assigned to him, but he would in any case have known of their distress from Mary Trevelyan, whom he often went to see, and he soon became greatly interested in the family. Valerie, the eldest little girl, who was about ten years old, was one of those charming unselfish children to whom sorrow and trial had given wisdom beyond her years. Now that Madame Brunot was incapacitated she acted as the little mother of the younger children, and scarcely knew what it was to be without a baby in her arms continually; she it was who consulted with John Pemberton as to the wants of the family while nurse Parry was attending to the sick woman, and, as he spoke French only with great difficulty, he used to take her with him when he went to get the necessary provisions for them; gradually she came to be so useful to him as his little interpreter, that Mrs. Parry was often left in charge of the household while Valerie went with him to help in succouring families as badly off as themselves. Hand in hand they would walk through the streets of unhappy Paris, or stand in the long line of purchasers waiting at the shops of the butchers and bakers till their turn came to be supplied; and the child showed wonderful calmness and courage with the ceaseless thunders of the bombardment sounding over her innocent head and the lurid smoke of the cannon glaring before her eyes. She soon came to feel for John Pemberton that intense affection which an intelligent and warm-hearted child is so quick to cherish for the friend of mature years of whose kindness and wisdom she has had experience. She well knew that he was the benefactor of those who were dear to her, and she looked upon him as the embodiment of all that was good and noble; she would open her guileless heart to him as she trotted along by his side, and John Pemberton soon found that the services he had rendered to her family were more than repaid by the benefit he derived from his intercourse with her, and the insight he gained into her transparent nature and simplicity of mind; for she restored to him that faith in his fellow-creatures which had been so cruelly destroyed by Lurline's artful intrigues. Valerie taught him that the world is not all evil, that God has many a holy shrine in pure unworldly hearts that seem through all their lives to retain the freshness and brightness with which they first came from His creative hand. The patience, too, with which the child, in quiet submission to the will of the Heavenly Father in whom she trusted so implicitly, endured a life of joyless privation without a murmur, made the man of riper years feel ashamed of the gloom he had allowed to overspread his whole existence, because the one love on which he had set all his hopes had failed him in such bitter fashion, and she taught him, above all, a lesson of disinterestedness in her thoughtful and observant care for others and complete forgetfulness of self.

One evening Mary was seated in the midst of Madame Brunot's children, whom she was feeding with some rice, and she smiled gently on them, as they stood round her with open mouths, like so many hungry sparrows; but when the welcome repast was over, and they had all been carried off to bed under the guardianship of Valerie, Pemberton saw how instantaneously the transient brightness faded from her face, while a long shuddering sigh seemed to shake her whole frame. She went to the window, and stood there, looking out with a sad wistful gaze so full of yearning anxiety and pain, that he no longer doubted she had indeed some heavy secret trial that was blanching her wan face, and wasting her delicate frame with far more insidious power than all her labours on behalf of the suffering.

He was always in the habit of escorting her back through the dangerous streets to the hospital, when he happened to meet her at the Brunots'; and she was soon ready to go, for she never stayed away from her duties longer than the time necessary to do anything she could for the Brunots and to comfort Mrs. Parry with the assurance that she was quite safe and well. So the two soon found themselves walking, by the quietest way they could, in the direction of the hospital. It was a bright moonlight night, clear and cold, and Pemberton could study his companion's face as they went along as well as if it had been high noon.

"Valerie Brunot is a very wise little woman," he said presently.

"She is indeed a singularly thoughtful, intelligent child," answered Mary.

"She has made a discovery which I was too blind or too stupid to make," said Pemberton, "and has told me she is certain you have some great grief or anxiety which you are bearing unaided and in silence. If this is true, Miss Trevelyan, I should be so thankful if you would let me try to help you."

"It is true," she said, in her soft pathetic voice.

"Then do, I entreat of you, tell me what it is—if at least it is at all possible for me to be of use to you with regard to it."

She held down her head, and did not speak.

They were crossing one of the bridges over the Seine, and Pemberton resolutely stopped, and looked at her while he repeated, "Miss Trevelyan, can I help you? You must tell me. These are not days for conventionalities."

"I think you could," she answered; "but I fear that it might lead you into danger."

"As to that, I cannot be in greater danger than I am every day and every hour. My duties oblige me to be under fire half my time, near the ramparts. You may be perfectly certain nothing can make any difference to me in that respect. I shall not move from this spot till you tell me what I can do for you."

Then she raised her face into the full moonlight, and Pemberton saw that over it was passing a wave of emotion which made her lips tremble and her eyes shine with tears.

"Oh, how kind you are," she said; "it will indeed ease my heart to tell you. Think—think what it must be to me to spend every hour, night and day, attending to the sick and wounded who are strangers to me, and all the while to know that he, he who was my first and dearest friend on earth, is most likely lying somewhere within those walls ill, dying perhaps, with none to tend or care for him."

She could not go on, but, bending her face on her hands, sobbed unrestrainedly. John Pemberton looked at her with infinite compassion.

"You mean Bertrand Lisle?" he said, very gently.

"Yes," she answered, in a broken voice. "I know that he came into Paris at the same time that we did. He cannot have escaped from it, as you know; and in no possible way have I been able to hear anything of him. But I have an instinctive conviction that he is ill somewhere, and in need of help. I have visited every ambulance to which I could gain access, and looked in the faces of hundreds of wounded men; but never, never have I seen him."

"Then, Miss Trevelyan, from this moment leave the search to me; and I promise you that I will never rest till I have found him. I can go where you cannot, and I do not doubt I shall succeed."

She put both her hands into his. She looked up into his face, with eyes radiant with gratitude.

"I cannot thank you," she said, "for I know no words which could express what I feel; but our Father in heaven will bless you, Mr. Pemberton, with a great blessing for your mercy and goodness to me."

He pressed her hand in silence, and they walked on to the hospital.

"I ought not to wonder at any man's folly," thought Pemberton, as he turned away from seeing Mary within the gate, "after my own insane weakness at Chiverley; but certainly there never was madness like that of Bertrand Lisle, when he flung aside such a heart as Mary Trevelyan's for the sake of the syren Lorelei!"

(To be continued.)

"TO BE KEPT TILL CALLED FOR."

A TRUE STORY.

THE Farlingham coach was on the point of starting from the "Green Man and Still," the coachman and proprietor, honest Dan Rumble, had gathered up the reins, and was in the act of lifting his booted foot to the first step, when a small voice was heard calling on him to take charge of a correspondingly small brown-paper parcel. How it was that at such a supreme moment he could pay any attention to so insignificant a matter is a mystery. The largest-hearted coachman must be parcel-hardened at times, and, certainly, to have a miserable packet forced upon you by some urchin just as you are about to assume your high command, must be a thing below ordinary notice. However, moved by irresistible fate, Mr. Rumble did take the parcel, unmindful of all booking, and other irregularities, slipped it into the boot without looking at it, and, utterly regardless of repeated intimations from the small voice that it was to be "kept till called for," mounted and drove off.

That night the brown-paper parcel remained at the Farlingham coach-office, sole representative of all the manifold and multiform packages which had been brought from town. To the coachman's surprise there was no name on it—nothing but the direction that it was to be kept at Farlingham till called for, as the boy had said. And there it remained, sometimes having for a short time the company of one or more other parcels or boxes, who soon, however, showed that they had friends in the world who cared for them; but more frequently all alone—a poor neglected common-place solitary parcel, that seemed to have been forgotten by everybody. Sometimes Mr. Rumble happened to notice it, and said, "Why, there's that parcel still; hasn't anybody been for it yet?" and then it would again be totally lost sight of for a time.

Weeks, months, a whole year, two years, passed away, and still no inquiry whatever was made about it. At last, one day, without rhyme or reason—just in the way we often arrive at petty decisions, without any external pressure—it came into Dan Rumble's mind all on a sudden to do something or other with that parcel. Like a very small foreign substance which the system cannot appropriate, it was producing a slight irritation, and he declared, in the hearing of his wife, that he must get rid of it.

"Why not open it, and see what's inside?" said she, with instinctive but somewhat languid curiosity—it was such a contemptible-looking parcel.

"All very well, missus," was the reply, "but suppose the owner should turn up to-morrow."

"Nonsense! a thing like that, that has been left unclaimed for a couple of years, can't have any owner. Look at it; why it's as light as if it were full of nothing but fluff," and she gave it a toss in the air, as if to show its unsubstantial composition.

"Never mind if it be only fluff, as you say, remember it ain't my fluff; there's the difficulty. What don't belong to me always has been and always shall be sacred as the Bible, whether it be golden sovereigns or only goose-feathers."

"You are such an honest old dear!" said the wife, admiringly; "but how you are to get rid of that miserable thing if you won't open it, or burn it, or give it away, is more than I can tell you. Sure enough, I have asked everybody if they knew anybody who was expecting a brown-paper parcel, till I am heartily sick of it."

"I know what I shall do with it," said Dan, all at once, after a long pause, "I shall take it to-morrow to Squire Clearhead, and ask him to open it in my presence."

"Do, my dear," said his wife, laughing; "and then, when you have found the goose-feathers inside, the squire will tell you that they rightfully belong to you."

She did not say this sharply, but in pure mischief, and all the while she liked him the better for his scrupulosity, and knew very well that there was no greater goose on earth than the man who fancied it would ever do him any real good to act dishonestly.

So Dan went accordingly to the squire's, and told his errand, and brought out of his capacious pocket the shabby packet, placing it before the worthy magistrate with a certain air of relief, as if he were about to get rid of a small bother.

"There it is, your worship," he said; "please to undo the string and let's see what can be done with the contents. I don't suppose they are worth all this trouble; but I hope you will forgive me, for I can't abear to have anything on my mind."

"Quite right, Rumble," said the squire, as he proceeded to cut the string, as requested, and leisurely to unfold the paper; "quite right; the highway of honesty may sometimes be the longest road, but it's worth while going miles out of your way to keep to it. Eh? what?—is it possible? Well, I declare! to think of such a thing!"

And, in the midst of such a fire of exclamations, Squire Clearhead revealed to light a compact nest of silvery pieces of paper, whose aristocratic crackle, as he turned them over, proclaimed at once the high breeding and careful culture of a Bank of England note.

"Why, here's a small fortune!" cried the astonished squire.

"False notes, I'll be bound, sir," said Dan, eyeing the notes incredulously, as the other turned them over with the dexterity of a banker's clerk; "the rogues were hard pressed, and so got rid of them in this way. Not a bad plan either."

The suggestion caused the squire to stop in turning them over, and he scrutinised one of them severely, holding it up to the light, and applying various other well-known tests.

"Nothing of the kind, Rumble, I'm positive of that," he said, at length, putting down the paper-examiner, and looking up into Dan's honest and unperturbed face, with evident interest in the growing mystery; "these are genuine notes, I feel perfectly confident. Of course," he continued, "they may have been stopped long ago at the Bank, and probably were, having, as I should think, been dishonestly come by; but that can easily be found out. If they have been stopped we shall be able to return them to their owner, or his representative, and may perhaps also discover some clue as to their coming into your possession. But if, on the other hand, they have not been stopped—which is very unlikely—and if we cannot trace them from the time of their first issue—which is more than probable—then, upon my word, we shall have a tidy little fortune upon our hands."

The squire began to reckon up the value of the notes. It took some little time to do it, and all that time the face of Dan Rumble altered not in expression one whit. No gleam of covetousness lurked in those steady eyes; not, forsooth, because he had any sublime indifference to feathering his own nest, but simply because, to his way of thinking, there stood between that possible fortune and himself the impassable gulf that it was not his.

"Eight thousand pounds, more or less!" exclaimed the squire, when he had turned over the last note; and he sat back in his chair, and folded his hands, and again looked up into Dan's face.

"Well, they 're not mine, sir, that's clear; I only wish it was as clear who the rightful owner is."

The squire liked those few bright words amazingly. There was a sweet wholesome scent about them, better than the best of flowery perfumes. He felt he could not trust such a man too much.

"What would you wish me to do with them, Rumble?"

"Whatever you think best, your worship; I leave them in your hands, and shall be glad to have got them off mine."

"Well, then, I tell you what I'll do," said the squire, after a minute's deliberation; "I will go up to town with you to-morrow, and we'll see my lawyer, and go with him to the Bank of England, and perhaps put ourselves in communication with the police, and sift the matter, so far as we can, to the very bottom. For my part, I don't think we shall have far to go. I shall seal the packet up in your presence, Rumble, and then you can leave it with me."

They went, they investigated, the notes were scrutinised, the bank books were searched, the police authorities were consulted, everything was done that could be done, but all to no purpose; not the slightest clue could be discovered as to the history of those notes.

They had never been stopped, there was no indorsement on any one of them that furnished the least trace of ownership that was of any use, the police—though they were wonderfully shrewd in explaining how the notes had come into Dan Rumble's hands—could find nothing whatever, upon reference to their records, that even hinted at any contemporaneous loss or robbery, advertisements in London as well as country papers published the fact of the discovery in general terms, but all in vain; and every scent that was followed only ended in the pursuers being as much as ever at fault.

(To be concluded.)

SURLY BOB.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "SHAG AND DOLL," "HUGH'S HEROISM," ETC.

CHAPTER II.

THE bird stood erect on Bob's finger, as if she felt at home there, putting her head first on one side and then on the other, as she looked at him out of her small bright eyes. Bob returned her glances, and as he did so something actually approaching a smile broke over his rugged features and softened them, especially when, bending his head, he laid his cheek caressingly against the bird's soft plumage. Then he stroked it gently with his hand for a few moments, looking, as he did so, strangely unlike the boy who a short time ago had sat sullen and silent in his class in the school-room.

But some sudden sound from without made itself heard, and he was again his old self in a moment. The dove was instantly hidden from sight, as were also those softer feelings which seemed for the moment to have been stealing over him. Then he stood listening, apparently ready to repulse any attack upon or invasion of his domain. For Bob was always ready to fight for his rights, and he had come by degrees to look upon this out-house as his own property. For it was made no use of by the family (indeed, none of the cousins would have condescended to sleep in or inhabit such a miserable place), and having thus been given up entirely to the brothers, Bob had long considered it as exclusively his, and was as ready to defend it, and as resolved to keep off intruders, as if it had been his own castle by right of inheritance.

But he was generally left unmolested, there being little to tempt any one either in the place or its contents. Only sometimes the most provoking of the cousins, Sam and Bill, would come on purpose to annoy Bob, and try to force an entrance into his den. But they always met with such rough handling, that they had begun to think it best to leave "surly Bob" to himself. And the latter, having found out a way of shutting the crazy old door, when he went out, in such a manner that it would have been very difficult for any one but himself, who knew the knack, to open it, he felt pretty easy in his mind when absent as to the safety of whatever treasures he might have left within. Poor Bob's treasures, however, were soon numbered, the ring-dove apparently being the only one, as, besides the bed, the place seemed to contain nothing but a broken chair and a three-legged stool.

The sound outside he at length found was caused by little Johnnie's crutch; and, accordingly, as it drew nearer, he opened the door for his brother to enter. Then he closed it carefully again.

The little fellow came in looking blue with cold; and as he seated himself and laid aside his crutch, he exclaimed, "How bitter cold it is, ain't it, Bob? My hands and feet ache so I scarce knows how to bear it!" and he held up his numbed fingers to his mouth, that his warm breath might fall upon them and perhaps put a little heat into them.

"It's 'cause you can't run about like other chaps, that you get so starved," said Bob, as he went down upon his knees and took hold of one of Johnnie's feet.

"Whatever are you going to do, Bob?" he asked.

Bob did not reply, only bent lower over the small foot he was chafing; but the face which generally looked so ill-tempered and harsh wore another expression now: the usually heavy listless eyes were soft and even glistening; the firmly set and rather thick lips were parted into a half smile, as at some pleasant thought. Was it, then, that Bob, in spite of his rough exterior, had a heart, and that little Johnnie—and Johnnie alone—held the key to it? Was the silent sullen lad touched to find that there was one who could love him—even him, "surly Bob"—and like to be with him? It almost looked so; and looked too as if he knew how to love in return, so gently did the boy—whose fists, half an hour ago had dealt out blows and a black eye to Tom Lane—rub and chafe, and try to warm the little brother's feet and hands.

"Have you been all this time a-coming home?" he asked at length, abruptly.

"No, I went into widow Black's," replied Johnnie.

"What did you go in there for?"

"She was at the door, so I just spoke to her, and then she asked me to come in a few minutes. You see, as she's blind, she's glad of any one to talk to."

"What d'you find to talk to her about? I ain't never got nothing to say."

"Oh, she asked me about the Sunday-school. She likes to hear what they've been telling us there; and I could remember some of it to-day, 'cause 'twas so easy to understand, wasn't it, Bob?"

"Dunno," returned the other, shortly.

At length he declared that Bob's rubbing had made him quite warm, adding, "We'd best go in, hadn't we? and see what we can get for tea, or it'll all be over, I expect, for it must be getting past the time, and I'm dreadful hungry."

"Come along then," returned Bob, handing him his crutch, and the two went out together, Johnnie saying, in a low voice, "And when we come back we'll have out our little dove, won't we, Bob, 'cause we shall be all safe then."

(To be continued.)

"THE QUIVER" BIBLE CLASS.

249. How does our Lord illustrate the close connection there is between Himself and those who do the will of His Father which is in heaven?

250. What special law was given by Moses in reference to cases where property was left to the daughters of a family?

251. Which of Christ's miracles were miracles of creation?

252. For what purpose does Jeremiah use the type of good and bad figs?

253. What proof is there that the early inhabitants of Canaan gained much of their power from the possession of chariots of iron?

254. State the punishment inflicted at God's command upon a man who had broken the Sabbath.

255. Quote a passage in which St. Paul says he was hindered in his work by Satan.

256. What command was given by God to the children of Israel as to the make of their garments—and why?

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS ON PAGE 608.

237. Joel (or Vashni) and Abiah (1 Sam. viii. 2).

238. "Then came Peter to Him, and said, Lord, how oft shall my brother sin against me, and I forgive him? till seven times? Jesus saith unto him, I say not unto thee until seven times, but until seventy times seven" (Matt. xviii. 21, 22).

239. Because the prince of Tyre had set himself up as God, and lifted up his heart in pride (Ezekiel xxviii. 2, 6).

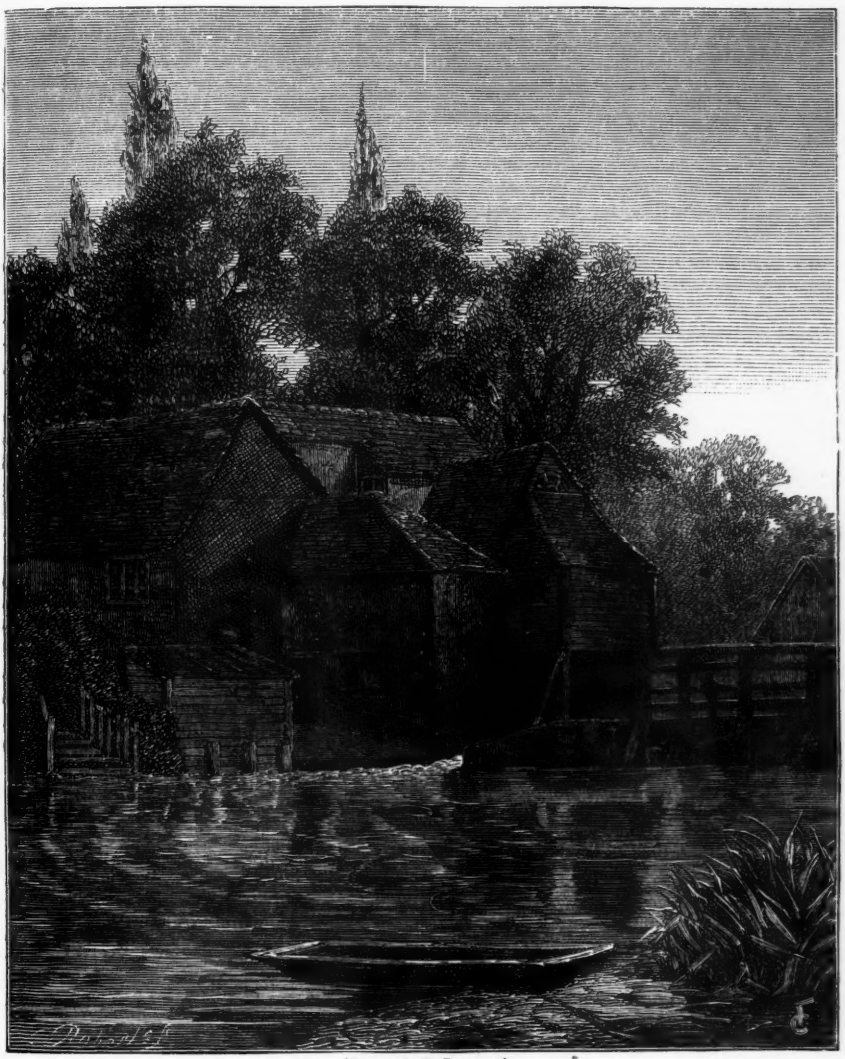
240. Five (Luke xvi. 28).

241. "Rise up, Lord, and let Thine enemies be scattered; and let them that hate Thee flee before Thee." "Return, O Lord, unto the many thousands of Israel" (Num. x. 35, 36).

242. Under the oak in Jabesh, by the men of Jabesh-gilead (1 Chron. x. 11, 12).

"EVEN AS THOU WILT."

SOUL, where goest thou?
Whither? unto rest?
Whither? Then as now
Unto what is best.



For Faith's trusting eyes
See, what to Doubt's sight
Thickest darkness lies,
Even as clearest light.

Dust shall pass to dust;
But the sure soul still
Flies, with perfect trust,
God, where Thou shalt will.

Be it dark with ill
To my trembling sight,
Lord, it is Thy will;
Lord, I know 'tis right.

Calm, through life, through death,
Joy and grief, I tread;
For, through all, Faith saith,
All by Thee are led.

W. C. BENNETT.

(Drawn by F. CARLESS.)

LET THEM SLEEP.

BY MRS. G. LINNÆUS BANKS.

THERE'S a twitter from the poplars,
And a flutter in the limes,
For the dawn is slowly breaking,
And the birdies wake betimes;
But the trees still cast a shadow
On the mill beside the stream,
Where the unawakened inmates
In serenest slumber dream,
As though the wash of waters
Was a lullaby supreme.

But the dawn is creeping upwards,
And the birds their matins trill,
To awake the drowsy sleepers
In the cottage and the mill;
But the human, worn with labour,
Has the longer need of rest,
And while night still spreads her pinions
(Like a blessing from the blest)
Let them sleep, to wake as blithely
As the birdlings in the nest.

There be those among the song-birds
Of the dense and stifling town
To whom the night brings no repose,
And the dawn comes with a frown,
Who would gladly sink to slumber
Like the miller and the thrush,
And awaken fresh and buoyant
When the dawn comes with a blush;
But their nests are not mid lindens,
And their stream runs with a rush.

THE BRIDGE BETWEEN.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE TROUBLES OF CHATTY AND MOLLY," "THE DINGY HOUSE AT KENSINGTON," "QUEEN MADGE," "AGAINST HERSELF," ETC., ETC., ETC.

CHAPTER XXXIV.—NETTA'S LETTER.

DOROTHY never forgot those dying words of Tortoiseshell's as long as she lived. Out of love for the kind old lady at first and for His own sake at last, she thought of that friend who "never failed," and so gradually the gap in the girl's life filled up, and new and holier thoughts took the place of the old ones, and Dorothy was no longer lonely, and would never be so again. She had found something now to dream about and think of, something which neither spoilt her life nor stayed her energies, but which made all labour easy and all self-sacrifice sweet.

"Do you know, Dorothy, you have grown so pretty lately," Sally said one day, as she looked up into her sister's truthful brown eyes, that had sometimes a far-off look in them, which the child only dimly understood then. "You are far prettier than Netta."

"Oh no, Sally," she said, "Netta was a beauty."

"Well, so are you; and Mr. Fuller thinks so too now." The quick colour came to Dorothy's face. Adrian Fuller was always at her side again. He resumed his old footing in the family, even in the shabby lodging. His old footing with all but Dorothy. She was never the same, and never could be again. She always remembered the summer days which had been so bright, and those dreary ones that followed, and above all the terrible day, in which he had all but accused her of the feeling he had himself fanned and encouraged, and that still more terrible evening when she had flung his meanness in his teeth. No, she could never be the same again. Her heart beat quicker when he came, the colour rushed to her face when he entered a room where she was, and her eyes drooped beneath his gaze. The fearless, frank little Dolly, who liked him in former days, and felt no shame in owning it, had vanished, and the Dorothy he knew now was a shy sweet maiden, who worked hard and laboured, not for her own happiness but for the happiness of those around her, and who seemed to have some world of her own far away from his, and which raised her above and beyond him. She had a fascination now for him that Netta in all her glorious beauty had never possessed—a beauty which is as different as that which appeals to the senses only as is the flash of diamonds from the light of stars, a beauty which we feel rather than behold, and which brings all our better nobler feelings into play, until in struggling towards the light we long to reach we leave our baser selves behind. So gradually Adrian Fuller learned to love Dorothy Woodward. But she never guessed it. She was too much engrossed with the work her hands had found to do, and the new happiness her heart had found to dwell upon. And yet there was something still wanting in the girl's life, something that made her creep away sometimes, and sob and fret, and pray that she might have strength to put away all longings from her heart, and be content with that happiness only which is to be found in the happiness of others.

They had not been many months in the shabby rooms before Dorothy received a characteristic letter from Netta in answer to the one she had written telling her of the family misfortunes. The Beauty was vexed. "I am very sorry for you all," she wrote; "but it is of no use telling me these things. It only makes me unhappy, and I did not at all like my husband knowing that my people were obliged to go into lodgings, and my sister to teach the children of an obscure doctor. Now, I have a good bit of news for you: Robert (Robert was the elder brother, who was stationed within a few miles of the Beauty) seemed quite touched with the account of the family troubles, and is going to write by this mail, making over the interest of the thousand pounds left him by grandpapa to you until better days shall dawn. This is very generous of him, though of course he is well off, and can afford it. I wish I could have done the same, but have too many things to buy, for in this place one is obliged to dress so much, and my husband is so absurd, and never understands this. I hope you will get one, and soon get into a house again. We may be in England again next year, for this climate does not agree with me at all. I wish you were here, Dorothy; you would soon get off. You will believe this when I tell you that a girl who came out in the same steamer as ourselves, not at all pretty, and with very provincial manners, has already had four offers of marriage. This will show you what an excellent hunting-ground there is here, and how different is the conduct of the men from the indifference which they sometimes exhibit in England."

CHAPTER XXXV.—CHANGES.

She was sitting talking with George Blakesley about the old house at Hampstead.

"My friend wants to let it," he said, "and wants hardly any rent for it, merely a nominal one, so that his house is taken care of, and the garden—he likes your garden, Dorothy—is left undisturbed. It will be the best thing you can do to take it. I will manage the getting it entirely for you." She almost trembled with emotion. The happiness of going back into the old house seemed too great a one to bear.

"But we have no furniture now," she said.

"I know; I thought of that," he answered. "But I have given up the actuary business, and think of going abroad for two or three years."

"Two or three years?"

"Five or six perhaps. I want change, and rest and time to work." There was such a weary tone in his voice, it made Dorothy's heart ache, and yet her lips were tied, and he did not notice how pale she had grown when he told her of his intention to go away, and never even guessed how much he was unconsciously throwing from him. "I am going away," he continued, "and I thought that perhaps you would not mind taking charge of my furniture. It could be moved in immediately, if you wouldn't mind this. It would save me the trouble and expense of warehousing it, and be really a kindness;" and he looked as if he were asking a favour at her hands. She understood him though, and her eyes filled with tears. "It would make me so happy if you would, Dorothy," he added, in his quiet pleading voice.

She understood him, and answered, simply, "Very well, Mr. Blakesley," and so it was arranged.

Then an idea occurred to him.

"Suppose," he said, "we kept this little affair to ourselves, and got the house ready, and then pretended to take them out one fine afternoon, and drove them back to the old house."

She clapped her hands with glee.

"Oh yes!" she exclaimed. "Oh yes! only let's tell Tom!" So Tom was told, and made joyful demonstrations thereupon.

"He is a regular brick," he said to Dorothy, when they were alone. "Can't think what he sees in us to be so good. Why, he's the sort of fellow who does things not merely because it pleases him, but because he thinks he ought to be good to his fellow-creatures." The colour went slowly out of Dorothy's face, and then came rushing back.

"Tom," she said, "do you think that is why he has done this? If so, I would a thousand times rather ——"

"No, don't be a donkey," said Tom. "But he is an awfully good fellow. Why, last year, Doll, I got into no end of a mess about that beast of a boat, and was awfully in debt, and at last I told Blakesley, and asked him to lend me some tin, and he wouldn't."

"Well?" asked Dorothy, not seeing that this story was redounding to the honour and glory of the once interloping Blakesley.

"He said it would ruin me if I began borrowing money; it ruined almost every fellow who tried it on; and so he wouldn't, unless he found I absolutely couldn't pull through without; then he investigated everything, and bullied me well, and helped me, and got me all straight again, and went down to the office, and made them keep me on. Blakesley's an awful brick, I mean to say, and I shall be as glad as possible to see his old spider-leg chairs and crockery about the place."

"Yes," she said; "but if he only does it ——"

"Now look here, Doll, I think you ought to know him well enough to leave his motives alone, and trust to their being all right. I do, at any rate. Besides, think how the old folks will kick with delight at going back to the old place; you have no business to do them out of that pleasure, just because you have taken an idiotic notion into your head."

"No," she said, after a pause, "you are right, I haven't." And so the matter was settled; but Dorothy was not happy about it. The fact is, Dorothy was not happy at all; the long strain on her energies had tired her, and her face was getting worn and thin. George Blakesley noticed the difference.

"You want rest," he said; "rest, and quiet, and freedom from care, and I think you work too hard."

"Oh no," she said; "I shall be well again soon."

"You must try," he said, cheerily, "and now I want to tell you something. I go out of my house to-morrow, so you can have the things moved in. My servants will help you, and Tom says he means to work hard at it, because, of course, you have your teaching to do in the day. Then when all is ready you can give every one a surprise; and, Dorothy, make your father and mother understand that they are really doing me a kindness in taking charge of the things. And I don't think I shall be round again, for I am going down to Oxford to visit some old friends in the morning, and I shall not be back till the day before I start for America."

"Not be back! Shan't we see you again, then?"

Her face was blanched with a sudden fear, and her heart stood still with a faint sick feeling.

"In a year or two."

"Yes, but come and see us before you go," she pleaded.

"No," he answered, so coldly that she felt her pride coming to the rescue, and could not ask again. "I shall have so little time, and must say good-bye to my aunts. I wish you would go and see them sometimes," he added, as if asking a favour at her hands.

"Yes," she answered, "I will."

"I shall come and see you all as soon as I come back, from America I mean. I am only going for a few years, you know. I shall find you all in the old house, I hope;" he said this when he was taking a final leave; "or, at least, most of you. Perhaps you will be married.

"I! no, never."

"Ah! that is what they all say," he answered, with a wintry sort of smile. "But I hope you do not mean it, more than the rest. I should like to see you happy, Dorothy."

She understood him now. He wanted her to understand that he no longer took an interest in her.

"Thank you," she answered, almost haughtily; "I will let you know when the event is likely to take place." (To be continued.)

THE GOSPEL ACCORDING TO ST. LUKE.—III.

BY THE RIGHT REV. THE LORD BISHOP OF GLOUCESTER AND BRISTOL.

WE may here not unfitly add a few remarks on the parables peculiarly recorded in this Gospel, as they admirably illustrate those characteristics of St. Luke's Gospel which we have already observed; that large-heartedness, tenderness, compassion, and broad spirit of pity and loving-kindness, with which the whole narrative seems pervaded and animated. Let us briefly run through the list of the parables which are peculiar to the Gospel we are now considering. These appear to be eleven in number: the Two Debtors (vii. 41), the Good Samaritan (x. 30), the Friend at Night (xi. 5), the Rich Fool (xii. 15), the Barren Fig-tree (xiii. 6), the Lost Coin (xv. 8), the Prodigal Son (xi. 11), the Unjust Steward (xvi. 1), the Rich Man and Lazarus (xvi. 19), the Widow and the Judge (xviii. 1), and the parable of the Pounds (xix. 11), to which I have recently alluded, and which it seems reasonable to consider as different from the parable of the Talents in St. Matthew. The mere enumeration illustrates the first comment—that the general subject and character of these parables is in completest harmony with that pervading tone of love and mercy to all men, which we have seemed so specially to recognise in this comprehensive Gospel. We may add, too, the remark, that several, if not the majority of them, obviously wear that same historical character which we might naturally have been led to expect in the inspired record of St. Luke. While in St. Matthew the parables are rather of a more definitely Oriental cast, and refer more commonly to the nature, extent, and diffusion of the kingdom of God, the parables of St. Luke are more of a historical character, and refer more to the life of the soul, and to the spiritual necessities of the individual member of the heavenly family. So distinctly, indeed, is this character marked, that in the case of one of the above list of parables, that of the Rich Man and Lazarus, it has often been debated whether we ought not rather to consider the narrative as belonging rather to the province of actual history than of mere shadow and similitude.

More need scarcely be said on the general character of these parables. We may pause, however, to add a few remarks on the way in which they are introduced into the sacred narrative, and may thus carry out that hint afforded us by the parable of the Pounds, which has, in fact, led to the present digression. In the case of that parable, we have just observed, that its introduction was accounted for by definite historical facts—our Lord's nearness to Jerusalem, and the mistaken notions about His kingdom which were now prevailing among those who heard him. The connection, in fact, between the parable and the history is close and immediate. Is this, however, merely exceptional or accidental, or is it a principle which apparently prevails throughout the third Gospel? Such a connection is certainly what we might have been led to expect in the record of the historian-evangelist; can it, however, be substantiated by examples? Let us briefly test this in the case of the other parables. If we take, for example, the eleven parables which have been recently specified, we may certainly observe this connection in the case of at least nine of the number. The parable of the Two Debtors, for instance, stands in immediate connection with the narrative of the Woman who was a sinner; that of the Good Samaritan is the answer to the question—"Who is my neighbour?" that of the Friend at Night illustrates the subject with which the chapter opens—the subject of prayer; the parable of the Rich Fool stands in closest connection with the worldly-minded request of him who would fain have had our Lord take the part of a judge and divider of earthly goods; the parable of the Barren Fig-tree forms the sequel to the subject of God's judgments, as alluded to in the case of the Galilæans, and the fall of the tower in Siloam; the Lost Coin forms a practical rebuke to the murmuring of the Scribes and Pharisees at our Lord's eating with publicans and sinners; the Prodigal Son continues and concludes the same subject; the Rich Man and Lazarus is the answer to the Scribes and Pharisees, whose covetous spirit had led them to gainsay and deride; the parable of the Pounds, as we have already observed, was to repress ill-founded expectations. The only two exceptions to this connection of the parable with the history occur in the cases of the parables of the Unjust Steward, and, perhaps, of the Widow and the Unjust Judge, though in this latter case it may be observed that the words with which the end and object of the parable is specified, and the precise terms in which it is applied, seem certainly to hint at some connection between the foregoing prophecy of the Lord's coming and the exhortation which follows. If prayer is to be a permitted instrument in hastening that coming, great indeed is its necessity, paramount indeed the duty of the elect to faint not, and to pray alway for the advent of their avenging Lord.

One further subject demands our consideration, and our survey of the general characteristics of St. Luke's Gospel may be concluded. This subject, though really first in point of importance, I have reserved to the last, as serving to illustrate several of our foregoing comments, and as standing in some degree of connection with the present aspect in which we are considering our evangelist as "the beloved physician." This concluding subject is the portraiture of our Lord, as presented us by the writer of the third Gospel. Here, indeed, all the characteristics of St. Luke, that we have previously noticed, appear combined in the most perfect and harmonious unity. The large-hearted Gentile proselyte, the reflecting historian, the thoughtful observer, pass and repass before us in the inspired delineation of our Master's earthly life. He appears to us, not so much the Jewish Messiah, not so much the wonder-working Son of God, not so much the Word made flesh, as the Redeemer of our lost race, the Saviour of the world, the God-man, who had come to heal that which was wounded, and to find that which was lost. We may illustrate this, both negatively and positively. On the negative side, we may observe certain omissions, which, in the general and comprehensive Gospel of the historian-evangelist, it does not seem wholly precarious to refer, if not to studied design, yet, at any rate, to a mode of contemplating our Lord's life and works so true to itself and so consistent, that what seemed imperfectly to accord with it passed unconsciously out of view. One of these general classes of omissions is the prevailing absence of reference to Messianic prophecies having any limited or Judaical reference; and another, the general and prevailing silence on our Lord's special relations to the polity of Israel in events where the other sacred writers seem to give them emphasis and prominence. The isolated instance in which our Lord in this Gospel does refer to Messianic prophecy in its Jewish relations seems to evince the truth of this first remark; the omissions in the narrative of our Lord's triumphal entry may be urged in illustration of the second. In the case, for example, where our Lord refers to this form of Messianic prophecy, it is in fact to show how incompatible with the actual truth is every narrow and national application: "And He said unto them, How say they that Christ is David's son?" Again, in the case of the triumphal entry, while both in St. Matthew and St. Mark we read of the royal name of David mixed up with the acclamations of the multitude, and while in St. John we have alike Messianic prophecy and reference to the Lord as King of Israel, in our present evangelist we have only the inclusive title—"the King that cometh in the name of the Lord;" to which, it may be parenthetically observed, is an addition, which still more clearly seems to set forth the significance of the omission, even this remarkable addition, which we alone find specified by St. Luke, as heard from the lips of the clustering multitudes, "Peace in heaven and glory in the highest!" What, in but little changed words, had been heard sung by the tongues of angels on the slopes of Bethlehem, is now heard on the Mount of Olives. Angels and men alike imply the universality of the reign of the coming King.

If, however, St. Luke's special portraiture of our Lord is thus apparently recognisable in its negative characteristics, most surely is it to be seen in vivid clearness in its positive features. The words of the prophecy of Isaiah, which this evangelist alone gives in all their fulness, supply the key-note to the whole: "All flesh shall see the salvation of God." To all has Jesus come as the Saviour and as the Redeemer, the Healer of the sick, the Freer from the powers of darkness, the Son of Adam both in descent and in sympathy, though the Son of God in essence, majesty, and power. "He hath sent me," said the Lord Himself by the mouth of His prophet, "to heal the broken-hearted, to preach deliverance to the captives, and recovering of sight to the blind, to set at liberty them that are bruised, to preach the acceptable year of the Lord." Some of the illustrations of this have been already incidentally referred to under other heads; as, for example, the tenderness shown to the widow of Nain, the forgiveness extended to the woman that was a sinner, the mercy vouchsafed to the dying malefactor, and, generally, the repeated notices of the all-inclusive love, which showed itself in healings, not of the few, but of the many; not of isolated cases, but of all.

In reference to this portraiture of our blessed Lord, we must certainly call attention to one class of miraculous healings which seem somewhat studiously dwelt upon by St. Luke, as serving to set forth our Lord as the Friend of man in its truest aspects—his Saviour from the power and tyranny of darkness. All the synoptical evangelists specify these cases of the healing of demoniacs, and St. Mark perhaps in some instances more graphically than St. Luke. There seems, however, a recognisable difference in the drift of the narratives of the two evangelists. In St. Mark the recital of this class of miracles appears to involve a different design—the design of setting forth the wonder-working Son of God, while in our present evangelist the studious mention of these manifestations of divine power seem rather designed to set forth our Redeemer's loving-kindness and mercy, especially as vouchsafed in His rescue of suffering man from the thraldom of the spirits of evil. The mention of this form of divine mercy is at any rate frequent and persistent. Not only have we all the more notorious cases which are mentioned by the other evangelists, such as of the demoniac and the synagogue at Capernaum (iv. 33), of the Gerasene demoniac (viii. 26), and of the hapless boy who was healed when our Lord was returning from the Mount of Transfiguration (ix. 37)—not only have we very clear and explicit accounts of these, not only have we all those references which are also found in one or the other of the remaining evangelists, but still further we meet with various allusions to this particular exercise of saving power which are peculiar to this present Gospel. It is in St. Luke alone that it is noticed that this form of healing was performed in the presence of the two messengers of the Baptist (viii. 21); it is St. Luke alone who tells us that the women who were permitted to minister to our Lord and accompany Him in His circuits through Galilee, were healed not only of general infirmities but of evil spirits (viii. 2); it is in St. Luke alone that the power entrusted to the apostles over these enemies of the kingdom of our Lord is defined in the comprehensive terms as over "all devils" (ix. 1). It is only in St. Luke that we read of the holy joy with which the returned disciples declared unto their Lord how even the devils were subject to them in His name (x. 17); and it is there, too, alone that we read that mystical assurance of the victory of the kingdom of light conveyed in the declaration that He who had sent forth His followers had Himself seen their success in the lightning-like fall of Satan from heaven (x. 18). More instances might perhaps be found; we might perhaps even with justice allude to the suggestive fact that in one case—namely, that of the woman bowed by a spirit of infirmity (xiii. 11), and perhaps in another, the restoration of St. Peter's mother-in-law—the physician-evangelist recognised the direct working of Satan, even in cases which, especially to one educated as he had been, might have been deemed only the ordinary manifestations of sickness and disease.

There is yet one more point which it is necessary to specify in St. Luke's portraiture of our Lord, and it is this—the frequent mention he makes of His prayers to His heavenly Father. Perhaps it is thus that the evangelist would convey to us what St. John reveals to us by our Lord's own solemn declaration—the essential unity between the eternal Son and the eternal Father. Prayer in the aspects of the third evangelist may have been the outward symbol and token that the Father and the Son were one, the hours of return as it were, to the glories which He had from everlasting, the holy departures for a season from the darkness of this world to the glories of that inaccessible light. Be this, however, as it may, the fact itself—the frequent mention of our Lord's prayers—cannot but be regarded as an important peculiarity in St. Luke's portraiture of our Lord, and as one that occurs too often to be considered a historical notice without special significance and design. A few examples will not be out of place. At the baptism in the Jordan our evangelist reminds us that his Master was then praying (iii. 21); it is he who tells us that his Lord's wont was "to retire to the deserts and pray." It is he again who specifies that before the choice of the twelve apostles "He went out in a mountain to pray, and continued all night in prayer to God." It was after "He had been alone praying" (ix. 18) that He put the question to His disciples, which St. Peter answered with the affirmation that He was the Christ of God; it was when in prayer, as our evangelist tells us, that He exhibited to His amazed apostles the glories of Transfiguration (ix. 28); it was as He was "praying in a certain place" (xi. 1) that His disciples besought Him to teach them to enter into this communion with the Father of Spirits, and, according to our evangelist, it was at that time that He taught them that blessed form of prayer whereby we, too, say, "Abba, Father." Lastly, out of the seven sayings on the cross, the only one that can be described as a definite utterance of prayer, "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do" (xxiii. 34), is found only in the narrative of St. Luke, even as it is there also alone that the last words of prayerful resignation, those words that tell of the holy and everlasting unity of the Father and Son, are specially and solemnly recorded—"Father, into Thy hands I commend My spirit: and having said this He gave up the ghost."

Such is a general survey of the characteristics of the third Gospel. Much more might be added, but if this and the foregoing articles help to induce our younger readers (for whom these pages have mainly been written) to search for themselves the Holy Scriptures, to mark as well as to read, and to strive more and more to realise and to love the Book of Life, enough will have been done. The comments on this one Gospel may perhaps lead some of our readers to apply the general principles of simple criticism which we have here followed to the remaining Gospels. Such efforts will be alike instructive and edifying. They will more and more make them feel as well as see the truth, and realise that "these things were written that we might believe that Jesus is the Son of God, and that, believing, we might have life in His name."

SCRIPTURE LESSONS FOR SCHOOL AND HOME.

SCRIPTURE STORIES. Second Series. No. 6. A Sea Side Talk.

Chapter to be read—Matthew xiii. (part of)

INTRODUCTION. Ask where Christ spent most of His time? Why in Galilee and not Judea? Why would His own people not receive Him? for what sort of a king were they looking? Was Christ a temporal king? From what does He deliver us? Who alone can forgive sins? What did He do to show that He was God? But was He always working miracles? No; used to talk to them about His spiritual kingdom, and what they must do to attain to it. Had been preaching a good deal in Galilee. At whose house did He often stay? What was Simon Peter? Going to read to-day of a conversation by the sea.

I. The Parable. (Read xiii. 1—9.) Try and picture the scene to the children—a hot day, bright sky overhead; the lake of Galilee cool and calm, surrounded by mountains; Christ comes out of the house, finds multitudes gathering around Him, first tries sitting on the shore; crowd too great; cannot talk comfortably; gets into Peter's boat (Luke v. 3.), has little anchor let out to keep it steady; sits down in the end of the boat and begins to talk. Picture the crowd on the shore standing or sitting about in groups—little children running about; boys throwing stones into the water, perhaps spelling out Peter's name on the stern of the boat. Now suddenly a sower comes in sight on the hill-side opposite. Christ points him out—"Look, look, a sower," &c. In how many different kinds of places did the seed fall? Yes; and in three produced no fruit, in one produced some fruit of three different degrees. (a) The first. Two accidents to this: either trodden down or picked up; anyhow, did not sink in at all, made no impression on the ground. (b) The second. Where did it fall next? Just in a little soil on the top of a rock; very little depth; could not go far; soon sprung up, but as soon withered; roots no depth, no moisture to keep alive; soon scorched under the sun. (c) The third. This the first time a plant actually formed; but what grew up with it? What effect did the thorns have? therefore no fruit to perfection. (d) The fourth. Same seed, sown by same man now produced fruit. Why? Where was it sown? What makes the ground good? Must have had previous careful preparation; weeds removed, soil cared for; here produces fruit, some more, some less, but all some.

II. The Explanation. (Read 18—23.) First explain what a parable is—a story or picture of what goes on in earth to teach some lesson about Christ's kingdom—this parable about the Word of the kingdom, i.e., about the word of God. How does God's word come to us? By voice of spirit speaking to conscience; by voice of Bible read by or taught to us; by voice of ministers telling us about God. What is the ground? Speaks not only to ear but to heart: let us see with what success. (a) First class—trodden down or picked away. Who comes and takes it away? Yes, but Satan can be resisted. If he takes it away it is because we let it go; because we hear it, but don't heed it; because we let other thoughts or words drive it away. This especially case with young—are careless, heedless, thoughtless, often hear, but without profit; how often has this been the case with all? must always ask for hearing ear and attentive heart, or will lose all good. (b) Second class—stony ground. At first seems more hopeful; seed has sunk in; who are represented here? hear with joy: all sounds so delightful—singing hymns, hearing of heaven, pleasures of religion; all so nice, they determine will indeed serve God. But no root; trusting to good resolutions instead of God's help; then comes persecution, perhaps laughed at, called a saint; person begins to leave off reading the Bible, praying so much; drops religious habits of church-going, &c., gets tired, or is laughed out of it—no fruit. (c) Third class—among thorns. A little advance here; plant formed; fruit looked for; why fail? because other things, foul weeds allowed to grow up with it, should have been pulled up. What are these? love of pleasure, excessive cares, love of money, &c. Remind how Christ requires whole heart; his disciples must, like Abraham, be ready to give up a child; or the young man to give up money; or St. Paul, friends; all that comes between us and Christ, or will bring forth no fruit. Solemn question to be often put: "Is anything keeping me back from Christ?" any secret sin, any bad companion, any too exciting pleasure, if it cast any shade over profession, must be abandoned. (d) Fourth class—good ground, i.e., well-prepared. How can heart be prepared to receive seed? sin must be put away, bad habits left off, God's Holy Spirit prayed for to make heart tender, ready to receive impressions—that so seed may spring up and bear fruit. What is this fruit? See Gal. v. 22, knowing God and His love in salvation of world will produce love to Him, joy, at the glad tidings—peace in the heart because sins forgiven—gentleness towards others, meekness in our character—patience under trial, &c. Should also aim to increase these fruits, 30 become 60, 60 become 100—aim at highest standard will thus fulfil design of sower, and make soul meet for eternal glory.

Questions to be answered.

1. What is a parable? Where was the parable of the sower spoken?
2. Describe the scene of the story.
3. Name the kinds of soil.
4. Explain what is meant by the sower and what by the seed.
5. Explain the four classes of hearers.
6. What are the fruits intended?

STILL AND DEEP.

BY F. M. F. SKENE, AUTHOR OF "TRIED," "ONE LIFE ONLY," ETC.

CHAPTER XXXVII.

THE promise made by John Pemberton to Mary Trevelyan seemed to lift a mountain-load from her anxious heart. During the long hours which she spent by day at the sick-bed of the sufferers, she was ever listening for the sound of his step, coming to tell her he had found her Bertrand; and through the dark night, when she took her turn to watch with Marthe—a stout elderly woman, who seemed to have not a care in the world—Mary was always glancing out eagerly for the tokens of the dawn, in the hope that the new morning would bring her tidings of him. But night followed night, and day succeeded day, and she seemed no nearer to a termination of her cruel anxiety than she had been at the first.

This much Pemberton ascertained—that Bertrand had certainly been in Paris, and that, in spite of his disabled arm, he had gone to take part in the defence of one of the forts; but beyond that point all trace of him was lost. With some difficulty John Pemberton succeeded in ascertaining that he was no longer in any part of the fortifications; but no one could give him any tidings whatever of his fate. His own private opinion was, that he had fallen, like so many other brave men in those fatal days, and been flung, along with hundreds of others, into some of the deep trenches which were dug as burial-places for the countless dead; but when he cautiously and tenderly hinted this opinion to Mary, she calmly said that she knew certainly it was not so. She might never be permitted to see him any more in this world; but she felt assured that his spirit had not passed from the realms of sense, or hers would have been cognisant of its departure.

John Pemberton deferred to her opinion, in so far as to continue his search for the missing man, but he quite despaired of success. In fact, he began to feel very desponding at the state of matters altogether, for the siege had by this time been many weeks protracted, the bitter frost of that terrible winter had already set in, and the scarcity of provisions was becoming so great that even the most large-hearted charity could not ensure the poorer classes from an absolute famine. The young man, whose whole heart was given up to the desire of proving to his Divine Master that now, at least, he was true to Him, worked with an energy which, to those who witnessed it, seemed quite superhuman. He no longer restricted himself to the task of conveying food to the starving people, but toiled to relieve the suffering all around him, in whatever shape he met it. He grew thin and gaunt, and his eyes seemed to become larger and blacker, in contrast with his haggard face; but still he never rested, or relaxed his efforts, till those who saw him marvelled what could be the secret of his strength.

Many a sickly fancy tormented Mary, in her uncertainty as to Bertrand's fate; and sometimes she would imagine that while she was wearing out her life in anxiety for him it was possible that he might be perfectly safe and happy in England, with Lurline for his wife, as there had been some few cases of escape from Paris, in disguise and otherwise; and it seemed to her that if he were still in the beleaguered city Pemberton must have found him. If he had escaped, it was to Laura, surely, that he would go;

(Drawn by WILLIAM SMALL.)

"'They call me Pierron,' said the little waif, as he ran along by her side."—p. 625.

and in spite of all that Charlie Davenant had told her, it was utterly impossible for Mary to believe that any one could be false to that dear Bertrand, for whom she would gladly have given her life. When she mentioned this idea as to Bertrand's escape to John Pemberton, he told her at once he felt convinced it was impossible, and he still adhered to the impression that there was a darker solution to the problem than she could be induced to admit.

However, there came a day when the question, so far as Laura Wyndham was concerned, was thoroughly set at rest. One evening, when Mary had gone to the Brunots', with the portion of her own scanty meals which she often saved for the hungry children, she was met by little Valerie in an unwonted state of excitement, which had quite roused the child out of her usual sedate womanliness. She had been watching from the window for Mary's arrival, and came flying down the stairs to meet her.

"Oh, Miss Trevelyan," she exclaimed, "if you had not come soon I should have gone to the hospital to you all by myself, for there has been such a wonderful thing. A letter has come for you from England, and the commissionnaire who brought it said it came in a balloon; do you really believe it? Did the letter come flying through the air?"

"I think very likely it did, Valerie; letters come only by balloons or carrier pigeons now; but where is it? Let me have it, dear; it makes me anxious to hear there is a letter;" and the little girl felt that the hand she held was trembling.

"It is here," she said, drawing her into the little salon; "I hope it will be a happy letter."

It was a small thin envelope, such as alone was allowed to be conveyed by balloon, and it had been laid in state on the table while the children stood round, gazing on it as if it were something strange and wonderful; Mary saw at a glance that the handwriting was not that of Bertrand Lisle, and at once she grew calm and almost indifferent; but when she had opened it there fell out from it another note, enclosed in her own, which bore the name that always was in her heart and thoughts, and she saw that both were from Lurline. When she opened her own note, which was written on a half sheet of paper only, to meet the requirements of the balloon post as to weight, her eye caught sight of the signature, and she started uncontrollably, for the name, written in the Lorelei's strong decided characters, was, "Laura Brant." The note dropped from her hand. "Married, actually married!" thought Mary; "false to Bertrand! can it be possible? Oh, how will he bear it, my poor Bertrand!" All her thought was for him, and, gentle as she was, her indignation against Lurline was so great, that she could scarce bring herself to touch the letter which announced her faithlessness; when she did at last take it up and read it, she found it written as if the Lorelei was quite unconscious of there being anything objectionable in her conduct. She began by saying that she was sure her dearest Mary would be pleased to hear that a very great change had taken place in her fate, and that she was most happily married, and just about to start for Italy with her husband; and she was anxious that dear Bertrand Lisle, for whom she would always feel a sisterly regard, should hear the fact from herself. Of course, she said, he must have known that in giving up his appointment, and becoming a poor soldier in France, he was abandoning all chance of marriage with her, and she had no doubt some reason to complain of his conduct; but she would not reproach him, oh no, she felt too much affection for him, and for that reason she was specially desirous he should receive the letter she enclosed, in which she assured him she should always love him as a brother, and that her husband was quite prepared to receive him as such whenever he liked to visit them in their Italian home. She knew Bertrand was in Paris, she added, for he had written to her from thence a letter which she had not yet answered, and doubtless Mary must be in communication with him; she therefore entrusted her letter to her, and begged her, without fail, to transmit it to him. So ended the letter of Mr. Brant's newly-married wife; and it was long before Mary could almost realise that it was possible her Bertrand could have been so betrayed, and truly, were it not, as we have said before, that the character and history of Laura Wyndham are real and not fictitious, it might be hard to believe that any woman could be so heartless.

The next time that Mary saw John Pemberton, after she received the letter, she silently placed that written to herself in his hand; he read it slowly through, with a grave face.

"I am not surprised," he said, sadly; "poor Lurline! the day will come when she will have a terrible awakening." He sat silent for a few minutes; then he said, "Miss Trevelyan, you may have the opportunity of seeing Laura again, which I shall never have, and therefore I want to bespeak your charity for her. She is not all evil, be very sure—none of God's creatures are; her nature has been warped and perverted, but there are good qualities, I feel sure, under all that crust of worldliness and selfishness, and I should like you to know," he continued, softly, "that I pray for her continually, night and day, ever beseeching that she may be brought back to God, to light and truth, by any means; and I do not doubt the merciful Father will one day grant me my petition, though in this world I may never know it, only I fear it will need some sharp discipline of sorrow to break down the barriers she has erected between herself and the blessed heaven, and if ever you can aid her in the time of her tribulation, and can help her to come out of it with her robes washed white and clean in the fountain opened for all sin, I beseech you then to take pity on her, and do all you can to bring her home to our dear Lord."

"Oh, that I will!" said Mary, fervently, "if ever it is in my power; but you are far more competent for such a task than I am, and you may be able to go to her with the authority of a minister of God. Why do you think of using so weak an instrument as myself, when you could do so much more for her?"

"Because I shall never have the opportunity," he said, quietly; "I shall never be a minister of God, in the sense you mean, nor shall I ever see Laura again."

"How can you know that?" said Mary, wonderingly.

"That I cannot tell you," he answered; "but you will find that I am right." She asked no further question, with her usual quietness, but presently she said, in a low voice, "I suppose, if I ever have the opportunity, I am bound to give Bertrand the letter Laura has enclosed to me for him?"

"There can be no doubt of that, surely," said Pemberton, surprised.

"But it will be such a cruel shock to him, and one he could never have anticipated."

"Still, it is better he should know the truth at once, and it is impossible not to feel—considering what Lurline is—that he has had a most fortunate escape."

"I am afraid it will darken all his life," said Mary.

A smile passed over Pemberton's lips.

"I think, on the contrary, that it will open the way for him to far purer and more lasting joy than he could ever have known with Lurline. I know, Miss Trevelyan, that, to one of your character, it seems impossible that the heart can ever change its allegiance, but I think, in Mr. Lisle's case, it was a sort of spell which Lurline threw over him, a passing frenzy which seized him, rather than a true deep-seated affection, and it will vanish as speedily as it came, when he hears that even while engaged to himself, she has become the wife of another man. I only wish I could see any prospect of being able to tell him the news."

"You have still no clue to him then," said Mary, wistfully.

"Alas, none!" he answered; "but I do not give up the search, Miss Trevelyan, nor will I to the end."

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

It was now the month of December; and those who remember what the weather of that period of 1870 was in England, may form some idea of the additional suffering caused by the intense cold in Paris, where both food and fuel were almost beyond the reach of all but the most wealthy, and still the siege went on, with all its horrors, and the state of matters generally was enough to make even the bravest hearts quail and lose their courage.

It was about six o'clock, on one of those bitter evenings of hard frost, when the stars were glittering in the steel-blue sky, and the glare of the incessant firing lit up the frozen snow on every housetop. Mary Trevelyan was seated at one end of a long wooden shed, which had been erected in the garden of the hospital for the accommodation of the wounded, and which was filled with a long row of beds, each one of which contained a suffering tenant. She had been dressing the wounds of an old soldier, whose foot had been carried off by a cannon-ball, and, soothed by her tender handling, he had dropped off to sleep, with his rough fingers holding tight by a fold of her dress, so that she was afraid to move for fear of disturbing him. She had become absorbed in her own thoughts, when she was aroused by a disturbance of some kind, which seemed to be going on at the entrance to the shed. Looking up she saw Marthe, with her long black veil thrown back, and her arms stretching out of her wide sleeves, engaged in what seemed to be a pitched battle with one of the little street Arabs, who were amongst the most active of the population in fomenting excitement during that disastrous time in Paris. The stout old woman was trying to prevent his entrance, which she had summarily concluded must be for some nefarious purpose, and he was obstinately determined to make his way past her; as Mary rose and came towards the combatants, knowing that poor Marthe's sharp temper was apt to beguile her into actions which she afterwards deeply repented, the keen black eyes of the little boy caught sight of her, and he exclaimed, with a triumphant shout, "There she is, the English lady; I know her; I have seen her with my Englishman in the streets, and I will go to her, I have something to give her!"

"Pray let him pass, Marthe," said Mary, eagerly, "he may have a message for me;" and at her request the woman reluctantly withdrew the strong arms with which she was barricading the boy's entrance, and let him pass. He flew up to Mary, and gave her a piece of paper, which seemed to be a leaf torn out of a note-book, and she saw these words written on it in pencil—

> Come at once to the Church of the Trinity, Bertrand Lisle lies there very ill. Take my little messenger with you to show you the way; he is an ally of mine, and can be trusted.—In haste.
>
> JOHN PEMBERTON.

For a moment Mary's long-tried strength almost gave way, under the sudden revulsion from the feeling, akin to despair, with which she had begun to think of Bertrand's fate, to the certainty that in another half hour she should see him. She staggered, and would have fallen, had not kind Marthe caught her. "There!" said the voluble Frenchwoman, as she held some water to her lips, "did I not tell you, Mademoiselle Marie, that you would wear yourself out completely? Now, you must go to bed, and stay there till morning, and I will attend to your patients for the night."

But Mary was making a great effort to control her weakness, and soon she raised herself from the supporting arm of the kind woman. "Dear Marthe," she said, "I shall indeed be grateful to you if you will do what is required for my patients to-night; but not that I may sleep—I am going out: the friend I have lost so long is found."

"You are no more fit to go out than your old soldier there, who has only one foot left, and that one damaged; wait till the morning, my child."

"Wait, after all these weary months!" exclaimed Mary. "Oh, my dear friend, you do not know what you are asking!" and she rose at once to her feet, and, after looking in her pocket-book, to be sure that she had Laura's letter with her, she went out, followed by the boy.

"They call me Pierron," said the waif, as he ran along by her side; "and I can tell you, Mademoiselle, that I should have been Pierron dead and buried long ago but for my good Englishman with the hard name which I cannot say. My mother died last year, and my father was shot on the ramparts, and I have no one; but this kind man has fed me every day, and I follow him wherever he goes. I shall never leave him."

"You must try and be of use to him, then, Pierron, for he works very hard."

"Ah, he does indeed! but am I not of use? Did I not run all the way to Notre Dame de Pitié with the note? am I not conducting you to him?"

"Mr. Pemberton is in the church ambulance, then?"

"Yes, surely; it is crammed with sick people, and wounded, some dead, some dying, all heaped together: it is a spectacle! I jumped over two or three dead men to come to you."

Pierron was a specimen of what the little Parisian boy of the streets became in those dark days—utterly indifferent to the sight of pain and death, and heartily enjoying the excitement. Mary tried to rouse him to some gentler thoughts as they walked along, but in vain; he persisted in entertaining her with an account of the terrible sights he had seen, till they reached the door of the great church which had been converted into a hospital, and which, at this day, bears an inscription on one of its pillars commemorating the fact.

It was indeed a strange scene which presented itself to Mary Trevelyan as she walked in through the principal door. The church was large and lofty, and the ceiling was richly painted with figures of saints and angels, which looked down with their serene beauty on the terrible spectacle below. The chancel, and the space immediately in front of it, had been left untouched; all was confusion and pain: the chairs and wooden barriers had been removed, and the stone pavement was strewn from end to end with rude couches made of straw, having pieces of old sacking for coverlets, on which men, young and old, in every stage of physical suffering, were laid, while surgeons moved about from one to another, and a few kind ladies flitted to and fro doing what little they could amid an amount of misery which baffled human help, and administering to such as could take it small quantities of soup, made from ingredients of which it was best not to inquire the nature. And, through the misty air that overhung it all, there went a low murmur, the many mingling voices of weariness and pain, which made the whole place seem like one of the visions in Dante's terrible description of the realms of woe beyond the grave.

Where, amid these hundreds of prostrate forms, was Bertrand Lisle? Pierron had darted away from Mary's side so soon as they entered the church, and was already plucking at the sleeve of a tall man who was bending over one of the miserable couches in a corner of the vast church. At the peremptory summons of the quick-witted little boy, John Pemberton turned round and saw Mary Trevelyan standing motionless under the lamp which overhung the doorway, her dark eyes luminous in its light, and her pale young face seeming in its sweetness and purity almost like that of a pitying angel come to bring comfort and succour to the dying. He could not help watching her for a moment in her stillness and patience—her little hands clasped close on her breast, her dark mantle flung back from her shoulders, and her long grey dress falling in statuesque folds round her to the ground; and he remembered how Lurline used to call her a block of marble. "How little she could understand her," he thought, "and how miserably Bertrand has failed to appreciate her. There is the imperishable love of a most noble heart beneath that calm exterior, and happy had it been for her if it had been altogether fixed on imperishable treasures; but she is a true and blessed child of God, and He will protect His own, even if she have to pass through a fiery furnace of affliction." He was advancing to her as he said this to himself, and in a moment she had seen him and was at his side, breathing quick, in her silent agitation. "Yes, he is here," he said, answering her unspoken question; "but come aside with me one moment, much as I know you long to go to him, that I may describe his state to you before you see him."

He drew her into the shadow of a pillar, and she leant against it to support herself while he spoke to her.

"I found him here," he said, "where apparently he has been for some time, but unfortunately my duties never led me to the spot until this evening. He has been suffering from violent intermittent fever, like many others who have been exposed on the ramparts; now raving in delirium, now completely exhausted and unable to speak; he was conscious, but very feverish, when I first found him this afternoon, and he knew me at once. Instantly, before I had time almost to say a word to him, he overwhelmed me with a series of anxious questions about Laura. He was certain I could give him tidings of her, he said, and you may think how strange it seemed to me to notice the jealousy of myself in his look and tone as he spoke. I asked him what it was he wished to know, hoping to find he was in a measure prepared for her faithlessness, but it proved to be quite otherwise. It seems he is so impressed with the belief of her love for him, that he has been tormenting himself by fears that she is broken-hearted for his sake, pining away, dying perhaps; and when I began by telling him such was not the case, I saw that he did not trust me to tell him the truth, knowing how I myself had loved her formerly. Then I told him him there was a letter waiting for him, from Laura herself."

"You did not tell him it was in my hands, I hope!" said Mary, anxiously.

"No, I did not mention your name, for I could not tell what your wishes might be in so delicate a matter. I told him a friend of mine had the letter, and that I would send for it, but his excitement and impatience to see it became so great that he was quite unable to control his restlessness, and was so unreasonable and almost violent in his feverish state, that the doctor, when he came to him in his rounds, gave him an opiate, which he said would keep him quiet for at least a few hours. It soon took effect, and he fell into a heavy sleep in which he is now lying. I know that you will wish to take care of him yourself, Mary, at least for to-night; and as I am imperatively wanted in another part of the town, I have only waited for your coming to leave him with you. He will probably sleep a few hours longer, but when he wakes you must give him the letter; it may shock and pain him at first, but it will put an end to all his needless anxiety about Lurline, and I believe that in the end it will make him far happier than he has been since first he had the misfortune to know her."

"He has no idea, then, that I am even in Paris?" said Mary.

"None whatever, so far as I know," he replied, and quietly she determined that she would not reveal her identity to him, that night at all events, since it was necessary that her hand should be the one to give him the letter which would finally part him from her who was in fact her rival.

"Take me to him now then," she whispered, and John Pemberton drew her gently forward.

(To be continued.)

TO BE KEPT TILL CALLED FOR.

A TRUE STORY (concluded).

A FEW months after this fruitless but most thorough inquiry had been set on foot, honest Dan Rumble found himself again in the study at Squire Clearhead's; Mr. Gimlett, the lawyer, and two or three other magistrates of the neighbourhood being of the party.

"We have been considering, Mr. Rumble," said the squire, "what is best to be done with the packet that has been giving us so much trouble for the last few months; and we have come unanimously to the conclusion that you had better take charge of it again."

A deep groan all but escaped from Dan's breast, nor did he in the least perceive the humorous expression of the squire's face, who seemed to enjoy the coachman's disconsolate appearance.

"Never!" was his deprecatory reply; "why, how will it ever lie quiet in the booking-office again after all this fuss has come abroad about it? Mercy on us! but I and my old woman will be murdered in our beds. Oh, gentlemen, do what you like with it, but never let me be pestered with that bit of brown paper any more, though it does contain such a sight of notes. I never liked it, but now it has got so much under its shabby coat, like a seedy old miser. I hate the very thought of its company."

"Ah, but Mr. Rumble," interposed lawyer Gimlett, "the old miser, as you call it, shall change his coat, and be a miser neither into the bargain. You shall have its company under an altered appearance."

"Don't understand you, sir," replied Dan, bluntly.

"Well, what I mean is this. We have turned the old parcel into hard cash, and invested it in your name in the good old Three per cents.; and we have such an opinion of your honesty, and of the upright way in which you have behaved in this affair, that we want you to take the money and buy a little property with it, as soon as you can, and live upon the income of it."

Dan shook his head. "'Taint likely," said he, "the money is no more mine than the notes were."

"Well said, old Truepenny," replied the lawyer; "there we are all agreed. Make that excellent conscience of yours quite satisfied on that point. The money is not yours, and we don't want to persuade you that it is yours, or to take it as if it were yours. We want you to take it as a trust, and to use it as a trust until the rightful owner comes to claim it, which, to my fancy, will not be in your life-time; and for this purpose we advise you to invest the money in real property, and to sign a bond to give up the same whenever the lawful claimant to those bank notes has come forward and proved his right."

Dan Rumble looked very thoughtful, in fact anything but comfortable; and it was all that the gentlemen could do to persuade him to agree to any such a course. But they did persuade him at last—chiefly by the argument that the money must otherwise lie idle and useless to everybody, and by convincing him that he and his heirs would be bound to deliver up possession whenever the lawful owner made good his claim.

"Then they can always come down upon us, can they?" was his last of many questions, repeated in every shape and form.

"To be sure they can," said the lawyer, "even down to the Greek Calends."

"When are they?" inquired the innocent sceptic.

"When nobody shall want money, lands, lawyers, coaches, or anything else," was the ready reply.

"Humph, that time is a long way off," said Dan, laughing with the rest.

"Exactly so; and not till then will the original owner make his appearance, take my word for it."

"What is your opinion, Mr. Gimlett," asked one of the party, "as to the probable explanation of this mystery?"

"My theory is this," replied the lawyer, "that there has been a double death in the matter. Some eccentric individual—not a miser, for such a miserable reptile would want to handle gold, he would not be content with paper money, but some one just the other way—perhaps a person of eccentric, reckless benevolence, one of those people who send a bank note in answer to every appeal, however absurd—though, by the way, I would rather be in their shoes than in the miser's—but some such person, living alone, without relatives to interfere, was taken ill, and dies. The nurse, or housekeeper, precious creature, instantly sweeps up all the cash she can find, but is frightened at the quantity of notes lying about, hastily wraps them up in a piece of old brown paper—you remember how shabby it was, and how irregularly the notes laid—bethinks herself of our friend here, whose coach, perhaps, she has travelled by, scribbles the writing outside, which was by no means good, if you recollect, charters a small boy to take the packet, with strict injunctions to give it into the coachman's hands, 'to be called for,' intending to call for it herself by-and-by, but 'by-and-by' never comes, for death suddenly overtakes her, and spoils the game. This is my theory, and if I am wrong it will not be the first time I have been so by a long way."

"The only objection I see to it," said the squire, "is the extreme improbability of such an amount of bank-notes being found lying about, even in the wildest case of eccentricity."

"No doubt it is almost incredible; but so should we say of the whole affair, did we not know it to be true. Human nature is a marvel of eccentricity; and as to leaving notes about, it is not long since that an eccentric old gentleman died who gave away thousands anonymously every year, and on whose table was found lying, as a thing of naught, a Bank of England note for a thousand pounds."

As this story, in all its extraordinary features, is a perfectly true one, it may serve to render more forcible the illustration which a certain minister once drew from it, as follows:—

"That brown-paper parcel, with its valuable contents of bank-notes, is like the Bible. Plain and unattractive to the eye of sense, it is full, nevertheless, of God's promises, which, when their hidden virtue is unfolded to one who seeks to know it, make every leaf of that Bible literally a bank note of heaven—a promise to pay, for Christ's dear sake, some good thing to him that truly asketh. The collective preciousness of that volume is infinitely greater than if each leaf were a bank note for a thousand pounds. So that he who said of old, 'The law of thy mouth is better unto me than thousands of gold and silver,' spoke no hyperbole. He, therefore, who sees no beauty in his Bible, and leaves it neglected on the shelf, is like the man who had such wealth within the despised packet and knew it not. How many such there are! How intense will be their regret should they discover too late what their neglected Bible really contained! None need say, 'These promises are not for me—I have no right to appropriate them.' They are for all who possess a Bible. The fact of possessing it is enough. For all the promises of God are, for Christ's sake, paid in full to them that demand their fulfilment. 'Whatsoever ye shall ask the Father in my name, He will give it you.' 'All the promises of God in Him are yea, and in Him Amen.' Only the secret of its contents must be revealed by God's own teaching. It is a sealed book till we ask to have Him open it to us. 'Did not our hearts burn within us,' said the disciples, 'while he opened to us the Scriptures?' The words of His mouth 'are all plain to him that understandeth, and right to them that find knowledge.' We have but to persevere in that prayer of old, 'Open Thou mine eyes, that I may behold wondrous things out of thy law,' and we shall find the Bible a repository of 'exceeding great and precious promises,' that make us well provided for in time, and for all eternity."

SURLY BOB.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "SHAG AND DOLL," "HUGH'S HEROISM," ETC.

CHAPTER III.—AN ACCIDENT.

WHEN the boys crossed the little garden on their return to their sleeping quarters, they found that the snow had begun to fall fast, whilst the wind, which blew in their faces, was very sharp and penetrating. It was a night cold enough to make even those who had plenty of warm food, and clothing, and good fires, shiver and draw their wraps more closely around them with perhaps a half fretful murmur at the severity of the weather. Bob and Johnnie, however, who had none of these comforts, did not complain or grumble at it, but took it, as they did other hard things in their lot, almost as a matter of course, and bore it with a kind of silent patience.

But they felt it keenly enough, and long after they had lain down in bed they still remained awake, unable to sleep for the cold.

"Let's lie a bit nearer each other, Bob, and then may-be we'll get some heat into us," said Johnnie, at length.

The elder brother turned, and putting his arms round the younger, drew him close to him, whilst at the same time he wrapped the coverings well about him, regardless of the fact that by so doing he left himself with only a very small share of blanket.

"You'll get warm now, little 'un, won't you?"

"Ay, soon, I dare say. But, Bob, you're cold too; your hands feel like ice! and you've given me 'most all the blanket. You must take it back over yourself, Bob."

"Oh, I don't care for the cold," returned Bob, in a half contemptuous tone, as if it was an evil too trifling to affect a big fellow like himself.

"Then I won't care for it either."

"Oh, you're different; you can't help it, 'cause you're a little chap, and you get chilblains and all sorts of things."

"And so do you, Bob; you've got a dreadful sore foot with chilblains."

"Oh, that ain't nothing—I don't care for that!"

"Bob——" began Johnnie, and then broke off.

"Well," returned the other.

"You're always so kind to me, Bob; I do so wish——"

"What?"

"Why, that you'd be kind sometimes to the other fellows as well. They don't know a bit what you're really like, 'cause you only fight 'em, or beat and cuff 'em. If they knew you like I do they'd love you too."

"What 'ud be the good of that?"

"Well, I don't know; only I like people to love me. And I can't bear 'em to say you're the worst boy in all the class, like I've heard 'em say many a time. If I could speak up and tell 'em all I know, they'd say different."

"Don't you go telling no tales 'bout me," muttered Bob, "and they may call me what they likes. 'Tain't no matter to me."

"Oh, Bob, don't you care? I do; 'cause 'tain't fair, and it vexes me so when they make you stand out, and keep you in, and say, 'He's a reg'lar bad 'un, he is,' 'cause you ain't, Bob; you ain't bad, or you wouldn't be so good to me," and Johnnie's voice had a half sorrowful half-appealing tone in it.

"Have you been vexing yourself over that?" exclaimed Bob in astonishment. "Why, what a queer little chap you are! Who'd ever have thought that you'd have gone and fretted over their giving of me a bad name!"

"I don't like it, Bob; I couldn't bear to think as you deserved it."

"Why not?"

"'Cause, Bob—you won't be angry, will you?"

"No, not I."

"Well, then, 'tis partly 'cause of what teacher said to-day, about its being them as love Jesus as He takes into His fold. And He said them as love Him try to be like Him; but if boys are always quarrelling and fighting that shows they aren't trying to please Him, and don't care about Him. And, oh, Bob! I do so want Him to be able to take us both into His fold, don't you?"

"Dunno; I'm a deal too bad, I am."

"But Jesus can make us good. And you aren't too bad, Bob; you're real good to me, and I love you ever so, and Jesus loves you too; teacher said He did—every single boy in the whole class."

Bob made no reply, only tried to put his corner of the blanket more closely round Johnnie, and at last the little fellow's eyes closed in sleep, whilst the elder one, who was still wakeful, lay for a while looking at the pale thin little face, which seemed paler than ever in the moonlight, which was streaming in through the small window, and falling right across the bed. Bob's face relaxed into a softened expression as he gazed, until, at last, he murmured to himself, "The Shepherd as he's been a talking about has got him safe in His arms, that's certain; but as for me I'm too bad—a deal too bad."

Meantime the snow outside was falling silently and noiselessly, working a change in the whole face of Nature, as it clothed everything in its own mantle of beauty, and made even that which in itself had no loveliness of form or colouring look pure and stainless in its dress of spotless white. Everywhere it fell alike—on the stately tree or the stunted shrub, the rich man's roof, or the lowly out-house in which two poor boys were lying closely huddled together for warmth, a meet emblem of that Holy Spirit which descends so silently, and steals so secretly into hearts here and there; not singling out only the great or learned, but visiting alike the simple and untaught, and revealing His presence within them by changed actions, and gentler words and looks, clothing them with a beauty not their own, but put upon them. Might He not even now be drawing near to "Surly Bob," though he knew it not, but lay murmuring, "I'm too bad—a deal too bad."

The next day, on coming out of morning school, the boys lingered about in the road, or rather lane, outside, as was their custom, some of them generally having a quarrel to settle, or some piece of mischief to plan. This morning they all seemed to have made common cause against Bob, as if determined to pay off old grudges, of which each of them could count up a score or more. Tom Lane in particular was still smarting from the treatment he had received yesterday, and was ready enough to join in any scheme of revenge upon his enemy, who often got the best of it in a hand-to-hand fight.

Dull and obtuse as the boys were in some matters, they had penetration enough to have found out by this time that the way to inflict a wound on Bob was to aim a dart at his little brother; for though Bob before others was generally cold and indifferent enough in his manner to Johnnie, taking but little notice of him, still his companions had somehow discovered his one sensitive part. And now, bent on "paying him out," they set themselves to tease Johnnie; not because they disliked him, for none could bear ill-will to the gentle unoffending child, but because they knew it was the surest way of annoying their mutual foe.

Accordingly, when Bob, who had been kept behind for a few minutes, came out of the school-house, he found a group of them surrounding his little brother, imitating his lame walk, and pretending to have a crutch, by the help of which they were limping along, whilst the child stood looking like a wounded stag at bay, more wondering and perplexed at their unkindness than angry a bit. But Bob, as at a glance he took in the state of the case, was furious, and with a face dark with passion, rushed upon them, and dealt his blows right and left with an unsparing hand.

Before, however, he had settled off all his adversaries he heard a cry from Johnnie, and turning, saw him lying on the ground with Tom Lane sprawling on the top of him. The little fellow, not noticing it, had been standing on a slide which the boys had made before going into school, and Tom—whether accidentally or on purpose no one could say—coming along the slide behind Johnnie, and unperceived by him, had apparently been unable to stop himself, and so had tripped the other up, and fallen on him.

Bob rushed to his rescue, pausing first, however, to vent his anger upon Tom by giving him a sound thrashing. A fierce scuffle followed between the two, but though both boys were in a usual way pretty equally matched as regarded size and strength, Bob's outraged feelings lent on this occasion such unwonted force to his blows that Tom was soon overcome. Then, throwing him from him, Bob turned to Johnnie, whom he found still sitting just where he had fallen, all doubled together, crying and sobbing.

(To be continued.)

"THE QUIVER" BIBLE CLASS.

257. Quote passages in which the rainbow is mentioned after the Flood.

258. What passage in the New Testament leads us to think that Moses considered he was doing God service when he slew the Egyptian?

259. What other inhabitants of Canaan were giants besides the Anakims?

260. How many years did God provide manna for the children of Israel; and when did they last eat of it?

261. On what occasion did St. Paul conform to the Jewish ceremonial law, in order to conciliate the Jewish converts?

262. For what purpose did Jeremiah hide stones in the clay near to the house of Pharaoh, King of Egypt, in Tahpanhes?

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS ON PAGE 624.

243. "Grant that these my two sons may sit, the one on Thy right hand and the other on Thy left, in Thy kingdom" (Matt. xx. 21).

244. The blessings from Mount Gerizim; upon which stood the elders of the tribes of Simeon, Levi, Judah, Issachar, Joseph and Benjamin. The cursings from Mount Ebal; upon which stood the elders of Reuben, Gad, Asher, Zebulun, Dan, and Naphtali (Deut. xxvii. 12, 13).

245. Consumption and burning ague (Lev. xxvi. 16).

246. "Moses said, Honour thy father and thy mother, and whoso curseth father or mother let him die the death. But ye say, if a man shall say to his father or his mother, it is Corban, that is to say a gift, by whatsoever thou mightest be profited by me, he shall be free, and ye suffer him no more to do aught for his father or his mother; making the word of God of none effect through your tradition" (Mark vii. 10, 11, 12, 13).

247. The son of Shelomith, of the tribe of Dan (Lev. xxiv. 10, 11).

248. As a token against the rebels, and as a proof that Aaron had been especially chosen by God (Numbers xvii. 10).

(Drawn by TOWNELEY GREEN.)

MOTHER'S GARDEN.

BY THE REV. M. G. WATKINS, M.A.

DEAR children, do ye seek to know
Where mother hopes for better flow'rs—
Unfading ones—than earth can show?
Blooms suited for the heavenly bowr's?

Though starlings dot the great south lawn,
And lengthening tracks of sunshine lie
Between its mazy patterns, drawn
In flowr's of gold and crimson dye;

Though midst the wood-walk's dripping wreaths
  Of snow, warm blustering zephyrs bare
The primrose from a myriad sheaths—
  Still mother's garden is not there!

Nor is it hid in lofty walls,
  Where wasps fret autumn's purple plum,
And blackbird to its fellow calls:
  To see its brightness this way come!

The gate beside that close-clipped bush
  Leads onward to the church's bound
Beneath the drooping beeches. Hush!
  For where we tread is holy ground!

Pass by the orange-lichened stones,
  Which mark where wearied youth and age
Laid down through distant years their bones,
  And ceased the Master's strife to wage.

But halt by these small grassy mounds,
  Sun-kissed, bedropped with nightly dew;
Above the thrush's song resounds,
  Around are blooms of every hue.

Here mother's garden meets your eyes,
  But not this turf, each smiling flow'r—
Beneath these mounds her treasure lies,
  And patiently waits Time's last hour.

Waits patiently good seeds here sown
  In faith, until God's trumpet sound,
To bid them blossom by His throne,
  And round the Lamb be found.

CHRIST THE LIGHT OF THE WORLD.

BY THE REV. D. MOORE, M.A., VICAR OF HOLY TRINITY, PADDINGTON, CHAPLAIN IN ORDINARY TO THE QUEEN.

"I am come a light unto the world."—JOHN xii. 46.

LIGHT was the first-born of all God's material creatures. Before its appearance the world was an invisible and shapeless void. The firmament above was blackness, and darkness sat on the face of the deep. A word changed the aspect of all things. "Let there be light," said a Voice from the uncreated glory; "and there was light."

And light is the first-born of God's spiritual creatures also. There is a chaos in the life of souls, a time when all the objects of the spiritual world appear to us without form and void—men seen as trees, and trees as men. The Spirit of God is just moving on the soul's troubled waters, but as yet darkness abides on the face of the deep. Blessed moment, when in such a soul God says, "Let there be light!" let the light of the glorious Gospel of Christ, who is the image of God, shine into that heart. Let him see that a light has come into the world.

We can hardly wonder that the apostle St. John, both in his Epistles and in his Gospel, so frequently recurs to this noblest of all the creature types of Christ; for not only had he heard his Divine Master in the days of His flesh declare Himself to be the light of the world, his own eyes had seen that light, had seen it all under all its phases and obscurations—as "the day-spring" from on high, breaking up the twilight of the nations; as a struggling sunbeam, forcing itself through the mists of Jewish prejudice; as a flood of sudden brightness, glistening on the Mount of Transfiguration; as eclipsed for three hours on the day of the Crucifixion; and, lastly, as revealed to him, in his sweet visions of exile, as "the bright and morning star." Hence he alone, of all the four evangelists, has preserved those conversations of our Lord, in which He is compared to the physical element of light; and he evidently clings to the image. His Gospel opens with it, "That was the true light which lighteth every man that cometh into the world;" whilst in four successive chapters, from the 8th to the 12th, we find him constantly recurring to the same source of illustration.

The text is only one instance of several in the chapter from which our text is taken. In the 35th verse, our Lord had been uttering some solemn admonitions on the folly of rejecting His message, for very soon they would have no message to reject. "Yet a little while is the light with you. Walk while ye have the light, lest darkness come upon you." But with many this darkness was judicial; the prophet Esaias had foretold it long ago. Nevertheless, the light was there—open to all who would come to it, and a blessing to all who would walk in it. "I am come, a light into the world, that whosoever believeth in me should not abide in darkness."

We may find our profit, then, in the inquiry in what relations Christ would have us consider He stands to us, by declaring Himself the "Light of the World." Much of high philosophy and much of holy comfort are veiled under inspired poetry; and if those who write and if those who read will alike pray for the spirit of holy illumination to guide them, in that light we shall see light. Now, the light of the natural world answers many and truly beneficent purposes. It enables us to see our way, it cheers and revives the daily task, it exerts a beneficial influence upon the productions of the vegetable kingdom, and it sheds loveliness over the face of all Nature. Hence, if the light of the spiritual world produce effects at all answerable to these, we should expect to find in Christ, and to have derived to us through Christ, something like analogous and corresponding blessings. Let us see how far such expectations are met. Thus answerable to that great benefit of light to the natural world, which enables us to see our way, we should expect to derive from Christ—

I. DIRECTION—teaching knowledge of what we are, and whither we are going. This is the first form of benefit we should look for from one who should proclaim himself "the light of the world." We have our Lord Himself making this application, "If any man walk in the day, he stumbleth not, because he seeth the light of the world; but if a man walk in the night, he stumbleth, because there is no light in him." Now, for 4,000 years the world had been walking in the night; groping for the wall like the blind; seeking the Lord, if, in the midst of such thick and cheerless gloom, haply they might find Him. But few they were that found Him. Darkness covered the earth, and gross darkness the people. Men had no just views of God. They knew neither the perfections of His nature, nor the eternal rectitude of His government. The great mystery of the universe was still unsolved—"how man could be just with God;" or yet, until he were just, how God could be merciful to man. But the light of the world appeared. The clouds of ignorance broke up. On the dim horizon of human speculation began to appear the first traces of life and immortality; and men saw how, without contradiction, and without compromise, God could be just, and yet "the justifier of him that believeth in Jesus."

And as it was with the world, while it was without the Gospel, so it is with individual souls while they are without Christ. They are all in darkness; all stumbling; all together gone out of the way; and though they may take different paths, yet of those who take not Christ for their light, there is none that chooseth the way to heaven—no, not one. They are all walking in darkness somewhere. One is going consciously in the downward path that leadeth to death, acquiring at each step an accelerated speed, and hastening to a swift destruction. Another, hurried along a course of giddy pleasure, has a feeling that he is not going right, but he has a certain point where he intends to turn back, and get into a better path. A third is led the wrong way, by over-much eagerness about lawful things, by the claims of the farm, the family, and the merchandise, not knowing whither he is going, but having a vague and indefinite hope that he may be found right at last. Whilst a fourth is of bolder aim. Scorning to enter heaven by the strait gate, he would fain climb up some other way—by the ladder of duties, and repentances and prayers; expecting salvation as the price of his moralities, and heaven as the recompense of his prayers.

Yet so hath darkness blinded the eyes of these men, that all their ways seem right unto them. "The light of the world" is no light to them: for the "light shineth in darkness, and the darkness comprehendeth it not." But let the light shine savingly. Let Christ reveal himself to the ignorant who are travelling out of the way; let Him reveal Himself to the ungodly, as one whose sufferings are the sternest monument of God's anger against sin; to the worldly, as the enemy of all disaffected and divided hearts; to the cumbered and the careful, as an all-sufficient portion; and to the formalist, as the sinner's true righteousness—the first, the only, and the last—and their eyes will open upon a new world. Henceforth they will feel they need stumble no more, nor stray no more. They have only to follow Christ, to walk in the light of that example which He has left, that we should follow His steps. He who delivers souls from death will always preserve feet from falling; and having given "light to them that sit in darkness," He will also "guide their feet into the way of peace."

II. But the comparison of our Lord to light, we observe, in the second place, naturally suggests the idea that He would be to us the source of all gladdening, and comforting, and reviving influences.

"Truly the light is sweet," says Solomon, "and a pleasant thing it is for the eyes to behold the sun." There are few of us, perhaps, who have not felt the exhilarating influence of light upon the natural spirits. We have been passing, it may be, a night of weariness and sad unrest, and this hour is as the last, and that as the one which went before. There is neither sight nor sound to break up the dull monotony of sorrow, or relieve the one dark universal blank. How cheerful, at such times, is that first mantling greyness which makes objects just discernible, which tells us of the near approach of day. We should number the light among the greatest of our common mercies. Its connection with our spirits, with our health, with all that renders life grateful and enjoyable, makes it, while we have it, as it were diffused Deity, the type of a beneficent Omnipresence, a reflected material spark from Him who came as a light into the world.

And this connection between light and gladness on the one hand, and between darkness and misery on the other, is found to hold with equal truth in spiritual things. See this illustrated in the case of the heathen. Go, ask him whether there is not a settled gloom connected with all that senseless homage which he offers to gods of wood and stone? whether he has not a sad heart, when he bows the knee to an unknown god? and whether—even "more than they that wait for the morning; I say more than they that wait for the morning"—he does not long for the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ. We can form but a faint idea of the joy which Gospel light brings to the minds of the benighted heathen. His darkness is not a dreary undistinguishable void merely, it is peopled with spectral forms, dark spirits, untrusted and unloved divinities. Oh, how refreshing to those who sit in this darkness, to see a great light, to have an object of worship revealed to them rich in mercy, beaming with grace, glorious in holiness—a light to lighten the Gentiles, and a day-star to guide the world!

And this connection between light and cheerfulness in spiritual things is commonly assumed in Scripture in the case of the believer. "The Lord make His face to shine upon thee," was the ancient form of priestly benediction. "Light is sown for the righteous, and gladness for the upright in heart," said the Psalmist. And, again, "There be many that say, who will show us any good?" "But of all the good under heaven," he goes on, "I know but one which can put 'gladness into the heart.'" "Lord, lift Thou up the light of Thy countenance upon us." Especially is this reviving influence felt after a child of God has been for some time under a cloud. "Who is among you," says the prophet, "that feareth the Lord and obeyeth the voice of His servant, that walketh in darkness and hath no light?" Many such there are, and often, during this midnight of the heart, are they heard to exclaim, "Would God it were morning!" But this morning must be waited for. The light of the world knows the time for His appearing, even as the material sun knows the time of his going down. The one as well as the other will be better prized by us for being occasionally withdrawn. Peter wist not what he said, when, his face reflecting the effulgent brightness of the transfiguration, he said, "Lord, it is good for us to be here." This would not be always good. A time of vivid spiritual manifestations is often our most dangerous time. There is only a step between the waters of baptism and the wilderness of temptation; and this perhaps is permitted, because if the opened heavens were to continue their bright light, we might come to think that it was a light of our own kindling. We see, then, a spiritual benefit in seasons of despondency and sadness. They show us our utter helplessness; they discover the weakness of our strength, the iniquity of our holy things, the thick darkness which surrounds us the moment we attempt to walk in the light of our own fire, and in the sparks that we have kindled. No: He who is the light of the world must also be the light of all duties. Cheerful these will never be, happy they will never be, unless we see Christ in them. He must be the lamp which goes not out upon the altar. He must be the candle which shines upon our domestic tabernacle. We can bind no sacrifices to the altar, unless God be the Lord who hath showed us light, and Christ must be the soul's everlasting light, before the days of our mourning can be ended.

III. But besides direction in our spiritual doubtings, and comfort under our spiritual fears, the analogy of the text would intimate that all our spiritual health and fruitfulness are to be found from Christ.

When speaking of light and its blessings, we do not always think of the powerful influence it exerts on the life and fruitfulness of the vegetable kingdom. Yet this is one of the most obvious facts noticed by naturalists. Plants shut up in a dark room will never come to perfection. If they do not wither and shrivel up, they lose all fragrance, and their leaves wear a sickly hue; whilst if there happen to be in this room one aperture only through which a little light is admitted, to that aperture all the leaves of the plant will turn. Those flowers which, for a pardonable gratification, you deprive of their loved light and liberty, making prisoners of them perhaps in a close room, see how they love that sweet emblem of their Creator, the light—how every flower, the fairest and the best, turns towards it, as if it could only unveil its beauty on the side where God is—for God is light. Oh, note we the religion of the flowers, worshipping this holy and beneficent agent in quiet gladness, and languishing in its withdrawal, even as a soul that mourns an absent God!

And such as the physical element of light is to the plants and flowers, such is Christ, the light of the world, to every tree of the Lord's planting. A state of darkness, in Scripture language, is always identified with a state of unfruitfulness. "Have no fellowship," says the apostle to the Ephesians, "with the unfruitful works of darkness:" and in another passage, when describing the moral darkness of the Roman world, he asks, "What fruit had ye then in those things whereof ye are now ashamed?" And as darkness implies all barrenness, so light and knowledge are the types of all saving health. "When thy light breaks forth as the morning," says the prophet, "thy health shall spring forth speedily." And no sooner do the nations "see the glory of the Lord, and the excellency of our God," than "the wilderness and the solitary place shall be glad for them, and the desert shall rejoice and blossom as the rose."

But the action of light on vegetable fruitfulness is involved in mystery; hardly so the action of Christ's light upon the soul, to make it bring forth fruit unto God. For these fruits are good works; but good works without Christ have neither object, nor motive, nor recompense. Every effort in this direction made by mankind before life and immortality were brought to light by the Gospel was unavailing. Philanthropy made no advances, truth no conquests, holiness no converts. But the Sun of Righteousness arose, and on His wings He bore not light only, but healing—healing for the diseased spirits of men, and a balm for all their spiritual wounds. And now, in the revealed character of God, in the constraining love of Christ, in the openings up before us of glimpses into a bright and beautiful future, the soul is conscious of an influence fresh and life-giving, as heaven's pure light upon the outer world. And instantly, on the soul's becoming acquainted with this light, its drooping powers revive. There is a going forth of all holy acts and confidences towards Christ. The light, lifted up, draws all men to itself. We live only while we are near to it, and are fruitful only while warmed by its beams. The life and the light, we are taught, are one. "In Him was life; and the life was the light of men."

If, then, we are barren or unfruitful in the knowledge of our Lord Jesus Christ, it is because we have knowledge only, and not light. We have heard of the light by the hearing of the ear, but we cannot say, "Now mine eye seeth thee!" There has been no in-shining upon our souls of heaven's spiritual brightness—we have not yet seen the light of the world. Let us not forget that all spiritual barrenness is the effect of deficient light. The heart is barren because the eyes are blind. Year after year the husbandman has come to us seeking fruit—fruit of conquered habits, renounced attachments, hatred to sin deepened, and love to all holy things gathering strength—but he findeth none; we still droop, and are still cumberers of the ground. Why is this, but that we will not come to the light, and often, it is to be feared, hinder the light from coming to us? But let us pray God to send out His light and His truth. Let them lead you. "After two days He will revive you, and you shall live in His sight." God is health wherever God is light; and where the true light shineth in the heart, there shall be both fruit unto holiness, and the end everlasting life.

IV. Once more, by comparing Himself to light, our Lord seems to point out that He is the source of all moral beauty and loveliness in the world.

St. Paul's definition of light is "whatsoever doth make manifest"—that is, whatsoever enables the eye to see that which otherwise it could not see. Nature, therefore, for the discovery of all her beauty, confesses her entire dependence on this element. The gathering of the evening shadows is the signal for her glory to depart. She prepares to shut up her beauties, as some plants close up their leaves, waiting till morning comes again, to show us beauty as it shows us light.

And does not Christ, the light of the world, shed beauty over the moral creation also? Does not a saving knowledge of Him make manifest, not only the bliss, but the beauty of holiness? Is there not, wherever His light shineth, an order in the spiritual economy, a holy beauty about the divine plans and purposes, a moral loveliness about our religion and its founder, which makes us glad while we believe, and love while we adore? Oh yes; light is not more instrumental in clothing Nature with all that is rich in hue and fair in form than is Christ, rising with holy light upon the believer's heart, in calling up a new world of beauty. Nay, we may pursue our analogy even one step further. The physical element is not only the revealer of material beauty, but is often its efficient cause. The beautiful plant loves the light, because the light makes it beautiful—it is the action of this element which gives it its quality of colour, so that in the dark it becomes a colourless and unfragrant thing. And it is so in the spiritual creation. There is no beauty where Christ, the light of the world, is not. The very virtues of the heathen were but splendid sins, says one. Souls without Christ are like the world without the sun—they have neither life, nor health, nor fruitfulness, nor beauty. It is all night with them. But let the light of the world arise, let the sun of righteousness appear, and what spectacles of moral beauty rise up before us! In every age of the Church we see the moral triumphs of Christianity; we see martyrs rejoicing at the stake, philanthropists bearing food to the dungeon, missionaries quitting the home of their birth, and patriots who have a heart for all mankind. And other fruits are witnessed also. We see the afflicted man kiss the rod that chastens him; the injured pray for the foes that wrong him; the sick, in all the majesty of trust, triumphing over Nature's weakness; and the dying discoursing calmly of an unseen world to the friends that surround his bed.

Oh, that upon each one of us Christ would cause a ray of this glorious light to shine; that He would make us children of the light and of the day, filling our hearts with bright hopes against the days of darkness, and taking from the valley of death its gloom, because Christ, the light of the world, is there!

Yet let us not forget, as we conclude our subject, those solemn words of the Master, "Yet a little while is the light with you." It will not shine always—that is, to any saving purpose; though, in the case of those who reject it, it will shine as a witness to barren resolves, and hushed convictions, and half repentances, and broken vows. No, the night cometh—that long night—when none can work and none can walk; when the sun of truth shall be darkened, and the stars of hope shall give no light; and then the witness shall give up His office to the Judge. "I judge him not," says the verse after our text, "he hath one that judgeth him: the word that I have spoken, the same shall judge him at the last day."

While, then, we have the light of the world, let us walk in His light—in the light of His word, to teach us; in the light of His providence, to guide us; in the light of His Spirit, to sanctify us; in the light of His promises, to bless us. So, when our spirits shall have passed from the darkness of this visible scene, and shall enter into a world of bright and holy things, He who was our "light" shall be found our "salvation" too, "bringing forth thy righteousness as the light, and thy judgment as the noon-day."

"ABOUT MY FATHER'S BUSINESS."

BY THOMAS ARCHER.

HEALING THE SICK.

AMIDST the numerous great charities which distinguish this vast metropolis, hospitals must always hold a prominent if not pre-eminent place. Helpless infancy, the weakness and infirmity of old age, and prostration by sudden accident, or the ravages of disease, are the conditions that necessarily appeal to humanity. The latter especially is so probable an occurrence to any one of us, that we are at once impressed by the necessity for providing some means for its alleviation. Helpless childhood has passed, old age may seem to be in too dim a future to challenge our immediate attention; but sickness, sudden disaster, who shall be able to guard against these, in a world where the strongest are often smitten down in the full tide of apparent health; where, in the streets alone, fatal accidents are reckoned monthly as a special item in Registrars' returns, and injuries amount annually to hundreds?

The great endowed hospitals, therefore, those magnificent monuments of charity which have distinguished London for so many years, and the value of which in extending the science of medicine can scarcely be overrated, are regarded by us all with veneration. At the same time we ought to feel a certain thrill of pleasure, a satisfaction not far removed from keen emotion, when we see inscribed on the front of some building, large or small, where the work of healing is being carried on, the words, "Supported by Voluntary Contributions." One other condition, too, seems necessary to the complete recognition of such a charity as having attained to the full measure of a truly beneficent work—admission to it should be free: free not only from any demand for money payments, but untrammelled by the necessity for seeking, often with much suffering and delay, a governor's order or letter, by which alone a patient can be received in many of our otherwise admirable and useful institutions for the sick. It should be remembered that immediate aid is of the utmost importance in the effort to heal the sick, and that delays, proverbially dangerous, are in such cases cruel, often fatal, always damaging to the sense of true beneficence, of the extension of help because of the need rather than for the sake of any particular influence. It would seem that we have no right to hesitate, or to insist on the observance of certain forms, before succouring the grievously sick and wounded, any more than we have to withhold food from the starving till ceremonial inquiries are answered, and certificates of character obtained. There are cases of poverty, and even of suffering, where inquiry before ultimate and continued relief may be useful, and personal influence may be necessary, but extreme hunger and nakedness, cold and houselessness, sudden injury or maiming, the pain of disease, the deep and touching need of the sick and helpless, are not such. Prompt and effectual measures for relief, and, if necessary, admission to the place where that relief can alone be afforded, will be the only means of completely meeting these wants. Free hospitals, freer even than workhouses, are what we need, and I am about to visit one of them to-day which rejoices in its name, "The Royal Free Hospital," now in its forty-seventh year of useful and, I am glad to say, of vigorous life.

To any one acquainted with that strange neighbourhood which is represented by Gray's Inn Lane and all the queer jumble of courts and alleys that seem to shrink behind the shelter of the broad thoroughfare of Holborn, there is something consistent in the establishment of such a noble charity as this hospital in Gray's Inn Road. Its very position seems to indicate the nature and extent of its duties. Near the homes of poverty, the streets where people live who cannot go far to seek aid in their extremest need, it receives those who, breaking down through sudden disease, or requiring medical and surgical skill to relieve the pain and weakness of recurrent malady, have no resource but this to enable them to fulfil their one great desire "to get back to work." The causes of much of the sickness which sends patients thither may be preventible: they may be found in foul dwellings, impure water, insufficient clothing, want of proper food, alternate hunger and intemperance; but whatever may be its occasion, a remedy must be found for it. Till all that is preventible is prevented, the consequences will have to be mitigated, the fatal results averted where it is possible; and when boards of health and sanitary measures have done, there will still be sick men to heal, failing children to strengthen, weak and wasting women to restore.

It is well, then, that this Institution should stand as a landmark of that free charity, which takes help where it is needed most; and this qualification is the more obvious when we turn from the sick wards to the accident wards, and remember that those great railway termini are close at hand, and others not far off; that all round that teeming neighbourhood men, women, and even children, are working at poor handicrafts, which render them liable to frequent injuries, and that in the crowded streets themselves—from the great busy thoroughfare of Holborn, to the bustle and confusion of the approaches to the stations at King's Cross—there is constant peril to life and limb.

There is something so remarkable in the external appearance of the building itself, such a military look about its bold front, such a suggestion of a cavalry yard about the broad open area behind this tall wooden entrance gate, that you begin to wonder how such a style of architecture should have been adopted for a hospital. The truth is that like many—nay, like most of our noblest work—this great provision for healing the sick began by not waiting for full-blown opportunities. The need was there, and the means that came to hand were used to meet it. This building was originally the barracks of that loyal and efficient regiment, the "Light Horse Volunteers," and so excellently had those gallant defenders of king and constitution provided for their own comfort and security, that when in 1842 the premises were vacant, and the lease for sale, the governors of the Royal Free Hospital became the purchasers, the long rooms were easily turned into ample, cheerful, and well-ventilated wards, and the various outbuildings and offices were quickly adapted to the reception of patients.

But the hospital had at that date been working quietly and effectually for above fourteen years. Fourteen years before its inauguration in Gray's Inn Road, this "free" hospital, which was not then "royal," had been commenced in Greville Street, Hatton Garden, and the immediate incident which led to its foundation is so suggestive, so inseparable from the recollection of the want which it was designed to alleviate, and from its own generous recognition of the unfailing freedom of true charity, that it might well be the subject of a memorial picture. Alas! it would be a tragic reminder of those days before any provision was made for extending medical aid to sufferers who had no credentials save humanity and their own deep necessity. It would be a grim reminder to us, also, that some of our great charities established for the relief of the sick are still trammelled with those restrictions which demand recommendations, to obtain which the applicant is often condemned to delay and disappointment. It would show us that our hospitals are not yet free.

Those of my readers who can remember the entrance to the broad highway of Holborn nearly fifty years ago—stay, that is going back beyond probable acknowledgment, let me say those of us who knew Smithfield when it was a cattle market, who had heard of "Cow Cross," and been told of the terrible purlieus of Field Lane; who had occasionally caught a glimpse of that foul wilderness of courts that clustered about the Fleet Ditch; had read of Mr. Fagin, when "Oliver Twist" was first appearing in chapters, and had dim recollections of nursery tales about Bartlemy fair and "hanging morning" at the Old Bailey; those of us who remember the cries of drovers, and the lowing and bleating of herds and flocks in the streets on Sunday nights; the terrible descent of Snow Hill; the confusion and dismay of passengers and vehicles on the steep incline of Holborn Hill; the reek of all that maze of houses and hovels that lay in the valley; those of us, in short, who can carry our memories back for a few years beyond the time when the new cattle market was built at Islington, the pens and lairs of Smithfield demolished, the whole Holborn valley dismantled, only a remnant, a mere corner, of Field Lane being left standing after the great viaduct was built—can imagine what the church of St. Andrew was like when, with its dark and dreary churchyard, it stood on the slope of Holborn Hill, instead of being as it now is in a kind of subway. That churchyard, with its iron gate, was reached by stone steps, which were receptacles for winter rain and summer dust, the straw from wagons, the shreds and sweepings from adjacent shops, the dirt and refuse of the streets. On those steps a young girl was seen lying one night, in the winter of 1827—lying helpless, lonely, perishing of disease and famine. The clocks of St. Andrew, St. Sepulchre, St. Paul, had clanged and boomed amidst the hurry and the turmoil of the throng of passengers; had clanged and boomed till their notes might be heard above the subsiding roar of vehicles, and the shuffling of feet, till silence crept over the great city, and more distant chimes struck through the murky air, tolling midnight. Still that figure lay upon the cruel stones, under the rusty gate of the churchyard, as though, unfriended and unpitied by the world, she waited for admission to the only place in which she might make a claim in death, if not in life. Not more than eighteen years old, she had wandered wearily from some distant place where fatal instalments of the wages of sin had done their work, and had come to London unknown, unnoted, to die. That she had come afar is but a surmise; she may have been a dweller in this great city, lost amidst the stony desert of its streets, friendless with the friendlessness of the outcast or the wretched, to whom the acquaintances of to-day have little care or opportunity to become the solacers of to-morrow; she may have crept to that dark corner by the churchyard gate, amongst the rack and refuse of the street, as a place in which she, the unconsidered waste and refuse of our boasted civilisation, could most fitly huddle from the cold. She was not left actually to die there, but two days afterwards she passed out of the world where she had been unrecognised. Not without result, however. Among those who had witnessed the distressing occurrence was a surgeon, Mr. William Marsden, who for some time before had repeatedly seen cause to lament, that with all our endowed hospitals, our great medical schools, and the advance of scientific knowledge, the sick poor could only obtain relief by means of letters of recommendation and other delay, until the appointed days for admission. The sight that he had witnessed awoke him to fresh energy. He determined to establish a medical charity, where destitution or great poverty and disease should be the only necessary credentials for obtaining free and immediate relief. His honest benevolent purpose did not cool; in February in the following year (1828), the house in Greville Street was open as a free hospital, and it was taken under the royal patronage of George IV., the Duke of Gloucester becoming its president.

(To be concluded.)

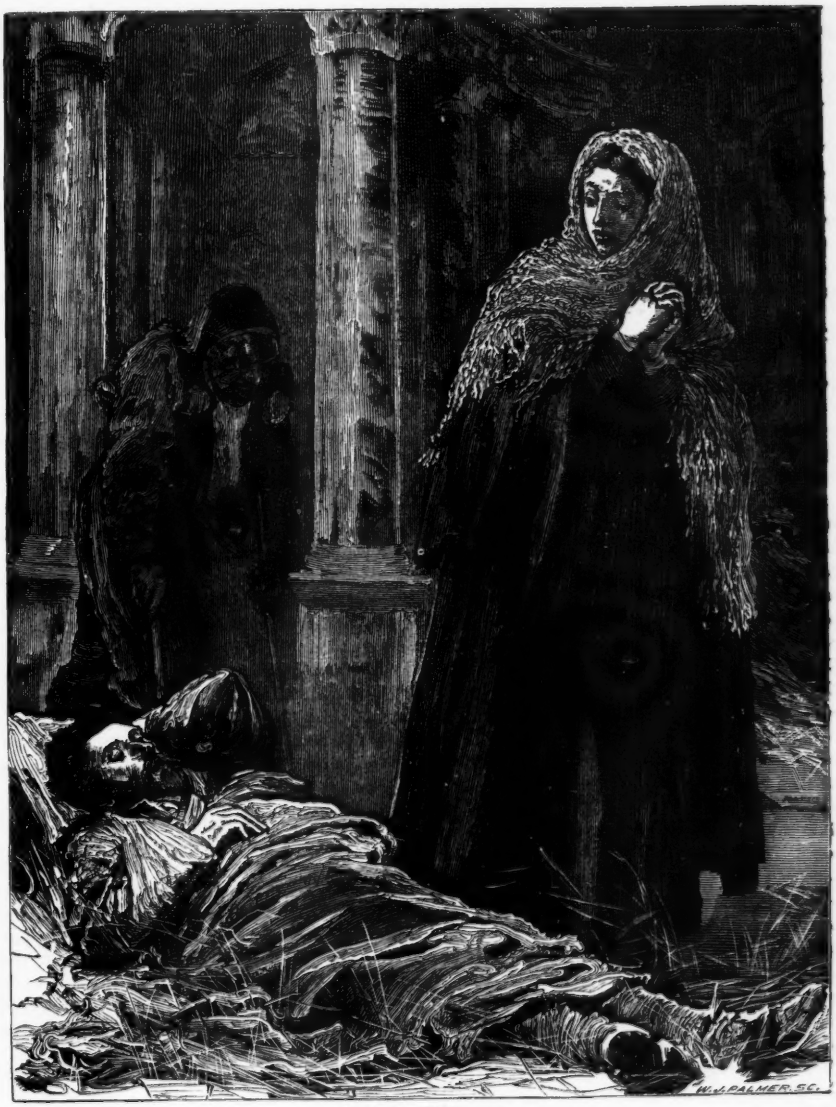
STILL AND DEEP.

BY F. M. F. SKENE, AUTHOR OF "TRIED," "ONE LIFE ONLY," ETC.



CHAPTER XXXIX.

In a quiet corner of the church, lighted only by a lamp which hung before a little side altar, Mary Trevelyan found him she had sought so long—her Bertrand—her one love, dearer than ever in his helplessness and poverty. He lay on a heap of straw, with his knapsack for a pillow, and his military cloak thrown over him as a covering, and he was still wearing a uniform torn and scorched in several places. He was asleep, in the attitude of a tired child, with one arm round his head; as he lay on his back the lamplight shone full on his face, showing the change that had taken place in the appearance of the once brilliant handsome chargé d'affaires. The rich brown hair, which used to be so soft and silky, was matted and lustreless, the beard untrimmed, the features seeming almost too strongly marked, from the hollowness of the sunken cheeks; but it was still the dear face that had haunted her dreams and lived in her thoughts, and there was no reason now why she should not let her eyes dwell on it with all the tenderness that filled her heart, for he was no longer bound to any other, even though she no longer believed that he had ever loved herself.

John Pemberton, whispering to her that he would see her in the morning, disappeared among the motley crowd which thronged around, and Mary sank on her knees by the rough couch, murmuring, "Oh, my darling, my darling, have I lived to see you again!" and then she poured out her whole heart in thankfulness for her unexpected joy.

It was perfect bliss to Mary Trevelyan to remain there by his side, letting her hand rest with a caressing touch on his long thin fingers, as they lay listlessly across his breast. There were sights and sounds of anguish all around her, yet she could not still the ceaseless song of praise within her soul, for all the love her heart could feel was lavished on the wasted form stretched out before her, and that was breathing, palpitating with the life on which her own depended. One thought of sadness only she had, and that was in the certainty of the pain which the Lorelei's letter would give him, although she could no longer doubt that Laura had never really loved him, and therefore that he was well quit of what would have been but a mockery of happiness, almost in her estimation a sacrilegious union; yet it did grieve her to know that she must herself be the instrument of his sorrow, and that from her hand he must take the letter which would give his trust in Lurline's affection such a rude awakening. Mary determined that she would, if possible, prevent him finding out who she was, until he had passed through the shock of Laura's faithlessness, and could disconnect her from any share in bringing him such evil tidings.

The evening wore on while Bertrand slept. Hour after hour passed; it was near midnight, but there was little rest or silence within the great church. Some of the sufferers, like her own charge, found a temporary relief in slumber, and one by one a few sank into the surer sleep of death, and were borne away by the attendants to await their burial on the morrow; but for many there was no ease from pain, nor could those rest who had come to succour them.

(Drawn by W. SMALL.)

"He was asleep, in the attitude of a tired child, with one arm round his head."—p. 664.

Gradually Mary noticed from Bertrand's restless movements that the effect of the opiate was beginning to wear off. He turned from side to side, stretched out his arms, muttered a few indistinct words, and at last he opened wide the bright blue eyes she had scarce hoped to see again, and, raising himself on his elbow, he looked round eagerly.

The moment she saw any sign of his awakening Mary had drawn the hood of her mantle over her head, and she sat beside him, bending down her face so that he could not see it. He took her, no doubt, for one of the kind women who habitually nursed the wounded, and asked her in French if she knew where Mr. Pemberton the Englishman was?

She answered in the same language, thinking it might prevent his recognising her voice, but he started visibly when the low soft tone met his ear, as she said, "He is gone away for the night, but he will come to you in the morning."

"Whose voice was that? who spoke?" said Bertrand, sharply, in English.

Mary did not answer, but held to his lips a glass of some restorative she had been preparing for him. He drank it, and then leant back with a sigh.

"My mind is wandering back to those I loved of old," he said, speaking again in French. "I thought I heard the voice that once was sweetest to me in all the world, but no doubt it was yours, kind nurse. Tell me—did the Englishman give you no message for me? Did he not leave with you a letter? He has belonging to me a letter from England. He promised I should certainly have it to-night."

"Yes, and it is here," whispered Mary; "I have it quite safe for you."

"Ah, give it me!" he exclaimed, with feverish excitement. "Why do you delay, nurse? It is mine; let me have it at once!"

With trembling hands, she took it from her pocket and put it into his eager fingers. He almost snatched it from her in his anxiety, and as he saw the peculiar handwriting, which any who had once seen Laura write could never mistake, a flush of eager pleasure glowed over his pale face, and he pressed the letter to his lips, as he murmured, "My poor Lurline!"

The lamp hung on the other side from that on which Mary was sitting, and he turned completely round to get its full light upon the paper as he tore open the envelope.

Then Mary rose very softly, and moved away, saying, gently, "I will come back to you when you have read your letter."

Her sensitive nature shrank from watching the first moments of his bitter humiliation and disenchantment. He took no heed of her; he was already absorbed in the lines he was reading, and she went along through the rows of prostrate forms, towards a peaceful spot some little way removed from all that confused mass of suffering, and there sunk on her knees in prayer.

After a time she rose to go back to Bertrand, and as she turned to walk through the ranks of the sick she involuntarily looked down towards the entrance door, and saw a dark figure in the act of passing out behind the curtain which hung over the opening. How or why it was she could not tell, but a sudden chill and terror struck into her very soul, and she hurried breathlessly to the spot where she had left Bertrand. Was she blind, or dreaming, or could it be true, that she saw the straw couch where he had lain, the knapsack which had formed his hard pillow, the cloak flung on one side which had covered him? but he—her Bertrand, her one love—so long lost, so lately found—he was no longer there—he was gone! Her senses seemed abandoning her; she flung herself down by the bed; she passed her hands over the straw, as if to satisfy herself that his form rested there no more—then she started up, and appealed almost frantically to those lying around.

"Where is he? did you see him go? what has become of him? oh, tell me!"

Some were asleep, some too weak and ill to answer her; she got no response. But suddenly a lithe little figure rose up from behind a pillar near her, and came bounding towards her. It was Pierron, who, after wandering about the church for some hours, to abstract what morsels he could from the provisions of the sick, was preparing to take his night's rest among them.

"If you want the monsieur who was lying in that bed," he said, "I can tell you all about him. I was watching him, for you left a piece of chocolate beside him which he did not eat, and I had it."

"Oh, tell me, Pierron! where is he? only tell me, and you shall have all the chocolate I have left."

"Yes, that is right," he said, taking hold of her hand; "come, he is gone out."

"Out! but he was ill, feeble!"

"He was in a fever, madame, like a madman; he read a letter he had over and over again, and his eyes grew wilder, and his breath came short, and he flung himself about, and at last he looked at the words on the paper again, and sprang upon his feet. He seemed quite strong, but I think he was mad, for he laughed, and he crushed the letter in his hands, and flung it away."

"Where is he then, Pierron? where is he now?"

"Do I know? I can only tell you he went out when he had thrown the letter away. He said words which sounded like 'I will go home, I will go home.'"

Through Pierron's curious pronunciation of the English words, Mary could detect what they had been.

"And then," the boy went on, "he rushed away down the church, as if he were quite strong, with his eyes blazing, and his lips laughing, and he lifted up the curtain over the door, and went out into the street, and I saw him no more."

"No more! no more! Oh, my Bertrand!" said Mary, with an almost unconscious wail; "but I will seek him! I will never rest till I find him!" and, hastily putting the food she had promised into the hands of the child, she in her turn rushed down through the crowded church, and went out into the bitter cold night.

The stars were shining bright as diamonds in the clear expanse of heaven, the snow lay deep and hard all round, no human being was in sight in the deserted streets. Mary drew her cloak over her shoulders, and hurried on, she scarce knew whither.

"I will find him," she said, "or die!"

CHAPTER XL.

JOHN PEMBERTON was greatly distressed and alarmed when he returned to the church ambulance next morning and heard from Pierron of the disappearance of Bertrand Lisle, and of Mary Trevelyan's rashness in having gone out alone into the disturbed city to seek him. He guessed rightly enough what had happened as regarded Bertrand. The shock he had received from Laura's letter, in his feverish state, had brought on delirium, under the influence of which he had been seized with some delusive idea that he could at once start for England. The condition of high fever in which he was might to a certain extent have preserved him from suffering by the bitter cold which had prevailed through the night; but Pemberton thought with dismay of Mary's delicate frame having been exposed to it, and he could only hope that she had long since found her way home, either to the hospital or to Madame Brunot's house. He could not rest, however, till he had ascertained where she really was; and he was walking from the door, with the intention of seeking her, when he met her, coming with slow and wavering steps along the street. She seemed utterly exhausted, but apparently had wandered back to the church with the faint hope that Bertrand might have returned there; and when she saw John Pemberton advancing from it, she tottered towards him, and, stretching out her hands, said in a faint voice, "Has he returned? Oh, has he come back to me?"

"Alas, no!" said Pemberton; "but I hope we shall soon find him."

She threw back her head with a gesture of despair; then her eyes closed; her lips almost unconsciously murmured, "Oh, my Bertrand!" and she sank down in a heap on the snow at John Pemberton's feet. He lifted her up, and carried her into the church, while he sent Pierron flying off to procure a carriage.

Mary's face and hands were cold as ice; and he guessed—what was indeed the case—that she had been wandering about all night in the snow, expecting each moment to find Bertrand extended somewhere on the pavement. When the cab arrived, Pemberton placed her in it, still quite insensible, and took her home to Madame Brunot's, where nurse Parry seized upon her at once, loud in lamentations. With Valerie's help, poor Mary was soon placed in the bed from which she was destined not to move for many days to come.

Meanwhile, for days, and even weeks, John sought for Bertrand, but altogether in vain. Nowhere, far or near, could he find any trace of him. It was well perhaps for Mary that a serious illness, the result of fatigue and exposure, rendered her for some time incapable even of knowing his ill-success.

She lay helpless on her bed while the year which had been so fatal to France closed in sullen gloom, and another opened which was destined to be yet more terrible. The gleam of hope which the armistice of January had brought was again extinguished, and the siege had been renewed with double vigour. It was plain, however, that the cruel struggle must be ended soon, were it only for the sake of the famishing women and children. But the prospect of the bitter humiliation which awaited them had deepened, if possible, the deadly hatred felt by the French soldiers for their Prussian foes; and the position of the resident German tradespeople who had not been able to escape from Paris before the siege was becoming extremely dangerous; they were perpetually liable to the suspicion of harbouring designs for the betrayal of the city into the hands of the enemy; and any one, even amongst the French themselves, who showed them the smallest friendliness, was in danger of being accused of complicity in their supposed treachery.

Not far from the Brunots' house was a little toy-shop, kept by a quiet old man, a native of Nuremberg, who, in happier times, had been a great friend of the colporteur's children, and had often bestowed playthings upon them which they could not afford to buy. Naturally, the little ones, French though they were, could see no reason for giving up their acquaintance with kind old Herr Klein; and it was only in obedience to John Pemberton's strong prohibition that Valerie ceased from going daily into his shop, as she passed, to wish him "Good-morning."

One afternoon in the month of February, Pemberton went as usual to Madame Brunot's, to inquire after Mary Trevelyan, and to report to her the continued failure of his endeavours to find Bertrand Lisle. She was now well enough to sit up, though she had not yet been out of doors; and he found her in her usual position, reclining in an easy-chair drawn close to the window, whence she could look out on the street, as if she hoped to see him pass on whom her hopes were ever fixed.

John Pemberton was pleased to see Mary looking stronger than she had done since the dreadful nights which had so nearly proved fatal to her; but he at once perceived that she, as well as all the rest of the family, was in a great state of anxiety and alarm; and the cause was soon told to him.

Valerie had been sent out, early in the morning, to purchase some rice and bread, on which the household now chiefly subsisted, and had never returned. The baker's shop was at a considerable distance from the house, and they knew that she would have to wait a long time till it came to her turn to be served amongst the patient crowd who often had to pass hours at the door of the bakehouse before they could obtain their scanty supply; and, therefore, for a considerable period even weak nervous Madame Brunot was not surprised at Valerie's non-appearance. But as the day wore on they all became very uneasy at her unaccountable absence. Mrs. Parry had gone out to look for her, and had walked about for some time without seeing any trace of the child; but she had not dared to venture far. The good woman was excessively timid, and in the present state of Paris she never voluntarily went outside the door. On the present occasion, her inability to speak French, so as to make inquiries for Valerie, rendered her comparatively useless when she did go. She soon came back, and even Madame Brunot did not ask her to go again. They all relied on the hope that John Pemberton would call, as he so often did; and they knew how speedily and energetically he would seek the poor child, wherever there was the remotest chance of finding her.

"If you had not come soon I must have gone out myself," said Mary, anxiously; "it would have done no good for nurse Parry to have gone again."

"You do not look very fit for such an expedition," he said, with a smile; "but I will go to the bakehouse at once, and I hope I shall bring her back with me. I trust it may only be that she has had to wait longer than usual."

"You always bring us so much comfort," said Mary, looking up at him gratefully. "What a friend you have been! You will have a great blessing, I am very certain, for the goodness you have shown us."

"It has been by special mercy that I have been allowed to be of any use," he answered, humbly; "but, dear Mary, you can repay me a thousand times any little help I have been able to give you, if you will sometimes remember me when you speak to our Father in heaven, and ask for me that when my hour shall strike I may be permitted to go swift and straight to the feet of Him through whom alone I hope for pardon."

"I think you may be very sure that it will be so," said Mary, "though not perhaps for many years to come."

"Many years!" said John, looking up thoughtfully into the blue cloudless sky; "sometimes I feel as if I could not wait many hours, I long so inexpressibly for the vision of that Divine One, the only Pure and True." Then he coloured violently at having been betrayed into an expression of feeling on so sacred a subject, and pressing her hand, he went hastily out on his mission. Never while Mary Trevelyan lived did she forget those words, or the yearning look in John Pemberton's dark eyes as he uttered them.

The young man hurried along the street, much more seriously uneasy about Valerie Brunot than he had cared to let her friends see. He went in the direction of the bakehouse, looking carefully on either side as he advanced; when he reached the shop, he found himself at the end of a long string of persons who were waiting to be served, and saw at once that Valerie was not among them. It was in vain to ask the busy men in the shop if, amongst such a crowd of applicants, they remembered one little girl; and he was turning away more anxious than ever, when he suddenly observed a small figure crouching under an archway at the opposite side of the street, which he recognised at once as the lost child; and the moment she saw him Valerie bounded towards him, and flung herself into his arms, sobbing hysterically, and clinging to him in evident terror.

"My dear child," he said, soothing her, "I see you have somehow been very much frightened; but we had better go home as fast as we can, and then you will tell us all that has happened."

"Oh no, no!" she exclaimed; "I must tell you first. I am so frightened I dare not go near our house. I should have stayed out all night if you had not come."

"Let us go in here then," he said, drawing her within the portico of a church which stood near; "we can sit down on the bench here while you tell me."

She obeyed, nestling close to him, and clasping both her hands round his arm while she told her story.

"It is poor Herr Klein that has done it all," she said; "but he could not help it. You know that little house near ours which was thrown into ruins by a great shell bursting on the roof?"

"You mean the cottage that is uninhabited now, with only part of it left standing?"

"Yes; I was just passing it, on my way to the baker's shop, when I heard a most dreadful noise of shouting and screaming, and people calling out that they were betrayed, as they always do when they want to kill somebody. I was frightened, and ran inside the doorway of the little house (for there is no door on it now); and I had hardly done so when I saw Herr Klein come flying down the street, without his hat, and his face all white, with a red streak across his forehead, and he came dashing into the little house where I was, and went down on his hands and knees on the ground behind me, and said, 'Valerie, stand in the doorway, for Heaven's sake, and hide me!' And I did, though I was dreadfully afraid, for there came a crowd of soldiers next, rushing along with their swords drawn and their guns on their shoulders, and they were calling out, 'Death to the Prussian spy! death to the Prussian traitor!' I suppose they never thought at first that Herr Klein was hiding in the ruined house, and they went on past it. But, you know, a little way further on they could see down the long boulevard, and in a minute they could tell that he had not gone that way; and so they all came storming back into the house where I was, saying, 'He must be here;' but that very moment Herr Klein had crept through a window at the back, and was gone; and so then they caught hold of me, and asked if he had been there. I could not tell a lie, you know, so I said, 'Yes,' and then they demanded where he had gone, and I said I did not know. Then one of them called out, 'She is an accomplice, the little viper! I know her: it is the fillette Brunot; I have seen her in his shop. He uses her as a spy. Let us crush the little serpent! let us kill her!' And another said, 'We must make her tell us where he is, first; but we can get her at any time—I know where she lives. In the meantime, we may catch him yet, if we are quick. See, there are marks of blood on this window; he has got out that way.' So then they flung me down, saying, 'Don't think to escape us, little traitress! We will find you in your nest of serpents; no doubt the whole family are traitors!' And then they all went scrambling through the window, and left me, and I ran away as fast as ever I could, and came here. I got our bread, but I have been afraid to go home, for I am sure those terrible soldiers will be waiting for me, and perhaps they will go to our house and kill us all—maman and Mary and little Jacques."

Valerie began to sob afresh, while John Pemberton sat in great perplexity, considering what would be the best course to take. He thought it probable, as Klein had a considerable start of his pursuers, that he would escape them, in which case it was but too likely that the soldiers would seek to wreak their vengeance on the child whom they chose to pronounce his accomplice. Yet matters might be worse if they burst into Madame Brunot's house when there was no one there to protect it; and he came to the conclusion at last that he must risk the endeavour to take Valerie home, and he trusted that, by using the most unfrequented streets, they might reach the house in safety. Valerie trusted him too implicitly to object, and hand in hand they started.

(To be continued.)

TWO-EDGED PROVERBS.

BY THE REV. P. B. POWER, M.A., AUTHOR OF "THE 'I WILLS' OF THE PSALMS," "THE FEET OF JESUS," ETC.

"A STITCH IN TIME SAVES NINE."

THERE are some proverbs which, if universally acted upon, would have almost turned the tides of human existence. They would certainly have altered the flow of many of its streams, and in every case for the better. For almost all proverbs are more or less warnings against evil, perhaps not directly, but none the less surely because indirectly. They might be said to have grown out of the evil soil of an evil world, to have come into existence because they were needed as warnings against or correctives of evil manners of some form or other.

The world is full of ruin and loss and misery which need not have been, and which would not have been if even this solitary proverb had been attended to, and that stitch in time had been taken, which, according to the proverb, saves nine.

Ever since the Fall we seem to live under the law of decay. The tendency of all things seems to be to fall to ruin. We seem to be continually repairing; ever so much of our energies goes to keeping things barely in order; and as to the bills for repairs, and the marvellous items of which they are composed, we are almost afraid even to think of them.

There are two classes of persons of whom we have to say a little in connection with this proverb that "a stitch in time saves nine"—some who do not see this, and some who do, but who neglect to make use of the truth they know, so that in point of fact it is practically no truth to them at all.

There are some persons who do not see this. They expect perishing things to last. Though they see walls crumbling to powder, wood rotting away, the perishing look beginning to come up very soon on the newest things, they take but little notice; the matter is too common to arrest practical attention, and they let things just take their course. Now, the course which things generally follow in this way, is from bad to worse; the world, if not all down hill, is down hill most of the way; and that is just one of the reasons which makes life hard work to many of us—we have to be going up hill, to be always keeping things right; not only to be taking a step forward, but to secure the step we last made. We are very much like people in ships, whose cabin furniture is knocking about, and being knocked about; and yet with all this, you find folk expecting things to continue in one stay.

But there are others who see well enough when and where repairs are needed, but it does them little good, they are fair and easy-going people, and they don't do anything; they say, "'Twill do by-and-by," or they let things take their chance, and the chance almost always turns out the wrong way.

The world is full of neglected things, of those ruined beyond repair, of those wanters now not merely of the nine stitches, but ninety and nine, of those awaiting the one stitch which would avert so many more, and which they may wait long enough for, for they await it in vain.

There is my neighbour's fence, or what was once a fence, and that not so many years ago. Now it is no longer a fence, but an offence, for it makes the whole neighbourhood look shabby and disreputable, stretching as it does for nearly half a mile along the Woodthorp road, up to the very entrance to Woodthorp itself.

The first beginnings of that fence's troubles were on this wise. A loose nail allowed one of the staves to become unfastened. Farmer Joyce saw it, but he never heeded it, and the stave wagged about until it became quite unfastened. A gipsy tramp passing along, and having a far more practical eye than Farmer Joyce, determined at once that that stave was the very thing that would suit him, when split up with a handy little bill-hook he had in his wagon, to boil his kettle that evening.

I really don't think the tramp would have stolen that stave if it had not in almost so many words said to him, "Come take me; you see no one cares whether I'm in or out, they don't seem to think me worth even a nail and the little trouble of driving it in;" and so the tramp gave it the least twist in life; he took it out, just as an encouraging dentist assures us he will take out a loose tooth, almost with his finger and thumb, and that night that stave boiled the tramp's kettle, and made a beginning of the end—the unhappy end which, long before its proper time, overtook the unhappy Woodthorpe fence.

The next piece of wood soon loosened, and boys, seeing that no one took any notice, began to pull off the top bits, and then the wet soaked down into the body of the wood; and one tramp and another made tea with it, and it was even believed that the neighbouring baker's oven knew something about it; and so it came to pass that the fence became a public nuisance. Cattle strayed through it into the road, and were put in pound; boys crept in here and there through it, and were continually being brought before the magistrate for trespass; the hay was trampled down; sheep were stolen; and, to come to the end of the fence, nearly five hundred pounds had to be spent before the property could be put in order again.

I really do not much care where you look to find the truth of this proverb practically shown, for it seems to me that you will find it everywhere.

A word of apology spoken at the beginning of a quarrel would have hindered many family estrangements, would have prevented many a duel, many a lawsuit, many damages for libel, the eating of three or four helpings of humble pie—aye, the whole pie itself—instead of as much of it as would have gone into a tea-spoon at the most.

(To be concluded.)

SURLY BOB.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "SHAG AND DOLL," "HUGH'S HEROISM," ETC.

CHAPTER IV.—SYMPATHY.

NOW Johnnie, though a delicate little fellow, had a tolerably brave spirit, and was not given to cry and whine over every trifling hurt; therefore Bob knew something must indeed be the matter to call forth these signs of pain. He bent over him—that strangely softened look coming into his face, and chasing away the angry scowl it had worn a minute before, whilst he asked, and his usually harsh, gruff voice had a thrill of tenderness in it—"Be you hurt, little 'un? What have they been and done to you?"

"Oh, Bob, do help me; I can't get up, and it hurts me so I can't help crying," and little Johnnie's tearful face grew quite white from the pain.

"Where does it hurt?" asked Bob.

Johnnie pointed to his knee, the poor diseased one, where was the seat of all the mischief which had resulted in his lameness.

The elder brother's face again grew dark, as he hissed out the words, "Shame! Brute! See if I don't give it to him!" whilst he threw a glance around, as if intending another attack upon his enemy; but by this time the other boys had all cleared off, leaving the two entirely alone.

"Give me your hand, Bob, and I'll try to get up."

Instead, however, of doing that, Bob stooped and, with as careful and even gentle a touch as if he had been a woman, took his little brother in his arms, saying, "If you can't walk, why I'll carry you. We ain't got far to go, and you needn't be afraid as I'll drop you. Am I hurting of you?" he asked, as Johnnie seemed to wince.

"Not much—not more than you could help," answered Johnnie, trying to force back his sobs of pain, as he put his arms lovingly round Bob's neck, and clung to him.

The other carried him as if he had been a mere feather's weight; and bearing him through the kitchen, which he found empty, his aunt being at that moment up-stairs, he took him straight out to their own quarters at the back, and laid him down on the bed.

"How did it happen, Johnnie? What was that sneak Tom Lane a-doing to you? See if I don't pay him out, that's all!" and Bob set his teeth, and clenched his hand.

"No, Bob, don't be so angry. Maybe he didn't mean anything, for you see I was standing right on the slide—though I didn't notice as I was—and then he came up behind sliding, and couldn't stop himself, and so he knocked me down and fell down himself, too, on the top of me. Maybe he didn't do it a purpose."

"Oh, that's likely, ain't it? But he shall be paid out for it. See, if I don't give him such a licking as he never got afore!"

Bob's face, as he spoke, had hardened into an expression of such set and sullen hatred that Johnnie seemed half-frightened by it.

"Bob," he began, laying his hand upon that of the other, as if to detain him beside him, "you won't go and do nothing bad to Tom, will you now? Do promise me as you won't."

The child paused, but no response came from the elder lad.

"Bob, do say as you won't do anything to him; please do," and this time the little fellow's tones were full of entreaty.

"What d'you want me to promise that for?" muttered Bob.

"Oh, I do want it so much," returned the other, without giving a direct answer.

"Why?" persisted Bob.

"Well," answered Johnnie, forced to tell his reasons, "it's 'cause of what teacher told us yesterday. Don't you mind, Bob, how he said that if we wanted to belong to Jesus and keep safe in His fold, we must try and be like Him. And he said Jesus was never angry, or cross, or wouldn't forgive, though they did such dreadful things to Him. So, Bob, don't let us be cross or angry, or else it'll show so plain that we don't belong to Him."

The little boy paused a minute, and then went on, still in a low dreamy voice. "I was dreadful naughty just now I know. I was so angry when Tom threw me down, 'cause it hurt so, that I thumped him with my fists as hard as ever I could till he got up. And I called him bad names too. But I'm sorry now. 'Twas because I forgot about Jesus then; but, oh Bob, He saw it all! and He must have thought I didn't care about Him a bit! But I do: I love Him so I can't bear to think of vexing Him," and Johnnie's sobs mingled with his words. "Do you think He'll forgive me, Bob? 'cause I am sorry, real downright sorry!"

Bob had turned his face quite away, so that nothing of it could be seen; and now when Johnnie paused, he gave for answer nothing more than a sort of grunt deep down in his throat, which sound might have meant "yes," or "no," or anything. But Johnnie seemed to think it meant the former, as he pressed for nothing further, though his tender little heart seemed still full of sorrow.

CHAPTER V.—AN INDEPENDENT ACTION.

Dinner time came, but Johnnie could not move without such pain that Bob told him to "'bide still," and he would bring his dinner out to him. Accordingly he went in, and asked for his brother's share of the meal.

"Why don't he come and get it for himself?" said Mrs. Saunders, shortly, as she stood rocking in her arms a sickly, fretful baby.

"'Cause he's bad," returned Bob, quite as shortly.

"Bad! What's the matter with him?"

"He's hurt."

"How? What has he done to himself?"

"Some of 'em knocked him down."

"Oh, is that all!" exclaimed Mrs. Saunders, as she gave herself to the task of endeavouring to still the infant's cries, which grew louder and louder. "Can't he stand a tumble without making all this fuss over it! my word, it's time he learnt not to be such a baby!"

Bob shot an angry glance out of his eyes at these words; but Mrs. Saunders was too much taken up with her sick child to notice it; and Bob, having secured his own and Johnnie's portion, took no further heed of her or any of the others, but hastened back to his little brother.

"I don't know how I'm ever to get to school," remarked Johnnie, when the time drew near. "It hurts so dreadful bad when I try to move!"

"Then you 'bide here; and I'll make the door fast outside so that nobody shan't get in to you; and I'll come straight back after school."

"But aunt 'll be angry if I don't go, she's so strict about school!

"Oh, she shan't know anything about it; or if she does, I'll settle it. You 'bide still here, and Mary Jane 'll keep you company."

And Bob drew forth the pretty little dove, which nestled close up to the child in a confiding manner, whilst he stroked its soft plumage, and murmured gentle words of endearment in a caressing tone, the bird meantime making a low cooing, as if replying to all he said. Bob watched them a minute, and then turned to leave; taking care to fasten the door very securely on the outside.

Tom Lane was not at school that afternoon, so that Bob was not tempted to endeavour to revenge Johnnie's hurts upon him. But on the way home his cousin Sam overtook him, with the question, "Where's Johnnie? 'cause he wasn't at school."

"That ain't no business of yours," growled Bob, with a threatening look.

"Yes it is: and I shall tell mother he's been shirking school," answered Sam, defiantly.

"You dare to, you sneak!" shouted Bob angrily. "Let me catch you telling tales, that's all, and I'll soon teach you not to do it another time!" and forthwith Bob, who was the bigger of the two, seizing the other boy by the collar, gave him a violent shaking, accompanied by a stinging box on the ear.

Then he flung him from him, with the muttered words—"You'd best hold your tongue, I warn you;" and, regardless of Sam's whines and howls as he held his hand to the ear which was still tingling from the blow, he stalked off homewards. Sam gazed after him with glances of hatred and ill-will; but apparently he judged it best to take heed to Bob's hints, for when he arrived at home he said nothing on the subject of Johnnie's absence from school that afternoon.

The little fellow himself turned towards Bob on his entrance with looks of such bright welcome that the latter could not fail to perceive that his presence brought pleasure to the child. Johnnie cared for him, he could not doubt that; but he was the only one in all the wide world who did care for and love him—"Surly Bob." It seemed strange that such affection should be bestowed upon him, so ill-tempered, ill-mannered, and ill-looking a lad as he knew himself to be. Wonderful, it appeared to him, that Johnnie, whom nearly every one loved and praised, should turn to him, and cling to him, and like to be with him; should take it so to heart when he got blamed or punished, and be so grateful for any little thing he did for him. How could he help returning such love?

He didn't try to help it, though he often tried not to show it; but in the depths of his heart—that heart of which so many felt inclined to doubt the existence—there dwelt a fund of tenderness, and devotion, and half-reverential love for the little brother, who was so good, so clever, so altogether different from himself. The praises which Johnnie so often received from his teachers—whilst he had nothing but blame bestowed upon him—awoke no feeling of jealousy in his breast, but only served to confirm his sense of Johnnie's superiority and his own inferiority.

And now, with the almost womanly softness and gentleness which Johnnie's helplessness and weakness called forth in him, he stooped over him, and in a few words—for Bob was never known to waste them, whatever he might have done with other things—he asked how he had been getting on, and if his pain was any better.

But though poor little Johnnie tried to put a good face on the matter, and said, with a smile, that Mary Jane had been very lively, and had gone on chattering to him all the time that Bob had been away, yet he could not conceal from his brother's sharp eyes how much he was suffering; and the latter's countenance darkened, and again he clenched his fist, as if preparing to deal out blows to some unseen enemy. (To be continued.)

"THE QUIVER" BIBLE CLASS.

263. It is supposed, when St. Paul dwelt at Rome with a soldier who kept him, that he was chained to the soldier; what passage in the Acts tends to strengthen this idea?

264. What price did Amaziah, King of Judah, pay for the hire of one hundred thousand of the Israelites?

265. On what occasion did Samuel express a fear that Saul would kill him?

266. Quote a passage in which St. Paul states to what tribe he belonged.

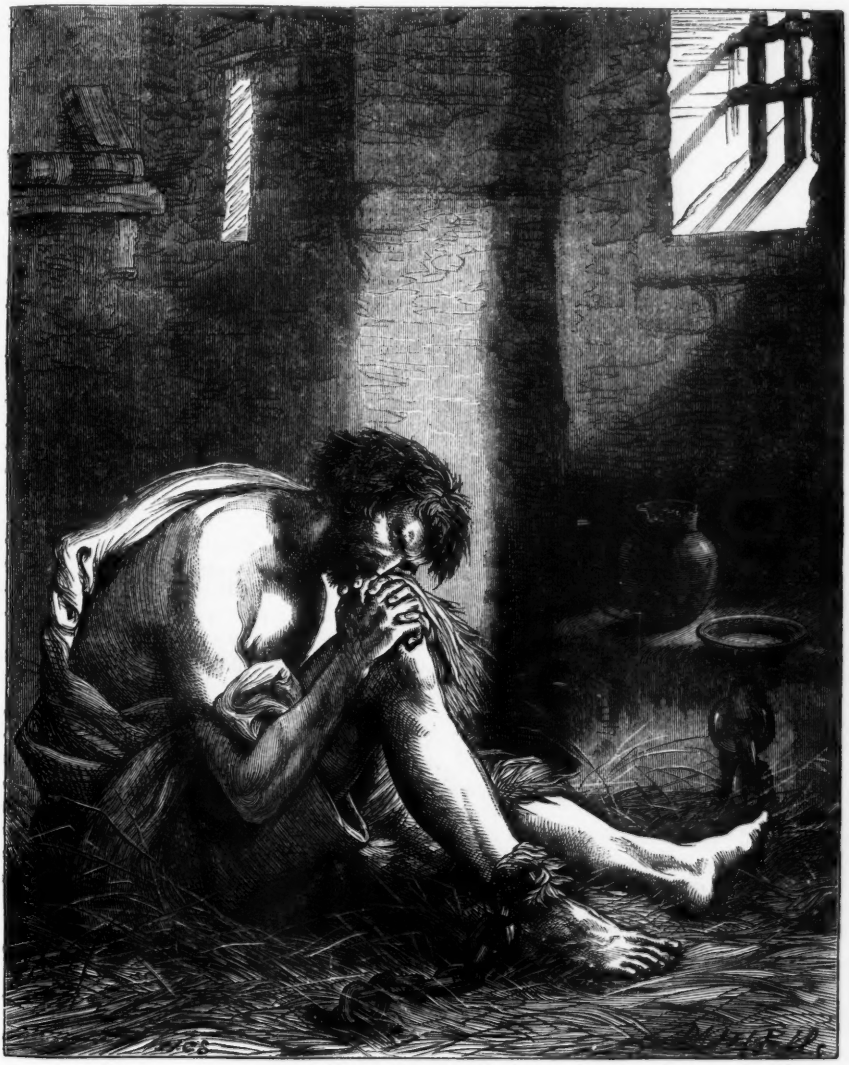
267. In connection with the gathering of the manna in the wilderness it is said, "He that gathered much had nothing over, and he that gathered little had no lack." Where does St. Paul use this passage in connection with almsgiving?

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS ON PAGE 640.

249. "And they said unto Him, Behold thy mother and thy brethren seek for thee. And He answered them saying, Who is my mother or my brethren? And He looked round about on them which sat about Him, and said, Behold my mother and my brethren! For whosoever shall do the will of God, the same is my brother, my sister, and mother" (Mark iii. 32—35).

250. That the daughters should marry to some one in their own tribe (Numbers xxxvi. 6).

251. The turning water into wine (John ii. 7—11). The feeding the multitudes on two occasions with a few loaves and fishes (Matt. xiv. 15—21 and xv. 34—38).



252. To illustrate God's dealings with those of the houses of Judah who had gone into captivity, and with those who were left behind in Jerusalem (Jeremiah xxiv. 1—3).

253. The fear that the children of Israel felt towards those nations who used them (Joshua xvii. 16; Judges i. 19 and iv. 3).

254. "All the congregation brought him without the camp, and stoned him with stones, and he died" (Numbers xv. 36).

255. "Wherefore we would have come unto you, even I, Paul, once and again, but Satan hindered us" (1 Thess. ii. 18).

256. "Speak unto the children of Israel and bid them, that they make fringes in the borders of their garments; and that they put upon the fringe of the borders a riband of blue, that ye may look upon it and remember all the commandments of the Lord and do them" (Numbers xv. 38, 39).

(Drawn by H. C. SELOUS.)

THE FIRST STONE.

FORSAKEN, down-trodden, crime-laden, heart-broken,
He lies in the dust. Cast thou not the first stone;
And be not, by thy too-ready lips, his doom spoken;
On high sits the Judge who may judge him alone.

He hath sinned. Well, who hath not? If to us were given,
To each and to all, what stern justice deems due,
Not a man of us ever could hope to gain heaven,
Nor e'er the strait gate of salvation pass through.

Forgive him! Who art thou dar'st sit on thy neighbour
In self-assured judgment? Say, hast thou no spot?
No speck on thy conscience? Why shouldest thou labour
To prove him all guilty, yet dream thou art not?

Oh, hypocrite! know that far sweeter to heaven
The tears of a sinner than those of the just,
As fresh scent gains the rose after tempest hath striven,
And sweeter her blossoms bloom out of the dust.

ASTLEY H. BALDWIN.

THE BRIDGE BETWEEN.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE TROUBLES OF CHATTY AND MOLLY," "THE DINGY HOUSE AT KENSINGTON," "QUEEN MADGE," "AGAINST HERSELF," ETC., ETC., ETC.

CHAPTER XXXVI.—AN EVENTFUL EVENING.

IT was indeed a happy day for the Woodwards on which they returned to the dear old house at Hampstead. The old sweet smile (which she had bestowed on Netta) came back to Mrs. Woodward's kind face, and Mr. Woodward recovered his health in the familiar study and in sight of the wild overgrown garden. Fortune smiled on them too, and Mr. Woodward was offered the editorship of a magazine, which he was only too glad to accept, and so things balanced themselves again, and the burden no longer fell upon Dorothy.

"I don't know what we should have done without you, my child," he said to her as they sat in the study one evening—the study which looked almost the same as in former days, for they found to their surprise that George Blakesley had bought in most of the things which had been in it, and had replaced them as a pleasant surprise on their return. "You have saved us all from ruin," he went on. "There would have been nothing but starvation or the workhouse for us if you had not kept the family together. I did not think there was so much in you, Dorothy."

And this was her reward, the knowledge that she had begun to live not only for herself but for others, that if she went from among those around her they would miss, not merely a face and form they loved because by kinship she belonged to them, but that they would miss also the work her hands had found to do and the thoughts her heart conceived. She had learnt to make herself necessary to the comfort and happiness of those within her reach, and in this satisfaction to find her own. They were very happy days, those of the first six months, spent in the old house. The garden had been untouched, and the sycamore-tree came into leaf, and all looked the same as in years past—

"The same, the same, yet not the same,
Oh never, never more."

thought Dorothy as she wandered down the moss-grown pathway with Adrian Fuller, "just as of old."

"It is like the days of our youth returned," he said.

"Oh no," she answered. "It is changed altogether, and we most of all."

"No," he said, "not changed, only we are a little tired. You have worked too hard, and I have never felt satisfied with life."

"You never will," she said, simply.

"Yes I shall some day," he answered, looking down at the frank fearless face and the drooping contradictory eyes, "I shall be some day, when I have secured enough to buy ease (I don't mean luxury), and can live quietly by the sea and dream away my life, and no longer have to work. Would you like that, Dorothy?" He was so certain she loved him still, as she had done in days gone by (and as he had learnt to love her in those that followed), that he did not think it necessary to trouble himself about any other possibility.

"No," she said, almost with a shudder. "I should be miserable, you cannot really mean it! you would not waste all your life and all your talents and let your energies lie dormant. Life was given us for something higher than that."

"For what was it given to us, you little Methodist?" he asked.

"To work and to help others, so that we in turn may be helped, and so that we may make the world, if only in the persons of the one or two around us, better than we found it; and for you, Adrian," for her reverence had vanished with her love for him, and she called him by his Christian name now, "you have talent, and can not only help others with it, but can leave your work to delight them long after you are forgotten, or only your name is remembered. It is not one's self one wants remembered, only to know that one's works are. It is not many who can hope for this, but you can. Such as I can only try to make the passing time here and there a little pleasanter for others, but even this is no mean thing."

"What an odd child you are, Dorothy; but I don't care a jot for these things. I don't want fame, only to be lazy and enjoy myself and dream away my life. Come in the house and play over some of your snatches to me," and they moved down the dim pathway.

"But you must care for these things," she said, "or you have no business to take up that place in the world which a better worker and a nobler nature might occupy. you bar up the way for him, and this is a crime. And day-dreams are things which we should only value as we try to fulfil them. We may have other dreams as well, and we want rest and quiet and all that, I know, but there can be no real rest unless we first tire ourselves with honest work; and I cannot think there will be any place hereafter in the Master's house for those who have not tried to do Him honour in the world." He let her hand slide from his arm. He was getting afraid of the girl—a quaint grave child still in look and years, who talked so strangely.

"Come into the house," he said, and drew her gently through the dark passage. Mr. and Mrs. Woodward were in the study. Tom was out, and Will and Sally had gone to look at men and women, so that the latter might carry them home in her memory, and draw new pictures. They went through the house and into the sitting-room, furnished with George Blakesley's "spider-legs and crockery," yet still bearing a vague likeness to former days in that it contained the old piano and the glass into which Dolly and the Beauty had looked one morning long ago. "Come and play," he said, and she, glad of the rest, sat down to the keys. He went to the other end of the room, and sat leaning back on an old uncomfortable sofa, while she sent odd snatches of music, strange and sweet—like herself, Adrian Fuller thought—through the fast-darkening room.

"I wish you would sing," he said. Dorothy had taken to singing to herself lately, but at best it was a poor little voice, though always sweet and in time.

"I can't," she said.

"Yes you can," he contradicted, "and I like your queer little voice; so sing."

She gave a nervous laugh, that ended almost in a shudder. It was so like one of the lordly speeches he used to make long ago, when she and Tom and Will were all children, and Sally could only just toddle, and he was then their great friend and playfellow. It seemed like an echo from a dead summer. She waited a minute, and then began, and sang song after song, till she thought he must be tired or asleep, for he made no sign, not that she had been thinking of him, for her thoughts had been far away, and the tears were stealing slowly down her cheeks.

"What sad songs they are," he said.

"I like sad songs," she answered, drearily.

"What was that one you was singing last night? I liked that," he said. She waited a moment or two and then began:—

"I made another garden, yea,
For my new love,
I left the dead rose where it lay
And set the new above.
Why did the summer not begin?
Why did my heart not haste?
My old love came and walked therein
And made my garden waste."

The symphony died away, but no second verse came or could come that night, the sounds from the piano ceased altogether, and the girl sat silently before it, hidden by the friendly darkness. He got up, and crossed the room quickly, and knelt beside her so as to be level with the face, which, he could dimly see, was buried in the two slender hands and bent forward over the keyboard.

"I understand you, you foolish child," he said, soothingly. She looked up flushed and afraid; he could not surely dream of repeating the mistake of long ago, she thought. "But we understand each other now, and you know I love you at last," he said, gravely and earnestly, in calm assured tones such as Netta Woodward with all her fascination had never listened to from him. She looked at him blankly, hardly realising what he meant, and he, mistaking her, went on. "It is all right now, and we belong to each other, do we not, Dorothy? and if you only will promise not to preach any more sermons," he put in almost laughing, for he had no idea of any answer but one from her, "we shall lead such a happy life together and"—but she managed to find her voice at last, and spoke, with the tears still on her cheeks, and a voice that was firm enough, though its tone was sweet and gentle.

"You are mistaken, Adrian; you are altogether mistaken; and must never speak to me like this any more, for I should like us always to be friends."

"What do you mean, child?" he asked, aghast at her manner rather than her words, not that he thought it really meant anything but the only one he considered possible. "You know you belong to me, and you shall, you little goose."

"Oh no, no!" she answered. "It is all gone by, it is indeed. Friends, yes, but that is all, Adrian; never anything more."

"And why not?

"We should never be happy, we think so differently. We used to be alike once perhaps, but it is all changed now, and if we lived our lives together we should still be far apart."

"But why is this?" he asked, his face looking grave and anxious. She could see it in the dark. It was such a handsome face, with large pleading eyes, that made her tremble and turn away, but only because a remembrance of old feelings came keenly back, and, for a moment, she "saw her soul in last year's glass" and wavered. "You cared for me once;" and feeling her wince, he added, "long ago when we all played in the garden together."

"Few things have a second summer, and then it is generally only a reflection of the first," she answered.

"It was Netta, I suppose. She spoilt everything," he said.

"No," Dorothy answered quickly, indignant that he should try to make a woman bear the blame. "You spoilt her life, she said so! If you had really cared for her as you pretended, she might have been different, but you were only fascinated, or if you loved her the feeling was not strong enough to move you from your love of ease."

"I say, are you going to finish your song, Doll?" said a voice that startled them to their feet. "We have been listening to your performance and want to know what you left off for? Are you two spooning in the dark, or what?" It was Tom's voice, of course. Dorothy rushed to the window, and opened it.

"Spooning," she began, indignantly, "we were talking"—the words died away on her lips. Tom was leaning against the outer wall of the house, and by his side was George Blakesley.

"How did you know I was here?" Adrian Fuller asked.

"Guessed it," answered the tormentor, concisely, "just as we guessed you were spooning."

"We were not spooning," she said, excitedly, almost crying with rage.

"Very well, Dolly dear," he said, teasingly, "then she wasn't spooning."

"We were listening while you sang, Miss Woodward, and as you did not finish the last song, we got impatient," George Blakesley said. His voice and his manner were the same as ever, but he called her Miss Woodward, and she heard it, oh so plainly! "I know the song you were singing—the words I mean."

"I did not expect to see you again," she said, trying to change the conversation, and wondering also what had brought him.

"I know. I have said good-bye to all my friends, and I sail the day after to-morrow;" he was really going, then, and the faint hope roused in her heart by his coming died out. Then a silence fell on the group—on the two looking out and the two looking in at the window, and presently, almost mechanically, she began watching a carriage in the distance, which was advancing along the road, the lamps looking like two fiery eyes in the distance. Dorothy's heart was standing still, and her hands were trembling with suppressed emotion, and she saw and knew and heard nothing till Tom exclaimed, almost with a shout, "Why, it's stopping here!" and the carriage drew up, and by the fitful light of the lamps she saw, amidst a cloud of wraps, the face of Netta the Beauty.

While Tom rushed forward, and Adrian Fuller went slowly round to the door, and Dorothy, in her surprise did not move, George Blakesley turned to her.

"I understand it all perfectly now," he said. "I thought it was so before I heard the song and you brake down to-night. I knew what it meant, though Tom never guessed. I am very glad, for I guess the end, and know he loves you."

"Oh, Mr. Blakesley!" she began, the tears coming to her eyes.

"I shall often think of you, and I am very glad," he said, in his unchanged manner, and then he pressed her two hands, hanging listlessly over the window-sill, and moved off.

"Oh stay, do stay! oh do come in!" she entreated.

"No," he said, "I have said good-bye long ago, and I sail the day after to-morrow;" and, evidently anxious to escape from the advent of the Beauty, he went, and she had no power to keep him, only to feel something that was like a sudden feeling of despair.

(To be continued.)

DAVID AND ABNER.

BY THE REV. W. HANNA D.D. LL.D.

IT was as king only over their single tribe that the men of Judah crowned David at Hebron. According to the Mosaic constitution, which gave the right of self-government to each tribe, and barred the interference of the others, they had no power to go further, nor does any step appear to have been taken by David towards inviting or constraining the other tribes to join Judah in acknowledging him as their king all through those five years* that appear to have intervened before Abner had Ishbosheth proclaimed as king over Israel at Mahanaim. Something like an invitation in this direction may perhaps be detected in David's message to the men of Jabesh-Gilead. Saul's first kingly act had been to rescue the Jabesh-Gileadites when on the very edge of a fearful calamity. The kindness thus shown they did not forget, and the day came for them to requite it. When the Philistines came to strip the slain on the bloody field of Gilboa, they found the bodies of Saul and of his three sons. Cutting off the head, and stripping off the armour of Saul, to hang them up as trophies in their great idol's temple, they gibbeted the bodies by nailing them up to the walls of Bethshan. To Jewish eye and feeling—among a people whose law forbad the suspension of a dead body, even of the bodies of those executed for the worst crimes, over a single night—a greater indignity could not have been shown to them. It was a poor and pitiful thing to wreak their vengeance thus on the lifeless corpses. It gives us, however, a striking proof of how complete the victory of Gilboa was, and how thoroughly the terror of the conquerors had pervaded the northern districts of the land, that not an Israelite was found there bold enough or grateful enough to rescue these bodies from the shameful exposure. The Jabesh-Gileadites took that burden and honour upon themselves. In face of a Philistine garrison, by a rapid night march, they took the bodies down, burned them, that they might be beyond the reach of a second such indignity being put upon them, and buried what bones the hasty fire had left beneath a memorial tree—a deed which, when reported to David, kindled the liveliest admiration, the warmest approval. Instantly a message was sent off to the Jabesh-Gileadites, applauding to the highest what they had done, speaking of it indeed as if it were a favour bestowed upon himself. Had it been his own sons whose bodies had been borne thus to honourable burial he could not have thanked them more cordially than he did. Beyond however the generous grateful feeling that breathes throughout the message, there might have been a wise yet delicate policy in his saying to them, "And now the Lord show kindness and truth unto you; and I also will requite you this kindness, because ye have done this thing. Now, therefore, let your hands be strengthened, and be ye valiant, for your master Saul is dead, and also the house of Judah have anointed me king over them." He speaks as one having official right to acknowledge and reward an act of public virtue; and, by telling what the house of Judah had done, hints at what the other tribes might do also. Summoning them to valiant action against the common enemy, he virtually promises them his protection—a promise that took in more than the Jabesh-Gileadites, that gave all Israel to know that David was under no such ties of recent obligation to the Philistines as would interfere in any wise with the duty he owed to all that sought the shelter of his throne. Such was the only attempt—assuredly a very modest and gentle one—to sway the movements of the northern and eastern tribes. Left wholly to themselves, these tribes, after some petty displays of tribal jealousy, would have fallen in with Judah in acknowledging the supremacy of David. Left wholly to himself, Ishbosheth would never have set himself up as a rival to David. He had not the ability, if he had had the ambition, to occupy such a post. He had however in his cousin Abner one with ambition and ability equal to that or any task. His near relationship to Saul, the high place he had held as chief captain of the army, the pre-eminent ability that he had shown in the many public services he had rendered, all conspired to give him great weight with the people. The opportunity was an inviting one. None knew better the irresolution and incapacity of Ishbosheth than Abner. Could he succeed in planting him on the throne of Israel, the power would all virtually be in his hands, otherwise his consequence and influence in the state must be comparatively small. David had relatives of his own—captains trained under his own eye—to elevate and to reward. Keeping Israel well in hand, holding them back from joining Judah on the one hand, and from prematurely kindling again the strife with the Philistine, slow and weary, he waited full five years, and when at last it seemed to him that all was ripe for action, knowing well that it would be by the tribes beyond the river that the scale would be turned, and that it was in their territory alone that the new king could at first at least be safe, he carried Ishbosheth to Mahanaim, and there had him proclaimed king.

* Ishbosheth, we are told, reigned two years over Israel (2 Sam. ii. 10), and David reigned seven and a half years as king in Hebron (2 Sam. ii. 10). There must, therefore, have been five years of David's reign during which there was no king over Israel.

It does not appear that David took any steps to thwart the project thus carried out, and had Abner been content to remain at Mahanaim, consolidating there the kingdom he had set up, David would have remained at Hebron, peaceably awaiting the will of God. But Abner had grown bold and over-confident. He mistook the inactivity of David. Timidity, he well knew, was foreign to David's spirit; he attributed it, therefore, to conscious weakness. Under this impression he led a large and threatening force to Gibeon, on the confines of Judah, with evident intention of attack. He thus took upon himself the responsibility of the civil war which followed, and for every drop of Israelitish blood that was shed in it must he be held guilty. Threatened in such a way, David took measures of defence. He did not however, as he would have done had he meditated aggressive action, lead out his army in person. Remaining himself at Hebron, he devolved this office on Joab, whose whole conduct in the affair that followed—the readiness with which he recalled his men from the pursuit when it would have been easy for him to have reaped still larger fruits of victory, and especially the words that he addressed to Abner (2 Sam. ii. 27)—conspire to tell us that his orders had been to act entirely on the defensive. But when the two armies stood front to front at the pool of Gibeon, it was difficult to prevent collision. The proposal of Abner, to settle the dispute by a passage of arms between twelve chosen soldiers on either side, reminds of like incidents both in Roman and Scottish story. The issue in this case was unique, and when all the twenty-four champions lay slain before their eyes, it was impossible to prevent the two armies from engaging in the conflict. Some sudden panic must surely have seized upon Abner's soldiers. They must have fled at the first onset, else, in such a conflict, always a bloody one where men of the same nation fight with one another, there had been a larger number slain. It was a sense, perhaps, of the unrighteousness of the cause they were fighting for that stripped Abner's soldiers of much of their strength, and turned them to speedy flight. In that flight we mourn the early death of the light-footed Asahel. Undoubtedly he brought that death upon himself. Twice warned, he would not turn back; and yet how natural was it for him to neglect the warning, borne on in the hurry of the pursuit, outstripping all his comrades, singling out the man who had been the cause of all the mischief, getting nearer and nearer to Abner at every stride, the glory apparently within his reach of at once ridding his king of his chief enemy, and restoring peace and unity to Israel. We follow his fleet footsteps with trembling interest, as at last he comes up quite close to his foe, and as that backward thrust of Abner's spear transfixes him, quenching that young life in all its glowing warmth, stiffening those active limbs into the rigidity of death, we stand still for a moment, as those did who came to the place where he fell down dead, to drop over the lifeless body the tribute of a tear. Abner knew well to what this deed exposed him. He knew that, by the law and usage of the land, the duty of avenging the blood of Asahel lay on Joab and Abishai. He was well aware how thoroughly by such men this duty would be discharged. But he was not prepared for the treachery which cost him his life.

When Joab sounded the retreat, in hot haste he marched night and day till he got back to Hebron. So quick continuous march of a victorious army one can interpret best upon the supposition that Joab felt that he had exceeded the king's order, and was eager, before any other report reached David, to explain in person the origin and issue of the battle. A desultory war, conducted, it would appear with no great eagerness, and attended with no important results on either side, ensued. David continued to act mainly on the defensive, and Abner felt too weak to become again the aggressor.

In this war David waxed stronger and stronger, and the house of Saul weaker and weaker. The eleven tribes were losing heart. They could not but contrast the wisdom and strength of David with the imbecility and feebleness of their own king. They could not but lament a division that weakened their nation, and made them a bye-word and reproach to their neighbours. Above all, they could not but feel that, in contending against David, they were opposing the declared will of Him whom they all acknowledged as their Sovereign Head. And none knew all this better, or felt it more keenly, than Abner. He was too shrewd a man not to recognise that it was a hopeless task ever to get such a prince as Ishbosheth recognised as king of all the tribes, and almost as hopeless to support him permanently, even upon the throne of Israel. He may already have made up his mind to make terms with David, and, by some signal service rendered, to purchase safety at least, if not promotion and honour, at his court. An occasion and excuse for his doing so was given, when Ishbosheth ventured to challenge and condemn him for having taken to wife Rizpah, the daughter of Ai, his father's concubine. The jealousy which Ishbosheth cherished and expressed may have even gone the length of attributing to Abner the design of taking his father's crown, as well as concubine. However this was, Abner flew into a towering passion, swore that he would translate the kingdom from the house of Saul, and proceeded without delay to make good his oath. A private overture was made to David. Whatever of treachery there may have been in it on Abner's part towards Ishbosheth, David saw no reason why he should not welcome it. A league was struck between them. Abner went himself to Hebron, sounding the different tribes by the way, and preparing them for the revolution he had undertaken to bring about. His reception at Hebron was all that he could have desired; and he was returning, confident of success, when he was followed and brought back by Joab, taken aside by the gate of the city, and basely slain. The treacherous deed put David in a peculiarly difficult position. The old Arab practice, prevalent for centuries in the countries bordering on Palestine, was, that when a man was slain, whether justifiably or not, the nearest of kin had to kill the man-slayer, wherever he could find him. The Mosaic law, so far from setting aside or condemning this practice, virtually legalised it. It made, indeed, a singular provision, in the establishment of the cities of refuge, for reducing it as much as possible to a nullity, by making it so easy for the homicide to escape. It was in exercise of his right as the blood-avenger, that Joab slew Abner.* Had the murder been committed within the gates of Hebron, which was one of the cities of refuge, he would have been amenable to the law; and, high as his position was, near as was his relationship to David, such base deceit, as well as cruelty, had been displayed, that the law would have been carried out against him. But Joab had taken good care to keep within its guardianship, by leading Abner aside before they entered into the city, and slaying him without its gates.

In such circumstances, what was David to do? It was not the mere rank or relationship of Joab that restrained him from punishing him. On the day when they crowned him king at Hebron, he had taken a solemn oath faithfully to administer the law of Moses. By punishing Joab, was he openly to violate it? It only remained, that he should do all, short of punishing the deed as it deserved, to manifest his abhorrence: and could more of this kind have been done? Making no account of what Joab might think or say, he loudly and openly condemned this act, wiping his hands of it, denouncing the heaviest vengeance on its perpetrator (2 Sam. ii. 28, 29). He forced Joab himself to rend his clothes and put on sackcloth,

* This has been doubted and denied (see Keil and Delitzsch), but is supported by the authority of Ewald.

and stand before the lifeless body of Abner, in acknowledgment of his guilt. On the day of the interment, the king himself followed the bier as chief mourner; and, weeping amid the weeping multitude, poured over the tomb the touching elegy he had composed. The whole day of the gloomy funeral he would touch no food till the sun went down, and at its close he turned to his servants and said, "Know ye not that there is a prince and a great man fallen this day in Israel? and I am this day weak, though anointed king: and those men, the sons of Zeruiah, be too hard for me. The Lord reward the doer of evil according to his wickedness."

It was no doubt desirable that, before the community at large, and particularly before the trans-Jordanic tribes, David should stand acquitted of all complicity with Joab's crime; and there may have been a touch of wise policy in such prompt and energetic means being taken to effect this; but there was such a transparent honesty, such a pure spontaneous outflow of emotion in all that David said and did, as utterly to preclude all idea of dissimulation. "All the people and all Israel understood that it was not of the king to slay Abner;" and they were pleased with him, and proud of him, as they saw him weeping over the grave.

For a little while after the death of Abner, the tottering throne of Ishbosheth still stood, till two officers of his guard, penetrating his bed-chamber, took him as he lay asleep, slew him, beheaded him, and hurried with the ghastly trophy in their hands to lay it at David's feet, reaping an ignominious death as their immediate and fit reward. Then "came all the tribes of Israel to David unto Hebron." Of their own free motion, it would seem, unprompted, unguided, they came. The tender of allegiance was made and accepted, the league was struck, the oaths were taken; a second time David was anointed, but now as king over all the land, a three days' feast celebrating the great event.

Upon that throne to which he thus was raised David had a great work before him. He had to bind together the scattered and hitherto independent tribes into a compact and coherent community. He had to lay broad and deep the foundations of a monarchy that was to last for nearly 500 years. He had to meet assault after assault, coming from the nations all around, and maintain by arms the integrity and independence of his country. He had not only to roll back the tide of conflict from the borders of Israel, but by many a foreign war, successfully conducted, to add to its boundaries. To that small community of Hebrews he had to give a place and a name among the nations, that has told decidedly and extensively on the character and destinies of the entire race of mankind. He had to revivify and restore the services of the sanctuary, reinstating the priesthood in its proper place of authority and influence, laying the foundations, in fact, of the Temple worship organised and completed by Solomon. And in doing this he had to furnish, in many sacred odes, expressions of penitence, of trust, of hope, of joy, of triumph, such in their compass, beauty, force, and tenderness, that they were destined to survive even the fall of Judaism, outlast all his other works, to be upon the lips of all devout worshippers of the Most High God as long as this globe shall last.

For tasks so singular David was singularly prepared. Let us look back for a moment upon the thirty-seven years that preceded the enthronement at Hebron. A childhood in a dignified home of piety; a shepherd youth, of quiet contemplation, among the hills, the harp a-tuning that was to lead the worship of the world; a glimpse at a monarch's court, a lesson for young ambition to lay to heart, telling how uneasy a seat a throne may be, and how a dark and troubled spirit can strip it of all power to gratify; a sudden elevation to unbounded popularity; proofs given of wisdom in council, courage on the battle-field; the prospect of standing for life next the king; as sudden a change from court residence and high honours to outlawry, exile, and bitter years of merciless persecution; then seven and a half years of restricted command, of patient expectancy of practice in the art of ruling at Hebron—altogether a preparatory discipline such in form and variety as few men in the same length of time have passed through, yet all telling in qualifying him for his life-work. When Heaven has some great work to do it finds the right instrument, and it knows how to fit the instrument for the work.

LEAF-HUES.

WHERE green is all the common hue
Of leaves, there seldom comes to light
A greenness for the blossoms too,
But they are blue, or red, or white.

With my dear child's last dress of green,
Her face of blushing white was seen,
The while her hair hung freely down
In waving locks of golden brown.

The chestnut leaves die off to red,
And maple leaves in yellow die;
The holly leaves in brown lie dead,
And bramble brown and grey will lie.

But she lay dead as white 's a sheet;
She lay as white as flour of wheat;
And she was folded all in white,
To rise an angel ever bright.

STILL AND DEEP.

BY F. M. F. SKENE, AUTHOR OF "TRIED," "ONE LIFE ONLY," ETC.

CHAPTER XLI.

MEANWHILE in Madame Brunot's house the anxious hours were slowly passing, and the poor invalid, worn out by the suspense, had fallen asleep at last, leaving Mrs. Parry free to quit her bed-side and come into the room where Mary Trevelyan still sat at the window. She was looking out at the calm clear sky, which now was bathed in all the glory of a beautiful sunset, and she was thinking of John Pemberton's wistful gaze towards it when he told her how his spirit longed for the presence of his Lord.

"He will always be happy," thought Mary, "whether he lives or dies, for his heart is already in heaven," and then her thoughts turned, as they ever did, to her poor Bertrand, and to mournful speculations as to where, even in that moment, he might be.

Mrs. Parry, meanwhile, was walking restlessly about the room, feeling more and more anxious as to the fate of the missing child.

There had been a succession of sharp quick shots heard not very far from the house a short time before; but cannonading and firing of all kinds was so continually going on around them, that it had scarcely attracted their attention at all. Suddenly, however, the door opened, and Valerie burst in, bareheaded, with her long hair tangled in confusion on her shoulders, her dress stained and torn, and her face convulsed with passionate weeping.

"Oh Mary! oh nurse Parry!" she exclaimed; "my Mr. Pemberton! my poor Mr. Pemberton! What shall I do? oh! what shall I do?" and, sobbing, almost shrieking, she rushed to Mary, who had risen, trembling, and hid her face against her, while she clung to her hands.

"What is it, Valerie? dear child, try and tell us!" said Mary. "Where is Mr. Pemberton?"

"Lying on the pavement. Oh, he cannot speak to me; they shot at him, and he fell! They were trying to kill me, and he came between me and the guns! he did it to save me! Oh my Mr. Pemberton! I want him to get up and speak to me!"

Mrs. Parry uttered a cry of dismay, but Mary, white and calm, laid her hand on her arm.

"Do you not hear Madame Brunot calling? she has been awakened, and is alarmed; go and tell her Valerie is safe."

Mrs. Parry obeyed, and then Mary made the child drink some wine and water, and when her gasping sobs had a little subsided, she said to her, "Now, Valerie, try and describe to me exactly the spot where Mr. Pemberton is lying; I am going to him at once."

"I will go with you and show you: I want to go to him, my dear, dear Mr. Pemberton!"

"But will it be safe for you? who was it hurt Mr. Pemberton and tried to kill you?"

"The soldiers, because I had helped Herr Klein; but they have gone away. Some people came out of their houses when the shots were fired, and they said the men had killed an Englishman, and the English ambassador would be angry, and then the soldiers all ran away, and took no more notice of me; and I want to go to my poor Mr. Pemberton; I am not afraid."

"We will go there at once, dear child," said Mary, hastening to quit the room before Mrs. Parry, whom she had purposely sent away, should come to exclaim against the idea of her going out in her weak state of convalescence. She threw a scarf lightly over her head, took Valerie by the hand, and stole down the stairs and out into the street.

It was a soft lovely evening, calm and peaceful; the western horizon seemed flooded still with liquid gold, while already the shadows were deepening on the earth.

The excited child drew Mary on more quickly almost than her feeble feet could carry her, but they had not far to go.

It had been impossible for John Pemberton to bring Valerie home without passing by the ruined house whence Klein had escaped; and there, it seemed, the vindictive soldiers had actually kept watch to intercept the poor child, whom they chose to believe could reveal to them some Prussian plot of treachery. Possibly they might hardly have meant to compass her death, but, as she afterwards told Mary, the moment she came up to the ruined house half a dozen of them rushed out from behind its broken walls, where they had been in ambush, and pounced upon her with shouts of triumph, but instantly Pemberton's strong hands had torn her out of their grasp, and he held her safe sheltered within his arm while he confronted her foes. Then had ensued a terrible struggle, of which Valerie was never able to give any distinct account. Mary was now about to learn what had been its fatal result. She saw, as they advanced, a group of persons standing in a circle on the pavement, at a short distance from the ruins, among whom she recognised one of the English gentlemen associated with the Society for the Relief of the Sick and Wounded, and several officials from the police-station. They made way for her as she came near, and then she saw that on which they had been gazing. John Pemberton lay stretched out on the stones, his calm face upturned to the sunset sky, whose glory fell upon it with a soft pure light. His dark eyes were fixed on the blue depths above his head with an intense full-orbed gaze, that seemed pregnant with meaning, and his pale lips were illuminated with a bright and joyful smile, such as they had seldom worn in his days of life and energy; yet, radiant and peaceful as was his countenance, it bore the unmistakable stamp of that great change which gives a solemn grandeur even to the features of the child who has passed through the mystery of death. It was so few hours, however, since Mary had seen him full of animation and spirit, that it seemed almost impossible for her to believe he had already been finally severed from all the conditions of humanity. She stood watching him for a few minutes in silence, and then looked round appealingly to the Englishman.

(Drawn by WILLIAM SMALL.)

"Valerie burst in, bareheaded."—p. 680.

"Is he really quite gone?" she whispered.

"Quite," he answered, sorrowfully; "he must have died instantaneously; he is shot through the heart. His little messenger Pierron, who was hovering near him, as usual, saw the deed done, and came at once to summon me. I hurried here as fast as a carriage could bring me; but I saw at once that no human aid could avail him. I can do no more now than arrange for his removal, and afterwards for his interment, which, in the present state of the city, cannot be long delayed."

"Let him be brought to our home," said Mary—"to Madame Brunot's—till you are obliged to take him away; we have a right to ask it, for he was our truest friend."

And so it was arranged. In a room on the ground-floor of their house he lay that night and part of the next day, where Mary and Valerie went continually to kiss the kind hands that could labour for his fellow-creatures no more, and to lay bunches of snowdrops and violets on his quiet breast, while the little children played round his bier, fearless of the gentle presence that was only associated in their mind with thoughts of love and tenderness.

At noon on the following day he was borne forth, and taken to a sunny corner of the vast realm of the dead at Père la Chaise.

Mrs. Parry could not leave the invalid, who had been greatly shaken by the terrible events of the previous day; so Mary Trevelyan and Valerie alone stood side by side, and saw the earth heaped over the heart that had been so pure and true. When at last they turned away, leaving no trace of the noble, faithful friend, save one little additional mound among the thousands that are gathered there, little Valerie burst into a fit of uncontrolled weeping, while Mary walked, calm and silent, by her side. After a time the child looked up into the fair tranquil face, and said, half indignantly, "Are you not sorry to leave him all alone in that strange place, Mary?"

"Dear, I cannot grieve for him," she answered, gently; "for I know that he has gained his heart's desire. Though we have laid his body down alone in a foreign country, his happy spirit is safe in his native land of paradise."

"But he will never speak to us again, or help us as he used to do."

"No, Valerie; and I well know what we have all lost in him. I cannot think how we are to go on without his protecting care. But would it not be very selfish to wish him back in this sad world, away from the blessed home where he has found his Lord, because on earth he can labour for us no more?"

"I will try not to fret, if it is selfish," said Valerie; "but I shall miss him, oh so much!"

And poor Mary, glad as she was for his sake that his longing wish was granted, could echo that lament with all her heart. Who, in truth, could miss his generous help as she would, who had depended on him alone for sympathy and succour in that which was the very life of her life?

Since the second disappearance of Bertrand Lisle, which had been followed by the total absence of any tidings of him, every one but Mary herself believed that he must have succumbed to the fever from which he was suffering, especially after his exposure to the cold of that winter's night; but she never faltered in her conviction that, had he died, she would have known it in the innermost depths of her spirit, by the powerful instinct of her own faithful love.

All the time that she lay helpless on her sick-bed she knew that John Pemberton had persistently sought for him, in obedience to her wishes, though without the least hope that any good could result from it; and now she was well aware that there was no one left but herself on earth who either could or would take up the quest.

Yes, she stood alone—alone, with her constancy to that one love; but her heart only grew the stronger on his behalf from the sense that all others had forsaken him; if he were alive at all, it was certain that he must be in Paris; and if in Paris in its present state, it was equally certain that he must be in pain and suffering; therefore, as she passed out from the gate of Père la Chaise, and left her only helper in his quiet grave, she took the solemn resolution that she would devote all the strength and power which yet remained in her weakened frame to ascertain the fate of Bertrand Lisle, and bring him succour, if it could yet avail him.

CHAPTER XLII.

Mary Trevelyan's first step in her difficult undertaking was to visit in succession the various hospitals of Paris, all of which had ambulances attached to them for the succour of the wounded; and one and all were filled to overflowing. It would not be easy to describe how much it cost Mary, with her peculiarly retiring and quiet nature, to go thus alone from place to place, searching the ranks of the sick for the one face she so pined to see. But, in the disorganised state of the capital, there was nothing remarkable in a young girl presenting herself, either at the barracks or on the ramparts, in search of a missing friend; and thither Mary fully meant to go, at least to make inquiries, if her search through the hospitals proved of no avail.

Nearly a week was thus occupied in going from one scene of suffering to another, and still she found not a trace of her lost love to cheer her in her painful pilgrimage. At last she came, in the course of her search, to the hospital of Notre Dame de Pitié, where she had herself worked so long in the early part of the siege; and here she was brightened by the warm welcome which her little friend Marthe bestowed upon her the moment she saw her.

"Ah, Mademoiselle Marie!" she exclaimed; "I have so often wished for you, and wondered why you did not come back to us. I thought perhaps you had gone home to paradise; for you are a little saint, you know! Where have you been?"

"I have been very ill, dear Marthe, and in great trouble, or I would have come to see you."

"Ah! you do look ill—so thin and pale; but, for that matter, we shall all soon be walking skeletons, if this terrible siege goes on much longer. We live on corn and rice, and have very little else to give even our patients, now we have eaten up all our cats."

"What! even the pretty tabby that you were so fond of?" said Mary, with a sad smile. "Surely, you did not arrive at making her serve for your dinner?"

"Ah, but I did! She was a charming cat, and most caressing in her ways; but I ate her myself, my dear friend. I am stout, and I require nourishment." And, truth to tell, Marthe's appearance strongly conveyed the impression that either the cats or some other condiments had nourished her frame very satisfactorily. "Are you coming to work with us again, my dear?" she continued.

"Some day, perhaps, I may," answered Mary; "but for the present I must devote myself entirely to the search for a friend of mine who has been missing some weeks. I fear he is lying ill somewhere; and I thought he might have been brought to your ambulance."

"Come and see," exclaimed Marthe, catching her by the hand, and drawing her on to the sheds where the sick were lying; and once more she made her sad inspection from bed to bed, but with the usual result: Bertrand Lisle was not amongst the sufferers there. Mary felt more than usually desponding when she found that it was so; for this was the last hospital on her list, and even her strong faith in her own sympathetic instincts could not altogether save her from the terrible misgiving that she should never find her Bertrand, unless she could look through the graves in Père la Chaise or Montmartre. This thought brought silent tears to her eyes, as she sat down to rest for a few minutes on a seat in the courtyard, and her distress was quickly noticed by the shrewd Marthe.

"Tell me all about him, my dear child," she said, taking a seat beside Mary; "and perhaps I shall be able to help you. Who and what was he? and how did he disappear?"

Mary was thankful to catch at any advice or assistance that could be given her; and she at once told the quick-witted little woman all the circumstances of Bertrand's stay in Paris, so far as she knew them, and of his flight, under the pressure of a sudden shock, from the Church of the Trinity.

"You mean that he was quite delirious when he made his way into the streets that night?" asked Marthe.

"Yes, quite; there could be no doubt of it. He was in high fever, and had been light-headed through the day."

"Then, tell me, have you sought him at the Salpetrière?" said the nun.

"No," said Mary, eagerly; "I did not know anything about it. Is it a hospital?"

"At the present moment it is, because they have an ambulance attached to the institution, like the rest of us; but at ordinary times it is simply a refuge for the aged and the poor, and also—mark this—for the insane. It seems to me more than likely that whoever met your poor friend wandering about that night in a state of delirium would conclude he was insane, and consign him at once to the Salpetrière. Probably the police took him there."

"Oh, Marthe, let me go!" exclaimed Mary, starting to her feet; "I feel sure you are right; I believe I shall find him at last. Oh, how can I thank you enough!"

Mary was moved quite out of her usual calmness, and seemed hardly to know what she was saying, as, with trembling hands, she tried to tie on her hat, and hastened to the gate.

"Well, well!" said Marthe, with a comical smile, "it seems these quiet English people can excite themselves sometimes. This monsieur will not come back to life for nothing, if he is found."

But Mary was too much agitated to heed her playful sarcasm. She had quickly embraced the good woman in French fashion, on both cheeks, and was already at the outer entrance, telling Pierron, whom she had enlisted in her service, and who was waiting for her there, to call a cab for her as quickly as possible. She was soon driving away, while Marthe waved her adieux; and Mary went on with a glow of hope at her heart, which she felt had at last a foundation in reason. At length she had reached the outer lodge of the vast building, the Salpetrière, which shelters within its walls hundreds of those who are suffering from almost every form of earthly misery. The porter admitted her, but she found, as she had expected, that it would be necessary for her to see the director before she could ascertain if any one answering to the description of Bertrand Lisle had been admitted into the institution. She had to wait some time before he was at liberty, and she walked up and down the gravel walk in front of the door, looking up with longing eyes at the stout old walls. At last the tedious delay was over, and she was ushered into the director's room. He soon became interested in her simple quiet account of the long search for Bertrand Lisle; and the hope she now felt that he might have found shelter in the Salpetrière, and the unmistakable emotion and anxiety which showed itself even through her self-controlled manner, touched the business-like official so much that he was ready to spare no pains to ascertain if indeed the friend she sought was numbered among the thousand inmates of this hospitable refuge.

"I am nearly sure that we have had such a case as you describe," he said; "but I can ascertain on referring to our books. I am not certain that he is still with us."

Mary's heart almost ceased to beat. Could it be that she was about to lose the trace of him once again, when she had seemed so near success? She sat white and breathless, but still as ever, while the director ran his finger down column after column of the official book. Suddenly he clapped his hands.

"Ah! here we have him, I do believe." And he read out from the page: "No. 724; officer; brought by the police; supposed to be insane; found to be suffering from brain fever; attended by Dr. Cruvilliers for eight weeks; convalescent; gives his name as Bertrand de L'Isle, but speaks with a British accent, and looks like an Englishman.

"Look at this case, monsieur," said the director to the doctor, pointing to the entry in the book—"what can you tell this lady about it? is the patient still here?"

"Yes; he has quite recovered from his attack of brain fever, but it has left a weakness of the lower limbs which renders him perfectly helpless for the present, though it is a mere temporary result of his illness. I have kept him here because he seemed to have no friends to whom he could go; and in the present miserable state of Paris he is likely to get better nourishment with us than he could elsewhere; but a change would do him good; he is very melancholy."

"Perhaps the visit of this lady will make an improvement in that respect," said the director, glancing with a smile at Mary, who had started to her feet, and was standing with heaving chest and tremulous lips, and eyes full of joyous light. "Will you conduct her to him at once, monsieur?" he added.

"Willingly," said the doctor. "This way, mademoiselle." And with quick, short steps he hastened on down a long passage; while she followed, hardly able to bear the tumultuous throbbing of her heart in its intense thankfulness.

"Monsieur de L'Isle is not able to walk," said the doctor, "but I have had him carried into a small private garden we have for our own use, where he can enjoy the air and sunshine undisturbed by the other patients. It is here you will find him," he continued, opening a door in the corridor, which led out into a small enclosure; "but I will not intrude upon your happy meeting, mademoiselle." And standing aside to let Mary pass out, he made her an elaborate bow, closed the door behind her, and departed. Mary advanced a few steps, and then caught hold of the branch of a tree to support herself, as the strong tide of feeling swept over her, and made her trembling knees bend under her.

Bertrand was reclining in a wheel-chair, with his face turned in the opposite direction from where she stood; he was gazing at the flight of a bird that was winging its way high up over the smoke of the cannonading, as if it sought to leave the beleaguered city far behind it. The wistful sadness of his look seemed to show how gladly he too would have escaped from the spot to which his weakness confined him; but although he was pale and thin, and the sunny brightness of his face seemed dimmed, there was little change in the familiar countenance which had haunted Mary's thoughts by night and day for so many dreary months. She stood there trembling, seized with a sudden timidity. Now that the goal of all her hopes was won, perhaps Bertrand would not wish to see her, she thought; he did not love her; he had left her for Lurline. Though Lurline was false, it did not make herself more dear; might he not mistake her motive in seeking him? The courage failed her altogether to move a step nearer to him. How long she might have stood there it were hard to say; but fortunately the bird which Bertrand was watching soared finally out of sight. He lowered his gaze, and slowly turned his head; then his eyes fell on the slight graceful figure, the sweet fair face, with its tender, touching expression, so wistful and yet so timid, and instantly there flashed into his look a rapture which was unmistakable, even to her trembling heart. He uttered her name with a cry of joy, and, forgetting his helplessness, he made an effort to start from his chair and rush to her, but his limbs failed him, he sunk back into it again, and could only stretch out his arm, exclaiming, "Oh Mary, Mary, my darling! come to me! can it be possible, is it your very self?"

Then she went to his side, and, as he seized her hands, and clasped them in his own, he let his head fall down upon them, and she heard him murmuring words of thanksgiving to the compassionate God, who had let him look upon her face again.

(To be continued.)

SCRIPTURE LESSONS FOR SCHOOL AND HOME.

SCRIPTURE STORIES. SECOND SERIES. No. 7. CHRIST WALKING ON THE SEA.

Chapter to be read—Matt. xiv. (part of).

INTRODUCTION. Our last lesson on a miracle saw Christ healing the nobleman's son. Where was it? Christ again in the neighbourhood of Capernaum. Which disciples lived there? What was their occupation? Was now going to show these fishermen His power over the sea, that their faith in Him might be strengthened.

I. CHRIST ON THE MOUNTAIN. (Read 22, 23). What great miracle had Christ just worked? for how many people? After seeing this great miracle they began to think—What a wonderful man this is! He can provide food for a vast number; He will do for our king; so they began to think of keeping Him by force (John vi. 15). How could He escape from them? does not wish to entangle the disciples in a tumult, so sends them to the boat—probably Peter's—while He dismissed the crowd. How had He escaped violence once before at Nazareth (Luke iv. 30)? so now, in some quiet dignified way, parts from them, and ascends the mountain. Why does He go there? Has had a long day with large crowds; has healed a great many sick, fed them, taught them. Surely He will now seek rest! What does He want first? prayer, communion with God, rest and refreshment for the soul before the body. Picture the Saviour amid evening mists slowly climbing the hill, watching disciples in boat in the distance, then kneeling down in some sheltered spot, communing with God. What lessons can we learn? (1) Thought for others. The disciples sent out of reach of disturbance. Christ thought of Himself last. How different to many children! but true love "seeketh not her own" (1 Cor. xiii. 5). (2) The privilege of prayer. Most children pray as a duty; how many value it, love it? Christ loved prayer because loved God. So with all; if realise God as a Father who delights in His children, will then love Him, and love to pour out hearts in prayer. Remind how often read of prayer in open air—Isaac in the fields (Gen. xxiv. 63), Peter on house-top (Acts x. 9), Paul by river-side (Acts xvi. 13)—so all may commune with God in quiet moments, in walks, intervals of business, &c.

II. CHRIST ON THE SEA. (Read 24—33). Now turn to disciples. Had started late; but skilful fishermen, accustomed to Lake of Galilee, would expect soon to row across to other side; but now wind has changed; no longer favourable; obliged to get out long oars (Mark vi. 48); still make no way; waves high, dashing over sides, boat taking in water; all the while where is Jesus? watching them, never losing sight, waits till have exhausted all efforts, then goes to them; at what o'clock? From Mark xiv. 35 show the four night watches: this then between 3.0 A.M. and 6.0 A.M., same as "the morning." How do they feel? cannot wonder at any person's fear at seeing a disembodied spirit; we should feel same fear; but how was their fear removed? they knew His voice, as Mary at the tomb (John xx. 16). What did He say? They had had too many proofs of His power and love to doubt any more; it was their Lord; they needed no more.

III. CHRIST SAVING PETER. Which disciple wanted to go on the water? Had seen Christ cause the fishes to collect for him on this same sea (Luke v. 8), will He let him now walk on the sea as He does? What was the answer? Picture the fisherman getting over the sides of the deck, holding by the ropes; now starting on his walk over the waves to where Jesus stands; the Saviour calmly watching him; he walks bravely on a few steps, with eye on Saviour; now sees large wave coming; heart shrinks, faith fails; begins to sink; still has faith left to cry for help. Was such a cry ever in vain? How soon does Christ help him? Gives gentle rebuke, but strong help. Now the two together climb over the sides of the boat, and are welcomed by their friends. What happened to the sea at once? and what did all in the ship do? Yes, when He multiplied the loaves they wished to make Him King, now worship Him as God PRACTICAL LESSONS. Christ's presence inspires (1) Joy. As soon as He called to them and they realised His presence, were of "good cheer." So after Resurrection, in the upper room disciples were glad (John xx. 20). So with us all. If know Christ as our Saviour, our Friend, must fill us with joy—joy of pardon, of quiet conscience, &c. Do we feel this joy? Christ's presence also inspires (2) Confidence. Peter safe as long as looked to Jesus. So with all, even children; waves of care and trouble come to all; must not look too much at them—i.e., not be too much troubled by them—must earnestly and steadfastly look to Christ, and then will be safe. His presence also inspires (3) Worship. Who worshipped Him as a baby when they saw Him? (Mat. ii. 11). So when we realise His presence shall give Him worship of heart and not merely of lips, and so be prepared for eternal worship of heaven.

Questions to be answered.

1. Why did Christ go on the mountain? Give other instances of open-air prayer.
2. What lessons does His conduct teach us?
3. Describe Christ's walking on the sea.
4. Describe Peter's walking on the sea.
5. Why did Peter fail?
6. What three lessons may we learn?

TWO-EDGED PROVERBS.

BY THE REV. P. B. POWER, M.A., AUTHOR OF "THE 'I WILLS' OF THE PSALMS," "THE FEET OF JESUS," ETC.

"A STITCH IN TIME SAVES NINE."—II.

LOOK at this mother trying with all her might and main to get this boy to obey her; she scolds him and coaxes him; she gets his father to whack him; and gives him an occasional box on the ears on her own account. On yet a little farther and see the schoolmaster giving him the cane, and everything else that may get some good into him or out of him. Yet farther, see him doing mischief by his insubordination amongst his fellow clerks, until the head of the firm gets rid of him, and he is thrown upon the world afresh. Follow him on, until you see him perhaps a blackleg or something even worse. All the tattered rags of humanity thus out at elbows, with its world-time gone, and probably its other world-eternity gone too, are so many outcomes of this truth, the thousand wanted stitches because a very few were not put in in time. Yes, if that mother had put in her stitch of loving authority when her present disgrace was a sweet curly-headed cherry-lipped infant of three or four, she might have lived to have seen him a man amongst men, a man before God; and she might have pillowed her dying head, as she gave up her last breath, upon his loving heart. You dreaded, poor foolish mother, the few pricks—it may be the one prick of the needle—and now, if you set to work with a crowbar, willing to rend your son in pieces if only you could re-compound him into a "man" again, it is too late; this ruin has been under your hand.

Neat little housewife just started in the suburbs with Alfonso—the dream of your life, just the very man you always hoped might take a fancy to you—there he is; and now that you have him, what are you going to do with him? Stitch him, dear little lady, be always ready to put in the needed stitch at the right time, and in the right place, and you will do well in married life. Never wait to put nine stitches in Alfonso, the dreamed-of one; for Alfonso is not as you saw him once in a dream, an angel with pointed wings, and the feathers all smoothed down with bandoline. No, Alfonso is human! and his flesh and blood will bear one stitch far better than nine; indeed, while you are putting the ninth into him, he may run very rusty, and the bandolined feathers may all stand up straight like those on the poll of a vicious cockatoo with which I was unhappily once acquainted; those erected feathers meant, "make ready, present, fire!" all in one breath; and then, down swooped his head and snap went his jaws, and every finger for itself, for woe betide the one it caught.

Ah yes! one sweet look, dear Madeline, will keep Alfonso all right; but nine sweet ones will not perhaps win him back, if he should unhappily prove himself human by the easy and undeniable process of going into the sulks. One stitch in the collar of the angel's shirt, one in the toe of his socks, one word at the outset of married life, with the cook to tell her that the angel cannot and will not eat his meat underdone, and Alfonso is rescued from ever trying to get into a club, or being extravagant in buying new socks whenever a little hole is seen in one he has. One stitch will keep Alfonso right to-day, nine may be wasted on him to-morrow; you may put him in a sewing machine, either hand or treadle; you may fell, and quilt, and whip, and tuck, and cross-stitch him as you like, Alfonso has become unstitchable, and that for ever.

Madeline give Alfonso the stitch in time, and Alfonso, start married life with a needle too; and should you ever attain to the West End, and drive a pair, and sit down sixteen to dinner three times a week, believe me you will say never were you happier than in the little house in the suburbs, when you each gave the other a timely stitch, so that no rents split up your little home, no leprosy broke out in its walls; no shreds and tatters of old happiness were wind-blown about your house and its back-yard; but by dint of giving each other the needed stitch in time, Alfonso is still as near an angel as any man can be who weighs fourteen stone and has an eight-inch beard, and Madeline, who has not been weighed lately, and now wears a neat little cap, is as near the sylph of former days, and is still as much the dream of Alfonso's life, as any woman under such circumstances can be.

But my proverb is two-edged, and sharp in truth it is on that terrible edge wherewith it cuts into those things which appertain to another life.

Take the highest of all things, the soul's great union with its Lord, the yielding up of ourselves to Him when we hear the tale of His great love, and comprehend in some degree the needs of our own great woe. If we throw ourselves upon Him at once, receiving His offers, and coming out as His disciples, our soul's sufferings will be as nothing, compared to what they must be if we put off this great salvation, and are aroused to our need of it again, and then seek the Lord. Far be it from us to say that He may not then be found, but the past will have told on us, and we may expect that we shall be encompassed with a host of self-reproaches, and doubts as to whether we shall be received now; and temptations will gather more thickly round us than they did before, and the habit of doing without Christ will have hardened upon us, and more than nine times over will probably be our souls' hard strife.

In education, in acquiring character, in checking the evils of our own hearts, the early effort will save a world of after work.

And why should we not make it? Let not the very smallness of what has to be done in many instances be the fatal hindrance. Let us not have it said to us, "If the prophet had told thee to do some great thing, wouldest thou not have done it?" Let us not, as the common saying is, lose the ship for a halfpennyworth of tar.

Let us look at the long "nine" of endeavouring to bring back a child from the way of evil.

Let as look at the long "nine" of our own after conflict with evil, to conquer the rooted habit of wrong-doing.

Let us ponder the hard discipline which may lie before us, brought upon ourselves, if we will not do at once what must be done, unless things are to go from bad to worse.

Let us ponder, too, how cause and effect are linking themselves together for a long long future.

Let us remember, too, that God himself points out to us the one in order that we may escape the nine; and then let us look all things straight in the face, and do at once whatever has to be done, believing and acting in the belief of the good old proverb that, "a stitch in time saves nine."

SURLY BOB.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "SHAG AND DOLL," "HUGH'S HEROISM," ETC.

CHAPTER VI.—A CASE FOR THE HOSPITAL.

AND as, all through the night, Johnnie lay awake, unable to sleep for the pain, which seemed to grow worse and worse, so that he could scarcely help moaning at times, Bob alternately murmured words of encouragement, such as, "Cheer up, old fellow, it'll be better presently!" or hissed out between his teeth threatening speeches, such as, "Won't I just pay him out, and thrash him so as he'll learn to take care what he's about next time! Won't I teach him as I've got a pair of fists, and know how to use 'em, too!"

"Oh, don't Bob!" pleaded Johnnie, "don't be angry!"

"Can't help it," muttered Bob.

"But teacher says we can ask Jesus, and He'll help us to do what's right. Oh, Bob, do let us ask Him to help us to forgive Tom Lane and everybody! Will you promise, Bob, as you won't do him any harm—not fight him, or anything?"

Johnnie's tones were so earnest and entreating, that Bob at length yielded so far as to say "he'd see about it."

"But won't you promise, Bob?"

"No; 'cause I mightn't be able to help laying hands on him," returned the other shortly, and Johnnie was forced to be content.

It seemed a long night to the poor little fellow, who was wakeful and restless, whilst, as usual, he shivered from cold, which, severe everywhere, was doubly felt in the comfortless quarters which the two boys inhabited. Bob put his coat over him, and, as he had done the night before, wrapped the slight coverings as much as possible about him, and then lay with his arm around him. But when morning came Johnnie seemed so worn out, and looked so ill, that Bob formed a sudden resolve, which was nothing less than to go for the doctor.

His aunt's indifference to Johnnie's hurts on the previous day had deeply offended him, for he did not stay to reflect that his short answers had led her to suppose it was nothing more than an ordinary tumble, such as boys are daily meeting with.

Therefore, after telling Johnnie that he should soon be back, he went out, shutting the door, as usual, carefully behind him.

He intended to "bolt"—to use his own expression—through the kitchen, so that no one might question or detain him; but unfortunately, in pushing open the back door in his usual rough manner, he upset a pail of water standing near. Mrs. Saunders, mop in hand, was engaged in washing the brick floor—for whatever her faults might be she certainly possessed the virtue of cleanliness—and as her temper was not of the sweetest, and, moreover as the noise and clatter of the falling pail awoke the baby, who instantly began to cry and yell lustily, this accident of Bob's aroused her anger.

In no gentle tones she exclaimed, "Now, then, you young good-for-nothing, what are you going to do next, I'd like to know! You're always after something or other you oughtn't to; I never saw a lad like you! There just you go and pick up that pail, and fill it again with water," she continued, at the same time closing and setting her back against the door leading to the street, through which she perceived Bob meant to make a dart.

Thus baffled he sullenly obeyed her order, thinking that afterwards he should be at liberty to depart, but Mrs. Saunders still kept her position before the door.

"Let me pass, will you!" he said gruffly and abruptly.

"Not I, for I know you're up to no good!" returned Mrs. Saunders; "what do you want to go out for?"

Bob declined answering her question; only repeated his former demand to be allowed to pass.

"Not till I know what you're a-going to do. You're after some piece of mischief or other, I'll be bound; for you ain't generally in such a hurry to be running out. It's work enough most mornings to get you lazy fellows up at all, as I know to my cost. So tell me what you are a-going to do."

But Bob remained silent. He could not tell his aunt his errand, as she would, he thought, be certain to forbid it, and say Johnnie wasn't ill, or, at least, that she could doctor him well enough herself. And to give some false reason, or say anything not true, was a thing which Bob, with all his faults, would not stoop to do. So he maintained a dogged silence.

How long the contest would have lasted it is impossible to say, for certainly Bob's obstinacy was sufficient to tire out the most patient and determined of natures, had not the baby, whose cries had been increasing in violence all this time, been suddenly seized with such a fit of coughing, that Mrs. Saunders was forced to quit her post to go and take up her child. Whereupon Bob, availing himself of the opportunity, opened the door, and rushed out of the cottage.

Mr. Hill, the parish doctor, was a kind-hearted man, who made it a point of conscience not to neglect any of his poor patients; and as, when Bob reached his door, he was just on the point of starting to pay an early visit to some one in that neighbourhood, he said he would accompany the lad, and look in upon his little brother in passing.

Most fortunately for him, at the moment when they reached the cottage, Mrs. Saunders had gone up-stairs with the baby in her arms, to call Sam and Bill, who had a habit of sleeping so long and so soundly in the mornings, that nothing but repeated calls and shakes and even scoldings could arouse them.

So, meantime, Bob, after giving a cautious peep around to make sure all was safe, slipped through the house, and, followed by the doctor, made his way out to little Johnnie. Then he breathed more freely. He had gained his object: and if his aunt did meet Mr. Hill on his way out he should not mind then, for the doctor would have seen Johnnie, and would be sure to tell her that he was really ill, and must be kindly treated.

Mr. Hill made a careful examination of the little fellow, and then sat down on the one chair the room boasted, whilst he asked several questions of the lads

"I must see your aunt," said Mr. Hill, rising and turning to Bob;" for I think this will be a case for the hospital, and it might be better to move him there at once. For he will require long and careful nursing; and that he could have better there than here. But you needn't look so dismayed, my little fellow," he added, noticing the blank expression of Johnnie's face; "they'll be very kind to you there."

"Oh, sir, don't take me away from Bob! Oh, please don't! I couldn't go and leave him."

And the tears streamed down the child's cheeks; whilst Bob, whose face had melted into tenderness for the moment, abruptly turned his back upon them, and stood looking out through the little window. But Mr. Hill had seen that sudden change of expression, and glanced at him with curiosity, as if he had found an interesting study in the lad.

Then turning to the younger boy, he spoke a few cheering words to him in a reassuring tone; after which he prepared to take his leave.

(To be continued.)

"THE QUIVER" BIBLE CLASS.

268. What peculiar ceremony was performed by Moses in the consecration of Aaron and his sons to the office of the priesthood?

269. Quote a passage in which the angels are said to be "fellow servants" with mankind.

270. Which of St. Paul's fellow-workers does he say "was sick nigh unto death?"

271. Quote a passage which shows that certain exceptions were made in the ceremonial law of Moses, connected with the keeping of the Feast of the Passover.

272. What was the object of St. Paul in starting on his second missionary tour?

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS ON PAGE 656.

257. "As the appearance of the bow that is in the cloud in the day of rain" (Ezekiel i. 28). "And there was a rainbow round about the throne, in sight like unto an emerald" (Rev. iv. 3). "And I saw another mighty angel come down from heaven clothed with a cloud and a rainbow was upon his head" (Rev. x. 1).

258. "For he supposed his brethren would have understood how that God by his hand would deliver them" (Acts vii. 25).

259. The Emims (Deut. ii. 11).

260. Forty years; and it ceased on the morrow after they had eaten of the old corn of the Land of Canaan (Exodus xvi. 35, and Joshua v. 12).

261. When he took upon himself the vow of a Nazarite, and went into the Temple to fulfil the same, according to the law (Numbers vi. 2—21, and Acts xxi. 23—27).

262. To show where Nebuchadnezzar would set up his throne in his conquest of Egypt, which the prophet then foretold (Jeremiah xliii. 9, 10).

(Drawn by F. CARLESS.)

WEAVING.

I STROLLED by a deep flowing river
On a golden-flushed August day,
And a web I began a-weaving
From the glory that round me lay;
The sun was shining above me,
The river sparkled below,
And the song it sang I remembered
As one I had heard long ago.

The reapers were busy a-reaping;
The corn fell in hillocks of gold;
Forth sounded a long silent music
In the chant that the reapers trolled:
The water-lilies a-floating,
Uplifted their goblets of snow,
And offered a draught of the nectar
I had tasted so long ago.

It seemed as the web I was weaving
Had in bygone years been begun,
And the threads that then snapped asunder
I was taking up one by one.
I could not tell where was the joining,
There seemed neither break nor seam;
The pattern was just as I planned it
In the days of my early dream.

'Twas as if the life I had dreamed of,
Though I knew it not, had been mine,
And unwitting my footsteps had wandered
Aright through a power divine;
All seemed so strange yet so real,
In the light that my soul had caught,
As I saw in the web I was weaving
How woof and warp were inwrought.

JULIA GODDARD.

THE TRIPLETS OF THE BIBLE.

BY THE REV. J. HILES HITCHENS, AUTHOR OF "THE FURNACE," "THE FACE OF THE KING," ETC.

VII.—THE THREE BURDENS.

"Cast thy burden upon the Lord."—PSALM lv. 22.
"Bear ye one another's burdens."—GAL. vi. 2.
"For every man shall bear his own burden."—GAL. vi. 5.

THE three passages now under consideration have been regarded as contradictory. Man is called on to cast his burden on God, and yet is told he must bear his own burden. Man is directed to bear his brother's burden, whilst he is informed that each must carry his own. On looking carefully at these texts, we shall, however, find no contradiction whatever. The words refer each to a different burden, as the study of the contexts will prove. In the first passage there is the burden of conscious need; in the second, the burden of human sympathy; and in the third, the burden of personal responsibility.

The words "Cast thy burden upon the Lord" were addressed by David to his own soul. He was accustomed frequently to preach to himself, and hence his Psalms are such powerful homilies to others. When he employed these words he was depressed by the prevalence of wickedness around him, and was overwhelmed by the hypocrisy, treachery, and rebellion to which he was subjected. His heart was sorely troubled, and his own inability to deliver him from his anxieties became painfully manifest. Under such circumstances of sorrow it was that he rebuked and encouraged his own heart by saying, "Cast thy burden upon the Lord." On other occasions the royal bard thus addressed his soul, and the language he then employed will serve to throw a light upon the text before us. In the 37th Psalm his utterances are most suggestive. He there counsels, "Trust in the Lord," "Rest in the Lord," and patient waiting for the Lord, whilst he adds, "Commit thy way unto the Lord." Very clearly, then, the burden which the shepherd-king would have cast upon the Lord is the burden of anxious care, the burden of crushing sorrow, the burden of conscious need.

Now, every man has a burden. They whose circumstances appear so prosperous, and whose characters appear so sunny, are not strangers to some care, that, acid-like, eats into the very life. Every heart knoweth its own bitterness, and not infrequently there is a bitterness in the heart with which no stranger and scarcely any friend can intermeddle. With some the burden may take the form of physical weakness or disease, and, consistently with God's present dealings, they cannot reasonably expect exemption whilst life on earth may last. With others the burden may be one of disappointment—the intentions which have been cherished for years have been frustrated in a day, and the hopes that promised so fairly have vanished like a dream. With others the burden is one of reverse and loss—the speculation which was deemed so safe and honest has proved an utter failure, impoverishing the family, and plunging them into distress. With others, again, the burden is one of domestic solicitude—the son who left the parental roof, with excellent advice and earnest benedictions, has proved a fruitful source of pain and anxiety; or the dear daughter, whose presence is a light in the home circle, is smitten with a fatal disease, her rosy cheek is blanched, her bright eye is dimmed, and her familiar voice is hushed. With others, again, the burden is one of bereavement—death has entered the home so full of merriment and mutual love; the mother's lips are sealed, the father's forehead is bedewed for the grave, the babe snatched from the warm caresses of the parent, the fluttering of some fond heart is stopped, and all the happiness of the home is eclipsed. Where none of these burdens press upon the spirits, then regrets in relation to the past, and fears pertaining to the future, with numerous daily worries incident on the callings of life, beget swarms of cares which scare the midnight pillow, and turn the melodies of day into wearisome discord.

But whatever may be the nature of the burden, it is the privilege and duty of the Christian man to cast it entirely upon God. He is able to bear it, and has promised either to remove it or sustain us under it. This, alas! we too frequently forget. We act as men enamoured of our sorrows and anxieties, as men who are never happier than when surrounded by a legion of threatening foes, or as men left orphan-like in the world to struggle and endure unaided. Many a time we might have shaken ourselves from the dust of the earth, and soared with light heart into the region of peace and freedom when we have been cleaving to the earth which hinders us. It has been well said, "Men do not avail themselves of the riches of God's grace; they love to nurse their cares, and seem as uneasy without some fret as an old friar would be without his hair girdle. They are commanded to cast their cares upon the Lord, but even when they attempt it, they do not fail to catch them up again, and think it meritorious to walk burdened. They take God's ticket to heaven, and then put their baggage on their shoulders and tramp—tramp the whole way there afoot." Oh, why should it be so with us! Why should we deny ourselves the strength that is so freely laid at our disposal by our Heavenly Father? Why should we remain in a state of hesitation, a state of intermittent rest, a state of partial bondage, when all the while we have the promises of God that He will sustain us? We want to realise more fully that there is a loving, wise, powerful, and present Friend, who knows all our circumstances and who wants to do all for us if we but commit all into His hands. He does not ask us to struggle with and stagger under the burden as long as we can, and then, when we are prostrate with exhaustion, leave it with Him. No; He begs us put the load at His feet at once—lay it upon Him entirely, and trust ourselves to His infinite and unerring grace.

The second passage—"Bear ye one another's burdens"—is a call to mutual sympathy. It embraces, we believe, three aspects of Christian duty, namely, patience with a brother's infirmities, relief of a brother's necessities, and interest in a brother's spiritual prosperity.

To exercise patience towards our fellow-creature in his infirmity, though often difficult, is nevertheless a duty. There are few of us who do not occasionally, if not frequently, meet with those whose advanced years or nervous physical and mental debility render them unfit for the eager race of life. Their presence indeed may sometimes be a hindrance to us, and their peculiarities a source of irritation; but we should remember that the hoary head, or the enfeebled powers, plead irresistibly for our sympathy. By the memory of the days when the stricken one was an active and able-bodied servant of his generation, by the recollection of the fact that the days are coming when we shall be as he is or worse, by the thought that no man, be he ever so weak and dependent, fails to be a teacher, and above all, by the knowledge of the forbearance of the Infinite Mind with all our frailties, we are called upon to "bear one another's burdens." Let not the irritable disposition be permitted to assert itself. Let not a hasty or harsh word soil the lip. Let not anger distort the countenance. Let not murmuring disturb our peace. But let us rather feel God has laid his burden upon our friend, and we must help to bear it.

To relieve a brother's necessities is unquestionably a Christian obligation. While nothing is more offensive than cold insensibility to a brother's care, nothing is more captivating than the compassion which brings a man with reverend mien to the home of sorrow, and keeps him bravely at his brother's side in every hour of distress. Such tender interest conforms us to the likeness of Him who is portrayed as the "Father of Mercies and the God of all comfort." Such compassion was inculcated by Him who went about doing good, and healing all manner of diseases. Such mercy was taught by the apostles, who urge us to "weep with those who weep," and who represent the human family as one body, asserting that "the members should have the same care one of another; and whether one member suffer, all the members suffer with it, or one member be honoured, all the members rejoice with it." We look to the religion of Jesus to foster this compassionate regard. We expect that He who came to beget "good-will among men" will have followers who shall be moved with quick-thoughted sympathy. We feel scandalised, misrepresented, injured, whenever we see a man called by the most blessed of all names looking on a brother's woe, walking through a fellow-man's Gethsemane with a cold eye, a callous heart, and a clenched fist. Following Him whose tender compassion embraced all classes and conditions of men the world over, it surely becomes our duty and privilege to burst the barriers to our heart's charity, and embrace all the brotherhood of humanity in the arms of our sympathy. We shall understand that the apostle draws no limitations when he says, "Bear ye one another's burdens." Thoughts of country, class, creed, or connections, are not to circumscribe our kindly efforts. Sorrow and compassion are to kiss each other, wherever in the world's highway they meet. Blessed is the man who obeys this inspired counsel! Contentment and profound gratitude are begotten in his breast. The blessing of him who is ready to perish is his portion. The smile of the God of all consolation lights up his surroundings. Thus his tribulations become dwarfed—

> "For he who meditates on other's woe, > Shall in that meditation lose his own."

And then closely allied to these obligations is another, that of seeking the spiritual well-being of those about us. Whilst true religion is pre-eminently a personal thing, it was never designed to shut up its possessor in the isolated region of selfishness. Whilst it teaches us to say, "Lord, what wouldst thou have me to do?" it never directs us to ask, "Am I my brother's keeper?" In the days of Christ's earthly ministrations there were very many who were wholly unable of themselves to go to Jesus and obtain cure. Some were paralysed, others were stricken with diseases which confined them to their chambers, whilst others were beyond the reach of human aid—dead. Notwithstanding these disadvantages and disasters, the friends or relatives went to Jesus on their behalf. A father interceded for his daughter, a centurion for his slave, and sisters for their brother. They all were rewarded by glorious and gladdening success. Health and life and happiness resulted. The affectionate interest we feel in the spiritual weal of those known to us should certainly not be less. Whilst it is true that every man may and can seek and find Christ, yet the supplications of others may aid him in his search.

But there is a third burden referred to in the last passage—"For every man must bear his own burden"—the burden of individual responsibility. This is by no means an optional burden: it is not one we can take up or put down at our pleasure; it is not one that any friend can help us carry; it is not one we can roll upon God and thus feel quit of it; it is a life-long and an abiding burden. From the moment our moral sense is capable of detecting the difference between good and evil, from that moment are we individually responsible to the great Heart-Searcher. This idea of personal accountability lies at the very basis of society. Let the fatalist say what he may, the consciousness of transgression and the apprehension of retribution lie too deep in the heart of each man to be removed by disputation. In this life man is made to feel his responsibility. Here an injudicious or sinful act brings in its train painful consequences, whilst noble, pure, and honest conduct, as a rule, is productive of precious fruits. But there is another state of being—a state in which every man must give an account of his stewardship; a state in which the master and the servant, the sovereign and the subject, must come face to face with the unerring Judge; a state in which there must be a personal examination and a personal award. "We shall all stand before the judgment-seat of Christ." Then every man must bear his own burden. There can be no escape for any. Now, you may quit a position among men where the light of criticism beats too fiercely upon you. Now, you may leave a home, or a situation, or a neighbourhood, where your conduct and character are too well known for your present comfort. You may go elsewhere, and live for a time among strangers, who do not every day bring you to account for the past. But then, when the judgment-seat is occupied by Him of Nazareth, and the books are opened, there can be no escape. Excuse will not be admitted, and proxy will nowhere be found. You may imagine that because the sin which lies at your door was committed in conjunction with others, that hence your burden of responsibility is lightened. Be not deceived. The crime was committed, and you aided or connived at its committal. You must bear your burden as if you alone committed it, just as when a commercial firm now fails, each partner can be held responsible for the entire loss. That the burdens men shall bear at the last will vary cannot, I think, be doubted. "The servant who knew his Lord's will and prepared not himself, neither did according to His will, shall be beaten with many stripes; but he that knew not, and did commit things worthy of stripes, shall be beaten with few stripes. For unto whomsoever much is given, of him shall much be required; and to whom men have committed much, of him they will ask the more." Here, in our courts of judicature, there is often but one law, which is applied to a large number of varying offences. But at the final judgment the law will suit the crime, and the punishment will be measured out in accurate proportion to the position, powers, and guilt. There will be no partialities, no mistakes. The man who has not believed in Jesus, let his virtues be what they may, will be condemned as a castaway for that final impenitence. I have seen in the royal mint a curiously-constructed machine for determining whether the sovereigns are of full weight. As one by one the coin passes into the balance, the machine, with quick but unerring precision, casts all those that are light on one side, and all that are standard weight upon the other. So with unquestionable certainty and justice will all who fulfil not the Lord's demands be driven from His presence. The workmanship in the sovereign may be exquisitely accomplished, but its condemnation is secured by its want of weight. So the culture of the mental and moral faculties in a man may be most admirable, but his doom is sealed by his coming short of this heaven-appointed standard. "He that believeth on the Lord Jesus Christ shall be saved: he that believeth not shall be condemned.

This last burden of personal accountability is afforded by the apostle as a reason why we should now bear the burden of mutual sympathy. He exhorts us to fulfil the law of Christ, that law of love which Jesus propounded as one of the two upon which hang all the law and prophets, that law of Christ which teaches us to love our neighbours as ourselves. He counsels us to cultivate obedience to the law of Christian charity and mutual sympathy, because by so doing as Christians we shall prepare ourselves for the hour coming when every man shall bear his own burden, and receive according to the deeds done in the body. Then, in that solemn hour, mutual sympathy shall be so regarded that the cup of cold water given to a disciple for Christ's sake shall enhance our reward. As, then, you desire elevated honours and increased joys in the world to come, as you wish to be signally accepted before the assembled multitude, as you would desire to have your name proclaimed with credit before the angelic throng, now cast the burden of your sin, sorrow, and infirmity upon the Lord, sympathisingly bear the burden of your brother's sorrow and need, and live in the anticipation of the time when every man shall bear his own burden.

"ABOUT MY FATHER'S BUSINESS."

BY THOMAS ARCHER.

HEALING THE SICK—(concluded).

KING WILLIAM IV. succeeded George IV. as the patron of this free hospital, and one of the earliest manifestations of the interest of our Queen in public charitable institutions was the expressed desire of her Majesty to maintain the support which it had hitherto received, and to confer upon it the name of the Royal Free Hospital.

It need scarcely be said that the late Duke of Sussex took a very strong interest in this charity, and at his death it was determined to erect a new wing, to be called "the Sussex" wing. This work was completed in 1856; and in 1863, by the aid of a zealous and indefatigable chairman of the committee, above £5,000 was raised by special appeal for the purpose of buying the freehold of the entire building, so that it is now, in every sense, a free hospital, with a noble history of suffering relieved, of the sick healed, the deserted reclaimed, the sinful succoured, and those that were ready to perish snatched from the jaws of death. Since the foundation of the modest house in Hatton Garden in 1828 above a million and a half of poor sick and destitute patients have obtained relief, and the average of poor patients received within its wards is now 1,500 annually, while 45,000 out-patients resort thither from all parts of London. The relief thus afforded costs some £8,000 a year, and this large sum has to be provided by appeals to the public for those contributions by which alone the continued effort can be sustained. Standing here within the "Moore" ward, so called after the energetic chairman before referred to, I cannot think of any appeal that should be more successful in securing public sympathy than these two statements:—First, that many of the inmates have been immediately received on their own application; and secondly, that bearing in mind the sad story which is, as it were, the story of the foundation of the hospital, this ward is occupied by women, many of them are persons of education and refinement, who yet would have no asylum if they had not been received within these sheltering walls, others may be poor, ignorant, and perhaps even degraded, but divine charity is large enough to recognise in these the very need which such an effort is intended to alleviate. Here at least is a peaceful retreat, where in quiet reflection, in grateful recognition of mercies yet within reach, in the sound of pitying voices, and the touch of sympathetic hands, the weary may find rest, the throes of pain may be alleviated.

Here are the two fundamental rules of the hospital, and they form what one might call a double-barrelled appeal not to be easily turned aside:—

IN-DOOR PATIENTS.	OUT-DOOR PATIENTS.
Foreigners, strangers, and others, in sickness or disease, having neither friends nor homes, are admitted to the Wards of this Hospital on their own application, so far as the means of the charity will permit.	All sick and diseased persons, having no other means of obtaining relief, may attend at this Hospital every day at Two o'clock, when they will receive Medical and Surgical Advice and Medicine free.

Even while I read the latter announcement the out-patients are assembling in the waiting-room, on the right of the quadrangle; the dispenser, in his repository of drugs, surrounded by bottles, jars, drawers, and all the appliances for making up medicines, has set his assistants to work, and is himself ready to begin the afternoon's duty; the consulting-physician of the day has just taken his seat in one plain barely-furnished apartment, the consulting-surgeon in another, while the resident house-surgeon has completed his first inspection of in-patients, and is ready with particulars of new cases. These rooms, where patients assemble, and doctors consult, are on the right of the pleasant quadrangle, with its large centre oval garden plot, containing a double ring of trees; and here also is the reception room for "accidents" and urgent cases—a very suggestive room, with styptics, immediate remedies, and prompt appliances ready to hand, but like all the rest of the official portion of the building, very plain and practical, with evidence of there being little time to regard mere ease or ornament, and of a disregard of anything which is not associated with the work that has to be done. It is the same with other apartments, where it is obvious that no unnecessary expenditure is incurred for mere official show. The business of the place is to heal by means of food, of rest, and of medicine, and there, on the left of the quadrangle, a flight of steps leads downwards to a wide area, where, in the kitchens, the domestic servants are busy clearing up, after serving the eighty-eight rations which have been issued for dinner—rations of fish, flesh, and fowl, or those "special diets" which are taken under medical direction. There is something about this kitchen, the store-rooms, and offices, with the steps leading thereto; and the cat sitting blinking in the sun, which irresistibly reminds me of the heights of Dover and some portion of the barrack building there; the old military look of the place clings to this Gray's Inn Road establishment still, and the visitor misses the wonderful appliances and mechanical adaptations of some more modern institutions, not even lifts to convey the dinners to the wards being possible in such an edifice. There is some compensating comfort in noting, however, that the nursing staff is so organised as to secure personal attention to the patients, and that the arrangements are touchingly homely, not only in regard to the simple furniture, the few pictures and engravings, and the little collection of books that are to be found in the wards, but also in the matter of sympathetic, motherly, and sisterly help, which is less ceremonious, but not less truly loving, than is to be found in some places of higher pretensions.

Here, on the ground floor, the twenty-two beds of the men's severe accident ward are always full, and some of the cases are pitiable, including maiming by machinery, railway accidents, or injury in the streets. The "Marsden Ward," adjoining, is devoted to injuries of a less serious kind, so that there many of the patients can help themselves. In the women's accident ward there are three or four children, one of whom, a pretty chubby-faced little girl of five years old, has not yet got over her astonishment at having been run over by a cab the day before yesterday, picked up and brought into this great room where most of the people are in bed, only to hear that she is more frightened than hurt, and is to go home to-morrow. There are some other little creatures, however, suffering from very awkward accidents, and they seem to be petted and made much of, just as they are in the women's sick ward above, where a delicate-faced intelligent girl, herself improving greatly under prompt treatment for an early stage of phthisis, is delighted to have a little companion to tea with her at her bed-side, the child being allowed to sit up in a chair, and the pair of invalids being evidently on delightfully friendly terms. There is a lower ward, with half a dozen little beds devoted solely to children, who are, I think, all suffering from some form of disease of the joints. Alas! this class of disease comes of foul dwellings, of impure or stinted food, of want of fresh air and water; and it brings a pang to one's heart to note the smiling little faces, the bright beaming eyes, the pretty engaging grateful ways of some of these little ones, and yet to know how long a time it must be before the results of the evil conditions of their lives will be remedied at the present rate of procedure; how difficult a problem it is to provide decent dwellings for the poor, in a city where neighbourhoods like that which we have just traversed have grown like fungi, and cannot be uprooted without pain and loss, which social reformers shrink from inflicting. Thinking of this, and of all that I have seen in this Royal Free Hospital, I am glad to carry away from it the picture of this child's ward and its two young nurses, though I could wish that the walls of that and all the other wards were a little brighter with more pictures, that a fresh supply of books might soon be sent to replenish the library, and that the flowers, that are so eagerly accepted to deck the tables of those poor sick rooms, and carry thither a sense of freshness, colour, and beauty, may come from the gardens and greenhouses of those who can spare of their abundance. To keep the eighty-eight beds full requires constant dependence on public contributions, and yet when we think of the work that is going on here, not the eighty-eight only, but the whole number of 102 should be ready for applicants, who would, even then, be far too numerous to be received at once in a hospital, which, with a royal freedom of well-doing, sets an example that might be hopefully followed by other and wealthier charities for healing the sick.

STILL AND DEEP.

BY F. M. F. SKENE, AUTHOR OF "TRIED," "ONE LIFE ONLY," ETC.

CHAPTER XLIII.

"I DO wish so much Mary had not gone back to the hospital; I miss her every moment!"

The speaker was Valerie Brunot, who was seated on a stool by the side of Bertrand Lisle, as he reclined in an easy-chair in her mother's house. It was the second day after his joyful meeting with Mary Trevelyan at the Salpetrière.

When his first agitation and delight at her unexpected appearance had subsided, and she had briefly explained to him how it was that she, whom he believed to be safe in England, had passed the whole time of the siege in Paris, she at once proposed that he should leave the refuge, which was associated in his mind with so much suffering, and take up his abode at Madame Brunot's, where Mrs. Parry would, she hoped, soon be able to nurse him into health. The doctor entirely approved of this plan. He had felt for some time past that his patient was not likely to get well unless he were roused out of the state of morbid melancholy into which he had fallen; and Bertrand caught at the idea most joyfully, and showed such feverish impatience to carry it out at once, that it was at last arranged he should accompany Mary home that same day.

To him it was like a return to life and home and happiness to find himself once more under the same roof with Mary Trevelyan; and as he lay that first night on the sofa, resting from the fatigue of the transit, and watched her gentle movements while she ministered to his comfort, the whole circumstances of his severance from her seemed to him like a bad dream, from which he had awakened to find himself once more in the pure light of day. The discovery of Laura Wyndham's falsehood and treachery had produced in him a revulsion of feeling towards her which did not fall short of absolute loathing and contempt. He was a just and honourable man, and the selfish intrigues and systematic deceit with which she had won her ends in his own case, completely revolted him. Her letter had suddenly revealed her character to him in its true light, as clearly as if he had been able to read into her soul; for although his fancy had been caught by her peculiar charm of manner and appearance, he would neither have felt, or imagined that he felt, anything like real love for her, had she not so thoroughly persuaded him of her own attachment and uncontrolled devotion to himself. The idea that she had abandoned to him her whole heart, with such an unreserved surrender that she could not even try to hide it, drew out all the tenderness of his nature, and made him, half unwillingly, return her an answering affection. And now he saw the truth. Not only had she never loved him, and been basely false in all her dealings with him, solely for her own selfish interests, but she was so incapable of a high and pure affection that she had not shrunk from entering into the most holy of bonds with a man of whose character and antecedents she knew nothing, simply because a marriage with him would gratify her worldly ambition.

When Bertrand Lisle, after thinking over Laura Brant's letter again, during his convalescence at the Salpetrière, thoroughly realised that she, who had solemnly engaged herself to him, was already, even then, the wife of another man, he was conscious, first of intense thankfulness that he had been saved the misery of an alliance with such a woman, and next, of the clear conviction that, however completely Laura had deceived him into the belief that she loved him, he had no less effectually deceived himself on the score of his supposed attachment to her; for the plain fact was, that after the first indignant sense of wrong and betrayal which the knowledge of her faithlessness had produced—and which was sufficient, in his weak state, to overthrow the balance of his mind—had passed away, the truth dawned upon him that, so far from being distressed at her loss, he was immensely relieved to find himself suddenly freed from all entanglement with her. The spell of her false fascination was broken; and he knew that his enthralment had never been love, even when he believed her worthy of it. He shook himself free of all thought of her now, with a hearty good will, a strong sense of compassion for Mr. Brant, and a great deal of vexation with himself for having been so easily taken in.

Gradually, as the weeks of his tedious recovery passed on in loneliness and weakness, an inexpressible longing rose within him to see once more the sweet face that had awakened the first pure affection of his youth, to hear again the low soft voice that had never spoken to him but in words of truth and tenderness; and the love, never wholly destroyed, even in the days of his greatest delusion, which he had always felt for Mary Trevelyan, revived with a force and intensity such as it had never known before; perhaps it took possession of him all the more powerfully now because it had so little hope to sustain it.

There was one respect in which the poisonous influence of Laura's falsehoods still worked with baneful effect in Bertrand's mind; not only had she to some extent persuaded him that the peculiar quietness of Mary's manner was caused by her cold apathetic nature, but she had deeply impressed him with the fear that if ever Mary consented to marry him, it would be from no affection to himself, but solely from the desire to carry out his father's wishes.

From the first moment when he saw her again at the Salpetrière he laboured anxiously to discover what her real feelings were towards himself; but as yet her extreme reserve had quite baffled him. He spoke to her of Lurline's treachery and of his own thankfulness at having been awakened from his delusions respecting her in no measured terms on the first night of his arrival at Madame Brunot's, but Mary had listened in silence, and when his vehement expressions of disgust at Laura's selfishness and deceit almost compelled her to speak, she merely said, gently, "Laura's conduct is quite incomprehensible to me."

He had little opportunity of speaking to her after that first evening, for so soon as it was settled that he was to take up his abode in Madame Brunot's house, Mary Trevelyan determined that she would not herself remain in it. She had the greatest dread of his imagining, now that he was once more free, that she herself laid any claim to his affection, either in consequence of his father's wish, or from the fact of that unhappy avowal of her love to him, which it was possible he might have known through Mr. Lisle; and it seemed to her best, both for herself and him, that she should quietly withdraw from his society, and leave him to the very efficient care of Nurse Parry.

She had told Bertrand of John Pemberton's long search for him, which had been terminated by so glorious a death; but she gave him no hint that it had been undertaken at her request; and when on the following day she went back to the hospital as volunteer nurse, she said not a word to him of her long absence from it, for which he was in fact responsible. Bertrand concluded, therefore, that she was only resuming her ordinary course of life, which his arrival had interrupted for a single day; and so it was that Valerie's remark considerably surprised him.

"You cannot have learnt to miss her so very much, when she has only been with you one day," he said to the child, in answer.

"One day!" said Valerie, looking up surprised; "I do not understand you, Monsieur Lisle; Mary has been with us eight weeks—ever since that terrible night when she went out to look for you in the snow."

"Went out to look for me in the snow!" exclaimed Bertrand, starting from his pillows. "Child, what do you mean? what are you talking about?"

"Don't you remember the night you were in the ambulance at the church of the Trinity?"

"I remember being there a great many nights, and a miserable time it was."

"Yes; but do you not recollect that night when you ran away?" persisted the child.

"When I ran away!" repeated Bertrand, in utter surprise, but unable to help laughing; "that is a strange accusation to bring against a soldier of France, Valerie. Who do you suppose I ran away from?"

"Why, from Mary, to be sure."

Bertrand fell back on his cushions, completely mystified. "You must be pleased to explain yourself, Miss Valerie, for I do not understand a single word you are saying."

"I think you are very stupid," said Valerie; "or perhaps being ill has put it all out of your head. Well, I will try and teach you. You know that my dear Mr. Pemberton found you in the church, do you not?"

"Yes, that I do remember; and he told me there was a letter from England for me; I got it somehow—I cannot tell in what way—and when I had read it, it made me bitterly angry, so that I believe I went into a violent rage—which no doubt you think was very wrong, little Valerie—and after that I remember nothing more till I found myself in the Salpetrière. I seemed to be for a long time in the midst of all sorts of horrible dreams, and then I woke up, and there I was among all the poor mad people. That is all I can remember; now tell me what you know."

"I understand it all quite well," said Valerie, composedly. "Mr. Pemberton told Mary you were there, and she went to nurse you; then she left you to read your letter, and went to say her prayers for you in a corner, and when she came back to take care of you she found you gone away quite; then Pierron——"

"Who is Pierron?" interrupted Bertrand.

"Pierron is an extremely naughty boy, whom I love very much, because he loved my dear Mr. Pemberton. He had been eating your cake and chocolate, so he knew what had happened; and he told Mary that when you had read your letter you got very wild, and did not know what you were saying, and then you ran right away from her out of the church."

"And then what did Mary do?" said Bertrand, eagerly.

"She did what nearly killed her," said Valerie, gravely; "she went away out into the snow, to try to find you; and all night long she wandered about in the terrible cold, and never found you, for the police people had taken you to the Salpetrière, though she did not know it. So then in the morning she came back to the church, to see if you had returned, and she met Mr. Pemberton, and when he told her you were not to be found, she fell down at his feet like a dead person; then he brought her home to us, and she was, oh! so ill for a long time after."

Bertrand shaded his eyes with his hand; he was deeply moved.

"Surely this was love," he said to himself—"true, devoted love!"

"All needful things are by God's word secure,
The bread is promised and the water sure."—p. 704.

Yet when he remembered how Mary had toiled at the hospital for the wounded, as Mrs. Parry had described to him, he thought, with a heavy sigh, that she would perhaps have done as much for any strange soldier whom it had been her lot to tend.

CHAPTER XLIV.

For many minutes Bertrand pondered over the child's words before he spoke again. At last he looked up.

"Tell me more about Mary," he said to Valerie—"everything you can think of."

"Well, she was ill a long time, and when she was feverish she used to call out your name, and cry bitterly—so that Nurse Parry said it broke her heart to hear her; and before she was nearly well again she began once more to look for you, because my dear Mr. Pemberton had been killed." And Valerie began to sob as she thought of him.

But Bertrand's impatience made him somewhat unfeeling. "I know about Mr. Pemberton, my dear child, and I am very sorry; but I want to hear how Mary looked for me. Are you sure it was me she wanted to find?"

"Of course it was!" said Valerie, looking surprised; "she has been very unhappy indeed about you ever since she has been in Paris. We all saw she was dreadfully miserable, but we could not find out the reason, for Mary does not speak much, you know; so then I got my poor Mr. Pemberton to ask her, and he found it was because she thought you were lying ill or wounded somewhere, with no one to take care of you, and she begged him to look for you, because he was a man, and could go to places where she could not; and to please her he did, but he thought you were dead himself, only Mary said she was certain you were not, or she should have known it."

"How could she have known it?" asked Bertrand.

"That I do not know," said Valerie; "she seemed to think something in her own spirit would tell her. Mr. Pemberton tried hard to find you, but he never did, till that dreadful day when he was shot."

"Yes—do not speak of him," said Bertrand, hastily, as Valerie's lips again began to quiver. "After that, what did Mary do?"

"She went out every day, so weak and ill, to look for you: and in such horrible places too—in the Morgue, and the hospitals, and the Hall of the Dead at the Hôtel Dieu. She used to come back half dead herself night after night."

"Oh, Valerie! is it possible?" said Bertrand; and, brave soldier as he was, the child saw tears glistening in his eyes.

"Yes; and now that she has found you I thought she was to be so happy, and always to be sitting beside you, looking at you, and taking care of you. Instead of that, the very first thing she does is to go right away from you, and go back to live at the hospital, when we are all so fond of her here; and I think it is very provoking of her."

Bertrand was inclined to think so too. "But tell me, Valerie," he said, "do you think Mary has gone back to the hospital because I have come to live here?"

"I am quite sure of it," said the child.

"How do you know?" he asked.

"Because she said so. I went to her yesterday, and held her tight, and said I would not let her go, and begged and prayed of her to stay; and I asked her what we had done that she should desert us, and she said she should never desert us, and that she should come and see us, but that now Mr. Lisle was come to live with us she could not possibly stay."

"It looks as if she did not like me very much, does it not, Valerie?" said Bertrand, with an uneasy laugh, but watching the child's face keenly as he spoke.

"I think it does," said Valerie; "I used to think that she liked you dreadfully, more than any one else in the world; but, of course, since she told me she could not bear to stay in the house with you I have changed my mind."

Bertrand turned himself round in the chair, and buried his face in the cushions. Not another word did he speak that evening, good or bad, to any one. Valerie Brunot had certainly given him food for reflection. For many days to come that conversation filled all his heart and mind.

Little Valerie was perhaps not far wrong when she said she thought Mr. Lisle was very stupid; for, although he kept his meditations to himself, so that neither she nor any one knew the course his thoughts were taking, he was making himself very unhappy indeed under the impression that he had lost all chance of ever winning Mary Trevelyan to be his wife. It might have been expected that all he had heard of her anxiety respecting him, and the devotion and utter disregard of self, even to the jeopardy of her own life, with which she had sought him, would have sufficed to prove to him that he and none other had her whole true love; but, unfortunately, he attributed all this to her large-hearted charity, which, he knew, stopped short of no self-denial where she could benefit her fellow-creatures; while the fact that she had left Madame Brunot's house with the deliberate purpose of avoiding him appeared to him to point unmistakably to the conclusion that she wished to have nothing more to do with him. It did not surprise him that this should be the case, even if she was too truthful to have said that she loved him formerly only to please his father; for since all this unhappy episode with Laura Wyndham had taken place, he felt so utterly humiliated at having even imagined he could care for such a character as she had proved to be, that he could not wonder if it had wholly altered Mary's opinion of him, and caused her to feel for him only as much contempt and dislike as the gentleness of her nature would allow. He could not help being aware, too, that he had not acted fairly by Mary in turning from her to another woman, when he had most distinctly led her to believe that he wished to win her to himself. Knowing, as he now did, how thoroughly false Laura had been, he thought it more than likely, as was indeed the case, that she had so misrepresented him to Mary as to cause her to set him free on the occasion when they met in the garden at Chiverley, with that generous delicacy which he now remembered in shame and regret. But even if she had in part misjudged him then, his subsequent conduct must surely have alienated her from him altogether, for it seemed but too evident that the man who could be content to ally himself for life to one so false and frivolous as Laura Wyndham must be wholly unsuited to come in contact with the pure true nature of Mary Trevelyan.

These painful thoughts rendered poor Bertrand sufficiently desponding; but there still remained to him one ground of hope, on which he was resolved to found a course of ceaseless and untiring efforts to gain even yet the priceless gift of her affection. He felt perfectly certain that whatever might be the present state of her feelings towards himself, at least she loved no one else, for he had been dear to her once. She had owned it to his father in those never-forgotten words, and he was thoroughly convinced that her steadfast unchanging character was quite incapable of turning to any new affection, even if that to which her heart had first been given had both betrayed and estranged her. He had therefore no dread of an earthly rival, but he did fear that, like John Pemberton, having proved the weakness and insufficiency of human love, she might resolve to give herself up wholly to that which, in its heavenly and eternal strength and purity, alone could certainly never fail her. If it were so, Bertrand felt it would be but a just punishment for his folly and blindness in having yielded to Laura's fascinations. But at least he was most deeply determined that it should not be his own fault if Mary were now finally lost to him; he would make it the one object of his life, at present, to draw back her pure heart to himself, and he would never consent to be separated from her any more in this world, unless her own fiat most absolutely forbade him to hope that she would ever link her fate with his.

As the days wore on, and Bertrand's health rapidly improved under the favourable influences which now surrounded him, he was thankful to find that no call of duty was likely to interfere with his purpose as regarded Mary; for the terrible siege was already at an end, and the Prussians were preparing for their triumphal entry into Paris. There was no longer any call to fight for France, so far as the foreign foe was concerned; and when, a few weeks later, the appalling reign of the Commune was brought to a close, after a dreadful and prolonged struggle, by the troops of Versailles, Bertrand was only most thankful that his physical weakness was still too great to admit of his taking any part in a conflict which compelled the soldiers of France to fight one with another, and to shed the blood of those whose nationality made them brethren.

A duty of a very different description did seem to lie before Bertrand Lisle, but it was one in which Mary's assistance would be most valuable, if only he could induce her to share his responsibilities with him—he had promised his old uncle, the Comte de L'Isle, when he left him, after the night he spent at the château, that if he survived the war he would, so soon as it was over, return to the old home of his forefathers, and take up his abode there in anticipation of its passing altogether into his own possession on the old man's death. Fain would Armand have kept him with him even then; but that was, of course, impossible, as he was on duty under the orders of the commanding officer of his regiment; and he gave his uncle an address in Paris to which he might send any communication for him; while he pledged himself to obtain his discharge from the army so soon as the establishment of peace would enable him to do so with honour. When the conclusion of the siege opened Paris once more to intercourse with the outside world, Bertrand sent to the address he had indicated to know whether any letter had arrived for him there from the Comte de L'Isle.

He was sitting alone when his messenger returned, bringing with him a letter with a deep black border, directed to the "Comte Bertrand de L'Isle." It proved to be from the notary before whom his uncle had identified him as his rightful heir, on the occasion of his visit to the château, and it contained the intelligence that the Comte Armand de L'Isle had died somewhat suddenly about a month after Bertrand had taken leave of him. He had had another stroke of paralysis, and had lingered only a few hours after it; but apparently he had experienced some sensation previously which had warned him of approaching illness, for on the morning of the day which proved to be his last, though he had risen to all appearance in his usual health, he had sent for the notary, and had charged him so soon as his death should take place to see that all the directions contained in the will he had entrusted to him were carefully executed; for which purpose he was to communicate with Bertrand de L'Isle at the address given, in Paris, and to make all arrangements for placing him at once in possession of the castle and estates.

The notary explained to Bertrand that, in the impossibility at that time of having letters conveyed into Paris, he had, with the help of the curé and one or two of the county magistrates, gone through all the legal formalities necessary for establishing him as lord of his ancestral home and all that belonged to it, and nothing was now required but that he should come and take final possession of his fair inheritance. In conclusion, the notary briefly detailed the extent and value of the property, and the amount of the yearly rent-roll. At these last figures Bertrand looked with very great astonishment; for he had asked his uncle no questions whatever as to the revenues of the estate, and he now found that it amounted to many thousands a year more than he had imagined, and that he was about to take rank amongst the wealthiest land-owners of France.

(To be continued.)

SCRIPTURE LESSONS FOR SCHOOL AND HOME.

SCRIPTURE STORIES. SECOND SERIES. NO. 8. THE SABBATH.

Chapter to be read—Matthew xii. (part of)

INTRODUCTION. As this lesson is intended to teach the right observance of the Sabbath, it may be as well to commence by a few questions on the appointment of the day of rest. When was it instituted? for whom? (Gen. ii. 2, 3). How is it mentioned in the fourth commandment? The word "remember" shows it must have been observed. Remind of manna given on six days with double quantity on the sixth (Ex. xvi. 15—26), of the strict observance by the Jews, no fire to be lighted (Num. xxxv. 3), the gatherer of sticks stoned to death (Num. xv. 36), the special blessings promised to those who observe the Sabbath (Is. lvi. 6.) From all this draw the object of the Jewish observance of the Sabbath—namely (1) as a day of rest from work; (2) as a day for holy worship. Shall now see how Christ shows the true principle of the law as a rule to guide us, who are Christians.

I. THE WALK IN THE CORN-FIELDS. (Read Matt. xii. 1—9.) Picture the Saviour and the apostles on the Sabbath, in the early morning, walking through the fields, talking together of the things of the Kingdom, a party of the Pharisees near, always on the watch to catch Christ in something wrong. What do the disciples do? Perhaps been out all night fishing, and had little time for food. Were they stealing the corn? (see Deut. xxiii. 24, 25.) Just as now handfuls of corn may be gathered and eaten in passing. What did the Pharisees say? With whom did they find fault? How did Christ answer them? Read 1 Sam. xxi. 1—6 for an account of David's eating the shewbread. Explain that he and his party were fleeing for their lives from Saul, and having nothing else to eat, the priest at Nob gave them the shewbread, i.e., hallowed bread set apart for the priests. And, as regards the Sabbath, what had the priests to offer up every Sabbath day in the synagogue? Killing beasts required a good deal of servile work: was this breaking the commandment? No; because Temple service required it: therefore works of necessity may be done. Now see the reasons given by Christ: (1) He is greater than the Temple. For what service were the sacrifices offered? Remind of the great veneration the Jews had for the Temple; how the charge against Christ was of saying He would destroy the Temple; against Stephen, was of blasphemy against the Temple. But who was greater than the Temple? Therefore disciples in neglecting food to attend on Christ were not wrong to gather the corn. (2) God will have mercy before sacrifice. Satisfying hunger is obeying a law of Nature, the strict observance of the Sabbath being a ceremonial law. For whose good was Sabbath ordained? Would starving be for man's good? Therefore, in certain cases, the strict letter of a law need not be observed. (3) Son of Man Lord of Sabbath. Who appointed the keeping of the day? Therefore may make alteration of the law; Sabbath made for a blessing, not a burden.

PRACTICAL. Ask what day we keep: what do we call it? Why the Lord's Day? Resurrection of Christ and Descent of Holy Ghost two reasons for observing first day, but the principle of day of rest unchanged by change of day; therefore must be kept holy; no works to be done save those of necessity.

II. THE MAN WITH WITHERED HAND. (Read 9—13.) The walk over, where did Christ and disciples go. For what purpose? What an example to us! Christ, Himself God, full of wisdom and knowledge, goes to synagogue for worship and hearing of law. Who accompanied Him? Probably whole party of disciples and Pharisees went in together. Whom did they find there? Now they begin to watch Him. So far have been silenced by Christ as to observance of Sabbath, but this another case, not a work of necessity. Is it, then, lawful to heal? How did Christ answer? See his great wisdom. He makes them answer themselves. What would they do? One sheep would not be of much consequence; surely better lose one than break a commandment; but would they leave it to die? How much is a man better than a sheep! So it is lawful to heal. Now notice the miracle. Christ had many ways of healing. What was the man told to do? How could he stretch it out if it was withered? In making the attempt found he had the power: but where did the power come from? Therefore shows he had faith to believe he was going to be healed, which showed itself in the act of stretching out his hand. What sort of an act was this of Christ? Therefore works of mercy may be done on the Sunday. How can we copy Christ's example. Visiting sick friends, relieving others poorer than ourselves, helping those in distress, &c. Even children may do something. If done for Christ's sake, such service of love shall be accepted.

PRACTICAL LESSONS. Have now found out four principles to guide us in observing the Sabbath: (1) A quiet walk with good companions—only be careful does not become a merry-making. What an opportunity for speaking a few words for God. (2) Worship in God's house. This everywhere spoken of in Bible. (Ps. lxcv. 5, Acts xvi. 13, &c.) No Sunday complete without this. (3) Works of necessity may be done. Still, as far as possible, preparation of food, &c., should be done previously. (4) Works of mercy are lawful and proper. How thankful we should be for the day! how careful not to abuse it. How many wasted Sabbaths have we to give account for! All may be and should be earnests of eternal rest in heaven.

Questions to be answered.

1. What is the origin of the Sabbath?
2. Why was the day changed?
3. What may be learned from the walk through the corn-fields?
4. What arguments did Christ use?
5. Describe healing of man with withered hand.
6. Draw practical lessons as to the observance of the Sabbath.

SURLY BOB.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "SHAG AND DOLL," "HUGH'S HEROISM," ETC.

CHAPTER VII.—"WILL HE FORGIVE?"

THE astonishment of Mrs. Saunders was extreme when Bob ushered the strange gentleman into the kitchen; and so soon as she understood the state of the case she cast angry threatening glances at the lad. He heeded them not, however, but leaving Mr. Hill to finish his talk with his aunt, he returned to Johnnie.

"Oh, Bob, don't let 'em take me away," cried the little fellow, as soon as he entered, "I want to 'bide here with you; and I won't grumble any more about the cold or anything else; only don't let 'em take me away!"

"But perhaps they'd make you well again ever so much quicker at the hospital," answered the other.

"But I don't want to go; they'd be all strangers there, and I shouldn't have you, Bob."

"But you'd soon make friends of 'em," returned Bob. "You ain't like me; you'd soon make 'em love you."

"Why, Bob, d' you want me to go?" asked Johnnie, in surprise. "I should have thought you'd have been lonely here, left all by yourself.

A dull aching pain in Bob's heart bore witness to the truth of Johnnie's remark; but he did not stay to dwell upon his own feelings, for he had heard the doctor saying to his aunt that the child's only chance of recovery was the care and good nursing he would receive at the hospital, and Johnnie's well-being, still more Johnnie's life, were far more precious to Bob than his own present comfort and happiness. So he stifled all longings to keep him beside him, and tried to reconcile the little brother's mind to what lay before him.

But all that day he watched over him like some one guarding a most precious treasure, and even seemed jealous of admitting his aunt when she came out to see the boy. And he would scarcely suffer her to do anything for his brother, showing plainly, in his dogged, determined manner, that he considered Johnnie as his own special property, and wished that every service rendered him should be rendered by himself.

And a very gentle nurse he proved himself to be, which seemed wonderful in one so rough and uncouth, though it showed how great is the constraining power of love—how it can master the most rugged nature, and mould it into softness and tenderness.

When the doctor came the second time he was still more decided in his opinion that the little patient must go to the hospital, and accordingly he gave an order for his admittance the following day.

"How long d'you think he'll have to bide there, sir?" Bob summoned up courage to ask.

"I can't say, my lad; but I'm afraid it may be rather a tedious affair. However, you may be sure we shall do all we can for the little fellow."

And then he went away.

The short winter's day was already fast closing in, and darkness soon stole into the small room. It seemed to Bob to creep into his heart as well, for his one little sunbeam was about to be taken away from him, and he knew not when he would return, even if he ever did, for Johnnie looked so white and ill that perhaps he was going to die instead of getting well. But that last thought was too dreadful to be pursued for a moment, and it brought such a lump in Bob's throat that he almost felt he should choke.

Johnnie had been lying silent, too tired for much talking; but now, when Bob gave a deep sigh, he seemed to guess something of what the other was feeling, and, as if wishing to comfort him, he put out his little hand, and taking Bob's, drew it to his lips, and printed a kiss upon it. This was too much for Bob; his self-command gave way, and sinking down on his knees beside the little bed, he buried his face from sight, and gave way to a burst of tears.

This was perhaps the first time in his life that he had been so overcome; at least Johnnie could not remember ever having seen Bob cry before; but now deep sobs for the moment shook the lad's strong frame. He soon recovered himself, however, and forced down all signs of grief, whilst Johnnie contented himself with again taking Bob's hand in his.

The darkness grew deeper and deeper, but still the two remained in the same attitude—the elder one fancying, from his silence, that the younger was falling off to sleep, and so fearing to disturb him by any movement.

After a quarter of an hour or more had passed by thus, Bob was almost startled when Johnnie's voice broke the silence, saying, in a low tone,

"You'll forgive him, Bob, won't you?"

"Who?" asked Bob, his thoughts having been wandering so far that for the moment he forgot to whom Johnnie was referring.

"You know, Bob—Tom Lane. You'll do it, won't you?"

"I'll try, for your sake, as you seem to have set your heart so on it," answered the lad, after a moment's hesitation.

"Not for my sake only, Bob."

"Whose then?" asked the other, in apparent surprise.

"Jesus Christ's," replied Johnnie, in a low voice. "He's told us to forgive everybody, and you know He's looking down to see whether we do it or not, and 'twould make Him so sorry if He saw we weren't trying to please Him. 'Cause He loves us so, Bob—doesn't He? A deal better even than we love one another. So 'twould be so bad of us—wouldn't it?—to show as we did'nt care for him."

Bob did not answer; and after a pause Johnnie began again.

"I thought at first, Bob, 'twould be so dreadful to go to the hospital all alone, with nobody as I knew or loved anywhere nigh me; but just now I seemed to remember all of a sudden as I shouldn't be alone after all, 'cause Jesus would be there. So I don't seem to mind going now, except for leaving you, Bob. But I'll ask Jesus to 'bide with you too. Isn't it nice to think as He can be in every place at the same time? with you here, and with me at the hospital. Doesn't it make you happy, Bob, to think how He's always taking care of us and loving us?"

Still no answer from Bob; only a husky sound in his throat. Certainly the two brothers were very unlike each other: Bob so silent and reserved, and Johnnie seeming to find it a relief to tell out his little feelings of love or sorrow. But it was only to his brother that he thus opened his mind: to all others he perhaps was almost as shy as the elder one about revealing the secrets of his heart.

Once more silence fell upon the brothers; during which Bob sat still and motionless. What was going on in his mind meanwhile no one could say; but possibly in that silence his little brother's simple words were echoing in his heart and speaking loudly there. Possibly, at that moment, if never before, he was feeling it to be a reality that the eye of God was upon him, searching out all his thoughts and feelings. And what did he see in him! What was Johnnie's little fit of passion, which was over in a minute and so mourned for afterwards, compared to the anger and longing for revenge which had stirred within him, not only lately, but countless times before? Possibly some such thoughts as these passed through Bob's mind; but as he did not tell his feelings, it is by his actions we must judge him; and therefore we must wait and see what those were before we can know whether he ever did learn that lesson of love and forgiveness—so hard to most of us—or whether it proved too difficult for him.

CHAPTER VIII.—LESSONS LEARNT IN LONELINESS.

"You'll be able to come and see me at the hospital, won't you, Bob? The doctor said so, didn't he?"

"Aye, aye," responded Bob.

"And when you come you'll tell me what they said at Sunday school, won't you, Bob?"

"I never knows anything as they say there," answered the other.

Johnnie's face fell a little. "I should so like to know if teacher tells anything more about the Good Shepherd. And I shan't be able to go."

"Well, I'll try and listen, but I ain't like to remember much, 'cause you know I'm a stupid, that's what I am."

This little conversation was held between the brothers the next morning, before the hour of parting had arrived. One more request Johnnie had to make; and that was that Bob would take special care of his little dove, and never forget to feed or look after it. But he need scarcely have asked that; for Johnnie's little favourite already held a place in Bob's heart, partly on its own account, but chiefly because the little brother loved it so much.

At length came the separation, and Bob found himself left alone. The place had never looked so dull and cheerless, so bare and comfortless before; and as he thought of Johnnie's wan pale face, the terrible fear came back again upon him that "may-be he was a-going to die!"

He sat down on his low stool, his elbows resting on his knees, and his face buried in his hands; and thus he remained for a considerable time, whilst every now and then a sob escaped him. At length—as if he found his burden of trouble and anxiety too great to bear alone, he sank down on his knees beside the bed where Johnnie had lain, and sent up a prayer—perhaps his first real earnest one—to that heavenly Friend, whom his little brother had already learned so to love and trust, that He would take care of him and make him well again. And as he thought of the child's words, "that Jesus would be with him in the hospital, and therefore he didn't so much mind going there," Bob's heart seemed to soften and go out in feelings of gratitude towards that unseen Friend, on Johnnie's account.

But he felt very lonely when he lay down that evening, for the first time, without his little brother beside him; and all night his dreams were of Johnnie, whilst his first waking thoughts turned to him. There was no one now to give him a kind word or look; and all day long Bob, who had always seemed to do his best, by his rough, sullen, surly ways, to make himself disliked, went about with a dull aching pain at his heart, which made him more than ever inclined to be cross and quarrelsome. Though he could not have told what he wanted, he was longing for sympathy, for a friendly glance or a soothing word; but as, instead of trying to win, he had rather seemed to repel all love save Johnnie's, so now, in his hour of need and loneliness, none came forward to show him affection or take any interest in him.

On coming out of afternoon school Bob caught sight of Tom Lane, whom he looked upon as the cause of all his trouble; and, accordingly, his first impulse was to rush after him, and give him a "regular licking," as he would have expressed it. But the next instant came the remembrance of Johnnie's words, pleading with him, and trying to make him promise to forgive Tom. And the thought that Jesus was looking down upon him at that moment, to see whether he did what was right or not, came into his mind. He had a fierce struggle with himself; his angry passions were so strong, and he was so little accustomed to do anything but yield to them, that it seemed as if they must have the mastery, and, in spite of his promise to Johnnie, he must take some revenge upon his enemy. For revenge seemed so sweet; to forego it so hard and bitter!

But just as he seemed on the point of giving way, all that his little brother had said about the Good Shepherd, and his longing that they should both belong to His fold, came back to him. "And if I don't forgive, I can't get taken in there: Johnnie 'll be inside and I left outside."

That thought decided him. He would try to forgive, whatever it cost him, and so he would let Tom Lane depart without that thrashing he had so longed to give him. Not in his own strength could he do even thus much: but when we earnestly wish to do what is right, that wish is like a prayer, and cries to God for help. And help and strength are promised to those who seek them.

Therefore Bob was enabled to come off conqueror. He turned away, and walked off homewards, having gained his first victory over his angry passions; and new, strange feelings of joy and happiness seemed to steal into his heart, and warm and comfort it.

And when he lay down to rest that night, still sorely missing his little bed-fellow, the thought of Johnnie brought back the recollection of his words, that Jesus would not only be with him at the hospital, but with Bob at home as well; and the idea of having a Friend always with him, watching over and loving him, was very sweet to poor friendless unloved Bob.

The next Sunday he went to school as usual; but when there—for the first time in the remembrance of his class—he sat quietly, read his verse properly, and listened attentively. For he had not forgotten his promise to little Johnnie, whom he hoped to see that afternoon; and he was trying hard to be able to take away something that he might tell him.

The other boys, astonished at this unwonted behaviour, tried to provoke him in various ways, but he heeded them not, his mind being too full of one subject to have room for any other. His determined nature showed itself in a new light now, for having made up his mind that he would listen and try to remember what was said, all the devices of the other lads to draw off his attention were quite in vain. He was like some rock standing firm in the midst of the waters, which dash themselves against it, but then glide off, powerless to harm or make any impression.

The lesson that day seemed as if it had been chosen on purpose for Bob, for it was all about forgiveness. And now he heard how the Lord Jesus had taught that those who would be His friends and followers must imitate His example in being loving and forgiving; and, moreover, the teacher went on to say, real forgiveness was not simply to refrain from taking revenge and seeking to do harm to those who had injured us, but meant much more than this, even that we must be ready to do kind actions and speak kind words to those very people who had so hurt and vexed us:—"But I say unto you, love your enemies; do good to them that hate you, and pray for them which despitefully use you and persecute you."

This was to go a step farther than Bob had yet gone. He had refrained from taking revenge—that had been very hard work—but now he must do more still, or, according to what his teacher said, and the words of the text he had quoted taught, he could not say he had forgiven. And if he could not forgive the little offences done against himself, how could he expect the Lord Jesus to forgive him all his great offences.

When Bob, having obtained admittance to the hospital, drew near Johnnie's bed, the latter looked up with a smile of such unmistakable pleasure at seeing him, that the nurse, who was standing near, could not help noticing it, and mentally wondered what there could be in that clumsy "lout of a fellow," as she called Bob in her own mind, to call forth such a welcome from the gentle little lad, who had already won her heart by his patience and engaging ways.

But Bob and Johnnie knew each other better than others knew them, and they were happy in each other's company. The time went much too fast, as they talked of many things; whilst Bob, in his blundering way, tried to repeat something of what he had heard at the Sunday-school.

Johnnie, however, looked so thin and ill and wasted, that Bob, after he had left the hospital, walked along with slow steps and bent head, full of anxious doubts and fears, whilst once or twice he put up the the back of his hand to brush away some mist which had gathered before his eyes. And when he reached home, and took his place at tea among the band of noisy quarrelsome cousins, he remained, unlike his wont, subdued and silent, taking little notice of what went on around.

But when the baby from his cradle set up a lusty cry, signifying his desire of having some attention paid to him, Bob took him on his knee, and gently rocked him to and fro in an absent manner, whilst still seeming to be occupied with his own musings. The refining touch of sorrow was upon him, and beneath it the rugged nature seemed to be softening and melting. And when the baby, clasping its tiny fingers around Bob's rough ones, laughed and crowed in his face, his lips parted into a half smile, which made him look altogether different from "Surly Bob."

And when bed-time came, as he crossed the yard on his way to his lonely room, he murmured to himself in a low voice more than once, the word "forgive." (To be continued.)

"THE QUIVER" BIBLE CLASS.

273. From what passage do we learn how long St Paul lived at Ephesus?

274. Why was Joab made the captain of David's army?

275. What man in the days of the apostles tried to usurp such pre-eminence in the Church as to cast out those with whom he disagreed?

276. What two cities are mentioned as having been destroyed with Sodom and Gomorrah?

277. Mention any passage in the New Testament where reference is made to these cities.

278. By whom is Noah mentioned as a preacher of righteousness? Quote passage.

279. Why did not Ezra have a band of soldiers to protect him and the Jews on their journey from Babylon to Jerusalem?

280. Where in the Old Testament is mention made of an iron bedstead being used, and by whom?

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS ON PAGE 672.

263. A hundred talents of silver (2 Chron. xxv. 6).

264. "For this cause therefore have I called for you to see and speak with you, because that for the hope of Israel I am bound with this chain" (Acts xxviii. 20).

265. When God ordered Samuel to go to Bethlehem and anoint David as king (1 Sam. xvi. 1, 2).

266. "Circumcised the eighth day of the stock of Israel, of the tribe of Benjamin, an Hebrew of the Hebrews" (Philipp. iii. 5.)

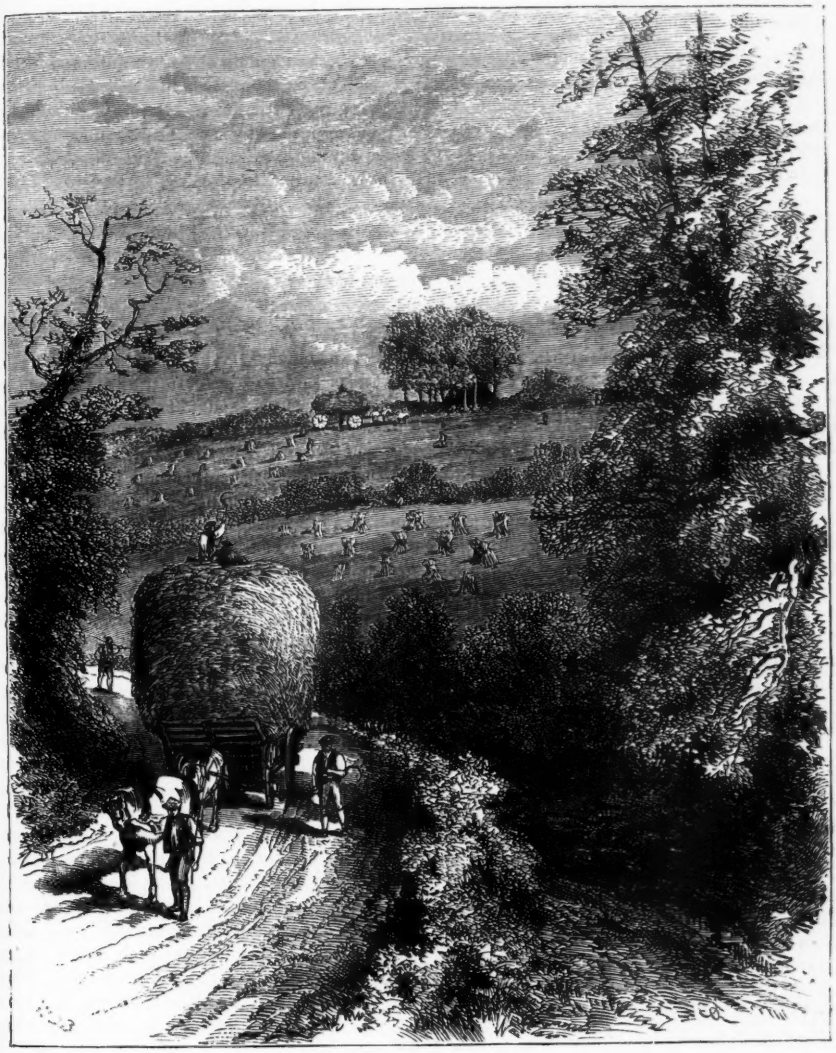
267. In 2 Cor. viii. 15.

"I WILL NOT FEAR."

IN my desponding eyes an endless train
Of cares and labours thickened on the plain;
Cradled in ease, unused to loom or plough,
Rough yoke of servitude, and sweating brow,
My nurslings pined and withered in my sight,
Or needy, walked the crooked paths of night.

But in the deeps a voice of sweetness said,
The saints of God look but for daily bread;
Cares on my shoulder cast, from doubt be free,
And let thy children learn to wait on me.
I listened, and a staff was in my hands,
Like his which blossomed into two great bands.*

In that sweet time, when every thorn is white,
And cuckoos sing, and hearts expect delight,
We sleep, on tiptoe for the morn, and low
The clouds hang weeping, and the north winds blow,
The bees are hived, the leaves and flowers are torn;
And the great tossing branches bend and mourn.



Hapless the insect who must wake and find
His one day dark with crosses so unkind;
Yet happy too, he knows no better lot,
No sunnier weather, so he murmurs not,
Spite of the dreary hours without a sun,
His life is lived, his mystic dance is done.

Some days must gloomy be, some lives o'ercast,
But murmur not, the rain will soon be past;
Let nothing move to envy or complaint,
Shake off unmanly fears, and play the saint;
All needful things are by God's word secure,
The bread is promised, and the water sure.

There is no war's alarum on the hill,
Calm are the water-floods, the land is still;
Thy sins are pardoned, Christ hath made thee whole,
Oh, where is he that can condemn thy soul!
Safe in His arms there is no evil thing,
Life has no misery, and death no sting!

G. S. OUTRAM.

* "With my staff I passed over this Jordan; and now I am become two bands."—GEN. xxxii. 10.

(Drawn by W. D. Blatchley.)

MOUNTAIN AIR.

BY ANNE BEALE.

SWEET autumn air, fresh mountain air!
Say whence thy power to banish care,
Thy gift of healing?
The heart seems bounding from its seat.
With quickened life the pulses beat,
Like joy-bells pealing.

The reaper's voice breaks forth in song,
The team draw friskily along
  The golden treasure;
Through the clear ether trills the lark,
The streamlet in its leafy dark
  Takes up the measure.

Why dwellest thou in realms unseen,
When thus thy spirit pure and keen,
  All earth embraces?
Outsearching every stagnant spring
Of sluggish life, long slumbering
  In hidden places.

Above, around us, one with thee
In universal harmony,
  Sound's waves are flowing;
The hum of insects, songs of birds,
The distant bleat of pastured herds,
  And breezes blowing.

Fresh mountain air, sweet autumn air!
Waft on thy pinions this our prayer,
  Thy virtues to inherit;
Thy rare refinement, healthy tone,
Strength, softness, buoyancy in one,
  And purity of spirit.

DAVID IN JERUSALEM.

BY THE REV. WILLIAM HANNA, D.D., LL.D.

IF the numbers given in the Book of Chronicles have been accurately recorded and transmitted, upwards of 300,000 "men of war that could keep rank came with a perfect heart to Hebron to make David king over all Israel." In this great host all the tribes were represented; the remoter (as was perhaps natural) more largely than the nearer; the tribe of Levi sending its contingent with the rest. "And they were with David three days eating and drinking." For so large a feast, so long continued, David had at hand no sufficient supply of viands. But these were amply furnished by the feasters themselves. Asses and camels, and mules and oxen, brought in from the neighbouring and fruitful districts of Issachar, and Zebulon, and Naphthali, "meat, meal, cakes of figs, and bunches of raisins, and wine, and oil, and oxen, and sheep abundantly." And "there was great joy in Israel," for not only were all those 300,000 one in spirit and in purpose, but "all the rest also of Israel were of one heart to make David king." Seldom has any monarch had a crown so spontaneously, unanimously, enthusiastically presented to him by the people over whom he was invited to reign. And as there were men among the offerers "that had understanding of the times to know what Israel ought to do" (1 Chron. xii. 32), who, we may well imagine, acted as spokesmen of the multitude upon this great occasion, it is instructive to notice upon what grounds the tender of the crown was made. (1) "Behold," said they to David, "we are thy bone and thy flesh." One can't help thinking that a distinct allusion was made and intended here to the edict issued by Moses in anticipation of a monarchy being set up: "One from among thy brethren shalt thou set king over thee: thou mayest not set a stranger over thee, which is not thy brother" (Deut. xvii. 15). This requirement David fully met. (2) "Also," the tribes said to him, "In time past, when Saul was king over us, thou wast he that leddest out and broughtest in Israel." No untried man this into whose hands they would put the sceptre, no bold adventurer who, in some sudden crisis, by fortune or some brilliant deed, had been raised for the time to foremost rank among them, but one of wisdom and of courage, well tried under their late king. They pass by the period of David's persecution by that king, teeming though it did with like evidences of qualification, as one which they desire not to remember upon an occasion so auspicious. But (3) chiefly they ground their offer on David having been chosen by the Lord. "And the Lord said to thee, thou shalt feed my people Israel, and thou shalt be captain over Israel."

Here, too, the Mosaic ordinance was referred to and respected: "Thou shalt in any wise set him king over thee, whom the Lord thy God shall choose." David might well have asked the men who spake to him so, why, if they knew so well, and had known so long that the Lord had anointed him to be their king, they had for those seven years by-gone withheld from him their allegiance; but this was no time for such recrimination. David is as ready to bury in oblivion this interlude of their opposition to his claims as they are to overlook that of his persecution by Saul. At once and gratefully accepting the sacred trust, "he made a covenant with them in Hebron before the Lord; and they anointed David king over Israel, according to the word of the Lord by Samuel" (1 Chron. xi. 3). They remembered what Samuel had said and done at Saul's inauguration as their first king, and as nearly as they could they followed the precedent he had given. One striking part of this was that, "when all the people shouted and said, God save the king, then Samuel told the people the manner of the kingdom, and wrote it in a book, and laid it up before the Lord." In this we cannot doubt that Samuel had in his eye the original injunction of Moses, as to the king that the tribes in after ages might set over them. "And it shall be, when he sitteth upon the throne of his kingdom, that he shall write him a copy of this law in a book out of that which is before the priests, the Levites: and it shall be with him, and he shall read therein all the days of his life: that he may learn to fear the Lord his God, to keep all the words of this law and these statutes to do them" (Deut. xvii. 18, 19). A separate copy of the law, with an appendix, drawn up by Samuel himself, embodying what he had told the people as "to the manner of the kingdom," was prepared and deposited in the hands of the Levites. This book still existed, and was now, we presume, produced, whilst Gad or Nathan acted over again the part of Samuel, and read aloud the sacred writing which defined the rights and duties of both parties in that covenant which David made with Israel.

The Hebrew monarchy was thus from the beginning grounded upon a compact between the rulers and the ruled, not simply tacit or implied, but public and formal, written and read, ratified by oath taken before the Lord. It was not an absolute but a limited and constitutional monarchy. Such kind of government has been very rare, and, save in the single instance of Israel, has always been the fruit of long and painful strugglings between those who have finally entered into such a social compact. So far, indeed, as we know, the instance now before us is not only the first, but the only one in the history of the world, in which a publicly made and publicly ratified compact between king and people, with express and articulate conditions agreed to on either part, formed at the very first the basis of the throne. In all other countries, in every age, laws and forms of government have been things of slow growth, their history ever one of progressive advance, from the confused to the orderly, from the rude to the more perfect. The history of Israel, both as to its civil code and its kingly government, exhibits a singular and solitary contrast to this. Here you have a community of untutored slaves, plunging into a wilderness without laws or government of any kind, emerging a few years afterwards with a statute-book in their hands, civil, juridical, economical, ecclesiastical, perfect in all its parts, which needed no additions or amendments, which after-dealings with it only mutilated and impaired. And here, too, you have a throne and kingdom starting up in a state so far of maturity, that the people had never afterwards to ask or exact anything of their sovereign which had not been embraced in the original covenant, nor had the king ever any duty to discharge beyond that which this covenant imposed. If the divine origin of the Jewish law and government be denied, it remains for the denier to explain the difference in this respect between the Jews and all other nations of the earth.

David's first act, as king of the combined tribes, was to shift the seat of government from Hebron to one at once more secure and more central. On the very summit of that mountain range which runs north and south through the country which lies between the Jordan and the Mediterranean, and at the distance of about a third of its whole length from its southern extremity, there is a promontory or tongue of land, separated on three sides from the neighbouring hills by deep precipitous valleys, and on the fourth connected with the general table-land of which it formed a part by a narrow neck of land. Here the Canaanites had erected the strongest of their fortresses, securely defended by nature on all sides but one, and upon that fortified so as to be apparently impregnable. Joshua had conquered and ravaged all the neighbouring country up to its very gates, but could make no impression on this stronghold. In the time of the Judges all effort of this kind was given up, and the Jebusites, its occupants, had not to dread any assault. Not even Saul, when at the head of all the combined forces of Israel, had ventured to attack it. There, for 300 years, it had stood, with its Canaanitish garrison, a virgin fortress; and it now remained the sole stronghold of that people whom the Israelities had been commissioned to eject—its very presence a reproach.

But at last it was doomed to fall. David and his troops came up from Hebron, and sat down before it. The Jebusites looked down contemptuously upon them. So secure did they feel, that they brought out their lame and their blind, and set them upon the walls, as if even such defenders were enough against any such assault as David and his men could make. To encourage his men, David held out the tempting bribe, that whosoever should be the first to climb the height and enter the fortress, should be commander-in-chief of all the forces. Hitherto this post had been held by Joab. In putting it thus into commission, and offering it to the boldest and most successful adventurer, had David a secret hope that he might be relieved from the necessity of continuing him in the office? If so, he was disappointed. Joab performed the feat, and secured the prize. The Jebusite fortress was taken. David occupied and strengthened the defence of the castle, and Joab repaired and fortified the rest of the city.

Fixed on now as the royal residence, the metropolis of the kingdom, there was yet lacking one thing to make it like other capitals. There was no house or palace for the king. Here, however, a difficulty interposed. The Israelites were altogether deficient in the constructive arts. For forty years their forefathers had dwelt in tents. When their children invaded and conquered Palestine they found houses and walled cities and castles built, and ready to hand. Their own private dwellings coming to them in this way, they would have to keep them up, so far, at least, as to prevent them falling into decay; but among a people of such simple habits, of such purely agricultural occupations, there was little temptation to do more. They had no public buildings, no temples in towns or villages, to erect and maintain. Up to this time they had no princes or kings for whom any special residences were required. Saul never seems to have entertained the idea of having such a residence. The project comes now into David's head, when he has found so fit a place for a palace as a gentle slope within the lines of his new metropolis. But how can it be executed? Hiram, King of Tyre, relieves him of the difficulty, by sending "cedar trees and carpenters and masons, and they built David a house." The stones were at hand. The choice wood came from Lebanon, and with it those Phœnician artisans, whose mason-marks upon the stones of the still greater buildings raised upon this same height in the days of Solomon, have so recently, and in such singular manner, been brought to light. And, by this kindly intervention of a neighbouring sovereign, and this opportune providing both of workmen and of material for his house, "David perceived that the Lord had established him king over Israel," and he thanked Him, and took courage.

This courage was soon severely tried. So long as their neighbours of the hill-country were divided, and fought only with one another, the Philistines looked on unconcerned, or with a malicious gratification; but those recent events—in the great gathering at Hebron, the enthusiastic union of all the tribes, the anointing of David as king over them all, the conquest and fortification of Jerusalem, its occupation as the centre and citadel of strength for the new kingdom—at once awoke all their old jealousies, and filled them with a natural alarm. They knew with what intensity the Israelities had resented the victory over them at Gilboa: how they burned to wipe off its disgrace: how eager they would be to seize the first opportunity for doing so which this happy combination of all their strength afforded. Upon whom but upon them would the first bolt of war be hurled? In haste to anticipate it, and be themselves the first to strike the blow, they gathered their strength and rushed up along one of the valleys to Jerusalem. David was taken by surprise; unprepared to meet such an onset in the open field, he shut himself up in that stronghold which the Philistines shrank from assaulting. Here he consulted the divine oracle, which told him to go forth, and which promised him victory. The Philistines, meanwhile, exulting and incautious, had spread themselves over the fertile valley of Rephaim, and were already gathering the spoils of a fancied success. Upon them David and his men broke forth, as dammed waters do when they burst through the barrier that had been restraining them, and even as such a mass of rolling waters carries all before it in its course, so were the scattered hosts of the Philistines driven back into their own land, leaving their idols behind them. The Israelites remembered how their own ark, which they had in like manner carried into the battle-field, had been treated by these Philistines, and took now their revenge by burning the captive idols of their enemy.

This defeat was too hasty and too incomplete for the Philistines to accept it. Again they gathered up their strength, and now, in larger numbers, and with more measured steps, the invasion of the Israelitish territory was made. Again David consulted the oracle, but was warned now to avoid an instant and open attack on front, and was directed, instead, to hang upon the flank and rear of the foe, to wait behind a grove till he heard "a sound of going on the tops of the mulberry trees," and then to go out to battle. He did so, and the hosts of the Philistines were smitten from Geba to Gazer, down through the mountain passes far on into the plain; the rout so utter and complete that for years in this quarter the Israelites were at rest.

So ended the first war in which David was engaged, its result strengthening the confidence which the people had in him as their warrior-king, and directing the trust, both of king and people, to Him whose supreme rule over the nations this kingdom of Israel was intended to exhibit and extend. His higher rule David was prompt to acknowledge. "God," said he, on occasion of his first repulse of the foe, "hath broken in upon mine enemies by mine hand like the breaking forth of waters." "Go out," he was told in the second instance, "for God is gone forth before thee." He "did as God commanded him." "And the fame of David went out into all lands; and the Lord brought the fear of him upon all nations."

HOSPITAL STORIES.

IT is some time since the kind friends of the Quiver Cot heard anything of little Willie C., who was for so long the favoured patient. I think that what I can now tell of Willie's condition will be read with interest, though I cannot still call him a proper subject for a Quiver paper. I cannot write anything interesting concern-the present cot inmate, but it is by our old friend Willie's special request that I "tell all those kind people how he has been a-getting on." I will therefore simply tell how wonderfully the efforts made in the little fellow's behalf at Great Ormond Street have been (with the aid of good air, good diet, and kindness) crowned with success.

Some time ago I went into North Wales, to stay at the Rhyl Children's Convalescent Home. I had been ill and in trouble, and had been obliged to lose sight of dear Willie. To my astonishment I met him in one of the corridors, shouting in a strong voice to another boy, and stumping along bravely. I said, "Willie C., how did you get here?" Willie's face—still thin and with the marks of the past four or five years upon it, but with a healthy brown tinge and brightness that I had never seen before—was turned up to me, and a very merry laugh rang out as he said, "Ah, you didn't know I was here, but I knew you were coming; ain't it jolly! See me walk about! Miss —— brought me here, it's better than Brighton. Let me show you my bed; we do have larks; that's Jem, that boy. Are you going to stay here a good while? I am. Miss —— says I shall get quite strong some day." And then, having exhausted his breath entirely, he waited for my congratulations. I went to see his bed, and other delights—the sand-hills and holes outside the house, where he and other happy and lucky little lads could kick up their heels, and sand their clothes and hair to their heart's content, getting the most outrageous appetites ever known. The next morning I went into the children's dining-room, and from behind a huge basin of bread-and-milk I saw Willie's smiling friendly little phiz nodding away. I walked up the room. Such rows of happy faces! Small fat bundles of children, of whom it was hard to believe what nurse Lizzie said, that just so long ago he or she had been unable to sit up or walk; long slips of girls, rosy, laughing, and brown; jolly-looking boys, full of mischief, chattering of what they were going to do after breakfast; nurses hopping about blithe and busy, spoons and cups jingling, huge plates of bread, with lots of butter on it, disappearing like magic, the sweet autumn sunshine lighting up the whole scene, whiffs of fresh sea air mingling with the scent of coffee, and a running accompaniment of plashing waves. What more pleasant scene can be imagined! A far more clever pen than mine would fail to do justice to those happy breakfasts. Children of all ages go to make a family, and there they are—maidens of various ages up to twenty, merry boys, and tiny children, presided over by sweet motherly ladies, who seem to get happier as the noise increases.

A few hours after we meet again. As I wandered on the sands, with my book and stool, I was attracted by a tremendous shouting and splashing followed by much hearty laughing. I could only see a number of heads bobbing about, and the amused faces of the on-lookers. I asked a fat old lady what the excitement was, and she said, "Oh, it's the convalesing children a-bathing, bless their 'arts; it does me more good than all the sea air to see them getting stronger every day; that's the sort of 'orspital I approves of," and the old dame wiped her eyes, and, bestowing a blessing on "them as works it," waddled away. I often saw her afterwards peeping about the Home to get a look at the "cons" during their meals, and she never failed to be down at the bathing time; and many a fine shell box has found its way into a dirty dingy little Sheffield or Leeds back lane home through her kind little tips to the poor patients. Good old body! I wish her a happy and peaceful old age, and kind hands to help her whenever she needs help. I found that Willie wore his irons, and I suggested to him that if he continued to improve, he would perhaps be able to leave them off. He looked a little sentimental, and said nothing. The next morning early I was going up a staircase, and came upon a queer-looking group of small boys, very lightly attired, hobbling down to the "salt bath-room," singing "Old Aunt Sally" at the top of their voices. I recognised our friend as one of these oddities, and found he was carrying his irons in his hand! Said I, "This beats Great Ormond Street, Willie, doesn't it? "No," said he, "nothing can't never do that; I likes being here, and I loves Miss —— but I shouldn't love her so much if she hadn't been the Lady Superintendent at Great Ormond Street. I should like to go back there, I think; the doctors here are very kind, but they ain't like our doctors, of course," and then Willie went off to his salt bath. I took an early opportunity of having a regular confidential conversation with him. I explained how grateful Willie ought to have been that he could be taken in at the happy Rhyl Home, and to have got so strong. I also showed him that he could not expect to stay at Great Ormond Street always, as he would be keeping some other child from being helped. At the same time, I could but feel glad that the child should feel such love and gratitude for all his friends had done for him. He told me that two boys had been Quiver Cot patients, and that both had recovered and gone to Highgate, while he kept ill and weak, but that "he didn't mind, God knew best, and he was glad that all the Quivers hadn't been so slow in getting well as he had." I also heard some amusing stories about the much-loved doctor, who had taken his case from the very first; I think Willie had treasured them for my sake, feeling sure of my enjoying them. One was, that at one time, the Quiver Cot patient lost appetite, and this good man tried to tempt the child to take a meal by suggesting various dainties usually irresistible among the little creatures. However, everything was rejected—eggs, watercresses, herring, all had lost their charm, even "srimps." As a last attempt the doctor suggested, "winkles!" That was the magic word! A smile and a nod came at last, and then, as Willie said with his eyes twinkling, "Mr. —— was so serious, he took up the diet card and wrote on it 'winkles and a pin;' wasn't it fun? Ah, he always done us good, when he came round, 'cos he made us laugh so. When I was in the Cot, a lot of the doctors got cross because I kept on stopping so long in the hospital, and one day, Mr. —— came to me, and he says, "I say, what do you think I'm going to do with you, you tiresome young monkey? You can't stop here for ever you know." And I says, "No, sir, I have been here a very long time," and so I had too. And then he says, all of a sudden, "I know, you shall go on the Christmas tree, and then the best boy can have you." Whether this solved the difficulty or not, the laugh relieved Willie's mind, and soon after his kind friend, the lady at Rhyl, visited Great Ormond Street, and carried him off to that joyful abode of fresh air, wonderful appetites, endless meals, and treats of all sorts.

I saw many amusing sights there. One great source of fun to the boys outside the house is a large tank, in which they fish continually. The game usually is for one boy to slip out and drop various catchable articles into the tank, unknown to the rest, and then commences the exciting sport. I watched them out of a pantry window, and the roars of laughter over each "take" were quite irresistible, and I betrayed myself by my own share of cackle. One great joy to all the children, both in the sick wards and in the "con." room, is the covered balcony that surrounds three sides of the house, a large and most commodious one. Up and down this place the tiny ones trot, while their elders sit and read, or work, and listen to one of Nurse Jane's stories. On a wet day there are games to play at, a yacht that holds three, rocks without intermission on the floor of the day-room, and noise of all sorts goes on joyfully. Bells ring unexpectedly for meals—always welcome though—and bed-time comes only too early. There is a pretty little chapel, full of low benches, where twice a day all assemble to thank and praise the good God for His kindness to His children who have passed through their suffering, and again enjoy the blessings of comparative health and strength, with no care or sorrow around them. The window of this dear little chapel is full of painted glass faces of the children of Scripture; and bright memories must remain to the patients when they go back to their poor homes and in many cases hard work, of the nice quiet prayer-time; and the hymns they learn at the Home are never forgotten. Imagine the joy of a month at Rhyl to those who never saw the sea in their lives. Down on the sands, with nothing to do but enjoy the novelty, the fresh air, and the feeling of renewed health creeping through the frame that has so lately been a sort of suffering machine only. I have watched both boys and girls pick up shells as if for their living, and then for very wantonness of enjoyment fling them away, and throw up their thin arms and shriek aloud from sheer happiness.

Once a week there is a service in the chapel, when the rector goes and questions the children, and teaches them so kindly, while the windows of the sick ward are all opened, that those in bed should also share in the pleasant and comforting service. Willie had been so well taught at Great Ormond Street, that he often was able to give an answer when all the rest were puzzled. He and many others could only sit at that time, but now Willie is quite a useful member of the Institution, and is actually able to be the errand-boy; and I think the doctor at Great Ormond Street would be puzzled to recognise pale Willie in that sunburnt and by no means thin boy who can now scamper about very quickly, although he is still a little lame. There is usually a good deal of fun going on among the boys—small practical jokes played off. One of the ladies, who generally went into their sleeping-room while they said their prayers, was one evening a little late, and when she went in, found the whole party sitting up solemnly in bed with paper cocked hats on. Willie was one of the ringleaders in most of the mischief. One night they all pretended to be asleep soundly when the lady went in, and she was just going to creep quietly out, thinking they were over-tired perhaps, when Willie said, "We aint really asleep;" then all the rest burst out into a laugh, not of rudeness, but downright fun, showing how different a state of mind and body they were in from what they had been but a few weeks before. I certainly never thought to see Willie C. chasing the hens about, and beaming with mischief, sending his voice on before him, and making up for the past quiet years. He is a great favourite with all the other children, as he knows many stories and hymns, and is good-natured, though quite a boy, up to all sorts of frolic, and as fond of getting dirty as any boy can be. Nevertheless, Willie often declared that he wanted to go back to Great Ormond Street, and belong to the "Quiver" again, and I fancy that he had been so long an invalid that he hardly liked returning to ordinary life, and being nobody in particular, merely one among the rest, although I am sure he was most thankful to be comparatively well and strong again.

SCRIPTURE LESSONS FOR SCHOOL AND HOME.

SCRIPTURE STORIES. SECOND SERIES. No. 9. THE RICH MAN AND LAZARUS.

Chapter to be read—Luke xvi. 19—31.

INTRODUCTION. What was the last lesson about? what rules did we find for the observance of Sabbath? So Christ was always trying to teach people their duty. Amongst others a good many rich people heard Him; very fond of money. Was Christ rich or poor? How was he born? Also had often nowhere to lay his head; often tried to teach people true value of money (see Luke xvi. 13, 14); cannot serve, i.e., be slave of, both God and Mammon—one will be the master, both cannot be. Now speaks to Pharisees a parable to show folly of thinking only of this life, forgetting the next—called Dives (a rich man), and Lazarus.

I. THE TWO IN LIFE. (Read xvi. 19—21.) (1) The rich man. How is he described? Well-fed, well-dressed: no harm in these things in themselves; quite right to live according to position in society. Abraham was rich. God gave Solomon riches. Christ himself often went to feasts in rich men's houses, which he would not have done had it been wrong. What then was wrong with the rich man? Not so much what he did as what he did not do. What opportunity had the rich man of doing good? Just before his eyes every day lay the beggar; he did not recognise his duty; did not see in the poor man one of God's poor; but used his riches only for himself. By whom are riches given? Are they absolutely for any man's own use? Christ just before been teaching parable of Unjust Steward, to show that all must give account of stewardship. So this rich man would soon be called to account. Whom else did he forget besides the poor man? To forget God far worse: for this would have to give account. (2) The beggar. Describe his situation—daily carried to gate of rich man's house, laid there to enlist his sympathy, hoping if only for crumbs from his table; his wounds unwashed, licked by the dogs. What possible comfort had he in this life? But had evidently put his trust in God; cried to him (Ps. xxxiv. 6). though poor, was rich in faith (James ii. 5), and therefore an heir of glory.

II. THE TWO IN DEATH. (1) The rich man at last fell ill. What good would his rich food do him now, could not eat it; or his fine clothes, could not wear them? What an awful scene! A death-bed without God; can carry nothing of this world away; has no hope in the future. Picture the grand room—rich curtains, mirrors draped, hushed footsteps, doctors whispering, nurses watching; cannot keep out death, who comes to all. Then the grand funeral—carriages, nodding plumes (in our day), undertakers' men; all possible pomp to show rich a man is dead; What a mockery all seems! (2) The beggar. Perhaps died in street; have read of such in London; want of food, of proper clothing, necessaries of life. But who is with him in death? Angels attending near to deliver him (Ps. xxxiv. 7); carry his soul to Paradise.

III. THE TWO IN ETERNITY. (1) The rich man. (Read 23—31). What is his condition of body? Fearful suffering. Whom does he see afar off? What does he want to be done? for how long? Glad of only a moment's cessation of pain? Can it be done? Why not? What is between the two? Who fixed the gulf? Not God, because will have all to be saved; not the devil, who would like some to cross from Paradise to torment; who, then, fixed it? the man himself. What is it separates between man and God? Yes, sin unforgiven, makes eternal barrier. What kind of God is God? A holy God cannot look on sin; therefore no sin can enter heaven (Rev. xxi. 27); man shuts himself out. What else does the rich man suffer? What agony of mind! Cannot forget. Where does he want Lazarus to be sent? Who are to be warned? But what warning have they already got? Do they hear them? Is it likely that they will listen to any one else? But who did rise from the dead? Did the Jews hear Him? did they hear apostles who testified of Him? Remind of lessons in Acts, how the preaching of the Resurrection was greatest offence (Acts iv. 2). If will not hear God's word will not hear God's messenger. (2) The beggar. In rest and happiness; no more told; this quite enough; earth's pains over, heaven's glory begun; trusted in God on earth, not disappointed now.

IV. PRACTICAL LESSONS: (1) Life the time to serve God. Many keep putting off; plenty of time in future. How do they know? have life now, perhaps, death at hand; therefore don't delay, repent at once while is time. (2) No pardon in the grave. This world the only preparation; at death lot is sealed; as die, so will eternity be. (3) The blessedness of heaven. Let teacher dwell on this rather than on torment of hell. Lazarus, no pain, no remorse, no sorrow, nothing but eternal rest, happiness, and peace. This the lot of all God's children, whether rich as Abraham; as poor as the beggar, heaven's joys for all who love God. Is this lot ours? Make it sure now.

Questions to be answered.

1. Compare the two in life.
2. Compare the two in death.
3. Compare the two in eternity.
4. What is the great lesson of the Parable?
5. For what was the rich man condemned?
6. Draw three practical lessons.

STILL AND DEEP.

BY F. M. F. SKENE, AUTHOR OF "TRIED," "ONE LIFE ONLY," ETC.

CHAPTER XLV.

BERTRAND sat for a long time with the letter from the notary open in his hand, thinking over all that it involved for his future life. The glow of delight with which he felt that it restored him completely to his native land, showed him, better than he had ever understood it in himself before, how entirely his heart had really always been with France, even while he loved England as a second home.

Henceforth all his interests and duties would lie in the country for which he had been willing even to shed his blood; and he saw that the position he was about to assume was one which would give him great importance in the counsels of the nation, while it would afford him ample employment in the care of his tenantry and the improvements of his vast estates. If he could but get sweet Mary Trevelyan to share with him alike his burdens and his dignities, thought he, how happy he should be, making his home in the beautiful old Château de L'Isle, varied by occasional visits to Paris and to England! how well Mary would suit the position of Comtesse de L'Isle! She was such a perfect lady, and her manners were so quiet and dignified, that she would know well how to keep up the traditions of the stately courtesy which had always characterised the heads of his house; and, as he pictured her to himself receiving his guests in the grand old hall, a somewhat mischievous smile curled his lips, for it suddenly flashed upon him how completely Laura Wyndham had overreached herself when she threw him over for Mr. Brant, the wealthy merchant.

As regarded Mary, however, the state of matters was very different. He had a great suspicion that the acquisition of his new possession and dignities would tell very strongly against him in her estimation. He felt certain that he stood a much better chance of winning her if she believed him to be poor and forsaken, than if he came before her endowed with honours and riches, which were sure to bring him many friends.

Bertrand still saw her occasionally, although she was now labouring with even more than her former zeal among the sick at the hospital, for she was often sorely wanted at Madame Brunot's house as well. No news had reached them yet of the fate of the unfortunate colporteur; and his wife's health failed more and more, while several of the children were ailing from their insufficient nourishment: so that poor Mrs. Parry had her hands more than full, and she often sent to ask Mary to come for an hour or two to help and cheer them.

On these occasions her manner to Bertrand was always sweet and gentle, but so reserved and still that he was unable to draw any conclusion from it.

One evening, shortly after the entry of the Prussian troops into Paris Bertrand Lisle came into the little salon of Madame Brunot's house from his own bedroom, which was on the same floor. He had by this time so far regained the use of his limbs that he could move about from room to room, and his arm was also quite restored.

As he opened the door, and went in, he saw a sight which made him close it very gently, after he had entered the salon, and stand motionless, contemplating the group before him. Mary Trevelyan was seated in an easy-chair near the window, with her head laid back against the cushion, and he saw at a glance that she had fallen into the deep sleep of utter exhaustion. It was no matter of surprise, as he well knew, for she had been up the whole of the previous night, taking her turn in tending the sick, and then, instead of using the hours when Marthe took her place in seeking the rest she so much needed, she had hurried away to Madame Brunot's, to do what she could for the invalids there; but it so happened that she had not been specially required, and so she had sat down, and dropped instantly into a quiet slumber.

But she was not quite alone: little Jacques Brunot, a curly-headed boy of four years old, was seated on the arm of her chair, with his feet firmly planted on her knee. He was amusing himself by twining his fingers in the long soft curls of her dark hair, which he had drawn down from its fastenings.

The mischievous little fellow, having sufficiently entangled her hair to satisfy his fancy, began to seek for some other source of amusement; and Mary, whose little hands lay loosely on her lap, was too fast asleep to be aware of anything he did. He proceeded, therefore, to twist her watch-chain round his hands in various ways, and finally drew out the watch itself with a violent jerk. It had been slipped within her dress between two of the fastenings; and as it was thus roughly pulled from its hiding-place, it brought along with it what appeared to be a small piece of white silk, folded into a little square parcel, and secured by a ribbon. This fell out on Mary's lap, and Jacques at once pounced upon it, and before Bertrand could stop him, he had opened it and disclosed to the young man's look, irresistibly cast upon it, the carefully preserved remains of a withered white rose, with one little violet laid by its side. At that sight, significant of a love and constancy which had never known decay or change, the heart of him who was in truth its object leaped up in a rapture such as life had never brought to it before. Involuntarily he bowed his face on his hands, murmuring, "Oh my Mary! my Mary! she is mine indeed!" but a movement on the part of Jacques recalled him to himself; as he looked up he saw that the precious rose would suffer utter destruction if left another moment in those rough little hands, so he strode quickly and quietly up to the child, and desired him in a low stern voice to fold up the flowers again in their silken case, and replace it where he had found it. The boy looked up at the bearded man who towered over him with such authoritative looks, and felt that prompt obedience was decidedly his wisest course, however unpleasant, just when it would have been so amusing to scatter those withered leaves all about the room; so he deftly replaced the fragile rose and violets within the folds of the silk, and tied the ribbon round them; then he thrust the little packet back into its resting-place over Mary's heart, and pushed the watch between the fastenings whence he had taken it. This done, he looked up for approbation from the gentleman who was evidently so resolved to be obliged, and was going to propose to him that they should amuse themselves by raising Mary's eyelids to see how she looked while she was asleep, when he suddenly found himself, to his dismay, lifted down to the floor, and then a strong hand, that looked as if it could administer a box on the ear with singular efficacy, pointed determinately to the door, and a stern whisper ordered him to leave the room at once; so Jacques discreetly trotted away, and was by no means sorry when the formidable hand had opened the door for him and closed it behind him, leaving him standing safe, though somewhat bewildered, on the other side.

(Drawn by WILLIAM SMALL.)

"She often sent to ask Mary to come for an hour or two to help and cheer them."—p. 712.

CHAPTER XLVI.

Bertrand and Mary were alone, and he stole softly back into the room, and sat down by her chair, bending his loving happy eyes on the fair spiritual face, that looked so innocent and sweet in its perfect repose; all his doubts of her perfect constancy had vanished, and he wondered how he had ever for a moment imagined her capable of change; the white rose he had given her, worn by her through all this weary time, despite his own faithlessness towards her, was a sufficient proof that she still held to the words she had spoken to his father on that memorable night, and that he was in truth her one and only love for ever. Now, then, at last he would claim her for his own.

He would wait till she awoke, so tired as she was, poor child! he must have that much patience, but not an instant longer; she should not leave the room till he had won her promise to be his wife. It was not long before Bertrand's persistent gaze began to make itself felt in some mysterious way by the sleeper. Mary moved a little uneasily, gave a gentle sigh, and finally opened wide her dark soft eyes, to meet those of him whose image had been mingling, as ever, with her dreams, bent tenderly upon her. She started up from her recumbent posture, and a sudden blush crimsoned her fair cheek for a moment, as she turned to him.

"Have I been asleep?" she said, passing her hands over her eyes; "how very tiresome of me!"

"Not at all tiresome," said Bertrand, smiling; "you never pleased me better than by taking that long sleep just now. But tell me, Mary dear, are you quite awake at last?"

"I think so," she said, with her soft pretty smile, "unless I ought to take it as a proof that I am still dreaming, that you seem to me to look so much better and brighter than you have done for this long time past."

"It is true that I feel just at this moment as if I had been suddenly inspired with new life," he answered; "and no doubt such a renovation must have its effect on my appearance, so it is plain that you have all your powers of observation alive again, and therefore you can undertake the discussion of a very important subject with me, for which purpose I have been waiting your return to the waking world."

He spoke playfully, but there was an earnest thrill of emotion in his voice which made Mary's sensitive heart throb, she knew not why.

"I am quite rested now," she said, "if I can do anything for you."

"You can do a very great deal for me—more than any one in the world," he answered; and then, suddenly possessing himself of both her little hands, he looked her full in the face with his sunny blue eyes, and said, "Tell me, first, Mary, do you not think you have punished me long enough now, and that the time is come when I may ask you to forget and forgive?"

She looked up at him with an expression of the most innocent surprise.

"Punished you, Bertrand!" she said; "what can you mean?—how could I do so, and why should you suppose I had ever any such wish?"

"Have you not been punishing me for my blind and insensate infatuation as regarded Laura Wyndham ever since that day and hour when you drew yourself away from me in the garden at Chiverley, and I knew, even in the midst of my miserable folly, that my good angel had finally deserted me?"

Mary bent down her head, so that he could not see her face, and said, in an almost inaudible voice, "I had no thought but for your happiness then, as now."

"I know it, my darling," he answered, in a tone of deep feeling, "and well is it for me if you do indeed still wish my happiness, for it is in your hands, and in yours alone; but, Mary, the moment is come when all reserves and concealments must be at an end between us, and I am going to open my whole heart to you, in the hope that you will do the same by me. My dearest," he went on, bending to kiss the trembling hands he held, "I have loved you all my life; and long before my father's death I had felt that I could never go through any part of my existence on this earth without you. When I found, therefore, that he too wished our union, I was most thankful to have his blessing on my one great hope, and my only doubt or anxiety was as to the nature of your feelings towards me; you were always so still and quiet, little Mary, that it was very hard to tell what you felt."

As he spoke a great tremor seemed to seize her frame; involuntarily her grasp tightened almost convulsively on his hand, and, while she bent her head still lower, her voice came, earnest and imploring, to his ear. "Bertrand, I beseech you to tell me the truth on one point, which has been to me a terror and an anguish ever since the day of your father's death, influencing me in all my conduct towards you from first to last—did he—did your father repeat——"

She could not go on, but Bertrand understood her.

"I will tell you all," he answered, gently; "you shall know the exact truth. My father said not one single word to me respecting your state of feeling, till after I had told him that I loved you with all my heart, and that it was my most cherished hope to win you for my wife. But when I went on to tell him that your great reserve of manner made me fear that you had no affection for me, then and then only, he bade me hope, in consequence of words which he said he had wrung from you as a dying man, with the assurance that they would be buried with him in the grave."

Mary's hand relaxed its grasp, and she gave a long sigh of relief.

"Then is it true and certain," she said, "that you never were influenced by the wish to make me happy, or to gratify your father?"

"It is quite true and quite certain," he said, smiling; "but, Mary, I might ask you the same question, for Lurline assured me that you did not care for me, in the very least, and that if ever you married me it would be only in order to carry out the wishes of the friend and benefactor you had lost."

Mary raised her eyes and looked at him, for the first time, as she quietly answered, "And to me Laura said that you felt bound to make me your wife, even while your heart was altogether hers, because your father had unwillingly caused the death of mine."

"The traitress!" exclaimed Bertrand, clenching his fist. "What a tissue of falsehoods she managed to weave around us! Mary, though I hate myself for having even for one moment admired the fair face that masked her hideous deceit and treachery, I think there was just this much of an excuse for me—that I was no match for the consummate subtlety with which she poisoned my mind respecting you; but, oh, my darling," he added, throwing his arms round her, "you understand me well now, do you not? I would have asked you to be my wife that last evening when we stood together by my father's grave, if the solemn sacredness of the spot had not deterred me; but I gave you the white rose I asked you to keep, and preserved its twin blossom for myself, in token that I should claim you before the roses bloomed again to be the sweet white flower of my life. I came to Chiverley for that one purpose only, and, even through all the senseless madness of the engagement into which Laura Wyndham drew me, I loved you still, my Mary, and dared scarce think of you, lest I should lament you too bitterly. Then when the mask dropped from Lurline, and I saw what she was, and ascertained the terrible extent of my delusion, you can never know with what wild longing my heart rebounded to its one and only true love, its hope, and rest, and life! Oh, my darling Mary, if you could only know how I pined and prayed for you during the long sad weeks at the Salpetrière! and when you came it was like the light of dawn shining in upon the gloom of night, and I thought that earth had changed to Paradise. Can I ever, ever forget that moment!"

"Or I," said Mary. "Ah, Bertrand! think what it must have been to me to see you then in living presence, with the blessed sunshine and the free air round you, when only a few hours before I had been seeking for you in the Hall of the Dead!" and she bowed her face on her hands as the remembrance of that past misery swept over her.

"The Hall of the Dead! where is that, my Mary? it is a mournful sounding name indeed."

"It is a vast underground room at the Hôtel Dieu where they place all those who fall each day in the battle of life. I shall never forget my visit to it at that dreadful time, when I was seeking you vainly every day; the hall was lighted only by tapers, which glimmered feebly amid the shadows; and there they have service once only in the year, on the day they call the Festival of the Dead, which is a superstition of their own. There were two rows of trestles down either side of the room, where the quiet forms were laid that would know neither healing nor suffering any more; and each calm face was uncovered for me, Bertrand, as I walked past them, looking——" She could not go on, but shuddered, while a low sob broke from her lips.

"My own darling, that is all over now, thank God, and we need never speak of it again; but, oh, how little I dreamt of all your priceless devotion! Yet when you did find me, Mary, your very first act was to separate yourself from me again. Tell me now, why it was that you left this house so soon as I entered it? You dashed all my hopes to the ground by doing so, and flung me almost to despair—why was it? Be frank with me, as I have been with you."

He bent down for her answer, and it came very low and hesitating, "Because of those words I had spoken to your father."

"Darling!" he exclaimed, "I understand it all; it was like your delicate sensitiveness; but now—now, that you know I desire nothing on earth so much as to have you for my own dear wife—now that I beseech you to come to me as my one choice blessing—you will tell me, will you not, whether you can still repeat those words to me with the lips that never knew deceit? Are they true now, Mary, as they were before I lost you through a false woman's witchery?"

And she answered, softly, "True now, and for evermore." (To be continued.)

LIVING BY FAITH.

"The just shall live by his faith."

I SELECT the words printed at the head of this paper from the Old Testament on which to found some remarks on the nature and office of faith, in preference to any allusion to it in the New Testament, because in the latter faith is generally connected with the person and work of our blessed Lord, and therefore to be regarded in a particular aspect, whereas, these words comprehend the great moral principle of faith generally.

We are repeatedly told in the Bible, even if we did not know it from our own experience, that religion is a matter of faith, and not of sight or sense. "The just man shall live by his faith," says the prophet, in the twilight of revealed religion. "We walk by faith, not by sight," answers the apostle, in the full blaze of Christianity. It is well, before entering upon any important discussion, that we should clearly understand in what sense every word is used. I do not in this paper use the word faith in the particular signification of "trust," which is attached to it sometimes in the New Testament, I use it in its larger and more comprehensive meaning, as that part of our nature by which we recognise the remote and the unseen; which enables us to understand and realise those things which are neither the objects of our senses nor the infallible deductions of our reason. In this sense, religion altogether is a matter of faith and not of sight. In this many persons see a difficulty. When we ask those who object to revelation altogether to accept it, or when we ask those who do admit its truth to be more clear in their practical recognition of its importance, we constantly hear it said that its acceptance would be more possible, and compliance with its precepts easier, if religion were a matter of sight and sense, and not of faith. This world in all its business and pleasure offers us the evidence of sense — the gratification of our animal propensities, the opportunities of indulgence, the array in which fashion clothes its votaries, the splendour of pomp and rank, broad lands and accumulating wealth, and care, and toil, and suffering, and the daily struggle for bread—of all these things we have the positive evidence of sense; there is no doubt about their reality; we are forced to recognise it every day, when we indulge in pleasure, or go forth to toil. If, then, for such matters—matters which you tell us are of comparatively little moment, which, when compared with religion, are worse than worthless—we have the positive, unmistakable evidence of sense, should we not fairly have expected, and may we not reasonably ask the same, if not still clearer, evidence, in proof of those matters which are of vastly greater importance, and the rejection or neglect of which would be so fatal a catastrophe? Why have we, for the minor matters of this life, the evidence of our senses, while all the domain of religion is wrapt in the dense cloud of mystery, through which with difficulty the eye of faith alone can pierce?

Now, in reply to such an inquiry and argument, let us first inquire what other condition of religion could there be. What kind of evidence of the reality of God, and Christ, and revelation, and the other truths of religion, does the objector require? Religion being in essence the conditions of our relation to God, the only way in which it could be made a matter of sense and not of faith, would be by the continued perpetuation of miracles. For if God were by any means to manifest Himself to our senses, the only way to prove that it was really a manifestation of God would be by the performance of miracles. Supposing that religion did thus appeal to the senses of one generation after another, is it probable that its acceptance would be more general, or obedience to its principles more implicit? People are often inclined to think they would believe if religion now offered miracles apparent to our senses, and did not command our adhesion simply as a matter of faith. The history of miraculous periods seems to prove precisely the opposite. Since miraculous performance has ceased in the Church, thousands more have been added to the faith of Christ than ever joined it during the time of the apostles. But suppose miracles were continued perpetually, so as to offer evidence to the senses of each succeeding generation, would not such a proposal involve an absurdity? The only way in which miracles are a proof of a Divine mission is that they are exceptional, that they are occurrences contrary to the known law of Nature—either interruption of it by Divine power, or results produced by a Divine power bringing into operation here other laws of which we have not and cannot have any knowledge. But if they were repeated incessantly from age to age, they would cease to be such, they would no longer be miracles; no one would regard them as evidences of a Divine mission. Thus, the only way in which religion could be made a matter of sense and not of faith is shown to be absurd and impossible.

Still, it may be said, with God all things are possible, and He might have revealed religion so, or in some way we know not of, to make it irresistibly acceptable and incapable of rejection by any. But then we find that such is not God's mode of dealing with mankind in other matters. If we believe in a God at all, and find that He treats man according to a certain plan or principle in the world of Nature, it is certainly no argument against a revelation which we say comes from the same God to say in it we find the same mode of treatment. If I discern certain peculiarities in a painting done by a particular artist, is it an argument against the supposition that another picture is from the same brush that we find in it precisely similar peculiarities? Is it not, on the contrary, a strong presumption in favour of the identity of authorship? So when it is said that revealed religion, being a matter of importance, if it really come from God, He would not have made it a matter of faith, requiring effort to believe it, but would have given it some power of forcing all to accept it, we answer, this is no presumption against its Divine authorship at all, for we find God does deal so with the affairs of life. The discoveries of science, for example, which have been attended with such grand results for man, which have conferred so many blessings and saved so many lives, are good things, but they were only discovered gradually, even at present have not been universally accepted, and by most of us have to be believed as matters of faith. It is no argument, therefore, against revelation to say that its importance would have caused God, if it came from Him, to give us the evidence of sense and not mere faith in its support, for we find that in Nature (which we cannot deny) the same God has made those things which are of most human importance to be by no means the most intimately connected with our senses. But I think, beyond all this, we can see positive reason why God should have made us live the higher religious life by faith, and not by sense. If religion were a matter of sense, to be necessarily believed by every one, just as we believe that one and one make two, where would there have been any room for that exercise of moral discipline and probation which is now found in studying the evidences and records of revelation? We take a small and narrow view of revealed religion if we think (as some seem practically to do) that the only end and object of revealed religion is to get man saved by his acceptance of particular truths. The ultimate end of religion is to bring man nearer to God—to train up in him those capacities which will make him enjoy the presence of God for ever. When, therefore, we find that there are other ends in giving a revelation than merely the discovery of religious truths, as such, we must feel that those other ends must have some share in determining the manner in which such truths are to be stated, and the extent to which they are to be sustained, explained, and enforced. Therefore, as one of the ends of religion is our moral training and culture, is it surprising, it has been well asked, that not only religion, but the mode in which it has been revealed to us, is calculated to afford us ample opportunity for such? If religion were a matter of sense and not of faith it could not be so. But as it is, in God's wisdom, we find, says a learned writer, "The exercise of our intellectual faculties in the search for truth as much a part of our moral probation as our behaviour in daily life." It seems, also, that the very fact of all human affairs and interests being matters of sense is a reason in itself why religion should be a matter of faith. There is in us a higher capacity than that which simply recognises the objects of sense; on what, then, is it to be exercised if not on matters of religion? Thus far I have endeavoured to show that religion, being a matter of faith and not of sense, is no objection to religion, inasmuch as it could scarcely be otherwise, and we can see how its being so serves to afford us opportunities for moral probation and exercise which otherwise we should not have. The great lesson to be deduced from such a consideration is this, that we are really living—living such a life as God would have us live, living such a life as Christ Himself lived, such a life as the thought and realisation of what He by His death has done for us should inspire us to live when we are living by faith and not by sight. This is the whole secret of religion. In God's sight none other are really living save those who live by faith. This is the interpretation of our Master's condemnation of men, as blind, and diseased, and dead in sins; for to give up the cultivation of the soul for the sake of gratifying sense, to neglect the heart for the outward condition, to allow outward things of life to overrule the inward power of our moral nature, to forget God and forsake God amidst His very works and mercies, this is, indeed, a mournful blindness, a sad disorder, and when the evil is consummated, it is moral death. I am not asking you to believe anything strange or fanciful; even on earth good and splendid deeds have been done only by those who have risen above the evidence of sense, and allowed faith—faith in humanity, faith in the power of truth, faith in the progress of thought—to guide and direct them. What was it which enabled the astronomer, despite the persecutions of religious bigotry, to maintain at all costs the truth which he had discovered? Was it not that he had faith in truth, that though for a while the side of truth was not that of gain, yet in the end it must succeed? Or, again, look at the brave adventurer who opened up to the astonishment of Europe a new continent of vast extent and teeming with a population of millions. Ploughing for months through a toilsome sea, why was it that his brave heart never quailed when the storm threatened destruction from without, and the whisper of mutiny was ominously heard within? How was it that while other hearts around him quivered like dried leaves upon the withered stem, his alone knew no fear? Was it not that he had faith in the mission that he had undertaken to perform, and the good it would accomplish for the human race? Was it not that while others were content with sensuous vision to contemplate the surrounding clouds of difficulty and doubt, he, with the eye of faith, saw "the Future's gleaming peaks rising across the waves of thankless years?" Need I remind you how splendidly the superiority of faith, as compared with sense, has been illustrated in the history of the Church herself? Recall but one, that perhaps the most memorable triumph of all.

Having passed the various vicissitudes of suffering and of success, the Church of Christ had nearly altogether lost sight of her high mission—the exalted principles of her life. She aimed at temporal and visible, rather than spiritual and invisible triumphs. Her ceremonial appealed to the senses, and not to the higher faculties of man's nature. Sense occupied every throne from which faith had been expelled. The popery of Hildebrand superseded the Christianity of Paul. Then, from the valleys of Spain, from the forests of Germany, from the plains of Italy, the cry of thousands of spiritual bondsmen arose to heaven—the shackles of a sensuous religion had become intolerable. Who should be able to strike them off, and bid a liberated Christendom go free? What an unequal contest had to be commenced! On the one side was the Pope, with all the Catholic powers of Europe to support him, with the prestige of his high position, with the traditional honours of the Papacy, with all the influence of a gorgeous ritual to which the genius of Raphael and Michael Angelo had lent the lustre of art, with all this adventitious aid the Pope hurled at his opponent the thunders of the Vatican, and against him the solitary monk of Wittemberg waged the fierce unequal contest alone. With an eloquence that has rarely been equalled, with an energy that never has been surpassed, the monk fought the battle, and at last came forth victorious from the fight. His only ally had been faith in God and truth.

I wish I could persuade you that this same principle which has won every great triumph in the onward march of civilisation and religion is the only sound principle of human life, is the very essence and basis of religion.

If you will practically believe nothing which is not a matter of sense, the thousand enigmas of life must remain unsolved, a pall of atheism envelope the world's history, the generations that have come and gone be so as but "dead waves of an endless ocean," or dead leaves of a deathless tree; human life but "a rudderless barque bearing a funeral sail, and leaving a pale track behind."

Over all this faith flings a gentle radiance caught from the face of Christ. Each wave has for us an eternal flow—each leaf a lifetime after winter. The pale track of life's barque is but the shadow cast by the dawning of a deathless day.

SURLY BOB.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "SHAG AND DOLL," "HUGH'S HEROISM," ETC.

CHAPTER IX.—VICTORIOUS.

THE week slipped away much as usual with Bob until Friday afternoon came round. It was already growing dusk, as, in returning from an errand on which his aunt had sent him, he found himself sauntering along an unfrequented road which led past the west front of the church.

Suddenly he was startled by hearing a crash as of broken glass falling from one of the windows in the tower. A disused churchyard surrounded the church, the whole being enclosed by a wall; but on this west side, on which was the tower, the building stood only a few paces back from the road, and therefore Bob could not help noticing the sound, and being attracted by it.

He stood still for a moment, glancing upwards, and then he fancied he heard his name called. The sound seemed to proceed from that same part of the tower; but the next minute he said to himself that it could only be his fancy, for it was impossible that any one could be in the church, which was always kept closely shut and locked.

At this instant, however, another crash of broken glass arrested him, whilst this time he distinctly heard his own name called, and he recognised the voice as Tom Lane's. He looked up in astonishment, but it was growing too dark to make out anything.

"I say, Bob Saunders, help a fellow, will you?"

"Where in the world are you?" exclaimed Bob, forgetting, in his surprise, the fact that he and Tom were sworn enemies.

"I'm shut up here in the tower; and I can't get out, for they've locked all the doors. And here I shall be left all night, unless you'll go and get some one to come with the key. Do, Bob, be a good fellow for once: for I've been here ever so long already, and master 'll be so dreadful angry at my not coming back all this time, that like enough he'll turn me off outright. Run and fetch the sexton, Bob; and then I'll do you a good turn some day!"

The last words were uttered in imploring, half despairing tones, for Bob had already turned away, as if refusing to heed the entreaties of the other. He walked on a few paces, whilst a fierce struggle went on in his mind; Tom's reference to his master having recalled a new grievance. For Bob also had applied for this same situation as errand-boy to Mr. Cross, the chemist; and the latter having preferred the sharp-looking Tom Lane to the dull heavy-looking clumsy Bob Saunders, the former had exulted over the defeated candidate, who had retired from the contest much disappointed.

And now here was a chance for Bob of getting the place after all: for if Tom never went back that night, it was not likely Mr. Cross would put up with such behaviour. He would be sure to dismiss him, and might then, perhaps, give Bob a trial. So he seemed to have Tom quite in his power; for if he did not release him, it was more than probable that no one else would be passing along that lonely lane that evening; and thus Tom would be left to his imprisonment all night.

But still all this time it was as if a voice were sounding in his ear, "Forgive—forgive. Be kind one to another, forgiving one another." And yet another voice was urging, "Take your revenge: don't be such a simpleton as to lose this chance of getting into Tom's place; for he is sure to forfeit it unless you are so foolish as to let him out."

But the tumult in his heart was stilled, as he sent up an earnest cry for help; and, turning back with a resolute air, he only paused underneath the tower to cry out, "I'm going for the keys, Tom, and I'll be back in no time," and then ran off as fast as he could go, to the sexton's house.

He found him in, and explained his errand; but it was a good while before the old man could at all understand the case.

"A boy in the church tower d' you say! No, no; you're a-making game of me! No boys couldn't get into the church tower. It must ha' been the owls you heard."

"I tell you, master, 'twas Tom Lane. I know his voice well enough: he don't hoot like an owl."

"It must be Tom Lane's ghost then," returned the old man; "for fifty Tom Lanes couldn't ha' got into the church with all the doors safe locked, and they haven't been opened since Sunday, 'cause there ain't no week service now the vicar's away; and they won't be opened neither till to-morrow, the day for cleaning, when my missus 'll take the keys and let herself in. And if Tom Lane's been in the church all this time since Sunday, why he must have been starved to death long ago, I should say."

"I don't know how he got there; but come along and make haste and let him out, master, or else let me take the keys."

"Oh, that's what you're up to, is it? and so you come making up this fine story about Tom Lane! No, no, I'm a match for you! and I ain't a-going to trust any boy as I know in all the place with them 'ere keys. Fine tricks you lads 'ud be after playing in the church, if I let a whole tribe of you get in there! no, no; I ain't a-going to trust my keys to the likes of you."

"Then come along and see for yourself if 'tisn't true what I've been a-telling of you."

Still it was a long time before old Simon, who proved to be most unbelieving, could be prevailed upon to leave his warm fireside and turn out in the cold; but at length he unwillingly yielded to Bob's representations, and as his cottage was at no great distance from the church, they soon arrived there.

The old man had taken the precaution of bringing his lantern with him, so that on entering the building they were not in total darkness; but all was still and silent within.

"There ain't nobody here," muttered Simon, whose temper was none of the best. "I guessed you were up to some of your tricks, Bob Saunders, you always were a bad 'un; and now you're come to play off your pranks on an old man, making him turn out this bitter night on a fool's errand, and then you'll go and set all the place a-laughing at him!"

"I ain't going to do no such thing," retorted Bob. "I told you 'twas in the tower I heard Tom, so come and look there first, master, afore you begin a-scolding of me."

But by this time Tom's attentive ear had caught the sound of their voices; and, descending the staircase, he suddenly commenced such a vigorous thumping and kicking at the door at the foot of the stairs, by way of attracting their attention, that old Simon was so startled by the unexpected noise that he almost dropped the lantern he held in his hands. At length, however, he produced the key, and cautiously opened the door, when he found it was indeed Tom Lane who was standing there, and no ghost.

"How on earth did you get into the church?" was his first exclamation.

"Through the door, of course," rejoined Tom.

"Now, none of your gammon for me. Don't tell me you got in through the door, for we ain't like to leave 'em open all week for you good-for-nothing young rascals to come in and play your tricks in the church."

"It was though; or how else could I have got in?"

"Then if the door was wide open, why didn't you go out again same way as you came in, instead of staying boxed up here, and fetching of me out in the cold to come and open it for you?" demanded the old man.

"I didn't say as they were wide open; but as I was passing along I saw one of 'em ajar, and so I thought I'd slip in and have a look round about. And then I spied this tower door open, and says I to myself, 'Here's fun! I've always wanted dreadful bad to go up that 'ere tower, but I've never had a chance: now I'll see for myself what it's like up there,' and so up I cut. But just as I was thinking of coming down again, somebody come and turned the key in the door; and, though I rushed down as quick as ever I could, and hollered, and kicked, and banged at the door, I couldn't make nobody hear. And there I've been ever since, till I saw Bob Saunders coming along, and managed to make him hear me; but 'twas precious hard work."

Tom did not go on to relate how he had made his presence in the tower known to Bob; but, picking up his basket of bottles, he rushed off to deliver his medicines, and then try to excuse his delay to his master as best he could. But before he went, he turned to Bob, saying, "'Twas real good of you, Bob, to help me out of this scrape; and I shan't forget it. I'll do you a good turn if ever I have a chance."

The old man, meantime, on his return to his house, received from his wife, who had come in during his absence, an explanation which enabled him to understand the circumstance which had seemed so mysterious.

Simon, directly after their early dinner, had gone out on an errand which had detained him the whole afternoon, so that he had only been in about ten minutes when Bob came to fetch him. As he found his wife out on his return, he had heard nothing of what had taken place during his absence; but now she explained that a lady, for whom she worked as charwoman, had come, soon after he went out, wishing to secure her services for the morrow, and as she did not like to refuse, having an eye always to making a little money whenever a chance of doing so presented itself, she had come to the conclusion that it would not matter for once if she went and cleaned the church that afternoon instead of the next morning; and this she accordingly did.

Having finished her work, she had come home and put the keys back in their usual place; so that Simon, finding them there, had naturally imagined they had never been moved since Sunday, and thus had been at such a loss to account for Tom's having been able to find his way into the church.

But he told his wife that for the future she must never leave the door even ajar; "for them young rascals had such sharp eyes;" but she had better always lock it after her when she went in.

And as it was very rarely that any one went up the tower, or round that part of the churchyard which lay beneath it, the broken window was not discovered until so long a time had elapsed that Tom's adventure had been forgotten even by old Simon, and no one thought of inquiring who had been the author of the mischief. (To be continued.)

"THE QUIVER" BIBLE CLASS.

281. Mention some passage which shows the intense dislike the Greeks had to the Jews in connection with religious matters.

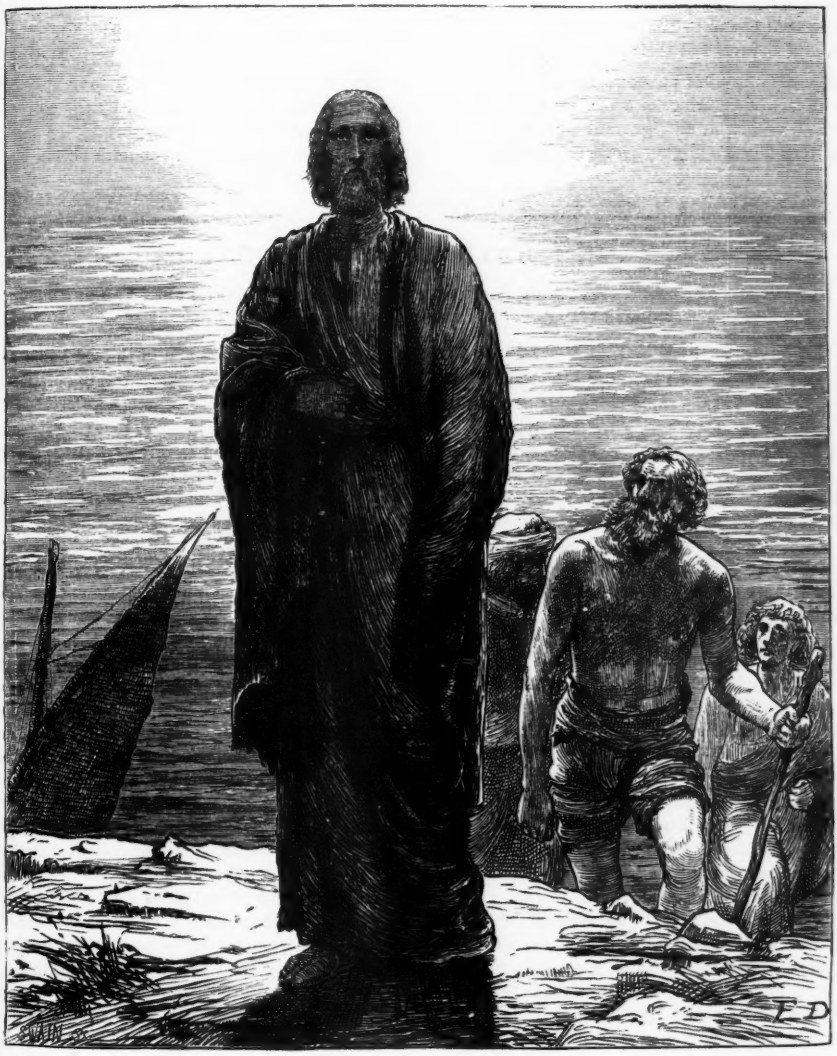
282. Where have we mention made of land producing a hundredfold in one year?

283. In Isaiah xl. 6—8 it says, "All flesh is grass, and all the goodliness thereof is as the flower of the field." What apostle quotes these words in his writings?

284. Quote a passage which shows the age of Caleb when he went with Joshua to espy out the land of Canaan.

285. Quote a passage which speaks of the swiftness of the ostrich.

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS ON PAGE 688.



268. "Moses took of the blood of a ram, which had been offered up, and put it upon the tip of their right ear, and upon the thumbs of their right hands, and upon the great toes of their right feet" (Leviticus viii. 23, 24).

269. "I fell down to worship before the feet of the angel; then saith he to me, See thou do it not, for I am thy fellow-servant, and of thy brethren the prophets, and of them which keep the sayings of this book: worship God" (Rev. xxii. 9).

270. Epaphroditus, whom St. Paul sent as a messenger from Rome to the Philippians (Phil. ii. 25—27).

271. "Speak unto the children of Israel, saying, if any man of you or your posterity shall be unclean by reason of a dead body, or be in a journey afar off, yet he shall keep the Passover to the Lord" (Numbers ix. 10).

272. "Paul said to Barnabas, Let us go again and visit our brethren in every city where we have preached the word of the Lord, and see how they do" (Acts xv. 36).

(Drawn by FRANK DICKSEE.)

CHRIST AND HIS TEACHING.

SPOTLESS and pure, simple and unadorned,
The life and teachings of our blessed Lord;
The vanities of human life He scorned,
Affected speech His truthful lips ignored.

The words He spake, wafted on arrows swift,
Pierced deep into the wondering listener's heart;
And wisdom, in its highest sense, the gift
He sought with love untiring to impart.

With weary step around a narrow sea,
  His pilgrimage was marked by troubles sore;
Hostile thy villages, O Galilee,
  Stern unbelief was rampant on thy shore,
And yet stupendous marvels shook thy land—
  Nature her laws suspended at His will,
Spirits of evil bowed to His command,
  And foul diseases lost their power to kill.

His followers a band of unknown men,
  Drawn from the surface of a tideless sea,
Unlearned, unsought, and ignorant till then,
  That they Truth's mighty pioneers should be;
Whose words, on waves of passionless renown,
  Borne onward by some strange mysterious power,
Should crush the daring sophistries that crown
  Man's highest efforts from his Babel tower.

Yet man still struggles in this later age
  The infidel's dark mantle to unfold,
Or mars the teachings of the sacred page
  With ceremonies, pomps, and cloths of gold;
Forgets the manger and the lonely inn,
  Forgets the homeless wanderer by the sea,
Forgets the fisher's humble origin;
  Yet all are types of what our faith should be.

THE BRIDGE BETWEEN.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE TROUBLES OF CHATTY AND MOLLY," "THE DINGY HOUSE AT KENSINGTON," "QUEEN MADGE," "AGAINST HERSELF," ETC., ETC., ETC.

CHAP. XXXVII.—"THE SAME, YET NOT THE SAME."

THEY stood round her—the same group and in the same room, just as they had done long ago, when she appeared before them in her ball-dress. There was a silence for a minute, in which each thought, and knew that the others thought, of that evening. Then Sally, who had entered unnoticed during the conversation, looked up at Will and whispered, "She is'nt the same now, Will." No one heard the remark but Dorothy, and the old refrain came ringing through her head again:—

"The same, the same, yet not the same,
Oh never, never more."

For the Beauty had changed, and the bloom would never come to her face again. She looked tired and careworn, and thin and faded, and on her cheeks there was a flush, and in her eyes a brightness, that made those who clustered round her look and wonder, and feel a sadness choke the tones in which they would have welcomed her home, and the salt tears slowly blinded Mrs. Woodward's eyes, till she could not even see her daughter's faded face. Her spirits were unchanged, however.

"How you all stare at me!" she laughed; "I know I don't look well; that is why we have come to England. Sir George has thrown up his appointment to bring me; and, tiresome enough, no sooner did we arrive than we were met by a messenger to say his mother was very ill"—she stopped to give a wheezing little cough—"and he has gone off to Lancaster. I could not endure another journey, so I have come for a few days, till his return, to see you all."

"My dear, you are very ill!" Mrs. Woodward almost sobbed.

"Oh no," she laughed, looking up with a thin tired face, that made Adrian Fuller, leaning against the mantelpiece, turn away, it was so different from the old beautiful one, "only the climate has tried me. I am so glad to see you in the old house again; only this ugly furniture makes me think of Dorothy's valiant George Blakesley. How is he, Dorothy?" she asked, in the old teasing manner, that almost made the old angry feeling rise in Dorothy's heart. To speak so of George Blakesley! He whom she loved with all her heart and soul, and felt she should never see again!

"He is going to America," she answered; "you will never see him again!"

"And have you put up a tombstone over Venus's grave?" she asked. "And here is the old piano; do you remember the musical parties, Dorothy?" She sat down before the instrument, and then wearily turned away. "I am so tired," she said, pleadingly, "and would give all the world for some sleep: I never get any rest now," she added, in an inexpressibly sad tone. So they went to make ready some refreshment for her, and a room in which she could sleep, while Mr. Woodward asked her questions about India and his eldest son, and a hundred things to which she would have answered impatiently enough in former days, but now there was a tenderness in her manner, added to the old dash and bravado, that seemed the strangest thing about her. She turned to the piano again, evidently because she was so utterly weary, and did not want to talk; and presently Adrian Fuller came to her to say good-night. He was going. She did not take her fingers off the notes, but she looked up and asked, "What have you done since I have been away? Have you anything to show for all this time?"

"No, nothing," he answered.

"I thought not," she said, bending over the keys.

"I had nothing to induce me, no one to help me or encourage me forward."

"You never will have," she answered; "if the love of your art and the wish to achieve something will not help you. But you love your ease better than all else; I knew that long ago. You will dream through your life, and die, and be forgotten, as I shall soon," she added, with a sigh; "and you will leave nothing by which to be remembered."

(Drawn by J. M'L. RALSTON.)

"You will dream through your life, and die, and be forgotten."

"BRIDGE BETWEEN."—p. 723.

"Lady Finch!" he said, almost angrily.

"Yes;" and she looked up at him with the weary blue eyes. "You know I am right," she went on, "You never loved anything so much as your own ease—you never will. Are you engaged to Dorothy?" she asked, suddenly.

"No," he answered.

"I am glad of that; don't be angry, Adrian;" and she put a hand on his, and stroked it gently. "I am a little bitter, I know; but I am very ill, and I have often thought how much there is sometimes within the reach of us all to do and to be, and yet we do not care even to stretch a hand forward. We love ourselves so well; not merely you and I, but all of us."

"I thought you left this sort of thing to Dorothy—she is always preaching." He stopped, and there was a silence for a minute or two, and Will and Sally crept out of the room. They soon tired of the Beauty, and Sally had a new picture to draw, and wanted Will to look on while she did it. Mr. Woodward sat for a minute watching his daughter, and the man who had been his friend once, and of whom he had hoped such good things to come. He had been disappointed in Fuller, he thought. He was one of those young men who flash in their youth, and promise a great deal, but who actually do no good work afterwards, either because the flash exhausts them, or because, having shown that they possess a certain amount of power, they are content to dawdle on through the rest of their days. "He seems to like talking to Netta or Dorothy better than anything else," Mr. Woodward said to himself; "and we never have long talks now as we used to have. He has quite gone over to the women."

And then he went to see what his wife was doing, and found that she was busy, and did not require either his help or his company, so, forgetting his newly-arrived daughter, he betook himself to the study, and seated himself before his papers, and proceeded to arrange them.

"It is scarcely fair of me to speak thus of your sister, Lady Finch," Adrian Fuller said, when the pause came to an end.

There was a sudden change in his manner and tone that almost made her start; but she gave no sign of her surprise, only let her fingers stray on indolently over the wiry uncertain keys of the old piano.

"Why?" she asked.

He looked awkwardly down upon her, on the poor faded yet still beautiful face, and the blue eyes that were so dim and weary, or else flashed in a hard and almost painful manner. He thought of the summer, with the history of which she was so closely entwined, and of the evening on which he first saw her, and of all her beauty and fascination, and of how his heart had thrilled once at the sound of her voice or the sight of her face, and of all her little coquettish ways, and her sweet voice, and the quaint old songs she used to sing in the twilight. And then he thought of Dorothy. It seemed like turning to the memory of some quaint picture, or listening to music that gave one vague yearnings and longings towards better things that were far away or far beyond one; then he answered the Beauty, gravely and calmly: "Because I think she is far better than any of us. I have learnt to think this since you have been away."

"Well, what then?" she asked, coldly.

The memory of all the protestations he had made in former days to the woman before him flashed back, and he had not courage to avow the truth and the state of his feelings now, as he had for the moment intended.

"Nothing," he said; and another awkward silence came. And then Mrs. Woodward came back, and he said good-night, and went; and Netta was left once more with her family.

CHAPTER XXXVIII.—NETTA AND DOROTHY.

Dorothy was alone in her own room at last, and sat down by the window to think over the events of the evening. She felt almost dazed, so much had happened in the few hours. Adrian Fuller had proposed, and she had refused him; and George Blakesley, whom she had been longing to see again, had been, and gone, and she knew that he cared for her no longer, and thought it probable that she might never see him again; and Netta had come back, and was sleeping in the next room. She could scarcely believe it all, it seemed as if the world had come to an end that night, or at least, as if she had come within sight of her end of it, for she knew now that she had lost for ever the love of the man to whom, when she was no longer bound, she had gradually given her heart, and whom she had learned not only to love (for love by itself is a thing that must sooner or later burn out), but to respect and esteem above all others. She sat and wondered blankly, as when a trouble too great to realise has fallen on us we often sit and blankly wonder, how she could have cared for Adrian Fuller in the old days. "I did care for him very much," she said to herself; "I can remember when the sound of his voice made my heart feel perfectly wild, and as it has never felt for George Blakesley; and yet, oh! what shall I do?" and she broke down and hiding her face, sobbed bitterly. And so it was; for the one man she had had a feverish infatuation, to the other she gave the best love of her life; the one had blazed out, and the other felt shipwrecked. "He seems to have taken my life away with him," she said. And this was the secret of her love, or of much of her love for him, that he made those around him better, and he had led her into the right pathway, and she felt as if she were too weak to walk along it alone. While she knew him and saw him, in the mere effort to follow him she left much of the old world behind, and though she had learned to love that which she had learned through him to consider beautiful, and to know her duty, and to long to do it, yet still with all her yearnings, all her longings, she felt too weak to stand alone. The love she had thrown away and found so terrible a burden once would have been all the world to her now, and she broke down, and sobbed again to herself in the darkness.

"Dorothy," said a voice, and the Beauty came softly into the room, and up to where her sister was sitting, "I heard you moving about a few minutes ago, and I wanted to come and talk to you, though I am so tired," she added, wearily. Dorothy did not move from her seat, only stared through the darkness at the dim white figure of her sister. "Now, tell me —what is the matter with you, dear?" she asked in the low, clear, sweet voice whose charm there was no withstanding. It brought the tears into Dorothy's eyes again, but she stood uncertain and doubtful, as she always had been of the Beauty, though she longed for the sympathy for which she felt afraid to ask.

"Nothing," she answered.

"Yes there is, dear," Netta said. "Dorothy," she said suddenly, putting up her arm and twining them round her sister's neck; "I want you to forgive me for all I did to you in the past days. You will—will you not, darling? I have so often thought of you, and of how patient you were, but I am glad you did not marry Adrian."

"Yes, so am I," Dorothy said, softly, leaning her head down on her sister's shoulder with a sigh of relief.

"I am so glad to hear you say that," Netta answered, "Do you know, Dorothy, I am different from what I used to be. You have had a great deal to do with it, I think, and I am not well; I fancy sometimes I shall not live very long——"

"Oh, Netta!" Dorothy began, but she could see her sister's blue eyes, which used to be so soft, looking at her with that unnatural brightness in them which she had noticed immediately on her arrival, and she stopped.

"Well, we do not know how that may be," Netta went on, "but I want us to be sisters in reality as well as in name—shall we?" she asked, humbly and entreatingly, "I will be good to you in future, and if you would only love me a little, Dorothy——." There was something the girl who listened never forgot in those last words, they seemed to tell of a whole life of smothered feelings. "If you only would——" and she waited, half afraid of what the sister she had once so slighted would reply. But for answer Dorothy only put her cheek against Netta's thin face, and, kissing her passionately, burst into tears. (To be continued.)

THE TRIPLETS OF THE BIBLE.

BY THE REV. J. HILES HITCHENS, AUTHOR OF "THE FURNACE," "THE FACE OF THE KING," ETC.

IX.—THE THREEFOLD BENEDICTION.

"The grace of the Lord Jesus Christ, and the love of God, and the communion of the Holy Ghost, be with you all. Amen."—2 Cor. xiii. 14.

S attentive students of the Scriptures, we must have observed that the epistles from the pen of the apostle Paul conclude with the devout breathing of a pious heart, the earnest expressions of the noblest wishes for those whom he has addressed, the loving commendation of his friends to the care and comfort and instruction of Heaven. These utterances are very varied, some only commending the reader to the grace of the Lord Jesus. None of them is so comprehensive and full as that at the heading of this paper. Here the apostle commends the Christians at Corinth to the sympathy and sanctifying work of the three persons in the glorious trinity in unity.

It is worthy of note that this, the fullest expression of goodwill, is made to the very Church that caused Paul so much anxiety. The Church at Corinth had permitted sad irregularities to creep into its midst. Gross disorders existed there. Some set themselves against the apostle, slandered him, sowed the seeds of dissatisfaction among the members, and aimed to foster a feeling of suspicion towards the great and good man who took the oversight of them. Hence Paul saw it to be necessary to send them a letter of stern rebuke and reproof. He was, however, still anxious for their spiritual good, and so, in closing his epistle to them, he pens this beautiful and bountiful benediction. For the very men who had used him badly he expresses the best of wishes; on the Church that had given him most anxiety he bestows his sweetest smile; into the hands that had been uplifted to injure him he would place the richest treasures. Truly this was in imitation of his Master. This was the exercise of that Christian love which he had commended to the Corinthians as the fairest of the graces! This was doing good to those who despitefully used him! Herein the apostle teaches us that the sweetest revenge is that of offering the most earnest and comprehensive supplication for our antagonists. Thereby we heap coals of fire on their heads, and fan to a brighter flame the fire of divine love in our hearts.

Because so very full and complete, the passage above has been selected as the favourite utterance of God's servants when closing their public services for Christ, and as the form for dismissing religious assemblies. The custom of pronouncing benedictions is not new, it is one of the most ancient and time-honoured parts of religious engagements. In the early ages of the world it was customary on the occasion of important changes in life, and on separation of friends, to utter words expressive of devout wishes. The form of blessing which God himself instituted, and which Aaron and his sons employed, is most strikingly in accord with the apostolic benediction. Listen to the words:—"The Lord bless thee, and keep thee. The Lord make His face shine upon thee, and be gracious unto thee. The Lord lift up His countenance upon thee and give thee peace." We seem to hear the Christian and not the Mosaic teacher. So marked is the likeness between the Aaronic and apostolic benedictions that we could almost affirm one was formed upon the model of the other. Knowing the reverence of Paul for the Old Testament Scriptures, and above all believing in his inspiration, we are assured that the two benedictions come from the same source—the Spirit of Truth—and are designed to convey similar thoughts. Both have a threefold aspect; both represent the persons of the Godhead as engaged in a threefold work; whilst the apostolic benediction is more adapted to the Christian economy, inasmuch as the distinctive titles of the three persons in the Godhead are employed, and their special work recognised. This will be more apparent by examining the three clauses.

"The grace of the Lord Jesus Christ." The word "grace" has a variety of meanings in the New Testament. Into these it is not necessary now to enter. It will be sufficient to fix the meaning of the word here. We regard it as signifying that love and favour, that blessed help, and sanctifying presence of Jesus, which the believer can claim as his portion in Christ. And surely there is something eminently suggestive in the wording of the clause—"The grace of the Lord Jesus Christ." We are accustomed to run the words together as pointing to one person, and conveying but one idea. But each word descriptive of the second person in the Trinity reminds us of a distinct aspect of the "grace" which is desired.

It is authoritative grace—"the grace of the Lord." Though Jesus took upon Him the form of a servant, and became of no reputation, He was nevertheless "Lord." Combining in Himself two natures, He was, and still is, "King of kings and Lord of lords." All power is His; and the lordly manifestations of His grace, love, favour, sympathy, have been again and again enjoyed. In the early Church especially was this so. He worked the miracles of healing in testimony of His Apostles' preaching. He revealed Himself to the dying proto-martyr. He commissioned His angel to speak to Philip. He appeared to Saul of Tarsus. He directed the angel to deliver Peter from incarceration. He directed the angelic messenger to strike the arrogant and vain Herod. He opened the heart of Lydia. He comforted Paul in prison, and inspired him to write in strains so lofty. He protected John, and made such mysterious disclosures to him. In these and many other similar instances we have "the grace of the Lord" exhibited to the early Christians as the grace of a royal, valorous, masterly, and omnipotent friend. He is the same "Lord over all" now. He is still the "Head of the Church." To realise, therefore, "the grace of the Lord" is to realise a favourable extension of the governing, directing, all-controlling power of the Saviour.

It is saving grace—"the grace of the Lord Jesus." He was called Jesus, Saviour, because He should save His people from their sins. The grace of Jesus saves not from the merely temporal calamities of life, but specially from spiritual wickedness, weakness, and woe. His grace saves from spiritual darkness by a word; from the bondage of Satan by His energy; from the power and pollution of sin by His strength. As saving grace it abounds to the utmost. There is no depth in the dead sea of human iniquity that the grace of Jesus cannot and will not fathom. Aye, often from the deepest depths of sin the grace has brought up the brightest jewels. Down through the fathoms of human abominations that grace has dived until it has raised to the pure atmosphere of holiness a persecutor like Paul, a blasphemer like Bunyan, and an outcast like John Newton.

It is anointing grace—"the grace of the Lord Jesus Christ." In olden times anointing was similar to coronation or robing in these days. It was indicative of the honourable and rightful reception to official dignity and power. Christ was "anointed with the oil of gladness above His fellows." No material oil, such as that which was poured upon the heads of Aaron, David, Saul, and others, was ever poured on the head of our Redeemer and High Priest. He was anointed with the Holy Ghost, when at His baptism a stream of Holy unction was seen coming down from the heaven of heavens and overflowing Him. It is thegrace of Christ—the anointing grace—that has led forth the ambassadors of the Cross; and for every struggle against evil, for every attempt to develop and diffuse the good, the grace of Christ has been given us.

How full, then, are these words, "the grace of the Lord Jesus Christ." They embrace the authoritative, saving, anointing presence, love, sympathy, and favour of the Son of God and Son of man; grace to overrule, grace to save from sin and danger, and grace to stimulate and qualify for service.

"The love of God." Though placed second, this in order of time and prerogative comes first. The grace of the Lord Jesus Christ is the channel; the love of God is the fountain. There could be no grace displayed by the second person, but for the affection of the first person. There would be no redeemer, no sanctifier, and, therefore no salvation for man, but for the Father's love. St. Paul does not say the love of the Father, though, beyond all question, it is the Father to whom he alludes. He says "the love of God," the highest, holiest, best, and first of beings. Now, as God, the Father loves all His created works. God's essence is love. There is no creature God does not love. "If," as one writer says, "God should not love His creatures, it would reflect some disparagement upon His workmanship, that He should make anything He could not own and love. God's power never produces what His goodness cannot embrace." The apostle is referring to the love of God in its special and endearing aspects. In thinking of man and his relationship to God, we must observe a distinction between man as a creature and as a sinner. The Infinite One loves every man as a creature; but He is angry every day with the wicked. It is the love to man as a pardoned sinner, as the recipient of the grace of the Lord Jesus Christ, that the apostle alludes to. It is the love of a Father for His child, the love which gives peace, confidence, boldness in expression of our desires, and reciprocal affection.

"The Communion of the Holy Ghost," "the fellowship," or participation in common with us. This is as though the apostle desired that the eternal Spirit may possess the hearts of the believers of Corinth; that He may dwell as a permanent resident within them, sharing life with them, sympathising in their sorrows, rejoicing in their joys, counselling them in their extremities, encouraging them in their hours of despondency, enlightening them in their darkness, inspiring them in their supplications, and always supplying their necessities.

It is to this communion the Holy Scriptures repeatedly point in such passages as the following: "Ye have not received the spirit of bondage again to fear; but ye have received the spirit of adoption whereby we cry Abba, Father. The Spirit itself beareth witness with our spirit, that we are the children of God." "And hereby we know that He abideth in us by the Spirit, which He hath given us." "The Spirit itself maketh intercession for us with groanings which cannot be uttered." And it was with a view to this "communion" that Jesus promised the Holy Ghost should come to the Church, and dwell in it as a "Comforter" and a "Spirit of Truth."

Happy, thrice happy, the man who has this Divine Spirit in his heart. "So much as we have of the Spirit, so much have we of heaven in present enjoyment, and so much evidence of its future fulness. He is in all respects completely an earnest." The glorious work He is effecting within us warrants us to rise in confident hope towards glory, honour, immortality, and eternal life. There is not a healing leaf of the Tree of Life which this Heavenly Dove would not willingly bring to us, as the dove of the Deluge brought the olive leaf to Noah. But it must be "communion," if the blessedness of the Spirit's indwelling is to be realised. There must be an effort made on our part to please Him. We must open our minds to Him. We must guard against vexing the Holy Presence. We must do our very utmost to preserve His favour and enjoy His impartations.

Thus, then, we can see how the three persons in the Godhead are devoted to our salvation. The love of God contrives the plan of our recovery, the Lord Jesus Christ accomplishes the purposes of God, and the Holy Ghost gives efficiency to the Saviour's work. The work of the second and third persons are necessary to bring rebellious man to the embrace of the first person. Christ is the way to the Father, and the Holy Spirit is the guide to the way. The love of God is the fountain, the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ is the channel, and the communion of the Holy Ghost is the individual connection between the heart of man and the channel. "It is the very glory of the Saviour's redeeming love, that it depended as much on the sanctifying love of the Spirit as the paternal love of God did on the Blood of the Lamb. Without the work of the Son as a Mediator, the Father could not have honourably become our Father; and without the work of the Spirit as a sanctifier, the Son could not have honourably become our Mediator. Christ Himself, therefore, looked as much to what the love of the Spirit would do for us, as God looks to what Christ has done for us. Thus, as our redemption by price required the death of Christ, so our redemption by power required the agency of the Spirit." Whilst, then, we speak of the love of God the Father and God the Son, we must not overlook "the love of the Spirit." To each and all of the holy three we are indebted for our present favours and prospects of future glory.

SCRIPTURE LESSONS FOR SCHOOL AND HOME.

SCRIPTURE STORIES. SECOND SERIES. No. 10. BARTIMÆUS.

Chapter to be read—St. Mark x. (part of).

INTRODUCTION. Christ's life may be divided into two parts. What was He constantly doing to His disciples? Why did He teach them? What were they to do when He was gone back to heaven? (Mark xvi. 16). The other part of His life was for the people—healing sick, feeding multitudes, &c. Two reasons for these miracles—one, because He was so full of pity, the other, to show that He was God. Going to read to-day of one of these miracles.

I. THE BLIND MAN. (Read Mark x. 46—50). All children have seen a blind man—often seen begging by way-side. This one evidently well known. What was his name? What city was it near? Remind of Jericho taken by Israelites (Josh. vi. 20). Why was he begging? Could not work. No blind asylums in those days; no books with raised letters; no one to teach him. Could only beg for a livelihood. Blind have keen sense of hearing: he hears larger number of people than usual. What can it mean? He calls to some one to tell him. Is quickly told. Probably has heard of wonderful miracles before. Oh, if he could only get to this Great Man, he would run up to Him and beg Him to heal him! What can he do? He can call out to Him. How does he address Him? Wishes to do Him all honour. Gives Him His family name—not Jesus of despised Nazareth, but Jesus Son of royal David. Now notice the crowd, and of whom did it consist? Why did these people follow Jesus so closely? always anxious to see His miracles, perhaps also are listening to His words. What do they tell the blind man to do? So eager to see and hear Christ; cannot put off; the blind man's interruption: they keep calling to him to be quiet: what effect has this on the blind man? Why is he so eager? thinks this is his only chance. Christ is near him now, may, perhaps, never be again, he must call and call till He listens. Notice about the blind man (1) His sense of need. What did he feel he wanted? No mistake about his blindness; he indeed wanted help. (2) His faith. Not only felt his want, but realised Christ's power. Had never seen Christ, only heard of Him; believed in His love, pity, compassion, and in His power to save. (3) His earnestness. Not daunted by first failure; persevered in calling till answer came. Did all he could to attract attention. Gave Him His title of honour. Was such a cry ever in vain?

II. THE CURE. (Read 49—52). What did Jesus do? stopped in his walk and talk, and called for the blind man. What did the people say to the man now? Perhaps he had been desponding—"He will not deign to notice me, a beggar; I must finish my life in darkness and dreariness." What does he do when message reaches him? why cast away his garment? yes, so eager; puts off outer robe to go more quickly. No doubt, no delay; the Master has called—he will come. Picture the scene. Christ standing calm and dignified, the disciples around, the crowd looking on: all are hushed in silence to see what will happen: the crowd parts for the blind man to come up; perhaps Peter the messenger. Blind man comes, led by the hand, trembling with eagerness. Jesus looks at him, full of compassion, sees in him faith to be healed: what question does He ask him? Will let this miracle be seen and known of all. All must hear his confession of faith, and see the divine power. What does Christ say? "Thy faith hath saved thee." What follows? immediately receives his sight. Picture the joy of the man, sees the Saviour, sees his friends, the village in the distance, &c. What does he do? he must stay with Jesus a little, and feast his eyes on his Deliverer—tell others of his wonderful cure. So he follows Jesus in the way. What was it saved him? Christ's power. Yes, but would not have been given but for his faith. Remind of Nazareth (Matt. xiii. 58) where because of unbelief could not do miracles. Unless faith to accept Christ's gift—the gift not given.

III. THE LESSONS. Remind how blindness is type of heart as it is by nature (John ix. 39; Rev. iii. 17) cannot see God. If realise this what can we do? one only thing, try to cry for mercy. Like David, in Ps. li. 1, must confess sin and ask for pardon. Such a cry never in vain (1 John i. 9). We, like blind man, must (1) Have a sense of need. This the great work of Holy Spirit—to convince of sin (John xvi. 9). Whom did Christ call to repentance? Yes, He saves the lost; unless realise this He cannot save us. We must also (2) Have strong faith in Christ as Saviour. Not merely believe in Him as being good and kind and willing to bless, but as making atonement for sin, as a pardoning God. And also we must (3) Persevere. What did the blind man do? So must we call again and again. Like him, cast away all that hinders. Will pardon, and bless even little children if only they seek Him.

Questions to be answered.

1. What were the two things Christ was always doing?
2. What three qualities did the blind man show?
3. How did he honour Christ in addressing Him?
4. Describe the cure.
5. Of what is blindness a type?
6. In what three ways can we imitate this man?

THE FISHERMEN.

WAVE linked to wave in ceaseless motion,
The grey sky and the grey-green ocean,
And nought else to be seen,
Save here and there a flightsome bird,
Whose shrill shriek ominous was heard
The sky and sea between.

All lonely: yet a little band,
Manly of heart and deft of hand,
Pursue their dangerous trade;
Those fishers, borne from home afar,
Remote from friends, with peril near,
And only God to aid!

A gale, an unexpected breath
Of mischance drags them down to death,
With rude remorseless sweep;
No friendly hand to close their eyes,
No ear to list their latest sighs;
Poor toilers of the deep!

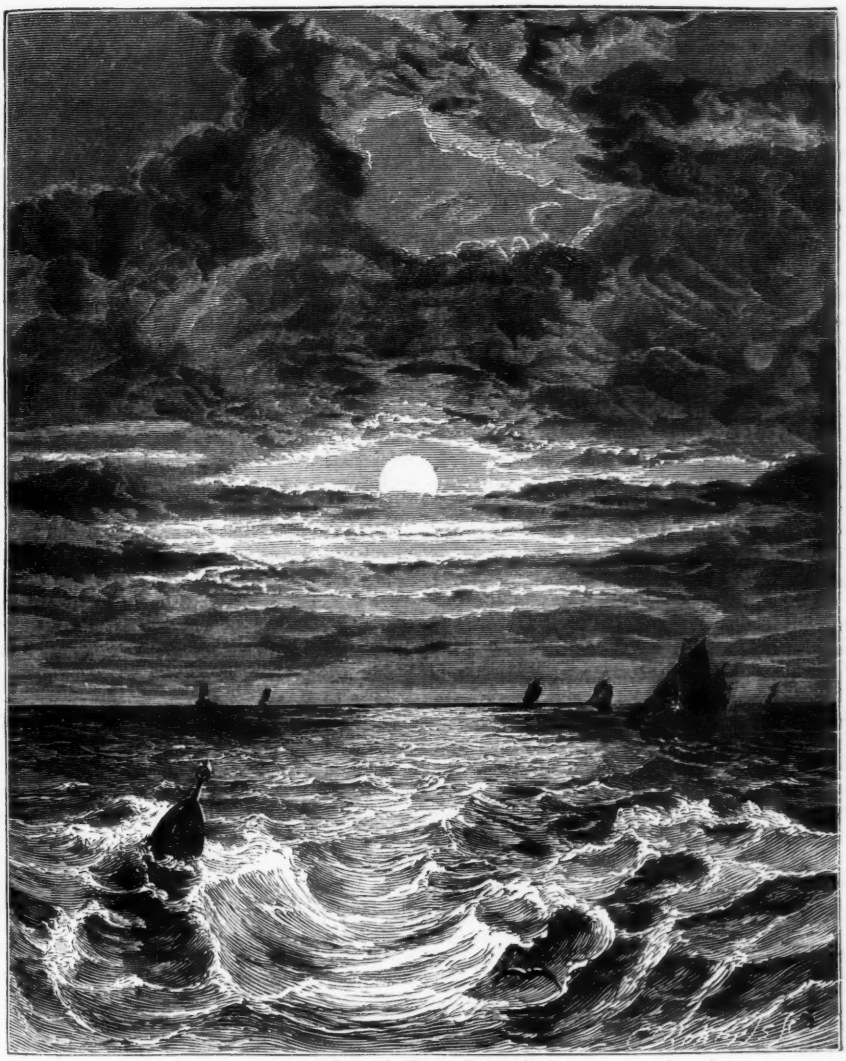
But sunset gilds the quivering sea
Athwart its billows bounding free,
(The day of labour o'er)
The little skiff triumphant rides,
And homeward each tired mariner glides
Safe with his finny store.

And loved ones wait along the beach,
And little hands extend to reach
His own, and bid him come
To the old hearth he loves so well,
Where quietness and calm best dwell,
Where all is dear—at home!

And we, too, in the dubious strife,
Changes and chances of our life,
Cast on the billows' foam;
Might we, when all our labour's done,
Glance upwards to a Father's throne,
And reach at last our Home!

T. H. GIBSON.

STILL AND DEEP.



BY F. M. F. SKENE, AUTHOR OF "TRIED," "ONE LIFE ONLY," ETC.

CHAPTER XLVII.

THE terrible days of the Commune were over. The fatal 24th of May, which witnessed the massacre of the Archbishop of Paris and his fellow-hostages, had come and gone; the flames that had threatened the total destruction of the fair city were extinguished, and the troops of Versailles were in full possession of the capital. The storm that had broken over ill-fated France had finally subsided, and it was marvellous with what rapidity all traces of it were swept away, while the light-hearted people went back composedly to their ordinary occupations. Already the bright June sun lit up each day the Champs Elysées, thronged, as of old, with pleasure-seekers, and merry groups, who were seated talking and laughing under the trees; while never in this world will it be known how much of pain and anguish and terror the walls of the city had enclosed through the weeks that preceded the sudden calm. It had in truth been a dreadful time, when the darkest of human passions had been let loose without restraint, and death and destruction had been in the very air.

Yet all through that memorable period there had been one little spot within the sad tormented city where, despite the deep sympathy felt for the sufferers outside, an intense happiness, such as this earth rarely sees, filled the two thankful hearts that had met in perfect love and confidence after such long severance and unrest. Since that first joyful evening, when all the barriers that had been raised between them were suddenly broken down, the young Comte de L'Isle and his future bride had had ample time to sound the depths of each other's thoughts, and see how hopelessly forlorn and desolate this life would have been for both of them, had they failed to find its only completeness and satisfaction in each other's love. Each day that he lived Bertrand found more reason to rejoice that he had indeed won Mary's priceless love; for with him, who was to her almost a second self, her great reserve melted away, and he learned to understand as he had never done before the tenderness and truth of her noble nature.

He carried out his plan of maintaining absolute silence on his succession to the title and estates of his family; and he took an almost boyish delight in planning the mode in which he would bring Mary as his wife to Château de L'Isle, still in total ignorance of the truth, and reveal it to her there. Meanwhile it was a great source of pleasure to him to hear Mary talking with such earnestness of the means she would adopt to make his life comfortable, on the very small income she believed him to possess. Although he had quite regained the use of his limbs, he was not strong or robust as he used to be, and she would ask him, with the prettiest softest entreaty, to promise her that he would not attempt to take any employment, but let her earn the needful means for his support, which she was sure she could accomplish by teaching French and music, as she naturally assumed they were to live in England. To all this Bertrand would listen with the utmost gravity, and tell her that her plans were extremely sensible, but that it was not necessary they should come to any definite arrangement till after their marriage, as he had money enough in his possession to carry them over at least the time of their honeymoon.

(Drawn by FRANK CARLESS.)

"The grey sky and the grey-green ocean."—p. 728.

It had been arranged, by Bertrand's special wish, that the wedding should take place so soon as Paris was restored to peace and calm; there was indeed no reason for delay, and he knew that his presence was greatly required at Château de L'Isle. It was also necessary that he should go back for a short period to the Italian town where he had held his diplomatic post, to wind up his affairs, which, in his haste to fly to the succour of France, had been left somewhat in confusion. He told Mary that they must proceed to this place immediately after their marriage, and that he meant to travel towards it by a route through France which was not quite direct, but which would enable them to spend a few days at a house where he had been very hospitably received when on his way to Paris with the despatches from the army. Mary was quite ready to go there, or anywhere else he liked, and she asked very few questions as to their journey; it was enough for her that she would be with Bertrand, that her bitter separation from him was now but a memory of pain, and the long aching of her heart for ever stilled in sweetest rapture of content; to hear his voice, to see his kind eyes turned smilingly on her, to feel the touch of his dear hand, was a joy so exquisite, so all-sufficient, that had he told her they were to spend their lives in the wilds of Siberia, it would have been to her a matter of indifference. The poverty and privation to which she looked forward with Bertrand were her own deliberate choice in marrying him, for she had had various opportunities, even since she had been in Paris, of attaining to brilliant positions, both in England and France, had she so willed it. There were many men of wealth and influence associated with her in the great Society for the relief of the sufferers, and her beautiful character, her gentle sweetness, her pure lovely face, had caused more than one to seek most earnestly to win her love, in vain. The true heart never wavered, even in its despair; and now, in its deep bliss of happy union, the outward accessories of life seemed absolutely nothing.

So, even while still the murderous cannon were thundering over their heads, those two inhabitants of Madame Brunot's little house were happy beyond all words, and their joyousness seemed to infect the other members of the family, who had not the same cause for satisfaction. One of Bertrand's first proceedings after his marriage was finally fixed, was to draw little Jacques into his room, where he could be alone with him, and, having set him standing on the top of the table, he sat down in front of him, folded his arms, and, looking at the astonished little boy with laughing eyes, he asked him to be so good as to state what he most desired to possess in the world, in order that he, Bertrand, might have the pleasure of presenting it to him, in recognition of the enormous service the young gentleman had unconsciously done him. When Jacques had thoroughly understood the nature of the large-handed long-bearded man's offer, he at once demanded an unlimited supply of bon-bons, and was informed that about a cart-load would be at his disposal that evening; but bonbons could not fill up the measure of Bertrand's gratitude, so he requested Jacques to name some more lasting tribute which he might offer him in memory of his great benefaction. Whereupon Jacques solemnly ordered him to endow him with a drum, a helmet, a sword, and a few other warlike instruments, with which Bertrand immediately promised to supply him, not taking at all into consideration the martyrdom which poor Nurse Parry would have to undergo from the music of the drum, and the terror with which she would see Jacques, who shared her room, possessed of implements capable of inflicting any amount of serious wounds on his own chubby little person.

Mrs. Parry was, however, almost as much delighted as Bertrand himself at the prospect of the wedding. She knew she was about to see her darling Mary happy at last.

Valerie, and her next little sister, Dorette, were looking forward with much ecstatic importance to the grand occasion when they were to officiate as bridesmaids at their dear Mary's wedding, and when they were to be attired in charming costumes presented to them by Mr. Lisle in preparation for the event.

Finally it came to pass that poor Madame Brunot herself could heartily wish Mary joy, without having any longer the tearful recollections of the missing colporteur, which made her feel it a sort of unfaithfulness to him to be happy, even in the bright prospects of others—for one evening in June there came a grey-haired travel-stained man to the door of their house, who asked the porter, in a very trembling voice, if Madame Brunot still lived there, and if she and her children had survived the siege; but he had scarcely received the answer, and clasped his hands in thankfulness, when Valerie, coming down the stairs to go out, suddenly saw him, and then her cry resounded through the house, "Father, father, is come back!" and, bounding from the steps, she flew into his arms, and nearly strangled him with her close embrace.

Yes it was indeed the husband and father, so long lamented, who had had a variety of unpleasant adventures, out of which it was somewhat amazing that he had escaped scot-free, and who, the moment Paris was opened again to the world, had hurried back, with very little hopes of finding, as he did, his whole family alive and safe, if not actually well. He attributed this result in great measure to the kindness shown to them by Miss Trevelyan and Mrs. Parry, and was proportionally grateful; and, as Madame Brunot soon began to recover from her nervous maladies, when her anxiety and suspense were over, there seemed indeed to be no longer any cloud on the enjoyment of the whole party.

One person outside the house did, however, object strongly to Mary's marriage, and this was Marthe, who did not at all admire losing her services at the hospital. Bertrand consoled her, however, by a secret donation of alms for her poor people.

The last occupation to which Mary Trevelyan devoted her time and attention during the brief period which preceded her wedding, was the preparation of a design for a monument to be erected over the grave of John Pemberton in the cemetery of Père la Chaise, and Bertrand trusted the execution of it to one of the first sculptors in Paris, with the promise to Mary that after their marriage he would bring her back to the capital, to see it completed and fixed in its place.

CHAPTER XLVIII.

At last there came a morning when all the world seemed radiant with the glory and beauty of a lovely summer day—a day in sunny June, when the sky was clear and bright, and the birds were singing, and the flowerets blooming, while in the happy hearts of those with whom we have journeyed so long in the tortuous paths of human existence, there woke the dawn of a new life of joy and peace, where the trials and sorrows that might yet await them would be robbed of all their sting, because henceforth they would be met and borne together.

Bertrand Lisle stood waiting at the door of the English chapel where the marriage ceremony was to be performed after the civil contract had been concluded elsewhere, and his eyes beamed with delight as the carriage bearing his gentle bride drove up to the entrance. Slowly she advanced, all clad in white from head to foot, with a long veil thrown over her dark hair, and one single snow-white rose fastened at her breast. The significant flower had been brought to her by Bertrand himself that morning, with the earnest petition that she would wear no other ornament but this dear token of her faithfulness in love and truth, and of his own great happiness, and gladly had she granted his request.

Monsieur Brunot walked by her side, looking very dignified and proud, as the representative of her father; and the two little fairy bridesmaids came behind, pacing with solemn steps and serious faces, and bearing huge bouquets of rich red roses, which it was Bertrand's fancy they should have, in contrast to Mary's one pure blossom; finally, Mrs. Parry, all smiles and tears, brought up the rear with little Jacques, who, greatly to her consternation, insisted on bringing his drum, with the view of celebrating the wedding by a vehement assault on it with his heaviest sticks. After a protracted struggle, Mrs. Parry succeeded in leaving this musical instrument in the carriage; and no sooner did little Jacques find himself in the church, than he became much subdued, and remained perfectly quiet while the solemn rite proceeded.

Fair and still as ever, Mary knelt by Bertrand's side and uttered the vows that bound her to him in the sight of God and man; but none would have thought that her stillness indicated want of feeling, who had seen the expression of her deep dark eyes, as she raised them to heaven in unspeakable thankfulness that at last she had a right to live for the happiness of him to whom her whole heart had so long and so absolutely been given!

The momentous service was over, the final words were spoken, the union of Bertrand and Mary de L'Isle was sealed before high heaven, and no human machinations could ever part them more, nor aught on earth have power to come between them, save death alone, that seeming ill which holds within its fast-locked shell the hidden pearl of eternal hope. There was no sorrow in the temporary parting from their friends, and, followed by many blessings, they quitted Paris, and started on a journey which was to have a termination little dreamt of by the new-made wife.

A few days later an old-fashioned travelling chariot, drawn by four horses, and guided by two postillions with blue coats and long boots, was going at a smart pace along the road that led from the nearest station to the Château de L'Isle, a distance of some ten miles. It was open, and within it sat those who had so lately been united. It was a lovely evening, and the pretty wooded country through which they were passing was clothed with all the glory of high summer. Birds were singing amid the foliage, and sweet-scented flowers filled the air with fragrance, while the cloudless sky overhead was not more serene and bright than the sweet face of the young bride in her perfect happiness, as she sat by the side of her husband.

"You have not told me anything about the people to whose house we are going, Bertrand dear," she said, presently; "they must be very kind to have sent their carriage so far to meet us; who are they?"

"A young couple recently married," said Bertrand, composedly; "a comte and comtesse, Mary, of the old noblesse of France."

"And you made acquaintance with them on your way to Paris, I think you said? Are they nice? did you like them?"

"Oh very much indeed! they are delightful people; indeed, I think the young comtesse is, without exception, the most charming person I ever met. Are you not jealous, Mary, that I do not except you?" he added, looking down at her with a smile.

"Oh no!" she answered, meeting his eyes with her candid gaze; "why should I be? You must have met many people far better than I am in the world; but what does that matter, if you love me?" she added, softly.

"I think you may be pretty sure of that, my darling," he answered; "but look, Mary, what a splendid triumphal arch we are passing under!"

"Yes, and I see there are a number more, all the way down the road; what does it mean, Bertrand? is it a fête?"

"No, they have been erected by the tenantry in honour of the comte and comtesse, who were expected home to-day after their wedding."

"Only to-day? If this is their first day at home I hope we shall not be in their way."

"I hope not," said Bertrand, gravely; "but I feel sure the comte will be very glad of your presence, and I do not expect that the comtesse will object to mine."

Mary looked up at him, rather puzzled by this speech, but the next moment she was still more surprised when she saw him stand up in the carriage and take off his hat, while he bowed right and left, with his handsome face glowing with pleasure. Looking out, she saw that they were approaching a large iron gate, which was thrown wide open, while the road on either side was lined with the villagers in their best dresses, who were waving hats and handkerchiefs, and shouting with delight.

"Oh, Bertrand, what is it?" she said, trembling.

"Do not be afraid, darling," he said, taking her hand in his firm grasp; "I will explain it all to you presently. You must bow and smile to them, Mary, for it is you they are welcoming."

She did as he desired her, but her heart was beating wildly, and she clung to his hand with a terrified grasp. The carriage passed through the gate; the musicians of the village band, who were stationed near it, struck up a triumphal march, and it rolled on through a throng of rejoicing people, till it drew up before the great door of the château. There, on the steps, stood the mayor of the country town in gorgeous costume, the curé of the parish, and several of the county gentlemen.

"Vive Monsieur le Comte!" burst from the whole assembled throng, as Bertrand leaped from the carriage. He waited to help Mary to alight, and then, holding her by the hand, he walked up the steps to the paved space in front of the door, and, turning round, he presented her to the people, saying simply, "My wife," and instantly a great cry rent the air, "Vive Madame la Comtesse! long live our beautiful lady!" And she did look beautiful in that moment, in her pretty bridal travelling dress, with an exquisite rose-pink flush on her cheek, and her dark eyes shining like stars in the sudden excitement, while Bertrand stood bare-headed by her side, with the wind blowing through his rich brown hair, and a smile of unspeakable happiness on his lips. It was such a moment as is rare indeed in this changeful world, but Bertrand felt to the very core of his heart that sweet Mary Lisle deserved to the full all the crowning brightness of that hour, as a reward for the faithful deathless love which, through evil report and good report, through desertion and betrayal, had never failed him for one single instant.

But he saw, though she had caught the reflection of his joy, that she was still trembling and bewildered, and, waving his hand again to the people who were to be regaled by his orders in tents placed on the lawn, he led Mary into the entrance-hall. There a long file of servants was drawn up to receive them, to whom he said a few kindly words; while she, with her sweet smile and quiet grace, charmed them all, as she acknowledged their salutations. Passing through the hall to a door at the other end, Bertrand drew her into a small octagon room, which had always been used as a boudoir by the lady of the castle, and which, by his direction, had been newly furnished for Mary.

His own taste had guided all the arrangements—even to the delicate shade of the rose-coloured silk which lined the lace curtains, and the clusters of white roses which bloomed in every window; and when, at length, the door was shut, and they were alone, he drew her into his arms, saying, "Welcome to your home, my Mary! my Comtesse de L'Isle!"

She let her head fall on his breast, while, half sobbing, half smiling, she asked, "What does it mean, darling Bertrand? what does it all mean?"

"It means that I have succeeded in realising a cherished dream, which few people are ever able to do in this world. I have planned for six weeks past that I would give myself the exquisite pleasure of bringing you to this grand old place, all unconscious that it is in truth your home, and my scheme has been successful beyond my expectations; for I wished so much that you should find yourself mistress and queen of Château de L'Isle, while still you believed that in marrying me you had embraced toil and privation."

"Dear Bertrand! it was indeed kind of you to give me such an unexpected pleasure; but I cannot in the least understand how it has all happened."

"No, darling; how should you? But, come and sit down here, and I will tell you the whole history from the first; we shall have time before we go out to be agreeable to those kind people; they are not marshalled at the tables yet, where we must join them soon." And then, sitting by her husband's side in this charming room, with flowers and sunshine round her, Mary heard all that we know already respecting Armand de L'Isle, and the providential arrival of Bertrand at his father's home in time to give peace to the old man's accusing conscience, and to be recognised as the legitimate heir.

(To be continued.)

THE LIFE OF SOLOMON.

BY THE REV. W. W. TULLOCH, M.A.

SOLOMON was the second son of David and Bathsheba, and possibly the last born of all that great king's sons. His names are significant. He was born during a period of peace, and the old king, thinking probably of the many troubles of his own reign, and desiring, as was natural, that war should no longer vex and harass his countrymen, called him "The Peaceful One." We find David declaring (1 Chron. xxii. 9, 10) that the name and mission of his son were predicted to him when, after the capture of Jerusalem from the Jebusites, he first thought of building the Temple. The prophet Nathan gave him his other name, perhaps as a sign that David was forgiven, certainly with reference to the king's own name. David is "the darling," but to Nathan, the young child is more. He is Jedediah, the darling of the Lord (2 Sam. xii. 25). Although brought up under Nathan the prophet, it is doubtful whether the associations surrounding Solomon in his youth were altogether favourable to the development of a very high or finely-balanced spiritual character; nor are we sure that the influence of the aged king over the boy, of whom he was so passionately fond, was altogether good; while all that we know of his mother, who must have exercised much personal influence over him, does not lead us to form a very exalted conception of her character. The probability is that even if Nathan's influence over him was exclusively for good, it would, in some degree at least, be neutralised by the other circumstances of his early life. He was early brought under the shadow of evil and intrigue. He must only have been about ten years of age when he had to share the fortunes of exile with his father. Brought into contact with a wider sphere of life than ever his father had been, by reason of his country's intercourse with a larger portion of the world, his boyhood would lack that repose and time for quiet thought and meditation which his father had enjoyed, and which no doubt did much to fit David for the performance of his great duties.

After the death of Absalom, the eldest surviving son of David was Adonijah. His mother was Haggith, "the dancer." Like Absalom, he seems to have been dear to his father's heart, and for much the same reason. He was "very goodly" to look upon. He had seemingly grown up without any restraint, his father letting him have his own way, and did not "displease him at any time in saying, Why hast thou done so?" We do not know if Adonijah was aware of the vow David had made to the mother of Solomon, in regard to the succession to the throne (1 Kings i. 13), but it is to be supposed he was afraid of the influence Bathsheba might exert on the king. He accordingly determined, if possible, to get himself declared king before the death of his father, thinking probably that if successful, his aged sire, who had always been lenient to him and desirous of peace, would not care to disturb what, without his knowledge or aid, had been accomplished. He therefore assumed the external marks of royalty, such as "chariots and horsemen, and fifty men to run before him." In this he followed the same course as Absalom, and, like him, he was fortunate enough to win over some of the oldest advisers of the king. He found friends in Joab, the head of the army, and in Abiathar, the head of the priesthood. The relations of Joab and David had for long been very unsatisfactory. As Dean Stanley says, Joab "had more than one deep resentment brooding in his breast, and there is something mournful in the sigh that the sacred historian heaves over the events which, at the close of his long life, at last broke the unshaken loyalty of the venerable soldier." "Though he had not turned after Absalom, he turned after Adonijah." Abiathar was probably led to side with Adonijah, either on account of the assurance he received that the past would be forgotten, or because he was jealous of the favour in which Zadok was held. All the sons of David—with the exception, of course, of Solomon—seem to have favoured his claims, so that, with the influence of the commander-in-chief and the high priest, with the addition, doubtless, of a large number of courtiers, it must have been a somewhat formidable gathering which assembled at the great feast at En-rogel. Success seemed almost certain; but while they were feasting and crying "God save King Adonijah," events were happening at the court of David of which they little thought.

Amongst those who took no part in the general disaffection, and remained loyal to the claims of Solomon, were the Gibborim; "the mighty men," with their brave leader, Benaiah; David's own body guard; Shemei and Rei, probably surviving brothers of David; Zadok, the younger chief priest, "the seer" (2 Sam. xv. 27); and Solomon's guide and instructor, the prophet Nathan. Acting on the advice of the prophet, who seems to have brought her news of what was taking place at En-rogel, Bathsheba visited the king and reminded him of his oath. Nathan followed, and was successful in making David see the gravity of the position. He called for Solomon's mother, and swearing by the Lord, who had "redeemed his soul out of all

"Oh no!" she answered, meeting his eyes with her candid gaze; "why should I be? You must have met many people far better than I am in the world; but what does that matter, if you love me?" she added, softly.

"I think you may be pretty sure of that, my darling," he answered; "but look, Mary, what a splendid triumphal arch we are passing under!"

"Yes, and I see there are a number more, all the way down the road; what does it mean, Bertrand? is it a fête?"

"No, they have been erected by the tenantry in honour of the comte and comtesse, who were expected home to-day after their wedding."

"Only to-day? If this is their first day at home I hope we shall not be in their way."

"I hope not," said Bertrand, gravely; "but I feel sure the comte will be very glad of your presence, and I do not expect that the comtesse will object to mine."

Mary looked up at him, rather puzzled by this speech, but the next moment she was still more surprised when she saw him stand up in the carriage and take off his hat, while he bowed right and left, with his handsome face glowing with pleasure. Looking out, she saw that they were approaching a large iron gate, which was thrown wide open, while the road on either side was lined with the villagers in their best dresses, who were waving hats and handkerchiefs, and shouting with delight.

"Oh, Bertrand, what is it?" she said, trembling.

"Do not be afraid, darling," he said, taking her hand in his firm grasp; "I will explain it all to you presently. You must bow and smile to them, Mary, for it is you they are welcoming."

She did as he desired her, but her heart was beating wildly, and she clung to his hand with a terrified grasp. The carriage passed through the gate; the musicians of the village band, who were stationed near it, struck up a triumphal march, and it rolled on through a throng of rejoicing people, till it drew up before the great door of the château. There, on the steps, stood the mayor of the country town in gorgeous costume, the curé of the parish, and several of the county gentlemen.

"Vive Monsieur le Comte!" burst from the whole assembled throng, as Bertrand leaped from the carriage. He waited to help Mary to alight, and then, holding her by the hand, he walked up the steps to the paved space in front of the door, and, turning round, he presented her to the people, saying simply, "My wife," and instantly a great cry rent the air, "Vive Madame la Comtesse! long live our beautiful lady!" And she did look beautiful in that moment, in her pretty bridal travelling dress, with an exquisite rose-pink flush on her cheek, and her dark eyes shining like stars in the sudden excitement, while Bertrand stood bare-headed by her side, with the wind blowing through his rich brown hair, and a smile of unspeakable happiness on his lips. It was such a moment as is rare indeed in this changeful world, but Bertrand felt to the very core of his heart that sweet Mary Lisle deserved to the full all the crowning brightness of that hour, as a reward for the faithful deathless love which, through evil report and good report, through desertion and betrayal, had never failed him for one single instant.

But he saw, though she had caught the reflection of his joy, that she was still trembling and bewildered, and, waving his hand again to the people who were to be regaled by his orders in tents placed on the lawn, he led Mary into the entrance-hall. There a long file of servants was drawn up to receive them, to whom he said a few kindly words; while she, with her sweet smile and quiet grace, charmed them all, as she acknowledged their salutations. Passing through the hall to a door at the other end, Bertrand drew her into a small octagon room, which had always been used as a boudoir by the lady of the castle, and which, by his direction, had been newly furnished for Mary.

His own taste had guided all the arrangements—even to the delicate shade of the rose-coloured silk which lined the lace curtains, and the clusters of white roses which bloomed in every window; and when, at length, the door was shut, and they were alone, he drew her into his arms, saying, "Welcome to your home, my Mary! my Comtesse de L'Isle!"

She let her head fall on his breast, while, half sobbing, half smiling, she asked, "What does it mean, darling Bertrand? what does it all mean?"

"It means that I have succeeded in realising a cherished dream, which few people are ever able to do in this world. I have planned for six weeks past that I would give myself the exquisite pleasure of bringing you to this grand old place, all unconscious that it is in truth your home, and my scheme has been successful beyond my expectations; for I wished so much that you should find yourself mistress and queen of Château de L'Isle, while still you believed that in marrying me you had embraced toil and privation."

"Dear Bertrand! it was indeed kind of you to give me such an unexpected pleasure; but I cannot in the least understand how it has all happened."

"No, darling; how should you? But, come and sit down here, and I will tell you the whole history from the first; we shall have time before we go out to be agreeable to those kind people; they are not marshalled at the tables yet, where we must join them soon." And then, sitting by her husband's side in this charming room, with flowers and sunshine round her, Mary heard all that we know already respecting Armand de L'Isle, and the providential arrival of Bertrand at his father's home in time to give peace to the old man's accusing conscience, and to be recognised as the legitimate heir.

(To be continued.)

THE LIFE OF SOLOMON.

BY THE REV. W. W. TULLOCH, M.A.

SOLOMON was the second son of David and Bathsheba, and possibly the last born of all that great king's sons. His names are significant. He was born during a period of peace, and the old king, thinking probably of the many troubles of his own reign, and desiring, as was natural, that war should no longer vex and harass his countrymen, called him "The Peaceful One." We find David declaring (1 Chron. xxii. 9, 10) that the name and mission of his son were predicted to him when, after the capture of Jerusalem from the Jebusites, he first thought of building the Temple. The prophet Nathan gave him his other name, perhaps as a sign that David was forgiven, certainly with reference to the king's own name. David is "the darling," but to Nathan, the young child is more. He is Jedediah, the darling of the Lord (2 Sam. xii. 25). Although brought up under Nathan the prophet, it is doubtful whether the associations surrounding Solomon in his youth were altogether favourable to the development of a very high or finely-balanced spiritual character; nor are we sure that the influence of the aged king over the boy, of whom he was so passionately fond, was altogether good; while all that we know of his mother, who must have exercised much personal influence over him, does not lead us to form a very exalted conception of her character. The probability is that even if Nathan's influence over him was exclusively for good, it would, in some degree at least, be neutralised by the other circumstances of his early life. He was early brought under the shadow of evil and intrigue. He must only have been about ten years of age when he had to share the fortunes of exile with his father. Brought into contact with a wider sphere of life than ever his father had been, by reason of his country's intercourse with a larger portion of the world, his boyhood would lack that repose and time for quiet thought and meditation which his father had enjoyed, and which no doubt did much to fit David for the performance of his great duties.

After the death of Absalom, the eldest surviving son of David was Adonijah. His mother was Haggith, "the dancer." Like Absalom, he seems to have been dear to his father's heart, and for much the same reason. He was "very goodly" to look upon. He had seemingly grown up without any restraint, his father letting him have his own way, and did not "displease him at any time in saying, Why hast thou done so?" We do not know if Adonijah was aware of the vow David had made to the mother of Solomon, in regard to the succession to the throne (1 Kings i. 13), but it is to be supposed he was afraid of the influence Bathsheba might exert on the king. He accordingly determined, if possible, to get himself declared king before the death of his father, thinking probably that if successful, his aged sire, who had always been lenient to him and desirous of peace, would not care to disturb what, without his knowledge or aid, had been accomplished. He therefore assumed the external marks of royalty, such as "chariots and horsemen, and fifty men to run before him." In this he followed the same course as Absalom, and, like him, he was fortunate enough to win over some of the oldest advisers of the king. He found friends in Joab, the head of the army, and in Abiathar, the head of the priesthood. The relations of Joab and David had for long been very unsatisfactory. As Dean Stanley says, Joab "had more than one deep resentment brooding in his breast, and there is something mournful in the sigh that the sacred historian heaves over the events which, at the close of his long life, at last broke the unshaken loyalty of the venerable soldier." "Though he had not turned after Absalom, he turned after Adonijah." Abiathar was probably led to side with Adonijah, either on account of the assurance he received that the past would be forgotten, or because he was jealous of the favour in which Zadok was held. All the sons of David—with the exception, of course, of Solomon—seem to have favoured his claims, so that, with the influence of the commander-in-chief and the high priest, with the addition, doubtless, of a large number of courtiers, it must have been a somewhat formidable gathering which assembled at the great feast at En-rogel. Success seemed almost certain; but while they were feasting and crying "God save King Adonijah," events were happening at the court of David of which they little thought.

Amongst those who took no part in the general disaffection, and remained loyal to the claims of Solomon, were the Gibborim; "the mighty men," with their brave leader, Benaiah; David's own body guard; Shemei and Rei, probably surviving brothers of David; Zadok, the younger chief priest, "the seer" (2 Sam. xv. 27); and Solomon's guide and instructor, the prophet Nathan. Acting on the advice of the prophet, who seems to have brought her news of what was taking place at En-rogel, Bathsheba visited the king and reminded him of his oath. Nathan followed, and was successful in making David see the gravity of the position. He called for Solomon's mother, and swearing by the Lord, who had "redeemed his soul out of all distress," announced to her his intention of keeping his oath. Thereafter, he summoned Zadok, Nathan, and Benaiah, into his presence, and ordered them to conduct Solomon upon the royal mule to Gibeon, and there anoint him king over Israel. This was at once done, and Solomon became king—the sound of trumpets made known the fact. "The people shouted 'God save the king,' and piped with pipes, and rejoiced with great joy, so that the earth rent with the sound of them." Solomon is then formally installed upon the throne. His friends inform David of their success, and in answer to their salutation, "God make the name of Solomon greater than thy name, and make his throne greater than thy throne," the aged king "bowed himself upon the bed," and said, "Blessed be the Lord God of Israel, which has given one to sit upon my throne this day, mine eyes even seeing it."

Jonathan, the son of Abiathar, conveyed the unwelcome news to the guests of Adonijah, who speedily made an end of their festivities, and dispersed in all directions. Adonijah himself fled to the altar for protection; and so great was his terror, that he would not leave it till he was assured of Solomon's pardon. This was communicated to him, with the order to go to his own house. He was not, however, content to rest there quietly. He persuaded Bathsheba, after the death of David, to ask the king for leave to marry Abishag, the virgin concubine of his father. This Bathsheba, suspecting no ulterior object on the part of Adonijah, did. But Solomon, and in all probability he was right (see Ewald, vol. iii., p. 212), interpreted this as an indication that Adonijah was still cherishing ambitious designs. He told his mother that she might as well ask the kingdom for Adonijah; and ordered his brother to be put to death. His friends, Joab and Abiathar, who had evidently something to do with the request, suffered for their fidelity to Adonijah. Abiathar was deposed from office, and only saved from death by the recollection of past services and the afflictions he had suffered in common with David. As the recollection of former services had spared the life of Abiathar, so the recollection of the murder of Abner and Amasa caused the king to put Joab to death. He was succeeded by Benaiah, and Abiathar by Zadok. Solomon seems to have considered it to be his duty to punish all those who had transgressed against David, even those who had lived under his father's prerogative of mercy. If, however, he punished the enemies of his father, he also showed honour to his friends. He maintained at his own cost Chimham and the other descendants of Barzillai, the Gileadite.

(To be continued.)

HOSPITAL STORIES.

PART II.

DURING the last few weeks (I write this in May, 1875) Willie has been able to go to the national school. I am again paying a visit to the Rhyl Convalescent Home, and almost the first word Willie said to me when I came was, "I go to school now, aint it nice for me to be able to do that? I never did expect to go to school!" I was afraid that his rather hot-bed existence previously would have unfitted him for roughing it with the other boys, but I found that he managed very well, and got no more buffeting than was good and wholesome for him. A few days after my arrival I met Willie looking very important. He burst out, "I've been inspected, and I've got a prize; the Queen sent a gentleman to inspect the school, and he has inspected me, and I answered some of the questions, and I am to have a certificate (Willie called it a stiff-cat), and we are going to have a tea-party, and I am to go."

It was only a fourth class, and for fear that the boy should be conceited, it was explained to him that had he been with boys of his own age it is probable that he would not have shone so brightly, but nothing damped his joy, and I have no doubt that his prize card was well deserved. I am glad to say that it is the diocesan fourth-class certificate for religious knowledge; the best of all knowledge surely! We can forgive Willie's being anxious that his kind Quiver friends should know of this, that, as he says, he "hasn't wasted all his time." He certainly looks remarkably well, fat and rosy as compared with his old skinny self. I paid a visit to Great Ormond Street just before coming here, and found the Quiver Cot empty, the little patient having that morning left, cured—a successful operation for cleft palate, by Willie's special doctor. He was a nice, quiet, good little lad, who allowed the delicate treatment necessary in such a case to be properly carried out.

I found that the moving into the large and handsome new building is to take place if possible in July. It will be a great blessing, for the old house is very old now, and for some time one of the wards had to be closed, as it was considered so unhealthy. Now, however, they are all in use, and the place looked much as of old, when I was one of the busy staff myself; and the familiar sounds and sights made me realise the strangeness of all the new faces. I told some of the boys about Willie, and how well he was; how long a time he had lain and waited patiently; and one dear little fellow said, "Do you think I shall ever get better if I am patient too?"

It was not easy to give a decided opinion, so I only expressed hopes. The wards were gay with spring flowers, and in one of them was a tiny boy, white and shaken-looking, with one poor little leg gone. He was going on his new crutches proudly enough. It was his first day up, and he was anxious that all the friends should see him. It is (and wisely) against the hospital rules for parents to take the children out of bed and nurse them, but one poor father, who was hanging over his little suffering mite's cot, could not resist the up-raised arms and beseeching eyes of a forlorn little three-year-old, and when the nurse very kindly but still firmly, suggested how unwise it was, the father and the child were equally tearful, and each tried to console the other. It was a very pathetic sight. It is beyond human nature not to feel very sorry for the fathers; but I often long to tell them that if some of them had spent less money on drink, and more on really wholesome food for their bairns, things would in some cases be far better. It is so often the old story. Sin must bring sorrow, and the sins of the parents are visited on the poor children. One tiny atom, who had no friends to see him, sat up in his little bed stiff and straight, with such a look of intense expectation as was sad to see. I spoke to him, and petted him, and he was sweet and gracious as only a baby can be; but after the first minute he looked on beyond me, and kept his eyes quietly on the door, giving a feeble start when any one entered. A woman told me that he always sat and looked like that on the visiting days. His mother had died since he was admitted. I fancy his hold of life is not very strong; and the thought passed through my mind —Was the mother looking for her little child as anxiously and sadly? At any rate the Good Shepherd has that little one in His special keeping, now that his father and mother have forsaken him. It is quite pleasant to feel the fresh air blowing in on the little sick children in the wards at Rhyl. The Home is close to the sea, and chronic cases get much benefit. I felt the contrast from Great Ormond Street, and wished I could transport a little of the invigorating freshness to the other pale darlings. There is one dear little boy at Rhyl, who was terribly burnt some time ago, who lies so still and patient, and is so grateful for a little chat, or a sight of that endless wonder to children—a watch. I told him about a little girl at Great Ormond Street, who was burnt much in the same way as he is, and he was so interested, and so delighted to hear that she quite recovered after being in bed for months. He has a weight attached to the end of his poor burnt arm to prevent contraction, and there he lies, day after day, poor little man! He was burnt in trying to put a flute up the chimney out of the way of his little brother. Poor boy, he has suffered for his thoughtless frolic sadly enough! After ever so painful a dressing, he never fails to give his quiet little "thank you" to the lady nurse.

Willie is very kind in going to the sick wards and amusing those in bed sometimes. The wards are very bright and pretty, and, of course, more airy and light than those in a London hospital ever could be; but Willie never will allow that they are in any way nicer than his wards. I told him that the Quiver Cot was empty just for that day on which I visited it, and he said with a smile, "Send me to it, I should like to go back again;" but the merry look and tone was so unlike anything I had seen in the old days from him, and I told him it would not do. His hospital days are over, we all hope, and now he must try and get on as fast as he can at school. He is sadly needing clothes, and if any of his friends could send him a few they would be gratefully received. He is about the size of most boys of eight or nine.

Before any more "Quiver Cot Stories" appear the old hospital will be gone. There is something sad in losing old friends, and we can but think a little mournfully that the old houses have had their day, and must disappear. So it must be, and certainly in this case one ought to rejoice, and hope great things for the future. I trust that if any of the readers of the QUIVER go to visit Rhyl, they will not omit to pay a visit to the hospital. M. S.

SURLY BOB.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "SHAG AND DOLL," "HUGH'S HEROISM," ETC.

CHAPTER X.—COMING TO THE RESCUE.

THE following Monday afternoon Bob was going along one of the narrow back streets which led to his home, when, as he drew near to a greengrocer's stall, he caught sight of his cousin Sam standing looking longingly at some tempting apples displayed in a basket outside. As there was a long stretch of blank wall opposite, Sam, no doubt, thought himself unobserved; and seizing the moment when Mrs. Luke, who generally kept a sharp eye upon her property, had gone through for a moment to her cottage at the back, he put out his hand, and taking some of the apples stealthily, slid them into his pocket. Emboldened by the success of his first attempt, he was preparing to repeat the action, when a hand was suddenly laid upon him, and turning round with a violent start, he found himself seized in Bob's grasp.

The latter held him firmly by the collar, as he demanded, "What are you after now, you young thief? Stealing old Mrs. Luke's apples, be you?"

"Let go!" cried the boy, angrily, as he tried to wriggle out of Bob's grasp. "'Tain't no business of yours what I'm a-doing; let go, I say!"

"Not till you've put back all them 'ere apples as you've taken. Come, turn out your pockets, or else I'll make you."

"You shan't!" retorted Sam, furious with passion, and preparing to use both feet as well as fists in his own defence. "I ain't a-going to do what you tells me, so you needn't think it."

But at this moment a third person, who was no other than Mrs. Luke's son, came up behind, unnoticed by the boys. Overhearing their words, which were spoken in no gentle tones, he at once perceived how matters stood.

"So I've found you out, you rascal! you thief!" he exclaimed, seizing a stout stick, with which he gave Sam a sound thrashing. "Let me catch you at these tricks again, and, I warn you, I'll hand you over to the police, and get you punished as you deserve. Turn out your pockets, you rogue; and remember, if you ever go trying these dodges again I'll do as I said. Take care I don't see you hanging about in these parts any more," he added, with a threatening look, as he flung the boy from him.

Sam, the moment he was released, darted off like a shot; whilst Bob, who followed more slowly, found himself, when he reached home, greeted with very black looks from his cousin, who muttered, as he passed him in the doorway, "Won't I pay you out for this, you great bully! See if I don't do something to you as you won't like! I'll have my revenge; and I knows how too."

The next day, instead of going to school in the afternoon, Bob was sent by his aunt on an errand for her. Having accomplished his business, he was sauntering up the High Street on his way back, when his attention was suddenly attracted by the sound of horses' hoofs. Looking round he perceived a pony running away, and tearing at full gallop down the street towards him. His rider was a little boy, whose face was blanched with terror, whilst he uttered loud cries for help, which only served still more to madden the frightened animal.

For one instant Bob stood still, taking in the state of the case; the next he had sprung forward just as the animal approached him, and calmly and coolly seizing the most favourable moment, had thrown himself in front of the pony, and laying hold of the bridle firmly, had thus brought him to a standstill.

Then he turned to the child—a handsome little fellow of only seven or eight years of age—who, overcome with fright, flung his arms round his preserver's neck, and, regardless of every circumstance save the fact that he was his preserver, in his gratitude gave him a kiss, and then, laying his head on his shoulder, burst into a fit of sobbing. He soon recovered himself, however; for Bob's strong arm was thrown round him with a protecting touch, whilst he muttered, in the soft tones he could sometimes use when his feelings were moved, "You be all safe now, little master; there's nothing to cry for. I'll take care the pony don't start off again. But let me lift you off; shall I?"

The child held out his arms confidingly to Bob, who gently set him down upon the ground. Just as he did so a gentleman, with a face almost as pale as that of the child, came hurrying up through the crowd, which made way for him to advance.

The little boy, on perceiving him, sprang forward, crying, "Papa, papa, here I am! I am all safe! This boy here stopped the pony, though he was going at such a pace! I was all but off. Oh, I was so frightened!"

The gentleman clasped his boy in his arms with exclamations of deep thankfulness, and then said a few soothing words to the little fellow, who was still trembling all over with excitement. For the moment he was too much engrossed in ascertaining if his child were really quite unharmed, to have room for any other thoughts; but the next instant he turned to thank his little boy's preserver.

Bob, however, had already disappeared.

(To be continued.)

"THE QUIVER" BIBLE CLASS.

286. Quote a passage in the writings of the prophets which has reference to the pursuit of the enemy after the battle mentioned in Genesis xiv.

287. What was the law among the Jews as to the pledging of raiment?

288. How was it that Ahaziah, the youngest son of Jehoram, King of Israel, came to the throne upon the death of his father?

289. Mention a passage in the New Testament where it states that every kind of beast and serpent is capable of being tamed.

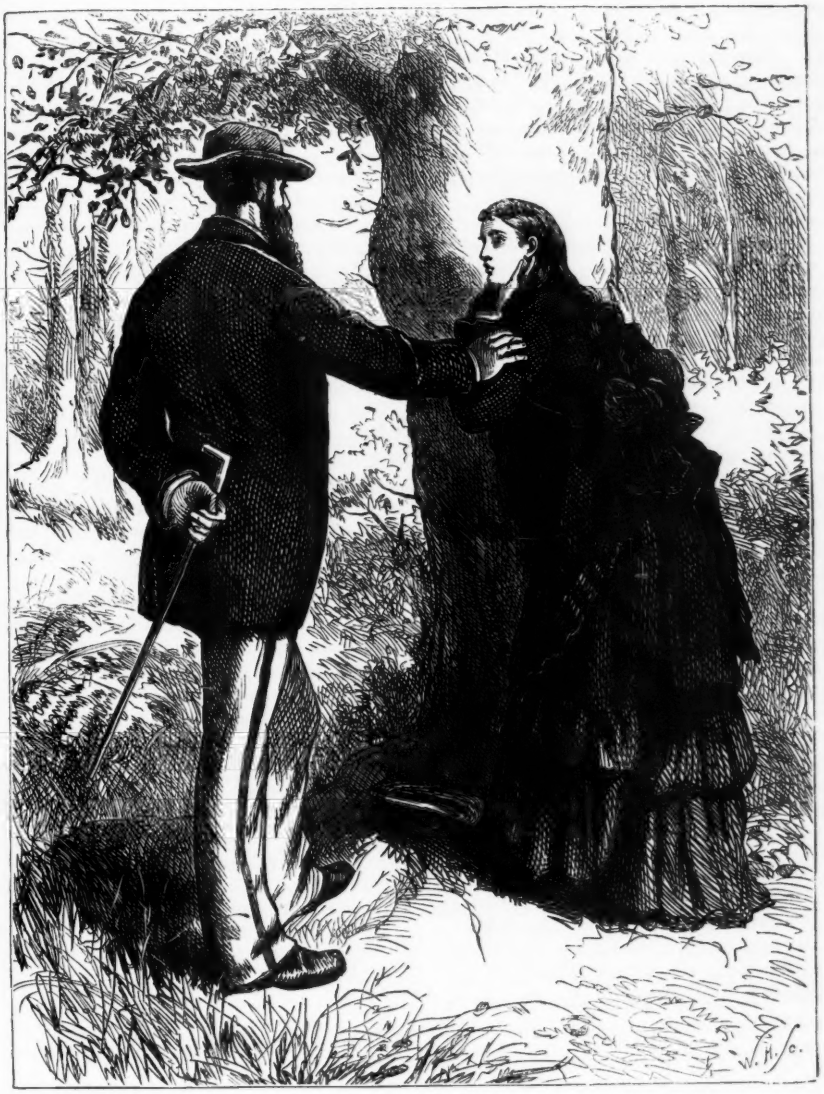
290. After what great battle was it that the men of Judah were three days in carrying away the spoil of their enemies?

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS ON PAGE 704.

273. "Therefore watch, and remember that by the space of three years I ceased not to warn every one night and day" (Acts xx. 31, see also ver. 17).

274. Because he was first successful in the attack upon the Jebusites (1 Chron. xi. 6).

275. Diotrephes (3 John, 9, 10).



276. Admah and Zeboim (Deut. xxix. 23).

277. "Even as Sodom and Gomorrah and the cities about them" (Jude 7).

278. "And spared not the old world, but saved Noah, the eighth person, a preacher of righteousness" (2 Peter ii. 5).

279. Because he had told the King Artaxerxes that God would keep them from danger, and therefore he was ashamed to ask the king for help (Ezra viii. 22).

280. By Og the King of Bashan (Deut. iii. 11).

(Drawn by W. L. JONES.)

LAURENCE HERNE'S FIRST PICTURE.

THE rooks were cawing round the elm-trees; the water-mill had not long been set in motion, and was making early music with its splashing wheel; the sun was shining in at the east casement upon the worn face of a pale woman who had fallen asleep after a weary night, and was probably dreaming of her only son, for once the word, "Laurence," escaped her, and she half awoke, but the next moment was slumbering as soundly as ever.

In the north room of the cottage Laurence Herne was at work upon a painting, by which he hoped to make his first step towards fame. He had taken his subject from the "Eve of St. Agnes," choosing the moment of Madeline's awaking in the "dim silver twilight" to find the table, with its "cloth of crimson, gold, and jet," spread with "spiced dainties, every one from silken Samarcand to cedar'd Lebanon," whilst beside it, lute in hand, stood the youthful Porphyro, gazing upon his beloved one.

The few relics of a life of early splendour that Mrs. Herne had passed had been elaborated into greater costliness in the picture; old faded damask and remnants of brocade, an antique silver vase, and mirror in quaint carven frame shorn of much of its gilding, were reproduced in pristine freshness.

But fairer than all these shone out the fair face that opened wide its blue eyes, half in fear, to look upon Porphyro. Where had the painter found the model for his Madeline?

The village doctor had an only daughter, with blue eyes and golden hair, just suited for the picture. Whether they had called into being the picture or not Laurence Herne scarcely knew; but at any rate, the love in his heart had nerved his hand to do its best, and had fired his ambition to gain a name for her sake, and also wealth, for Laurence Herne was poor. His widowed mother had a slender pittance, saved from the wreck of a fortune wasted by his father. And the two were alone in the world, clinging to each other, and making the joy and sorrow of each heart belong to both. Therefore, Phœbe Harcourt did not step between mother and son, but was taken alike into the heart of each, as making the life of the one brighter through the happiness of the other.

And Phœbe Harcourt sat for her likeness; and the picture-painting time was a happy idyll to the painter, interwoven with beautiful dreams. For he and Phœbe had hopeful visions of the future, springing out of the possible success of the picture, and from the happy stand-point of love and youth looked adown golden vistas into all coming time.

II.

Laurence Herne's picture progressed. Mrs. Herne's pale face lighted up with a rosy flush of pride as she looked upon her son's work. She was growing young again, for hope was whispering that Laurence would make his way in the world when she had left him. The village critics pronounced the painting to be wonderful; the doctor came with his magnifying-glass, examined it carefully, and found here and there a fault, in order to qualify the immense satisfaction he felt in his future son-in-law's success. He brought with him his new patient—a man of great wealth, who had just taken the Manor House, and was fitting it up in such a style as it had not entered into the hearts of the quiet people of Applethorp to conceive.

There was a report that Mr. Ford was going to be married, and that he was getting the house in readiness for his bride. One or two, bolder than the rest, ventured to hint this to him, whereupon he smiled, and did not deny it, which was looked upon as confirmation of the report.

Mr. Ford took much interest in the picture of "St. Agnes' Eve." Constantly he came to see it, and offered to use his influence in getting it into the Academy Exhibition. But Laurence declined. "The picture should be taken on its own merits, or not at all."

"But," Mr. Ford suggested, "there were so many more pictures sent than could be accepted, and a little influence——"

But Laurence somewhat curtly stopped him. "He did not wish his picture to crowd out those of greater merit."

Phœbe was disposed to take Mr. Ford's view, and was inclined to think Laurence a little uncourteous. But the young artist had been inwardly annoyed at Mr. Ford's criticisms upon his Madeline.

"Mr. Herne had scarcely done Miss Harcourt justice. There was a turn of the head, a curve of the lip he had not caught, and the eyes were scarcely of the right shade."

Laurence's colour rose. Phœbe grew a little nervous, and remarked, "that it was not exactly a likeness, only an ideal of her face."

"I cannot agree with you, Miss Harcourt," returned Mr. Ford; "an ideal implies something superior to the actual; allow me to say in this instance that the actual bears off the palm."

Laurence bit his lips, but made no comment. Afterwards he said, "I wish Mr. Ford would not come here giving his opinions."

"But I think he intends to buy the picture," answered Phœbe, "so of course he wishes it to be perfect."

"I shall not sell it to him."

"Oh, Laurence, you do not mean that! He has such a beautiful gallery to hang it in, and all his visitors will see it!"

Phœbe had been over the house with her father; for Mr. Ford had taken a great fancy to Dr. Harcourt, and was constantly asking his advice, and also Mrs. Harcourt's, and Phœbe's; there were so many things, he said, in which ladies had better taste than gentlemen.

So Phœbe wandered through the luxurious apartments that seemed to her glowing with Eastern magnificence; through the conservatory, with the fountain in its midst, and the orange-trees, and pomegranates, and passion-flowers. She had sat down, fairly overpowered with admiration, and involuntarily exclaimed, "How happy people must be who live in such beautiful places!"

"Do you think so?" said Mr. Ford, with a smile.

III.

At length the painting was finished, and Laurence himself took it up to London. He was restless and excited, and his mind alternated between hope and fear.

Phœbe came down to the cottage daily to see Mrs. Herne; she seemed dispirited and nervous, but Mrs. Herne attributed it to Laurence's absence and Phœbe's natural anxiety as to the fate of the picture. Then, again, she fancied that perhaps Laurence had communicated some certainty of failure to Phœbe that he had not mentioned to herself. But in another week a letter came to set all doubts at rest—the picture was accepted.

Phœbe did not come that day, and Mrs. Herne was too much of an invalid to go up to sympathise with her in the joy, so she sat in her easy-chair by the window, weaving all imaginable schemes for the future.

But though she knew it not, one of the figures was already slipping out of the pictures she was sketching out. Phœbe, who had seen much more of Mr. Ford than usual during the last three weeks, and had been consulted on the finishing touches of beauty to the enchanted regions of the old Manor House, was becoming flattered by his deference, and to regard it as almost a right, and had found herself unreasonably vexed by an allusion to Mr. Ford's approaching marriage.

Dr. Harcourt had, in allusion to the old report respecting it, jestingly asked Mr. Ford when the mistress of so much splendour was to appear to take possession.

"That is for herself to answer whenever she pleases," replied Mr. Ford.

"I should think she would be pleased to come at once," said Phœbe, as Mr. Ford seemed to appeal to her for an answer. And a strange pang of jealousy shot through her heart. She wished Mr. Ford had never come, and that she had never seen the Manor House, then she should have felt more contented with the lot in prospect for herself.

"I hope so," returned Mr. Ford, after a short pause.

And the subject dropped; until the next day, when Phœbe, wandering through her favourite beech wood that bordered the Manor House estate, was suddenly startled by an approaching footstep; she turned hastily round and saw that it was Mr. Ford. Then, all at once, Phœbe became conscious of all that she had scarcely acknowledged to herself before—that the life of struggle that she had looked forward to with Laurence had suddenly become distasteful to her; that Mr. Ford's compliments and deference had become more necessary to her than Laurence Herne's straightforward speeches, which she began to think dull and tame; and that Mr. Ford, not Laurence Herne, was the one who was most continually in her thoughts: and as the flood of light poured in upon her she would have fled. But Mr. Ford put his hand upon her arm, and, looking into the frightened face, said, "One moment, only one moment, Phœbe!"

She stood irresolute. Laurence Herne's face seemed to rise up reproachfully.

"Phœbe!" said Mr. Ford, pleadingly, "you will hear me?"

And Phœbe listened. Wealth, luxury, were at her feet, instead of the up-hill struggle for life. And Laurence Herne was forgotten!

IV.

The painting was a success. People crowded round to look at it, and as the season went on, a pale young man in shabby dress might be seen gazing at it more intently than others, as though there were some fascination in it that held him there. It was the artist himself; fame and the prospect of success had come to him, but the hope that had animated him to the work had fled away, and life now seemed not worth living for.

Large sums were offered for the painting, but Laurence Herne refused to sell it; and at the close of the exhibition it was taken to his poor lodgings, where his mother had joined him. The pretty cottage at Applethorp, with its roses and honeysuckles, was given up, and the mother and son were once more all in all to one another.

The painting stood upon the easel, and Mrs. Herne was contemplating it proudly and sadly. Laurence stood beside her. The beautiful face of Madeline looked out upon them from the picture, and the young man's hand trembled as he laid it on his mother's shoulder.

"Mother," he said, in a low tone, "I could not have sold it."

"No," she said, half hesitating.

She was not prepared for his next act. He had seized a brush, dipped it in some dark paint, and was daubing it over the lovely face upon the canvas.

"Laurence!" she almost shrieked.

But he, with flashing eyes, painted on, not seeing, not hearing, until he had finished his work of destruction. Then he threw aside the brush; his sudden passion was over, and he covered his face with his thin hands.

"Laurence," said his mother, bending over him, "is this right?"

"So let the past be buried in oblivion," he said, not answering her.

But his mother sat down beside him.

"Despair not, my son, there is an overruling Power that guides us on: to follow, not to rebel, is the duty of a man."

V.

YEARS after, again in a quiet country home, a painter sat working at his easel, and from time to time a fair old lady came in to look upon her only son.

Laurence Herne had won fame and wealth. He had never married, and yet he did not regret the past. When the first grief and disappointment of heart were over, and the love which could not truly exist without respect had, as time crept on, faded away, he became calm, and rose up out of his sorrow a stronger and a nobler man.

His first picture hung up in his atelier, and the face he had painted out he had restored in more spiritual beauty. As his mother's eye rested upon it, he said, "Mother, are you satisfied now? I have followed the Hand, and can now look upon my first picture without regret, without one rebellious feeling, without one wish that the past had been otherwise. Perhaps that the actual was not the ideal has made me a painter."

JEAN BONCŒUR.

BALAAM: A WARNING.

BY REV. C. J. ELLIOTT, M.A., VICAR OF WINKFIELD, BERKS, AND HON. CANON OF CHRIST CHURCH, OXFORD.

BALAAM, who is described in Joshua xiii. 22 as "the soothsayer," is one of those persons whose character and whose conduct are set forth by way of solemn warning, both in the Old and in the New Testament Scriptures.

The name of Balaam is supposed to be derived from two Hebrew words, and to denote "one who devours or destroys the people." Living in Pethor, a city of Mesopotamia, Balaam had probably inherited that traditional knowledge of the true God which may reasonably be supposed to have lingered in the land whence Abraham emigrated, and in which Jacob was for many years a sojourner.

The circumstances under which we meet with the first mention of his name may be briefly related as follows:—At the close of the long-protracted wanderings of the Israelites, we find them assembled for the second time at Kadesh, in anticipation of their promised entrance into the land of Canaan. It being deemed impracticable to effect a passage across the steep southern range of mountains, permission was sought from the King of Edom to pass through his territory, and thus to enter Canaan from the east. This permission being refused, and war with the Edomites, as "brethren," being forbidden, it was resolved to descend the Arabah, as far as the head of the Ælanitic Gulf, and thence, turning the southern corner of the Idumean range, to march northwards, skirting the eastern frontier of Edom, until, at length, having crossed the Arnon, the first river which the Israelites had seen since they left the land of Egypt, they entered upon their trans-Jordanic conquests, and subdued Sihon, King of the Amorites, and Og, the King of Bashan.

Having achieved these signal victories, in which it seems probable that a portion only of the entire forces were engaged, we find the Israelites collectively encamped in the so-called Arboth Moab—i.e., in the vast plains or steppes on the eastern banks of the Jordan, nearly opposite to the city of Jericho. Although really secure from hostile aggression on the part of the Israelites, by reason of the Divine prohibition—"Distress not the Moabites, neither contend with them in battle" (Deut. ii. 9)—the Moabites, apprehensive of the same destiny which had already befallen the neighbouring nations, entered into an alliance with the Bedouin Midianites who inhabited the country to the east of the Moabite and Amorite territory,* an alliance which, though for a while lost sight of in the course of the narrative, has, as we shall hereafter see, a most direct and important bearing upon its sequel. In terms admirably adapted to the circumstances of a shepherd-king exciting the alarm of a pastoral people, Balak, the King of Moab, thus addressed the Midianites: "Now shall this company lick up all that are round about us, as the ox licketh up the grass of the field" (Num. xxii. 4). Having concluded the desired alliance with Midian, Balak forthwith sent his messengers, with those of the Midianites, to invite the aid of Balaam; an acquaintance with whose fame as a soothsayer affords one amongst the many indications which are found in the Pentateuch of such a communication and circulation of intelligence amongst the scattered inhabitants of the earth as would scarcely be expected in those primitive ages;

* These Midianites, although allied to the Midianites amongst whom Moses lived, between the Ælanitic Gulf and Mount Sinai, must not necessarily be identified with them. It is probable, however, that their headquarters were on the east of Edom and Moab, and that, as nomads, their wanderings extended over the mountain range of Horeb.

and which may probably be accounted for in this instance by the consideration that the Moabites were the descendants of Lot, and, as such, were not unlikely to have maintained some intercourse with the original stock, which was still settled in Mesopotamia.

At the first summons which reached the mighty and far-famed seer, Balaam acts the part of a high-minded and conscientious man, and instead of yielding to inducements which to one of his character and temperament must have been extremely strong, he seeks the Divine direction; and having received from God a direct and positive prohibition, he at once, and in the most positive terms, dismisses Balak's messengers. For the second time Balak renews the application; and the length of the Assyrian desert is crossed on the second occasion by messengers more numerous and of higher rank than those that were previously employed. And it is in this portion of his history that the true character of Balaam begins to disclose itself. For having first announced, in high-sounding terms, his fixed resolution not to transgress either by way of excess or of diminution the Divine command, Balaam, instead of at once dismissing the messengers of Balak, as on former occasions, seeks to obtain a revocation of the express injunction which he had already received, "Thou shalt not go with them;" and though fully conscious both of the object for which his presence was desired, and—as he afterwards was constrained to admit—of the immutability of the Divine purpose, he secretly indulged the hope that he might yet be permitted to utter curses against a people whom God had blessed.

The result of Balaam's second appeal to God for direction is contained in the following words:—"If the men come to call thee, rise up, and go with them; but yet the word which I shall say unto thee, that shalt thou do." We are not told whether the condition contained in the words, "If the men come to call thee" was, or was not observed by Balaam. The key, however, to the subsequent history appears to be contained in the fact that God's will had been clearly and unequivocally expressed, and that it was a wilful tempting of God, and a provocation of His righteous displeasure, when Balaam sought to obtain a reversal of so express and so positive a prohibition as that which he had already received.

The circumstances attending the prophet's journey attest in a very decisive manner the truth expressed in the few but significant words of the historian, "And God's anger was kindled because he went." These circumstances are well known, and it is needless here to recount them. Suffice it to observe that, as in the case of other miraculous incidents of Old Testament history which have been the objects of assault to modern scepticism, direct testimony has been borne in the New Testament to the historical truth not only of the history of Balaam generally, but particularly to the fact that it was "the dumb ass speaking with man's voice" which "forbad the madness of the prophet" (2 Peter ii. 16).

Upon his arrival in the land of Moab, Balaam accompanied Balak successively to the high places of Baal, to the top of Pisgah and to the top of Peor, and there, on heights defiled, as it would seem, by idolatrous worship, Balaam, though maintaining the character of a prophet of the true God, directed that seven altars should be built, and seven oxen and seven rams prepared.

We are carried, in imagination, by the graphic pen of the historian, from point to point of the extended mountain range, as we follow the king in his untiring efforts to extort from the lips of the soothsayer a curse which should be fatal to the invaders, and as we trace the conflict of contending emotions which raged within the breast of the seer—the overwhelming influence of the Spirit controlling his lips, whilst "dreams of avarice" still lingered within his soul. With a fixed determination, which the idolatrous king was himself constrained to ascribe to a higher will than that of the prophet, the lips of Balaam continued to pronounce upon Israel an uninterrupted series of blessings, which he confessed his own inability to restrain:—

> "And he took up his parable and said:
> From Aram Balak bringeth me,
> The King of Moab, from the mountains of the East:
> Come, curse me Jacob;
> And come, defy Israel.
> How shall I curse whom God hath not cursed,
> And how shall I defy whom Jehovah hath not defied?
> For from the top of the rocks I see Him,
> And from the hills I behold Him;
> Behold a people that dwelleth alone,
> And that reckons not himself among the nations.
> Who hath counted the dust of Jacob,
> And the number of the fourth part of Israel?"

And then—contrasting, it may be, the dark forebodings of his own end with the present peace and the future blessedness of that people which had the Lord for their God—there proceeded from the lips of the sordid prophet an impassioned prayer which his own avarice was destined to convert into a curse—

> "Let me die the death of the righteous,
> And let my last end be like his"

The same or the like blessings having been renewed from the tops of Pisgah and of Peor, Balak, in final despair of the attainment of his object, desires Balaam to "flee to his place," inasmuch as, having been called to curse his enemies, he had "altogether blessed them these three times."

The vision of the seer is now enlarged, and the man "whose eye was closed," "falling down and having his eyes opened," beholds amidst the outlines of the "giant forms of empire" the advent of the stone, "cut out without hands," which was destined to break them to pieces. Dimly standing out before his view, as he gazes into the future, with an intuition higher than that of Chaldean art, he sees, though "not now," the brightness of that "star" which was destined to "come forth out of Jacob," and the might of that "sceptre" which, though "not nigh," should hereafter "rise out of Israel."

And here it might be presumed that the designs of the sordid prophet had been wholly baffled, and that the expectations of the idolatrous king had been finally disappointed, for, as though overwhelmed by the magnificent visions which he had just recorded, the historian, whilst he proceeds to record in the chapter which follows the successful wiles of the Moabites and the Midianites, drops the veil for the present over the deep degradation of the prophet.

But the end of Balaam was designed to stand on perpetual record as a solemn warning to all that it is "better for them not to have known the way of righteousness, than after they have known it to turn from the holy commandment delivered unto them." That which Balaam as a soothsayer was unable to effect by his enchantments, he accomplished too successfully by a recourse to sensual enticements, and by the attraction of idolatrous orgies. It is true, as has been already observed, that in the 25th chapter of Numbers, which records the participation of the Israelites in the whoredom and idolatry of the Moabites and the Midianites, there is no mention made of the name of Balaam. But, if we pass onwards to the 31st chapter of the same book, we find in the 16th verse the following words: "Behold, these caused the children of Israel, through the counsel of Balaam, to commit trespass against the Lord in the matter of Peor." Moreover, St. Peter, when describing the guilt and the doom of those who "beguile unstable souls," declares concerning them that such have gone astray "following the way of Balaam the son of Bosor,* who loved the wages of unrighteousness" (2 Peter ii. 15). And, once more, in the Epistle to the Angel of the Church in Pergamos, we read of those "that hold the doctrine of Balaam, who taught Balak to cast a stumblingblock before the children of Israel, to eat things sacrificed unto idols, and to commit fornication" (Apoc. ii. 14).

The measure of Balaam's sin was now full, and it remained only that he should reap the bitter harvest which he had sown. The Divine vengeance was about to overtake the Midianites, who had been partakers, as it has been shown, in the sin of the Moabites, and who were not, like them, in virtue of their origin, exempted from the sentence of destruction. One of the latest of the Divine commands which was addressed to Moses was this: "Avenge the children of Israel of the Midianites: afterward shalt thou be gathered unto thy people" (Num. xxxi. 2). In obedience to this command the Israelites made war upon the Midianites, and "slew all the males." And then the narrative proceeds thus: "And they slew the kings of Midian, beside the rest of them that were slain; namely, Evi, and Rekem, and Zur, and Hur, and Reba, five kings of Midian: Balaam also the son of Beor they slew with the sword" (v. 8).

It was thus that Balaam, being found amongst the hosts of Midian, fighting against the people on whom his lips had invoked blessings, perished in their slaughter, and received his portion amongst those whose "latter end is worse than their beginning."

We have seen that the Moabites, in virtue of their descent from Lot, escaped the destruction which overwhelmed the Midianites, with whom they had allied themselves. It must not be supposed, however, that their sin did not find them out, or that they were permitted to escape the righteous retribution of the Lord.

On the contrary, the bitter consequences of hiring the sordid prophet to curse Israel followed the Moabites from generation to generation. The penalty denounced against their sin is recorded in the Book of Deuteronomy in these words: "An Ammonite or Moabite shall not enter into the congregation of the Lord; even to their tenth generation shall they not enter into the congregation of the Lord for ever: because they met you not with bread and with water in the way, when ye came forth out of Egypt; and because they hired against thee Balaam, the son of Beor of Pethor of Mesopotamia, to curse thee" (xxiii. 3, 4).

The history of Balaam left its standing lessons of warning both for the Jewish and for the Christian Church. The reference made to it by the prophet Micah, whilst it shows how deep a hold this history had taken upon the prophetic mind, reveals to us also, in a fuller manner than the history itself, the extent of Balaam's knowledge, and the clearness of the revelation communicated to him of the Divine will. The words of the prophet are as follows:—

"My people, remember now
What Balak, the King of Moab, consulted,
And what Balaam, son of Beor, answered him,
From Shittim even unto Gilgal,
That ye may know the righteousness of Jehovah."

* Lightfoot considers Bosor as a Chaldaism, and infers from it that St. Peter wrote from Babylon. Ewald, in his "History of Israel," considers that it arose from a misreading for Boor. He observes, however, that in the ordinary MSS. of the text the name is Beor

The inquiry of Balak is then given, in these words:—

"Wherewith shall I come before Jehovah,
Or bow down unto God on high?
Shall I come before Him with burnt offerings,
With calves of a year old?
Will Jehovah delight in thousands of rams,
In ten thousand streams of oil?
Shall I give my firstborn for my transgression,
The fruit of my body for the sin of my soul?"

And then follows the reply of Balaam:—

"He hath made known to thee, O man, what is good,
And what doth Jehovah require of thee,
But to do justly,
And to love mercy,
And to walk humbly with thy God?"—MICAH vi. 5—8.

We learn, then, from the history of Balaam, that the highest spiritual gifts may be found in conjunction with the love of this present world. We learn, further, that opposition to God's clearly-revealed will must in all cases be fraught with imminent danger, and when wilfully persevered in, must be attended by inevitable ruin. But such opposition, when veiled beneath the semblance of piety, outward profession joined with inward hypocrisy, the utterance of blessings with the lips, whilst the heart—though unconsciously, it may be, even to itself—is full of "cursing, deceit, and fraud:" this is that condition which is the most hateful in the sight of Him who is of purer eyes than to behold iniquity, and which is pre-eminently calculated to provoke God's heaviest judgments—"the wrath of God on the children of disobedience."

The condition of such persons is most perilous when they are themselves least sensible of their danger. Like Balaam, they "know not" when God "stands in the way" to oppose them. Whilst uttering the empty confession with the lips, "I have sinned," they lay the blame—as Balaam on his ass—on any outward circumstances rather than on the perversity of their own wills and on the impurity of their own motives. Even when the Lord's hand is lifted up, and He has drawn His sword, and has bent His bow, even then they cannot, because they will not, see. The blindness which was at first wilful, gradually became judicial; and, in the end, when too late their eyes are opened to discern their sin and their danger, it is but to realise the fulfilment of the inspired psalmist's prediction, "They shall see, and be ashamed for their envy at the people; yea, the fire of thine enemies shall devour them."

SCRIPTURE LESSONS FOR SCHOOL AND HOME.

SCRIPTURE STORIES. SECOND SERIES. No. 11. THE MARRIAGE FEAST.

Chapters to be read—Matt. xxii.; Luke xiv. (parts of).

INTRODUCTION. Have read a great many stories about Christ's life. Was always doing or saying some good, wise, or kind thing. Did not always keep to same class of people; sometimes rebuked proud Pharisees, sometimes rich Publicans, now spoke to poor, now to rich, as Simon the leper, Matthew, and others. At this time has been eating a meal in the house of one of the chief Pharisees on Sabbath-day. So Christ talks to him about feast—whom to invite, and why.

I. THE GUESTS. (Read Luke xiv. 12—14.) Christ had been watching how the people behaved at the feast: how they chose the best seats (v. 7), and He rebuked them. Now He turns to the master, and tells him whom to invite. If invite rich friends, what will they do in return? therefore, you can expect no credit for that. Who, then, are to be invited? Can they return the same? Then who will reward us, and when? Just as had told them to lay up treasures in heaven (Matt. vi. 20), and so to use money that those benefited by it would receive us into heaven (Luke xvi. 9).

Practical. Let children see how this applies to them. Are always ready to do good in return—to exchange kindness, &c., at play or school; but are they ready to help those in need; to invite poor school-fellows, to lend books, invite to games, &c., those who can make no return? Such acts, if done from love to Christ, shall have their reward—here, in a good conscience, hereafter in the blessing of heaven.

II. THE INVITATION. (Read 15—17, and Matt. xxii. 1—4.) What remark was made by one of the persons at the feast? Yes, all such would indeed be blessed; but certain things were necessary. Guests must be invited, must accept, must come to the feast, must have a certain dress. So Christ tells a story. Who made a feast, and on what occasion? Who were those first bidden? By whom were they bidden? Yes, king's own servants first sent invitations, then sent again to bid to feast when all was ready.

III. THE EXCUSES. (Read Matt. xxii. 5—7; Luke xiv. 18—20.) What did the guests do? Made light of king's invitation; went about ordinary business, and sent impertinent excuses. What was the first? An excuse of business—must go and see new farm, go and try new oxen. What was the second excuse? Married a wife, which prevented coming. Were they good excuses? Why not? Had received king's invitation and accepted it? Nothing ought to stand in the way. What did the rest do? Actually beat and killed the king's messengers? What did the king do? Must punish such conduct.

IV. THE NEW GUESTS. (Read Luke xiv. 21—24.) Now where were the servants sent? What kind of guests were bidden? Could these give feasts in return? Picture the king's servants in royal apparel, collecting the poor and lame, describing the glories of the palace, the kindness of the king, the joys of the feast; gently helping the lame to walk, leading the blind by the hand, seating them all at the feast. Now, what is the report? Still more room: they must go further, beyond the city, into all the highways and hedges; tell the news of the feast far and wide; compel them to come in, that the house may be full of guests.

V. THE WEDDING GARMENT. (Read Matt. xxii. 11—14.) Explain the custom of providing each guest with a suitable dress at a feast. Now picture the king going round the rooms to see and welcome all the guests. What does he find? What does he ask the man, just to make sure no accident? What did the man answer? No possible excuse; dress was there, but he would not wear it, therefore nothing to say. What was done to him? too late to get one now. Such pride and contempt of king could not be excused; he must be shut out of the feast. Same servants who brought him in and offered the dress now removes him.

VI. THE APPLICATION. (1) The invitation. The children will at once see who the king is. To what does God invite us? Often described as a feast (Rev. xix. 7, 9). Who were those first called? Who were sent to the Jews? Prophets and messengers. So far accepted invitation as to be received into covenant by circumcision, and perform all external requirements of law. What more were they bidden to do? Yes, to come near to God, and to repent. Show how just in the same way we have been called. (2) The excuses. Let children name some prophets sent to Jews, as Samuel, Elijah, Isaiah, and others, and read Heb. xi. 36—38, to see how they were treated. Who were called when Jews refused? Remind of lessons on Acts. Whom did Christ call? (John xii. 32.) Remind how all did come to Him: common people, poor women, blind Bartimæus, &c. So, still, Gospel is preached to all who may come if will, without money or price (Is. lv. 1). (3) The wedding garment. At present all live together, wheat and tares (Matt. xiii. 30), nominal Christians and real ones. Will that always be so? Who will come to judge? What will be seen then? not mere profession but life (Matt. vii. 21).

Questions to be answered.

1. Whom are we to invite to a feast, and why?
2. How does this practically apply to children?
3. Describe the parable in brief.
4. Who was first called, and how? Who are called now?
5. What excuses do children often make?
6. Explain the wedding garment.

STILL AND DEEP.

BY F. M. F. SKENE, AUTHOR OF "TRIED," "ONE LIFE ONLY," ETC.

CHAPTER XLIX.

"NOW, my Mary," said Bertrand, when he had concluded the long history he had told her as briefly as possible, "I think you quite understand the circumstances which have suddenly converted me into a wealthy peer of France and the master of Château de l'Isle, and you can see, of course clearly all that it involves as regards yourself, and your position in the world, and I must tell you that I have but one fear left as regards the fair prospect before us, and that is, the possibility that it may be a grief to you to have to leave England entirely, and live—as I think we ought to do—altogether in France."

"You need have no fear of that kind, dearest Bertrand!" she answered, looking at him with her earnest eyes; "it can never make the smallest difference to me where I am so long as you are with me. Your presence makes my home, my most happy home, wherever you may chance to be, and all the world apart from you would be to me but a dismal desert!"

"And this is the being whom Lurline tried to persuade me was as completely without feeling as a block of marble!" said Bertrand, while he gazed at her admiringly.

"That was because she herself was always so animated, and I so silent," said gentle Mary, who tried to think charitably even of Laura.

"Still and silent you were, dear, no doubt; but only because of the depth of feeling below. I owe little Jacques a great deal," he added, smiling, "for having taught me that 'still waters run deep.'"

"Jacques?" said Mary, inquiringly.

"Yes, little mischievous Jacques. I have never revealed to you yet the potent influence that small individual has had on our fate, but I shall some day, when we have more time than we can spare to-night. The crowd which bewildered you so much were all our own tenants, come to bid us welcome to our home."

"Oh, Bertrand, it is indeed happiness to see you

(Drawn by WILLIAM SMALL.)

"Laura clung to her with a frantic grasp."—p. 749.

in your rightful place at last! and I know that I shall love your grand old home with all my heart; but do you know," she continued, squeezing her hands into his, "I feel just a little sorry that I shall never have occasion to work for you, as I meant to do!"

"Oh, but you will, my Mary; not certainly in order to help me to a livelihood, seeing we have a rent-roll which we shall find it a hard matter to spend, but you will have to work with me in caring for the welfare of our tenants. I fear their interests have been greatly neglected since my grandfather owned the property. He and his wife—you have heard my father speak of his admirable mother, have you not?—did all they could for the people, according to the ideas of those times; but since then they have been left to shift for themselves absolutely. We shall have to see to the improvement of their dwellings, the education of their children, and the nursing of their sick—that last item will suit you, Mary."

"Yes indeed, I can see there will be plenty to do. Oh, how happy it will be! And is it really possible, Bertrand, that we are settled at home already, when I thought we should have to start off again in a few days; I believed we were only going to pay a little visit to that charming comte and comtesse!" and she laughed merrily.

"Yes, I trust you admire the comte now you have made acquaintance with him. We are indeed at home, Mary, and here I hope we shall spend all our lives in peace and happiness. But, darling, after we have been here a week we must go on to Italy, as we intended, for I have left various matters there which I must set in order; we need not stay long, only a fortnight or so."

"I shall like to go so much! I want to see the place where you lived so long, and which I tried to picture to myself day after day. Bertrand, have you ever remembered that if we go there we shall perhaps see Laura Brant?"

Bertrand started. "I hope not," he said; "but you are right, no doubt; they are living there. However, I cannot help it, we must go; and we need not encounter her unless we please. I for one will not meet her, if I can possibly help it; for I do not think I could bring myself to be even reasonably civil to her. But do not let us speak of her, Mary; her very name is a discord in the harmony of this happy evening. Come, let us go to our friends."

And so that peerless day closed in upon them with smiles and congratulations from all around, and a sense of peace and blessedness in the sunshine of God's favour, which amply compensated them for all that they had suffered by the generous self-denial with which in different ways they both had acted.

After a very happy week spent at Château de l'Isle Bertrand and Mary found themselves in the beautiful Italian city where he had dwelt so long. They took up their abode for the few days they meant to remain at an hotel where he was well known, and the news of his return soon spread through the place, bringing many of his old acquaintances to call on them. The tidings of his new dignity and of his marriage had preceded him, and added to the warmth of his welcome. As yet however he had not actually seen many of his old friends, for the first day after their arrival had been spent in taking Mary to some of the picture galleries, and in arranging his affairs; but on the following morning they had hardly finished breakfast when an Italian gentleman, who had been one of Bertrand's greatest intimates, came rushing in with great delight and excitement to see his friend once more, and congratulate him on all the various improvements in his position.

Mary was amused at Signor Vilalta's vivacity and enthusiasm, and, accustomed as she was to the gesticulations of Frenchmen, she had never seen anything like the sort of dramatic representation with which he described everything he had to tell.

He had not been very long in the room, when Bertrand asked him the question, which both he and Mary specially wished to have answered. "Could he tell them anything respecting Mr. and Mrs. Brant?"

"Can I tell you anything!" exclaimed Vilalta; "I have volumes to tell, if you do not already know the final catastrophe. But you must have heard it; the whole place has been ringing with it."

"We know nothing," said Bertrand. "You forget, my friend, that we have been living in a besieged city, where, naturally, balloons and carrier pigeons were not used for the conveyance of gossip. My wife and I knew Mrs. Brant well in England, but we have heard nothing of her since her marriage."

"Indeed! then you shall hear a most exciting little history—a comedy first of all, and now a tragedy; but the public have got behind the scenes, and the whole affair is understood. Thus it is:—Mr. Brant about a year ago finds himself suspected of insolvency, and with very great reason; he goes to England, and manages, by false representations, to get enough ready money to make a great show of wealth and security, while he plunges deeper into some enormous speculations which he thinks may redeem his fortunes, with an alternative of the most absolute ruin. In order to assist him in his display of wealth he brings with him from England a wife most brilliant, most bewitching, and a consummate coquette; he teaches her the part he wishes her to play, but, to his dismay, she enacts it a great deal too well. She rushes into the most headlong extravagance, far beyond what his new-found ready money can meet, and, further, she gives herself up to a life of incessant gaiety, in which, while she uses his house, his money, and his servants, for the benefit of her numerous guests, she never considers him or his interests in any single thing she does. She has but one object, and that is to shine in the world, and to amuse herself in the very indiscriminate society with which she surrounds herself, and in which she goes to the utmost verge of propriety. Very soon the more noble and estimable of those with whom she became acquainted at first, drop away from her, and her perpetual fêtes and balls and riding parties are frequented only by the most reckless of our young men and women. All this does not suit Mr. Brant; he is furious that she compromises instead of enhancing his reputation, and that she squanders his money without furthering his object. He is jealous; he is indignant at her neglect of him; he is humiliated at finding himself reduced to a cipher in his own house. He reproaches her violently, she retorts with scornful indifference; he orders her to obey his commands, she laughs in his face, and tells him she always pleases herself; he tries to restrain her, she breaks out into more reckless expense, and more undesirable proceedings than ever. Open rupture between them. Mrs. Brant details every circumstance of the quarrel to the whole circle of her acquaintance. Mr. Brant's creditors begin to see the truth; his last speculations fail more entirely than any before. One month ago there comes a most tremendous crash; Mr. Brant's liabilities are made known; it would take the wealth of the whole province to cover them. Crushing ruin overtakes him, as well as hundreds more whom he had defrauded. He is bankrupt; he is criminal; he is on the point of being arrested; he takes flight in the dead of night; he wishes his wife to go with him, were it only because she knows too many of his secrets; she refuses, she will not leave her magnificent house. He tells her the goods will be seized, and she will be turned out; she tells him she shall know how to take care of herself, and turns her back on him. He departs, and they see each other no more; he disappears—none know where he is. Next day the creditors come to take possession of the house and all it contains; they tell Mrs. Brant she must go; she refuses; they discover that she has concealed some valuables; they threaten her with prison; there is a struggle; a terrible scene; she becomes very ill; they cannot remove her in the state she is in; they force her to retire to a small room in the attics, and send a wretched old woman out of the street to watch her, and report to them when she can be carried away, for all the servants had left. There a child was born to her, and the last that has been heard of her is that she is still in this place, very ill; dying, I believe."

Mary had listened to this long history with breathless attention, and ever-increasing pain and distress showing itself on her gentle face; but when Vilalta uttered these last words, she started from her seat, exclaiming in English, "Oh, Bertrand! poor Lurline! this is terrible! do let me go to her without a moment's delay!"

"We will speak of it when our visitor is gone," he answered, gravely, in English, and docile Mary sat down again at once in silence, without another word.

CHAPTER L.

THERE was a pause in the conversation for a few minutes after Mary's unusually impulsive outburst, and then Bertrand asked Signor Vilalta a few more questions about the unhappy woman who had so nearly marred for ever both his own life and his wife's, and on whom such dire retribution seemed to have fallen. "He wished to know," he said "whether, should she recover, the creditors would proceed against her for secreting the valuables which she had no doubt intended to carry away." Signor Vilalta thought not; the jewels and other treasures she had feloniously concealed had been taken from her, and nothing would now be gained by sending her to prison. They would turn her out of the house so soon as they could do so without risk to her life, and give themselves no further concern about her.

"But is she left quite without means?" asked Bertrand.

"Absolutely penniless, I believe," replied the Italian. "One of the creditors, who is an Englishman, gave the old woman a small sum to procure the mere necessaries of life for Mrs. Brant, and to pay for her attendance on her, such as it was; but he said, quite openly, that he did so very grudgingly, as he did not consider that either Mr. or Mrs. Brant deserved the smallest consideration."

"But she must have at least the means of living," said Bertrand. "What will become of her she if recovers?"

"It was thought she would write for help to her friends in England," answered Vilalta.

"I do not think there are any who could help her," said Mary. "Her father was so very ill when I left England that I do not believe it possible he can be alive now."

"Then I do not know what she is to do," said the Italian, shrugging his shoulders; "go to the house of the poor, I suppose."

"Does no one go to see her or help her now?" asked Bertrand.

"No one but the old woman who is paid to do it, I believe. You must know, my dear friend, that the fair Mrs. Brant did not make herself very much beloved in our city; she was so selfish, so heartless, so intriguing, she only attracted the silly young men."

Bertrand glanced round with a comical smile to Mary, whispering to her in English, "I suppose I may consider myself described in that speech, and it is quite true; I was a perfect ass to let myself be attracted by such a being as the Lorelei. I should have thought that some one would have gone to her for the sake of mere charity," he said aloud, in Italian.

Vilalta made an expressive grimace, as he answered, "I only know I do not feel at all disposed to befriend her myself, although she used to flash her brilliant eyes at me as much as at other men; she might have helped Brant, and been of real service to him, if she had chosen; but she wilfully hastened his ruin to please herself, spite of his remonstrances. Bah, she has no heart!" and he snapped his fingers in the air, as if this finished the subject.

After a few more words on other subjects, he embraced Bertrand, foreign fashion, on both cheeks; bowed most elaborately to Mary, and took his leave, promising to see them again before they left Italy.

He had no sooner closed the door than Mary turned quickly to her husband.

"Dearest Bertrand, you will let me go to do what I can for her, will you not? Only think of poor Lurline alone there, ill and unhappy!"

"Lurline, who injured you so much!" he said, laying his hand caressingly on her soft hair.

"That is one reason why I wish so much to help her," answered Mary, gently.

"You are right, my darling; she has injured us both, and therefore we must not leave her to perish unaided; but I wish much it had not happened thus. I had no desire that there should be any renewal of acquaintance. I myself will not see her; on that I am fully determined."

"Then had I not better go at once, dear? I think we shall both be happier when I have done it; and I shall try to be back with you by the time you have finished writing your letters."

"I suppose you must go!" he said, reluctantly; "but you must take your maid with you, Mary; I will not have you go there alone."

"Then you were right in thinking I should find some use for such an appendage," she said, smiling, "though I thought it so needless to bring any servant for me only from the château."

"Every one there would have considered it very odd if the Comtesse de l'Isle had travelled without an attendant. You must live according to your rank, my little Mary, and you will find the maid a great convenience. But now as to Lurline; when you have ascertained what condition she really is in, remember you must make no promise which would involve her coming to our house, or being seen by me. Only whatever she requires in the way of money let her have at once, the person I once thought to make my wife must never know want," and he threw back his handsome head with a somewhat lordly air; then he rang, and ordered a carriage to be got ready for the comtesse.

Very soon Mary and her French maid Justine, who was the daughter of one of Bertrand's tenants, were driving rapidly through the streets of the beautiful city, and they speedily arrived at the door of a house which might well be called a palace for the size and beauty of the building, but it looked deserted and uncared-for. A number of Italian beggars were lounging on the marble steps in front of the door, which stood open, revealing a splendid hall destitute of furniture, where a man, who seemed to be a lawyer's clerk, kept guard over a number of cases, apparently awaiting removal. He rose as Mary came forward, with her maid, and asked what she might be pleased to want. She said she wished to visit Mrs. Brant, who was ill, she believed, in the house.

"There is a sick woman somewhere in the attics," he said; "but I know nothing about her, excepting that my master means to send her to the hospital to-morrow, whatever state she is in; he will not have her here any longer."

"Will you show me the way to her room?" said Mary, giving him her card, and putting some money into his hand at the same time.

"I will call the old woman down to you, Signora Contessa," he said with much more alacrity than he had yet displayed, and he was gone before she could attempt to follow him; he soon returned with a disagreeable-looking old Italian, whose brown skin and shrivelled face would have made her seem like a mummy, but for the cunning black eyes which twinkled brightly under the yellow handkerchief she wore over her head.

She made a cringing salutation to Mary, and said, in a whining tone, "The Contessa must pardon me, but that ill-conditioned sick woman refuses to see her."

"Oh, I hope not!" exclaimed Mary; "why does she object?"

"She says she will not have any proud fine lady coming to make her an object of charity; and what else is she I should like to know?"

"Ah, no doubt she does not know me by my new name," said Mary to her maid, and, taking another card, she wrote under the printed words "Comtesse de l'Isle" "Your friend, Mary Trevelyan." "Go with the old woman, and give her this," she continued, to Justine, and the French girl at once told the Italian to show the way, and hurried off. In a few minutes she returned, running swiftly down the marble staircase, which was all covered with dust and straw, saying, "Ah, madame, the moment she saw your English name, she called out to you to come to her quick, quick!"

And Mary went to look once more upon Laura Wyndham.

Could this be Lurline, that faded haggard woman, with fevered lips and tear-swollen eyes, tossing from side to side on a miserable little bed which constituted almost the sole furniture of the small ill-ventilated attic? Mary stood at the door for a few minutes before the sick woman perceived her, trying to realise that this was indeed the brilliant Lorelei of Chiverley, who had stolen Bertrand's heart away from her, and destroyed all earthly happiness for poor John Pemberton. Her appearance, apart from the look of illness, was so squalid and neglected, that it was hard indeed to believe she could be the same. Her long fair hair was matted about her head, her once pretty hands and arms were so thin that the bones could be traced beneath the skin, and the expression of her face was wholly changed; its brightness, its saucy archness, all were gone, and she wore a look of restless gloom and misery. On a broken chair at her side was a jar of water and a little wine, and at the foot of the bed, wrapped in an old shawl, lay a puny infant, sleeping, happily unconscious of the wretchedness around him. Mary's heart swelled with pity for the rival who had been so cruel to her, and, whispering to Justine to take the old Italian woman away and leave her alone with Mrs. Brant, she advanced into the room, closing the door behind her. Suddenly Lurline saw her; then a look of wild eagerness flashed into her dimmed eyes; she started almost convulsively from her hard pillow, and stretched out her wasted arms to the graceful white-robed figure, so fair and sweet, that looked like a ray of silver moonlight passing into the dark room, where a small window, high up in the wall, admitted not a gleam of sunshine.

"Oh, Mary, Mary, come to me!" almost shrieked out Laura. "Oh, the comfort of seeing a good kind face again! Come to me, come!" and as Mary went forward and knelt down by her side, she flung her arms round her neck, and, laying her head on her friend's shoulder, burst into a torrent of tears. Mary soothed and caressed her for a few minutes, as if she had been a frightened child; but when she would have risen to bring her a little wine and water from the other side of the bed, Laura clung to her with a frantic grasp, and seemed almost beside herself with terror and misery. "Don't leave me, Mary! take care of me! help me! I am going to die! I know I am! and I am so frightened! I have been so wicked, I don't dare to go before God! What shall I do! oh, what shall I do!"

"Dear Laura, I am not going to leave you! do not be afraid! I am only going to get you a little wine, which will quiet you and give you strength. Let me try to make you more comfortable, and then we can talk together as much as you like."

"But you promise not to leave me," said Laura, clutching at her dress as Mary rose from her knees.

"Certainly, I promise," she said, with her sweet smile; "you can trust me, dear."

"Yes, I can trust you, Mary; you were always true and good. Oh, that I had been like you!" and she burst out again into a wail of piteous weeping, which went to the heart of Bertrand's wife, deeply as the miserable woman had injured them both.

(To be continued.)

COMFORTABLE WORDS.

BY THE REV. GORDON CALTHROP, M.A., VICAR OF ST. AUGUSTINE'S, HIGHBURY.

"My brethren, count it all joy when ye fall into divers temptations."—JAMES i. 2.

COUNT it all joy—that is, consider it a subject of unmixed rejoicing, a thing to congratulate yourself upon. And yet our Lord said to His disciples, "Watch and pray, that ye enter not into temptation." How can the two injunctions be reconciled? Probably in this way—We are to be on our guard, we are to pray, lest we should have a hand in placing ourselves in circumstances in which our faith will be tried; the path of duty is the path of safety; and if we find ourselves in a position which is not of our own seeking or selection, we have the protection and the promise of God to fall back upon, and may reckon upon emerging from the difficulty unscathed. Not so if we have to any extent taken the matter into our own hands, then we have no safe-conduct through the enemy's territory; we are thrown upon our own resources, and these are only too likely to fail us. Now, when we fall into divers temptations, that is to say, when we are encompassed by trials as a man by foes coming suddenly and unexpectedly around him, we may feel that we have a claim upon the Divine aid, and so our minds may be at ease; we have nothing to reproach ourselves with; we need have no misgiving; He, whose Providence placed us here, is pledged to bring us safely out. And so we are to watch and pray, lest our own self-will should bring us into circumstances of temptation; but if God brings us there we are to be confident and tranquil.

"Yes," it may be said, "but tranquillity is one thing, and rejoicing is another. Why are we to rejoice when so situated? Joy is a singular emotion for those who are it may be sorely and grievously tempted by the troubles that surround them."

Certainly, the tried disciple is not to rejoice in trial for its own sake, that would be contrary to the nature which God has given us, and there is nothing unnatural about true Christianity. But he may rejoice in the prospect of result. The bitter medicine brings health. "No chastening for the present seemeth to be joyous, but grievous; nevertheless, afterward it yieldeth the peaceable fruit of righteousness unto them which are exercised thereby."

And what is the particular cause of rejoicing which St. James mentions here? It seems to be this: that every victory over temptation contributes to the full and perfect development of the Christian's character, that we may be perfect and entire, wanting nothing. Let us give a little earnest consideration to the subject thus suggested.

Men have to acquire a mastery over any art by practice. First, they are instructed in the theory; and then they have to apply that theoretical knowledge in the manipulation of materials. A boy is apprenticed to his master; for a certain term of years he is occupied in learning his trade, in seeing how his master works, and in preparing to imitate him; and then the time of his apprenticeship expires, and the command comes—"Go and work yourself." And he works, and makes blunders, and spoils much material; but at last, profiting by his mistakes, and taught by experience—the best of all teachers—he masters his art practically, and attains such proficiency as he was intended for by Nature. Or, a soldier learns his drill. He is instructed in the use of his weapons, and acquires the art of performing evolutions in company with many others; but the most important part of his work is yet to come. "You have been trained and disciplined; now go and fight. There is your enemy; contend with him and deceive him." And we who call ourselves Christians are workmen, and we are soldiers. We learn the theory of our holy religion, and then the summons comes to go forth and put it into practice; for unless we do so we can never hope to become the perfect men in Christ Jesus which we ought to be.

Just so, argues the apostle, as we understand him, when we come into circumstances of trial, we are carrying our Christian theory into practice—we are called upon to translate what we have learnt into timely reality. If I require a box, I do not care for a man who can merely select the material and describe to me ever so accurately and graphically the way in which the thing can be made; I want one who can make the box. And what is wanted for the Christian Church and the purposes of Christ is not a man who can expatiate on the scheme of salvation, and tell us how the thing ought to be done, but one who can do the thing; who can bear suffering patiently; who can trust his God in the dark hour; who can deny self, and follow Christ; who can bring forth the fruits of righteousness, which are to the praise and glory of God. Observe, what is required is correct theory, but correct theory working itself out in act; and this is accomplished in circumstances of temptation, in such chiefly, if not in such alone. Say that you have faith; but how is it to be exercised? Why, you are brought into a situation in which your virtue is tried. Suffering comes, you must show patience. Loss comes, you must be trustful and hopeful. Disappointment comes, you must not be cast down. Your principle is tried, you are tempted to abandon the paths of rectitude; you must resist, for all these things is a trial of your faith. And if by God's grace you are victorious, your faith is strengthened, your character is developed, you have made some progress towards the stature of the perfect man in Christ Jesus.

Such seems to be the meaning of the apostle in the passage to which our text belongs. You learn rules—in your Bibles, in the instructions of the minister, in your solitary meditations and musings—you put those rules into practice in the conflict of daily life, in the encountering of divers temptations, and so become living practical Christians. "Blessed is he that endureth temptation."

But St. James suggests another thought. In order to see and feel that to fall into divers temptations is a blessed thing, a wisdom is required—a wisdom from above, a wisdom which God alone can give. It is not easy to pierce through the outward appearance into the inner reality. For this a well-balanced mind and a sound and penetrating judgment are required. "Wisdom"—that is what we want. Without it, it will be impossible to discover that there is a soul of good in so painful and perilous a thing as a surrounding by temptations. We must look through the temptations, we must fathom their secrets, before we can count it all joy to fall into them. And this wisdom God gives without grudging, but gives it to those only who ask in perfect and unfaltering reliance on the truth of His word.

Are we in trouble—sadly, sorely, terribly tried? Do we want the interpretation of the trouble? God giveth wisdom to all men liberally, and upbraideth not. He will enable us, if we ask Him, to see into His purpose, and to divine His motives.

Here, then, is another way of dealing with the subject of affliction: regard it as the proof of Divine love. "Whom the Lord loveth He chasteneth, and scourgeth every son whom He receiveth." Regard it—regard it as the appointed pathway to the crown. "Our light affliction, which is but for a moment, worketh for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory." But regard it also as the sphere of your Christian activity, in which you shall attain to your full spiritual development, and become perfect and entire, wanting nothing.

SURLY BOB.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "SHAG AND DOLL," "HUGH'S HEROISM," ETC.

CHAPTER XI.—A SORROWFUL HEART.

BOB meantime had slunk off, never dreaming of waiting for thanks, nor even thinking that anything he had done merited them; but his heart had been strongly moved and stirred, first by the sight of the child's danger, then by the sense of having rescued him from that peril, and lastly by that unexpected embrace of the grateful little fellow.

He seemed still to feel the warm soft lips pressed to his cheek; and to think of that lovely child having actually kissed him—"Surly Bob!" It did indeed seem very strange and unreal. And yet it was so pleasant too, it made his heart glow to think of it.

Full of these reflections, he scarcely noticed where he was going, until his thoughts were suddenly interrupted by his stumbling against some one who was coming at a quick pace from the opposite direction. Glancing up, he first of all perceived that it was a gentleman, and then that the gentleman was no other than Mr. Hill, the doctor who had been so kind to Johnnie, and about whom the latter had often spoken to Bob when he went to see him.

Covered with confusion, he was attempting some awkward apologies, when Mr. Hill began, "Why this is Bob Saunders, isn't it?"

"Yes, sir."

"Just the boy I was wanting to see. Can you turn and walk a few steps with me, my lad, as I am in a hurry, and I have something I want to say to you?"

Bob turned in silence, wondering what Mr. Hill had to say, but little dreaming what it would be. He soon knew, however, for Mr. Hill, after a few words about Johnnie, went on, "I half feared from the first that we should not be able to save the poor little fellow's leg; and now that we have tried every means that could be thought of, we find there is no course left us but to take it off above the knee. The injury received was too great, and the disease too deeply seated for a cure."

Bob was slow in comprehending some things, but he understood what these words meant, and his heart seemed to die away within him. He did not speak a word or show any sign of grief, so that a stranger would have thought him utterly indifferent; but when Mr. Hill left him he turned to walk homewards like one half stunned, feeling as if a heavy weight had suddenly fallen upon his heart, crushing it and making it ache with a dull pain, whilst it seemed full to bursting with yearning love and tenderness towards little Johnnie. If he could but go to him and comfort him, and stay beside him and help him to bear it! but the doctor said he must not see any one until the operation was well over, and he was making progress towards recovery.

Oh, if he could but bear it for him! He would give his leg, he would give both of them, gladly, if it could spare Johnnie. And yet he could do nothing for him! That seemed the hardest part of all.

When Bob reached home, finding it was not yet tea-time, he went straight out to his den at the back; for he always preferred his own company to that of his cousins, more especially now that his heart was so sore and heavy. But no sooner had he opened the door, which, by the way, did not seem to be fastened so carefully as usual, than he perceived something lying on the ground, and stooping, he found it was their little dove—Johnnie's pet—already cold and dead. Yes, there was no doubt about its being dead; for though Bob stroked it gently, and put his warm cheek down against it, and blew softly upon it, and spoke to it, and even kissed it, nothing was of any avail; the bird still remained motionless, not so much as a feather stirred.

At length Bob, seeing that the little pet was past recovery, laid him gently down; his face darkening meantime, as he muttered to himself, "There's been foul play here, that's plain enough. Somebody must have got in somehow, and killed Johnnie's bird. Let me catch him, that's all!" and Bob's looks and clenched fists expressed pretty plainly what he meant by that word "all."

But at that moment some slight sound attracted his attention; and glancing up at the little opening in the wall which went by the name of window, he found his cousin Sam's face squeezed against the small panes of glass, as he tried to obtain a view of what was going on within.

"So this is the revenge he threatened," thought Bob, as their eyes met; when Sam fell back with a mocking laugh, which left the other in no doubt as to who had been guilty of the death of their favourite.

Bob's wrath blazed out in uncontrollable fury; and before Sam could escape he had caught him, and was giving him such a thrashing as he had never before given to any one. Sam's cries and howls were so loud that they drew Mrs. Saunders out to see what could be going on.

At length with a sudden jerk he flung Sam from him, and bolting into his room, slammed the door in the faces of the others, and then firmly secured it. To make it still more safe he planted his back against it; and remained standing thus, listening to the sounds outside, but paying no heed either to Mrs. Saunder's demands to him to open, or to her threats of punishment, whilst Sam's howls grew more and more dismal as he found his mother taking his part. So he made the most of his hurts, whilst Mrs. Saunders exhausted all her powers of eloquence, as, in her loud shrill voice, she set before Bob, in strong terms, the baseness of his ingratitude, "in turning thus upon the child of them as had clothed and fed him all these years. But Bob would come to a bad end, that was certain. She always did say so, and always would. He'd find himself in gaol some day with that temper of his, and 'twould serve him right too. And, moreover, the sooner he moved off and learnt to shift for himself the better; for 'twas high time he did so; and she knew it was very wrong of her to let him stop on, setting such a bad example as he did to her own children. But let him dare to lay a finger on one of them again, and she would take care he didn't get off without a punishment! And his uncle should be told all about him when he came home; and she guessed he'd turn him out of doors that very day."

The longer Mrs. Saunders continued to pour out her words, the more angry she seemed to get; whilst Sam (of whose late behaviour she was quite ignorant, or she might, if only for the sake of justice, have rebuked him as well) stood by whining, and trying to make out that he had been very desperately hurt.

How long this would have lasted it is impossible to say, had not Mrs. Saunders, pausing to take breath, suddenly become aware that some one was rapping loudly at her front door. She accordingly hastened to open it, followed by Sam, and found a gentleman standing there, who had dismounted from his horse, which he was holding by the bridle.

"Does any one of the name of Saunders live here?" he inquired.

"Yes, sir; that's my name," replied Mrs. Saunders.

"Then perhaps you may be the lad's mother? It is a boy of the name of Bob Saunders I am seeking."

"Oh then he ain't my son, thank goodness!" ejaculated Mrs. Saunders. "What has he been a-doing now, sir? Something bad, I'll be bound; for that boy wouldn't stop at anything, it's my opinion."

"I am sorry to hear such a character of him," returned the gentleman, who was no other than Mr. Deveron, "for he has just performed a very brave action, and I have come to thank him for it, as he slipped away before I had time to do so. This isn't the lad, is it?" he added, turning to Sam.

"No, sir, not if his name's Bob. This is my own boy, Sam, sir."

"But does Bob live here? I was told he did. He is your nephew, probably."

"Yes, sir; my husband's nephew."

"And is he in? Can I speak to him?"

Mrs. Saunders turned to Sam, saying, "Go and tell him to come here, will you."

Sam went off slowly and reluctantly; for as his angry revengeful feelings had not yet cooled down, he by no means relished the idea of seeing Bob noticed, and praised, and even thanked by the strange gentleman, whilst he was totally overlooked. Therefore he obeyed his mother according to the letter, but that was all.

Giving a loud kick to the door, he cried out to Bob, "You're to come, mother says," and then ran off, seized with fear lest his enemy should suddenly pounce out upon him and give him another thrashing like the last, from which he was still smarting.

After lingering a few moments in the back kitchen, in order to make it appear that he had been all this time endeavouring to persuade Bob to accompany him, he returned to the other room, where Mr. Deveron meantime had been relating to Mrs. Saunders the part which Bob had been playing that afternoon, finishing by saying, "After taking my little boy home, and telling his mamma all that had happened, I came back here at once to seek Bob, as we both were so anxious to thank him."

"Well, is he coming?" asked Mrs. Saunders as Sam stole in.

"No; I've told him, but he won't come."

(To be continued.)

"THE QUIVER" BIBLE CLASS.

291. What was the name given by Hezekiah to the brazen serpent which Moses had made for the children of Israel in the wilderness?

292. Why was it that SS. Paul and Silas were beaten and put in prison at Philippi?

293. What happened to the Assyrians whom the king sent to occupy Samaria?

294. What seer is stated to have kept a kind of genealogical record of the events of the lives of the kings of Judah?

295. Give some passage from the prophets to show that Jeroboam King of Israel held his court at Bethel.

296. In what way does St. John the Baptist express his unworthiness to be the servant of Christ?

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS ON PAGE 720.

281. "Then all the Greeks took Sosthenes, the chief ruler of the synagogue, and beat him before the judgment seat" (Acts xviii. 17; see also verses 12—17).

282. "Then Isaac sowed in that land (Gerar) and received in the same year an hundredfold" (Genesis xxvi. 12).

283. St. Peter in his first Epistle (1 Peter i. 24, 25).

284. "Forty years old was I when Moses, the servant of the Lord, sent me from Kadesh-barnea to espy out the land" (Joshua xiv. 7).

285. "What time she lifteth up herself on high she scorneth the horse and his rider" (Job. xxxix. 18).

(Drawn by M. E. EDWARDS.)

THE THREE FLOWERS.

A STRANGER from a far-off land,
Within my garden, waste and dried,
Planted a plant with wounded hand,
Moistened it with his blood—and died!

And from one stem three branches grew,
Of diverse fashion, wondrous fair,
From which the summer sunbeams drew
Three lovely blossoms rich and rare.

As ardent as the morning light
That melts the stars like flakes of snow,
So did one flower's intensest white
A lake of light translucent glow.

Another like a sapphire sky,
And in its heart a star of white,
That shone and mirrored in the eye
A depth of colour infinite.

The third was like a kindling eye,
And smiles with heart's blood warmly drawn,
Or clouds of pearl and rosy dye
That sail and kindle in the dawn.

To grace the garden of my heart
They caught the sunbeams from above,
And wove their tints with heavenly art
In one device—"Faith, Hope, and Love."

J. Hue.

THE THOROUGH CHRISTIAN.

BY THE REV. JAMES SPENCE, D.D., AUTHOR OF "HOURS WITH DANIEL," ETC.

"I wish above all things that thou mayest prosper and be in health, even as thy soul prospereth."—3 St. John, 2.

WHO Gaius was for whom the apostle St. John expressed the somewhat singular wish recorded in these words we have no means of knowing. Several persons of the same name are referred to in the New Testament: one, of Corinth (1 Cor. i. 14); one, of Macedonia (Acts xix. 29); and one, of Derbe (Acts xx. 4). But the name was a common one, the same as the Latin Caius, and the identification of the person addressed by St. John with any of those bearing the same name is simply a matter of valueless conjecture. Perhaps nowhere in the New Testament is there a more complete though concise testimony to the piety and consistency of any Christian disciple than these words supply. They describe a character of rare excellence and worth, and give us a portrait of a thorough Christian man. Gaius seems to have been a person of social position and worldly substance, and to have been much respected. Some suppose that an ailing and feeble state of health at this time suggested or dictated the peculiar form of the apostle's wish on his behalf. It may have been so, but it is not necessary to assume it. There is much in St. John's wish for his friend calculated to lead all who read it to thoughtful reflection. It is really a prayer for Gaius that God would give him health and outward prosperity in accordance with his prosperity of soul—that he might in all things prosper as truly as he did in his spiritual life.

I. What bodily health is we all know, and how great a blessing it is, though that is learned often only when it is taken away for a time. Nor are we ignorant as to what temporal prosperity means, involving success in secular affairs and happiness in the various relations of life. But what is prosperity of soul? The soul of Gaius was prospering, and St. John desired for him prosperity in all other things in keeping with the spiritual prosperity which he enjoyed. What are the elements or evidences of this prosperity of soul? There are signs by which we can generally discern bodily health and energy, and signs by which we may judge of a man's worldly prosperity. Some of the things by which the apostle formed his opinion and estimate of the spiritual life and prosperity of Gaius we can find in this very brief Epistle. There was first the enthronement and indwelling of the truth. "I rejoiced greatly," says St. John, "when the brethren came and testified of that truth that is in thee" (ver. 3).* Gaius had received the truth, and held by it fondly and resolutely amidst temptation to error; it was enthroned in his heart. We can be in no doubt as to what St. John understood by "the truth" which was in Gaius. "We know," he says in his first Epistle (chap. v. 20), "that the Son of God is come, and hath given us an understanding, that we may know Him that is true, and we are in Him that is true, even in His Son Jesus Christ. This is the true God, and eternal life." With the gospel and epistles of John before us, even were there no further record, we could not doubt what were his ideas of "the truth." To him Jesus Christ was the True One, "the way, the truth, and the life;" and to have the Saviour dwelling by faith in the soul was to have the truth of God enthroned in the citadel of manhood. This was the foundation of spiritual prosperity, and the very ground of the new life. "Of His own will begat He us with the word of truth." The truth as it is in Jesus Christ, the eternal Word, is to the soul as food to the body, the means of nourishment, healthy development, and growth into the likeness of God. Truth, then—the truth of which the Son of God is at once the personal subject and the revealer—is essential to the life and the prosperity of the soul. This spiritual blessing does not depend on intellectual speculation, but on truth dwelling within, assimilating to itself the thoughts, desires, and affections of our manhood, and achieving its holy victories throughout our entire nature, "even as by the Spirit of the Lord."

* "Thy share of the truth," as rendered by Dean Alford.

Practical obedience, or holy consistency of character, is a second element and evidence of soul-prosperity. "Even," says St. John to Gaius, "as thou walkest in the truth" (ver. 3). To walk in the truth involves a course which includes all sides of the character, and all aspects of the Christian life. It means the regulation of the conduct and the exercise of all the powers according to the principles of the truth, which is "after godliness." There can be no spiritual prosperity in the presence of cherished sin, or in the absence of holy watchfulness. Holiness is the evidence and beautiful efflorescence of spiritual prosperity.

Again, the practical manifestation of love was a third evidence and element of the spiritual prosperity of Gaius. "Thou doest faithfully whatsoever thou doest to the brethren, and to strangers; which have borne witness of thy charity (love) before the Church" (vs. 5, 6). Such conduct was Christ-like, and what higher evidence could there be of having prosperity of soul? "Love is the fulfilling of the law;" "love is the bond of perfectness;" "he that dwelleth in love dwelleth in God." The inspired writer of the Epistle of the Hebrews says to them, "We are persuaded of you things that accompany salvation. For God is not unrighteous to forget your work and labour of love, which ye have shewed toward his name, in that ye have ministered to the saints, and do minister" (Heb. vi. 9, 10).

Intelligent faith and holy conduct, earnest convictions and practical benevolence for Christ's sake, constituted the highest evidence of godliness. To receive the truth, to abide in the truth, to walk in the truth, to spread the truth—all are essential to the presence and manifestation of sterling piety. Such were the signs in Gaius which St. John regarded as evidence of a healthy spiritual condition. We see, then, in him the type of the thorough Christian. The warmth of love in his heart was in harmony with the light of truth in his mind, and the purity of his life reflected the attractive beauty of both. So it is still. The true Christian has strong convictions, earnest purposes, generous sentiments; he cherishes holy affections, displays enlightened zeal, and performs benevolent deeds. The truth is in his soul, his words are truth uttered, his conduct is truth acted, his character is truth reflected. The beauty of truth charms him, its power purifies him, its love constrains him, its harmony strengthens him, and its glory fills him with gladness, energy, and hope, so that in and by the truth he lives in the present for the future. The consistent Christian is the highest style of man—the enemies of the truth themselves being judges.

II. The apostle desired for Gaius outward temporal prosperity, in keeping with his healthy and prosperous spiritual condition. In this wish, placing as it does temporal and spiritual prosperity together in the same human life, several truths were suggested, to which we do well to give some attention for our own instruction.

1. Temporal good is a legitimate and proper object of desire. It is not wrong to wish to be healthy and strong, or to be successful in business. St. John wished it for Gaius, and we may wish it for ourselves and for others. Health is better than sickness, and strength is to be chosen before weakness. God has no pleasure in our indigestion or our rheumatism, any more than He has in lying lips, which are "an abomination" to Him. It is in harmony with His highest law that His rational creatures should be well, and it is, therefore, perfectly right to wish for bodily health. Moral and spiritual considerations often make affliction good for us, but our Divine Father has no pleasure in chastisement. He would rather have His children good and obedient without the rod than be in a condition to need it. So would He rather have them prosperous and happy than disappointed and miserable. Progress is His law, and it pleases Him more to see the hand of the diligent making rich, than to see its labour fail and its skill fruitless. Here also other influences may come in to bring disappointment and failure which will issue in our highest good; but God would rather, for our sake, have the good with prosperity than the good with adversity and sorrow. It is perfectly legitimate, therefore, to wish for prosperity in all respects — in bodily energy, secular business, domestic relations, and social and public life. There is no solid reason, no religious reason, why a Christian should not seek bodily and outward prosperity.

2. Further, it is manifestly implied that temporal prosperity is not incompatible with the highest spiritual prosperity. They may exist together in the experience and history of the same man, even as John wished them to exist together in the case of Gaius. Some, indeed, might be disposed to think that the apostle's wish was an unwise one, because temporal prosperity seems often a sad hindrance to spiritual progress. Christ Himself said, "It is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle than for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of God" (Matt. xix. 24). There can be no doubt that, practically, the difficulty of maintaining healthy, elevated, and progressive spiritual life amidst all kinds of worldly happiness and prosperity is very great, but the thing is not impossible. The difficulty lies in our nature, not in the nature of the things themselves. There may not be many Gaiuses, but happily there are some. Would there were more! Had St. John seen or supposed that the spiritual prosperity of his friend would suffer by an accession of wealth, or a robuster condition of bodily health, he would not have wished for them in his behalf, but he saw no incompatibility between them. Gaius was in such a prosperous spiritual state as to be able to bear a larger measure of temporal good than he possessed. In this fact doubtless lay the secret of the apostle's wish. He took the prosperous condition of his soul into account when he wished for him temporal good of all kinds, more than he was at that time possessing.

3. Hence we may learn that temporal prosperity can be advantageously received and rightly enjoyed only on the basis of true spiritual prosperity. Except the soul be in a healthy spiritual state much temporal good is more likely to prove hurtful than advantageous to a man's highest interests. Christ does "not break the bruised reed," nor "quench the smoking flax," but the world often does so. If religion in the soul be feeble, if piety be but a weak and sickly plant, what is more likely than the accession of riches and prosperity to injure it, and even to crush it altogether? Sometimes we are disposed to think we could bear any amount of wealth, and wish God would only try us with it. But he knows our weakness better than we do, and holds back what he sees would prove our spiritual injury or ruin if we obtained it. This should tend to moderate our desires in relation to all worldly good. It is not, however, to be supposed that only those whose souls are prospering receive outward good at the hands of Divine Providence. Oh no, it is far otherwise. Many have secular wealth in abundance who are altogether destitute of spiritual life; many have much increase of worldly riches who are very poor towards God; multitudes have vigorous bodily health who give no place to God and His claims in their hearts. They think not of Him in whom they live and move and have their being. We live here in a state of probation, where God tries His children in various ways, to test their character in relation to Himself. The possession of wealth and the enjoyment of outward prosperity may often involve a grand test of spiritual character leading to everlasting issues, just as in the case of the young man who came to Christ asking the way of life, and went away sorrowful when the Saviour told him to sell all that he had and give to the poor. He was not prepared for this course of action, and seems to have preferred keeping his wealth to following Jesus. Though outward prosperity is by no means contingent or dependent on spiritual prosperity, yet the possession of the latter is the only solid and safe basis for the enjoyment of the former. We cannot in wisdom wish for the outward when we are not conscious of possessing the inward. This is in practical harmony with the words of our Lord when he said, "Seek ye first the kingdom of God and his righteousness, and all these things shall be added unto you."

4. The measure of spiritual prosperity may be therefore viewed as a safe standard for the measure of temporal good. The spiritual prosperity of Gaius dictated the apostle's wish for his prosperity in all other directions. It is not very often that, in our good wishes for the welfare of our friends, we can make the prosperity of their souls the standard of our wishes for them in regard to other things. How would this standard affect many of ourselves? Would it not be a terrible thing for some of us? How poor and ailing, maimed and suffering, would many be if they had no more bodily health or outward prosperity than they have of actual enjoyment in communion with God, and the exercises of spiritual religion! They would speedily be amongst the poorest and meanest on earth. With many Christians whose life is low, dwarfish, and languid in divine things, how terrible would be the test which St. John applies to Gaius! If bodily health were to be measured by the health of the soul, would not the dwellings of many become as hospitals, and their beds of ease be turned into beds of disease and languishing? The physical beauty of not a few would give place to deformity and ugliness, and secular wealth would at once take to itself wings and fly away. In some cases, on the other hand, disease would take its departure, and the vigour of health and strength would come by every avenue into the bodily frame.

Would not this wish of the apostle for Gaius be a safe standard for all? Unless religion keeps pace with the measure of our temporal good, our spiritual welfare is sure to be endangered by it. A Christian need have no fear of success in business, or of abounding tokens of outward prosperity, if at the same time he be growing in grace and in the knowledge of his Lord and Saviour. The danger is to have so much sail, as many have, of outward prosperity in the voyage of life, and so little ballast of spiritual piety. It is infinitely better to be content with little, and have wealth in God, than to have much worldly success while God is forgotten. Bodily health, even of the best and strongest, is but a temporal blessing, and secular success belongs exclusively to this life, but spiritual prosperity has its issues far beyond the things that are seen and temporal—"within the veil." Which was the richer and the happier man—Dives, with his goods laid up for many years, but without any conscious interest in the love of God, or Lazarus, who, happy in the Maker as his Almighty Friend, was only fed from the crumbs which fell from the rich man's table? No one is in doubt about the true and just reply.

SCRIPTURE LESSONS FOR SCHOOL AND HOME.

SCRIPTURE STORIES. Second Series. No. 12. The Transfiguration.

Chapter to be read—Matt. xvii. (part of).

INTRODUCTION. In order to understand this story must go back a little. Christ been talking to His disciples as usual about the future, but had now said some hard things (see Matt. xvi. 21—24). What were they expecting Him to do for their nation? Under whose power were the Jews at this time? So they hoped He would prove indeed a mighty king, and deliver them from Romans. He tells them He is going to Jerusalem. Is it to be crowned? What only crown did He have? Is it to put down Romans? No. What is He going for? (xvi. 21). To suffer all that He must suffer for our salvation.

I. The Story. (Read xvii. 1—9.) The story having been read, question it out of the children, drawing out the following points. (1) The time. One evening, after long day's work, as usual, of healing, talking, teaching, &c. Can picture Christ and disciples climbing up the mountain, getting views of Lake of Galilee, seeing sun set, stopping now and then to rest; at last reaching the top; darkness coming on. (2) The persons. Who were they? Christ leading the way, the others following: who were they? Let children name other occasions when these three were thus chosen out specially—in the raising of Jairus' daughter, and at the Garden of Gethsemane (see Mark v. 37, xiv. 33). Why should they be with Christ now? What had Peter just said? What did the mother of Zebedee's children ask for them? (Matt. xx. 20). Perhaps these three thought more of the kingdom than the others, so were to have a special lesson about it. (3) The vision. What did they see? (Mark viii. 3). Try and picture the scene: the mountain-top; Christ and three apostles; the bright cloud suddenly descends; His face suddenly lighted up like the sun; His raiment suddenly shining; how different to usual! How had Christ lived with His disciples? Poor and despised; sometimes no food, no lodging; a poor man. Now they see Him in glory, what will they think of Him and His kingdom? It must be a real kingdom, and it must be a glorious kingdom! But who else are here? Whence do they come? What was there remarkable about Moses and Elias? How were they like Christ? Where did Moses fast, and where Elijah? (1 Kings xix.). Remind of Moses' mysterious way of leaving this world, and of Elijah's translation (2 Kings ii.). What is Moses often called? Moses there as lawgiver, and Elijah as representing prophets—fit companions for Christ. What did He say about the law and prophets? (Matt. v. 17). (4) The conversation. Now the apostles hear Christ and Moses and Elias talking: what are they talking about? Surely about His glory, His kingdom, His power. No! (see Luke ix. 31) about His death. But was there no glory in it? (Heb. xii. 2, ii. 9). Yes; but not the glory they expected—the glory of saving souls, not merely of delivering bodies from power of Romans. While the conversation continued, what did the apostles do? Eyes dazzled with brightness, fell asleep; woke up presently, in time to see Moses and Elias depart (Luke ix. 33). Now Peter joins in: what does he ask? Why does he want three tents? How delightful to stay there always; no more long travels; no more taking up of cross; but to stop always and see glory of Christ! What happens while he is speaking? Another bright cloud comes over all; another voice—whose is it? Now they are indeed afraid. Who had heard God's voice before in a mountain? As Israelites, so the apostles. Now fall on faces in worship, and listen. Once more hear a voice—whose is it? (Matt. xvii. 7). Jesus speaks and touches them; they knew His voice—listen, look up. Jesus is alone with them; no more fear: they descend with Him.

II. The Lessons. (1) The time. Tell the children this occurred towards the end of Christ's ministry. When had voice of God been heard before calling Christ His Son? (Matt. iii. 17). So now, as He draws near the end, to strengthen Him; He knew all that was coming, so received comfort from communion with God. Just so with all; when something coming to us which we dread—e.g., leaving home, going amongst strangers, some illness coming on, some death approaching, if seek God, shall find Him very near; perhaps shall have some special sense given of His presence, causing face to shine and heart to rejoice; therefore learn a lesson of comfort. (2) The place. Where was the Transfiguration? So in prayer, soul rises to God, will find God. Whose voices shall we hear? How does God speak? By the law, hear it (see Ps. cxix.); by the prophets (Heb. i. 1), hear them; by His Son, hear Him (Heb. i. 2). Going to God in this spirit, with humility, reverence, teachableness, will be taught, cheered, comforted. (3) The conversation. What was it about? This lesson still to be learned. Glory in suffering (James i. 2); glory in patience (1 Peter ii. 20); glory in self-denial for Christ's sake; to be followed by glory in heaven, harps of gold, glory of God, endless bliss. Shall this be ours?

Questions to be answered.

1. What did the disciples expect Christ to be?
2. Who were with Him on the mount, and what was there remarkable about them?
3. Describe the vision.
4. What was the conversation about?
5. What lessons may we learn from the story?

RUTH TO NAOMI.

BID me not leave thee, mother dear,
Thy country shall be mine,
Those sunny plains my heart shall cheer,
Where clings thy native vine;
Oh, chide me not, for I am bent
On following thy feet,
No words can move my firm intent,
Then do not thus entreat.

To leave thee in thy widowed years,
Sad, childless, and alone,
Would fill mine eyes with burning tears,
Were I as hard as stone!
Do I not love thee passing well?
Did I not love thy son?
And canst thou bear to say farewell
To me his cherished one?

I view thy calm and thoughtful brow,
I read thy earnest eye,
And think our Mahlon's spirit now
Shines through them from the sky;
Then tell me not to tarry here,
And call another lord,
My love died on thy dead son's bier,
As music leaves a chord.

Thy great Jehovah hears my vow,
And He will bless our way;
To Him alone my knee shall bow
At night and early day;
Thy father's God who gave us breath,
Sheds light on what I do:
There's but the icy hand of death
Shall ever part us two. JANE DIXON.

STILL AND DEEP.

BY F. M. F. SKENE, AUTHOR OF "TRIED," "ONE LIFE ONLY," ETC.

CHAPTER LI.

MARY DE L'ISLE was too experienced a nurse not to see at once that the first thing to be done for the unhappy Laura Brant was to lessen her physical discomfort, before she made any attempt to quiet her mind. She therefore persuaded her to drink a little wine, and then bathed her face and hands with cold water, smoothing back the long hair that hung over her burning forehead, and gathering it into a net, so as to be out of the way; then she shook up the pillows, and raised Laura sufficiently to enable her to sit up in the bed, and, finally, she lifted the sleeping child very tenderly in her arms, and placed it where it could lie more comfortably, and give Laura greater freedom of movement. She managed, too, to open the high window, so as to relieve the oppressive atmosphere of the room, and when all these arrangements were completed, she came and sat down beside the poor changed Lorelei, and took her hand lovingly in her own.

"Oh, Mary!" sighed the invalid, who had watched all her gentle movements with tearful eyes; "it is like a breath of sweet air from heaven to have you moving round me; you look so fresh and pure, and snow-white as an angel, in the midst of all the wickedness and misery this wretched room contains. I cannot understand how you have come here; why did they bring me your name as Comtesse de l'Isle? Are you married? and to whom?"

"To Bertrand Lisle!" said Mary, very softly, and averting her eyes from Laura's face, over which her words brought an angry flush for a moment; but it soon faded, and Lurline gave a weary sigh.

"I might have guessed it," she said; "but how does that make you a countess?"

"Bertrand has succeeded to the title and estates of his family, by the death of his uncle."

"I never knew that he had any prospects of that kind," said Laura.

"He did not know it himself," replied Mary; "he was not aware of the existence of the château or the property till he visited his uncle last autumn, and soon after he came into possession."

"Then he is wealthy now, I suppose, and a peer of France?"

"Yes," said Mary, simply; "but, dear Laura, do not let us speak of such matters now, when you are so ill."

"Oh, the irony of fate!" exclaimed Laura, flinging up her arms with a gesture of despair; "and this was really the position I abandoned when I discarded Bertrand Lisle because he had become a poor soldier! I gave up the rich Comte de L'Isle to end my days as a beggar in a garret!" She flung herself round, buried her face in the pillow, and groaned aloud.

"Dear Laura!" said Mary, earnestly, "if you are indeed so ill that you think your life is drawing to a close, you have no need surely to trouble yourself about earthly riches and honours; they are at all times utterly valueless compared with that peace in immortality, which alone can avail any one of us at the last."

"Yes, you are right," she answered, turning slowly round; "if that awful hateful mystery of death is coming upon me—from which I would fly to the ends of the earth if I could—nothing matters much in my past life, except my wickedness. But where am I to find peace, or hope, or pity in that other world which they say is the presence of God? Mary, I see many frightful visions in my feverish nights—serpents crawling about me, and demons mocking me, but the most hideous sight of all is the spectacle of my own soul. I do not suppose you have the remotest idea how bad I have been!"

"We all need to repent, Laura."

"Repent! I do not know if I do, rightly; I repent of everything which has brought me to such a pass as this, but I cannot tell if it is repentance which will avail in the sight of God. How can I suppose the all-pure God will ever look on me with pardon or compassion, when I do not believe that you would sit there beside me, Mary, if you knew what my sins have been, even only against yourself!"

"It could not make the smallest difference to me, Laura; it is all past and forgotten; do not let us speak of it."

"But do you know that I parted you and Bertrand by a systematic course of falsehood, in order to win him to myself?" said Laura, with a bitterness against herself which caused her to use her natural frankness of speech for the purpose of self-accusation.

"God brought us back to each other," said Mary, gently; "so you need think of it no more."

"I doubt if Bertrand would be as forgiving as you are, Mary. He must hate and despise me, and so must poor John Pemberton."

For a moment Mary started, to hear the dead spoken of thus, and then remembered that Lurline could not possibly know of the catastrophe which had put an end to that noble life during the siege of Paris; she determined to say nothing on the subject at that time, when Laura was so much excited, in the hope that when she did tell her all the history of John's blessed passage to his rest, it might help to draw this wayward spirit nearer to the Saviour whom he had loved so well. Mary could remember his very look and accent, when he had begged her so earnestly to try and bring poor Lurline to the light and truth, if ever she had the opportunity. Perhaps his prayers had obtained this meeting for her, Mary thought, and when a fitting moment came, she would do her best to carry out his generous wishes for the woman who had destroyed all his earthly happiness.

"They do despise me! they do hate me! I see you cannot deny it, Mary!" said Laura, excitedly, mistaking altogether the reason of her friend's silence, "and they are right. I behaved shamefully to them both. I deceived them, for I cared nothing for either of them; I never loved but one man truly, years ago, and he would have nothing to say to me. I was utterly false to John and to Bertrand, when I pretended they had won my affection, and I betrayed them without a pang—first one, and then the other, when it suited my purpose. I see all the hatefulness of my conduct now as well as they can, but you can tell them that they have their revenge, Mary. Here I am, in this wretched hole, dying—dying! going before the awful judgment-seat of God; and I am terrified, I am appalled! What hope have I? I am lost! Yes, I am hopelessly lost!" and her voice rose to a shriek, as she tossed her arms about, and gazed wildly upward.

Mary took hold of her hands, drawing them firmly down into the soft steady grasp of her own, and, looking at the feverish violently-agitated woman with a calm and decision which had an instantaneous effect, she said distinctly, "Laura, you must compose yourself, that we may talk quietly over your position and prospects. Will you listen to me calmly?"

"I will do whatever you like," said Laura, wearily. "I can lie still as long as you are beside me; the sight of your peaceful face makes me feel safe."

"Then let me tell you, first, that I think you are mistaken in supposing yourself to be dying. I have had a great deal of experience of illness and death lately, and I feel convinced you have, at present at least, no fatal symptoms."

"I am sure I feel ill enough to be dying, Mary," said Lurline, pushing back the hair from her forehead; "I am so weak, and I am always light-headed at night, and every day I hear that dreadful old woman who waits on me say to the men who want to turn me out, 'Wait a little longer, and she is sure to die!'"

"Poor dear!" said Mary, compassionately, "it has been miserable for you to be left to such a nurse, but no doubt she said it because she wanted to continue in charge of you, so as to get the payment. We shall take you out of her hands now, you may be sure; and I still think, though you have a great deal of fever, and are very much exhausted, that you are in no especial danger. With care and good nursing, I believe you will soon recover."

"I don't think I wish it, Mary," said Laura, with tears rolling down her cheeks. "I am afraid to die—horribly afraid—because of my wickedness, but I am almost as much afraid of coming back to a hopeless poverty-stricken miserable life. What have I to live for now?"

"Your child, Laura! Surely you have not forgotten it!" said Mary.

"Poor little helpless mite! I think it would be happier for it to die too, than to live to have me for its mother!"

"Not if you fit yourself, as you may, to bring it up worthily; and there is your husband, Lurline," she added, in a low voice.

Laura turned her head away. "I do not love him; I never did!"

"Still, it is your duty to be with him; and if you try to please him, affection may grow up between you."

"I do not believe he would have me with him now; he wanted me to come too, when he escaped that night, and I was so enraged because he had reduced me to poverty that I refused. Then he said his failure was chiefly my fault, and we parted in anger. I do not know where he is now."

"Did he not give you any address to which you could write?"

"Yes, he did, a place in New York; but it is no use, Mary, I am not good like you; I cannot bear the thought of a life of privation and wretchedness. I think death would be happiest for me, if only I am not punished hereafter. I am so tired of suffering!" And she flung herself back in the bed, and closed her eyes.

Mary rose, and knelt down by her side, stroking her cheek with her soft hand.

"Laura, dear, you are completely worn-out now. and you must not talk any more; you need some strengthening food more than anything else at this moment, and I will see that you have that immediately, but I want you just to grant me one request. Will you let me take care of you now, and manage everything for you, as I think best, at least while you are so weak? I feel sure I can make you willing to live again, when you are better, and away from this place. May I do what I like with you, Lurline?"

"Oh yes, dear sweet little Mary," she said, bending forward to kiss her; "you are the only friend, the only hope I have in the world; how can I thank you enough, if you will indeed be burdened with the care of such a one as I am?"

"That is well!" said Mary, brightly; "then, dear, I shall go at once to make some arrangements for you, and you shall soon be very differently placed."

"But you will not stay long away from me, will you? I feel as if I could not let you go." And Laura held her tight with her burning hands.

"Only a very little while; do not be afraid; and I shall send back Justine, my maid, to you, almost immediately, with some fruit and nourishing food, and she shall stay with you till I come again."

"Oh then, I can bear it," said Lurline, "if I am not left alone any more with that cruel old woman!" and she relaxed her hold. Mary stooped to kiss her, and then quietly left the room.

CHAPTER LII.

SWIFTLY, as if her feet were winged, Mary de L'Isle ran up the long staircase at the hotel, and into the private sitting-room where Bertrand was waiting for her, apparently with no small impatience, as he was pacing discontentedly to and fro, glancing out of the window every moment.

"Ah, my darling, here you are at last!" he exclaimed, catching hold of her hands; "I cannot think how I ever managed to live without you, Mary, though it is not long, certainly, since I have had you for my own. It has seemed to me such an immense time since you went away this morning."

"I wanted so much to come back sooner, dearest, but I could not leave poor unhappy Laura. Oh, Bertrand, I am so glad we are rich!"

"That means that we are to pay a great deal for this very undeserving Lorelei, I am sure," said Bertrand, with a smile.

"I do not think she is undeserving now," said Mary; "she is so miserable, and she blames herself in all ways, as much as any one could do."

"She has some reason," said Bertrand, sternly; "but, Mary, is she really dying?"

"No, I think not, though she believes it herself; but she will require great care and good nursing. You never saw anything so hopelessly wretched as her present position."

"And of course you have been making all sorts of plans for her relief?" said Bertrand.

"Yes, indeed; for I am sure she would die if she were left there neglected and forsaken. She says herself she has no one in the world now except ourselves. No doubt her father is dead."

"And Mrs. Wyndham gone back to live with her brother; I heard she meant to do so. She will not trouble herself about her step-daughter, and to say the truth, Lurline does not deserve much mercy at her hands, any more than she does at yours or mine."

"But we are going to help her?" said Mary, coaxingly, as she passed her hands round Bertrand's arm, and drew him down to a seat beside her. "Come and sit down, darling Bertrand, and let me tell you all I want to do for her."

"I hope you are not going to tell me that you mean to nurse her yourself, Mary. You will be sacrificing me to her altogether if you do."

"As if I could ever sacrifice you!" she answered, tenderly. "You first, Bertrand, ever and in all ways; so long as life lasts you will find it so with me, and I never thought of leaving you to go to Lurline for more than a few hours each day."

"But I am due at Château de l'Isle next week, little wife, and I am not going there without you."

"I should be very unhappy if you did," she said, smiling up into his troubled face. "Now listen, Bertrand mine, and you will see how nicely it can all be managed. Poor Laura must not be left a day longer under the care of that Italian woman, who is quite cruel to her, and in that miserable place. I wish that we should at once take rooms for her in some quiet respectable house, and move her there

(Drawn by M. E. EDWARDS.)

"Oh, chide me not, for I am bent
On following thy feet."—p. 758.

this afternoon, having first taken a doctor to see her, that he may authorise her removal, as I am sure any sensible medical man would. Then we must get him to send in a proper nurse, and Justine, who is with her now, can stay till she comes. And then, Bertrand—and this is the most important part of it—I want you to telegraph to nurse Parry, and ask her to come and take care of poor Lurline when we go home next week."

"Ah, that is an excellent idea, Mary; what a wise little woman you are! But will the Brunots consent to part with her?"

"Oh yes; she is really not required there now, I believe, as Madame Brunot is getting quite well in the atmosphere of happiness which has surrounded her since her husband's return."

"And I suppose the dear old nurse herself would always do anything in the world we liked to ask her, though she used to anathematise the Wyndhams with all her heart!" said Bertrand, laughing.

"That was because she thought I was not happy with them; but she is tolerably well satisfied about me now, Bertrand, and she will be only very sorry for poor miserable Lurline."

"And what is to happen next? Are nurse Parry and Mrs. Brant to live all their lives in rooms provided for them in this city by your humble servant?"

"No, I do not mean to tax your good-nature quite so long as that, said Mary, laughing. "I hope that eventually Laura will return to her husband. She can only be happy if she does her duty to him and to her child; but before she can be brought to that, I know she must change very much from what she is now, although she is already as different as possible from the brilliant Lorelei you knew."

"I suppose she has lost her factitious beauty, which never was real, and has grown old and ugly," said Bertrand, who was certainly not disposed to think charitably of the woman who had deceived him. "And that is all the difference: I do not believe she can change her false selfish nature."

"But the grace of God can," said Mary, softly; "and this is just the part of the whole matter concerning which I am the most anxious, Bertrand; we shall do very little for poor Lurline if we only remove her from her temporal miseries, unless we can also help her to find the only source of real happiness and hope."

"Well, Mary, I have no doubt you could do more than most people in the way of converting sinners, but I do not think you will ever make a Christian of Laura Wyndham."

"I shall incur a grievous responsibility, and fail in a mission most solemnly confided to me, if I do not," said Mary, in a tremulous tone.

"What do you mean, my dear child?" said Bertrand, surprised; "you speak as gravely as if you had been appointed to some office in the Church for the reformation of careless and ungodly women. What special responsibility can you have with regard to Lurline, excepting the fact that she has injured you?"

"I have been given a charge almost from the other world, as it seems to me, with regard to her, and I have longed so much for an opportunity of acquitting myself of it, and now I believe it has been almost miraculously sent to me."

"You are speaking in riddles, Mary; do explain yourself."

"Yes, dear Bertrand. I wish I had told you before, as I fully meant to do; but it was a subject I felt to be almost sacred, and we have been so gay and happy, I did not care to allude to it. Now, you shall hear it all, from beginning to end. I am sure, glad as I should be to make her happier, I would not wish to assume any responsibility with regard to her from which I could escape, but it is in the name of poor John Pemberton that I am called to act."

"Did he really still think of her when you saw him in Paris, in spite of all her cruel treatment of him?"

"Oh yes, as far as this world was concerned; she was to the last his one thought, his one care. I am not sure if you know all his inner history, Bertrand—the history of his soul, in fact?"

"Probably I do not; he never gave me his confidence, and I suppose he did to you, most fully."

"I think he did," said Mary, simply; "we were together very often in our care of the sick and poor, and we were both brought so near to death during that terrible siege, that we could hardly bear to talk of anything but matters which concerned the life to come. Gradually I came to understand John's hidden existence quite well, though he never actually explained it to me in detail. Before he ever saw Lurline, he believed himself to have been drawn in very special love to his Saviour, and to have received from Him a call to devote himself wholly to the service of God in the sacred ministry. Into the pure peace and joy which this self-dedication gave him, his passionate affection for Laura came like the fiery blast of the hot simoom, drying up all the springs of heavenly aspiration, and withering his generous impulses to a life of toil and glorious abnegation. He forgot all for her; he ceased to desire aught on earth but her love, or to have any other purpose but to win her, at whatever cost. He became faithless, even to that which he believed to be a God-given vocation, and then the mercy of his Lord struck suddenly across his downward path, and she betrayed him. At once he learned what she was, what he himself had been, and all that he had lost through her fatal fascination. He never saw her face again, but he turned back to his God straightway, with—oh, Bertrand, how can I tell you with what heart-wrung penitence, what deep humility, what intense overwhelming desire to enter once more into a living union with Him who was his only and eternal joy, and whom in a brief madness he had forsaken! His remorse, his agony, cannot be told. He did not feel that he dared to offer himself for the ministry till he had proved the reality of his repentance by a service of suffering. For this reason he came to Paris, and there, Bertrand, he so lived night and day in heart at the feet of his Lord, even while with all his strength he was toiling for Him in the outer world, that he won to himself the great blessing of a power of love to his Master which seemed actually to draw him out of life into the arms of Christ. You will think me fanciful, I know, my husband, but his longing to pass into the immediate presence of his Saviour was so intense that I do really believe it attracted to him the bullets which freed his soul from its earthly prison. And so, in like manner, with regard to Lurline: I believe that it has been his prayers which have brought me to her side this day; for he had but one desire, so far as this world was concerned, and that was the intense longing that Laura might herself be turned from darkness unto light. He spoke to me of this very shortly before his death. He knew that to him it could never be given to do more than pray for her, as he did unceasingly; for nothing would have induced him to place himself within the sphere of her attraction again, and, therefore, he laid it upon me, in the most solemn manner, to do all in my power to bring Laura home to her God, if I ever had the opportunity. I undertook the charge, Bertrand; his earnestness acted upon me with a sort of magnetic power, and I could not have refused, even had I wished it. But I thought it most likely I should never come across her on this earth again, and now that I have so unexpectedly been brought to her, I do entirely believe, Bertrand, that it is in answer to John's prayers for her, incessantly offered to the last moment of his life, and for the same reason I believe that I shall be allowed to bring her back to her Redeemer; for, although personally I should be utterly weak and incapable of such a task, yet I do think that I shall be able to accomplish it by means of Pemberton himself. I think his beautiful history will touch her heart as with a ray of divine light. She does not even know at present that he is dead, or anything of the life he led after he parted from her; but, surely, when I have told her all, as I hope to do, she too will learn to desire that Deathless Love for which he was so glad to die."

And as Mary remembered the look that had been on John Pemberton's face when he spoke to her of his longing to depart, but a few hours before his death, the tears rose suddenly to her eyes, and she hid her face upon her husband's shoulder.

(To be continued.)

"ABOUT MY FATHER'S BUSINESS."

BY THOMAS ARCHER.

WITH THE PRISONER.

WHAT is the first greeting which a convict receives when he or she is discharged from prison?

Imagine, if you can, the shivering, shrinking, bewildered feeling of the man or woman who, after undergoing a term of penal servitude, some of it passed in hours of solitary confinement, has all this great city suddenly opened again, with its wilderness of streets, its crowd of unfamiliar faces, its tremendous temptations, its few resources for the friendless and the suspected, its great broad thoroughfares, where on every side may be seen evidences of wealth and plenty; where the tavern and the gin-shop offer a temporary solace to the wretched; and where, also, in every neighbourhood, there are foul slums in which vice finds companionship, and the career of dishonesty and crime can be resumed without difficulty or delay.

Those who have stood outside the walls of Clerkenwell or Coldbath Fields prison, and have watched the opening of the gates, whence the prisoners emerge into a freedom which is almost paralysing in its first effects, will tell you how the appearance of these poor wretches is greeted in low muttered tones by silent slouching men and women who await their coming. How, after very few words of encouragement and welcome, they are taken off to some adjacent public-house, there to celebrate their liberation; and how, almost before a word is spoken, the male prisoner is provided with a ready-lighted pipe from the mouth of one of his former companions, in order that he may revive his sense of freedom by the long-unaccustomed indulgence in tobacco.

I should be very sorry to cavil at these marks of sympathy, as such, they are eminently human. They do not always mean direct temptation—that is to say they are not necessarily intended to induce the recipient to resume the evil course which has led to a long and severe punishment. That the result should be a gradual, if not an immediate, weakening of that remorse which is too frequently sorrow for having incurred the penalty rather than repentance of the sin that led to it is obvious enough; but what else is to be expected? Not many men or women come out of gaol with a very robust morality. Without entering into the question how far our present system of prison discipline and management is calculated to influence the moral nature of culprits who are under punishments for various crimes, scarcely ever classified, and never regarded in relation to the particular circumstances under which they are committed, or the character and disposition, the social status, or the mental and moral condition of the offender, it may be broadly and barely stated that our penal legislation is not effectual in promoting the reclamation of the criminal.

Even if some determination to begin life anew, to avoid associations that have led to infamy and disgrace, to accept any labour anywhere in order to obtain an honest subsistence, has been working in the mind of the convict during the period of imprisonment, and under the advice and remonstrance of the chaplain and the governor, what is to sustain such half-formed resolutions? Supposing even that the discharged prisoner has been so amenable to the regulations of the gaol that he or she has had placed to the credit account that weekly "good-conduct money," which, when the term of punishment has ended, amounts to a sum sufficient to provide for immediate necessities, where is employment to be looked for? In what quarter is the owner of a few shillings—which may have to last a week or more—to seek a lodging and a meal, and that companionship which must be one of the keenest longings of the newly-released and yet solitary and half-dazed creature, who is ready to receive with grateful avidity any friendly greeting that promises relief from the long monotony of the gaol?

Surely, then, there can be few conditions which appeal more forcibly to Christian beneficence than that of the captive who is released after having undergone a sentence of penal servitude, part of which has been passed in solitary confinement. Whatever may have been the impressions made upon the mind during the period of punishment, and the influence exercised by instruction or exhortation, the very fact of regaining liberty, the excitement of freedom, and the uncertainty of the first steps a man or woman is to take outside the prison walls, will always involve a danger, before which a very large proportion of released convicts will succumb.

What, then, is being done in order to extend a helping hand to these, who are among the most destitute and unfortunate; who, even if they have relatives, may be ashamed to seek their aid, or are doubtful of the reception that awaits them, while the only companionship which they can claim at once, and without question, is that which will surround them with almost irresistible incentives to a lawless life?

In the very centre of this vast metropolis, at the point where its great highways converge, and yet in a modest quiet house standing a little back from the roar and turmoil of the main street, we shall find what we seek. Here, on the doorpost of No. 39, Charing Cross, is the name of "The Discharged Prisoners' Aid Society," and in two or three offices on the first floor—one of which is, in fact, a reception-room for the discharged prisoners themselves—the work for which there is such a constant and pressing need is steadily carried on, under the direction of a very distinguished committee, of which the treasurer is the Hon. Arthur Kinnaird, and the first honorary secretary, Mr. W. Bayne Ranken, who is assisted by Mr. S. Whitbread and Mr. L. T. Cave. In looking at the names of the gentlemen who are concerned in this admirable effort, you will have noticed that some of them are also associated with other charitable organisations which we have visited together, and notably with those of that Soho district where we last joined in the musical diversions of the Newport Market Refuge. As we enter this front office at Charing Cross, we have a pleasant reminder of that occasion, for we are welcomed by the indefatigable performer on the cornet, who, when we last met him, was making "the hills resound" in the upper room of the old slaughter-house, and carrying all his juvenile military band with him in one resonant outburst of harmony that awoke the echoes as far as Seven Dials. To-day he is carrying out his ordinary secretarial and managerial duties, as officially representing the Society, about which he can give us some information worth hearing.

But there are other visitors for whom preparation has already been made in the next room—men dressed decently, and yet having a certain furtive, unaccustomed bearing, as though they were not at the moment quite used to their clothes or to public observation. Some of them are not without a truculent half-defiant expression lurking beneath their subdued demeanour; others have an open, keen outlook; and a few others, again, both in the shape of their head and the peculiar shifty expression of eye and mouth, and one might also say of hand, would at once be characterised by the experienced observer of London life as men who had "been in trouble" more than once. On the table of the front office the object which has at once attracted our attention is a perfectly new carpenter's basket containing a decent set of tools, and the man for whom it is intended will be here for it by-and-by to take it away, just as the shoemaker who has just gone out has carried with him "a kit," with which, in addition to a little stock of money, he is about to begin the world afresh, under the auspices of his friends, one of whom—either a member of the committee, or the secretary, or one of the visiting agents—will keep him in view, and give him an occasional encouraging call while he remains in the metropolitan district; and if a situation should be found for him in the provinces, either the clergyman of the district, or some other friend of the Society, is informed of his previous history, and has a sincere interest in his well-doing. In no case have the London police anything whatever to do with watching or inspecting discharged prisoners under the care of the Society; and, on the other hand, it is a standing rule that where situations are found for these men and women, the employers are informed of their previous history, though any recommendation of the Society may be regarded as a strong inference that their protégé is trying to redeem lost character.

It must be remembered that a report of each of those who are under the care of the Society is made at the office once a month, either by the man or woman in person, or by one of the visiting agents or correspondents of the committee of management; and that, though the police are forbidden to interfere with these cases, except on strong suspicion that they are about to commit a crime, the most accurate and careful record of their mode of life and conduct is kept at the offices of the Society. Should they fail to observe the regulations which the Society demands, they are liable to police surveillance instead of friendly, encouraging, and confidential visitation; and it needs scarcely be said that this liability is often of itself sufficient to make them desire to retain the aid and protection which has been extended to them.

From a long and tolerably intimate observation of the lower strata of the London population, and of the results of various methods adopted to check the progress of crime, I am convinced that what is called police surveillance, as it is conducted in this country, is altogether mischievous in relation to any probable reformation of the offender. Even if it be denied (as it has been) that it is a practice of police-constables to give to persons employing a discharged prisoner information conveyed in such a way as to lead to the loss of employment and despair of obtaining an honest living, it is quite certain that the constant dread of being branded as a returned felon, and the hopeless dogged temper which such a condition produces, must be enormous obstacles to true reclamation. The man who could really surmount them must, whatever may have been his casual crime, be possessed of a hardy and indomitable desire for virtue which should challenge our profound respect.

But, apart from what may be called legitimate surveillance of convicts by the police, it is unfortunately notorious that members of "the force," who occupy positions as detectives, or "active and intelligent officers," employ agents of their own to bring them information, and that these agents, being men of bad character—frequently thieves—are interested for their own safety's sake in providing "charges," or "putting up cases," by conveying information of suspected persons. This is according to the old evil traditions that have descended to constables from the time of Jonathan Wild, and probably earlier; but it is obvious that where such nefarious tools are employed for obtaining evidence which will suffice to sustain a charge and convict a prisoner, there is constant danger to those who, having been once sentenced for crime, are not only peculiarly liable to be drawn into fresh offences, but are, from their position, easily made the victims of cunningly-laid traps for their re-arrest, or a suspicion that is readily endorsed, because of their previous conviction and the knowledge of all their antecedents.

It is the removal of discharged prisoners from this probability, and from the kind of interposition that forbids their return to the paths of honesty, and so actually produces "a criminal class," that is, in my opinion, the best distinction of a Society like this.

Amidst the volumes of interesting records which are preserved here are doubtless many that would confirm this view. Let us refer to one only, where a nobleman residing in London had engaged a butler who went to him with a very excellent character, and in whom he had the greatest confidence. Happening to have occasion to employ a detective constable on some business, his lordship was dismayed at receiving from that astute officer the intelligence that his trusted servant had once been sentenced to five years' penal servitude for some dishonest act, but had been liberated on a ticket-of-leave. Puzzled how to proceed, the nobleman had the good sense to apply for advice to this Society, where it was discovered that the representation of the detective was true enough, and that the man had been recommended to a situation by the Society itself, an intimation of his antecedents being given to the employer. In that situation he had remained for several months, without the least fault being brought against him, and he then applied for and obained the vacant and more lucrative appointment in the family of his lordship, who, though he acknowledged he should not have engaged him had he known of his previous fault and its punishment, kept his secret, and retained him in his service, where he remained at the time of the last report, respected by the household, and faithfully fulfilling his duties.

Probably this was one of those cases where, yielding to sudden temptation, a man incurs for a single crime punishment that awakens moral resolution; and it must be remembered that there are many convicts who, while in prison they are practically undistinguished from the habitual or the repeated criminal, or from the convict of brutalised, undeveloped, or feeble moral nature, are in danger of being utterly ruined because of a single and perhaps altogether unpremeditated offence, of which they may bitterly repent. The feeling of shame, of humiliation, of doubt as to any but a cold and deterrent reception by former friends, the dread of scorn, derision, or abhorrence, may lead such men or women to abandon as hopeless any expectation of resuming their former avocations, or even of once more attaining a respectable position. To such as these the Society offers such aid as may keep them from the despondency that destroys; and in every case, even in that of the wretch who has been convicted again and again, it holds out some hope of reformation. That there is some such hope even here may be learned from the fact, that even thieves—"habitual criminals"—do not, as a rule, bring their own children up to dishonesty, and are often careful to conceal from them the means by which they live. The ranks of crime are not so largely augmented from the children of dishonest parents (though, of course, evil example bears its dreadful results) as from the neglected children of our great towns.

(To be concluded.)

SURLY BOB.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "SHAG AND DOLL," "HUGH'S HEROISM," ETC.

CHAPTER XII.—BOB'S DREAM.

BOB meantime, ignorant of what was going on, remained safely barricaded in his fortress. Finding, after a while, that all had grown quiet outside, he moved from his position by the door, and sank down upon the low stool with his face buried in his hands.

Very miserable he felt; perhaps more miserable than he had ever been before. His fit of passion was over now; and as he thought how he had been trying to revenge himself, forgetting all he had lately been learning about forgiveness, and had yielded to that fierce temper of his which had so often brought him into trouble, he felt humbled and sorrowful. For he had been grieving that Heavenly Friend, who had lately at times seemed so near, but Who now, if He treated him as he deserved, would go away and leave him. And it had been so sweet to think that there was One Friend who was ready to love him just as he was—so unlovable that none but little Johnnie cared for him! It had been such happiness to think that Jesus would not turn from him because he was clumsy, and awkward, and stupid, and ill-tempered; but in spite of all his badness would receive him and help him to grow better. And now this was the return he was making for that love!

His aunt's taunts and reproaches now came back to his mind, adding their sting to all these other troubles. His independent spirit had long chafed at the thought of being a burden to others; but to-night it seemed more intolerable than ever. Better would it be to beg his bread, he thought, than go on thus. Besides, after his treatment of Sam he should be in worse disgrace than ever.

For a long time he sat, running his fingers through his hair as if to assist his puzzled brains, whilst he tried to think of some plan for the future; but his efforts seemed in vain, as every now and then he gave a dejected shake of his head. How long he remained thus he could not tell, but it had grown dark some time ago. At length he began to feel drowsy; his thoughts became more and more confused; his head dropped forward, and by degrees he slipped from his stool down on the ground, where he lay fast asleep.

Then it seemed to him that the little boy whose pony he had stopped that afternoon was standing over him, and, bending down asking why he was looking so sorrowful. And he fancied that he replied, "Because he had no friends; for the only One who was willing to love him he had vexed so much that he didn't know whether He would be his Friend any more." The little boy's blue eyes filled with tears at the thought of his having no friend; and he stooped down and kissed him. The tears seemed to come into Bob's eyes now, as he felt the touch of those little lips, and he put up his hand to brush them away. And as he did so he saw another Form, more beautiful than anything he had ever beheld, standing behind the child, and the Form bent towards him with a face so kind and loving, and placed something in his hand, saying at the same time that he need never again feel that he had no friend, for He would always be one to him, and would never leave him nor forsake him. Then Bob looked down to see what it was He had placed in his hands, for at first he thought it must be their little dove come to life again, it appeared so like it, and felt so warm and soft. But as he looked it seemed to grow whiter and whiter, and larger and larger, until at last it folded its wings all round about him. Then he felt so safe and happy that he scarcely knew what to do for joy. And that Form seemed to smile upon him, whilst he fancied a voice said, "He shall cover thee with His feathers, and under His wings shalt thou trust." And then he thought he asked if Johnnie mightn't come in too, and have those wings folded round him as well; but before the answer came Bob awoke, and found it was nothing but a dream.

With the first faintest streak of daylight Bob rose, and prepared to put into execution the plan he had formed over-night, which was no other than to go forth and seek his fortune in the world. Various motives had led him to this resolve; and having once made it, he was not the boy to change his mind.

Gently picking up the dead dove, with a sorrowful glance at it he laid it in his pocket, and then paused to consider how to get away without being noticed. His only mode of escaping unobserved he saw was to climb over the garden wall. But having done that, he would find himself in a neighbour's garden, and have still another wall to scale before he could get into the lane; and if any of the neighbours happened to perceive him he should get into trouble, for they would be sure to say he had come after the hens or to steal the eggs. However, there was not much chance of any one's being about at that early hour; and as that was the only way of getting off, save by going through the cottage, which Bob specially wished to avoid doing, he determined to risk it.

Using all the caution he could he managed his escape in safety, and found himself free. But what should he do with his freedom? Whither should he bend his steps?

The hospital seemed more like home to him than any other place, for Johnnie was inside it; therefore he turned in that direction, though feeling so forlorn that he would at that moment have been willing to submit to any accident, pain, or suffering, if only he might be admitted within the building as a patient, and thus enabled to be with his brother.

The morning was wearing on, the sun had shone out brightly by this time, and people were going their various ways, some intent on business, others tempted out of doors by the fine weather; but all, whatever their errand or object, passing by without noticing the lad who was standing leaning against the railings of the hospital, wondering whether any who came by might be in want of a boy in some capacity or other, and might be induced to try him.

But none as yet had taken the slightest notice of him; and, meantime, he was growing more and more hungry, and longing more and more for some breakfast. But he had yet a deeper longing than that one for food, and that was for a kind word, for an encouraging look, for a helping hand stretched out to him.

All these wishes and longings, however, though unknown to others, even to little Johnnie, who would have been so grieved had he known that Bob was standing outside feeling so lonely and sorrowful, were yet all known to the Great Father above, whose heart was sharing each pang that passed through that of the boy, whose eye was reading each thought and feeling, and whose hand was already bringing comfort near.

For as Bob was standing, full of anxious forebodings, looking up the street in one direction, a lady and gentleman and a little boy were approaching in the other. Suddenly the child, with the cry, "There he is, mamma! That's the boy that stopped my pony, papa!" darted forward, and seized hold of Bob's hand.

The latter turned with a start, and found himself face to face with the little fellow whose bright engaging countenance had haunted him in his dreams the night before. The next moment Mr. and Mrs. Deveron had also come up, and were overwhelming him with thanks for having done what he had thought such a simple thing that he never expected to hear of it again.

He grew quite shy and hot at finding himself made so much of, and fancied somehow it must be all a mistake, or he must be dreaming again; for the lady had actually taken his hand—his rough, coarse, dirty hand—in her small one, and was even holding it there as if she did not care even if the dirt did come off on to her light kid gloves. And she was not only holding his hand, just as if he had been a friend of hers, but she was looking down upon him with the sweetest face Bob had ever seen, and in the kindest of voices was saying, "How fortunate we were to meet you, for we were on our way to your home in hopes of finding you there. I could not rest until I had come to thank you for your brave conduct yesterday. It makes me shudder to think of what might have happened but for your help;" and she glanced towards her little son, who was standing by, bright and rosy, the picture of health, but who, had it not been for Bob's timely aid, might have met with a terrible accident. "I can never thank you enough for coming to the rescue as you did," she added.

"No, we cannot forget it," interposed Mr. Deveron; "and you must let us know in what way we can be of service to you, for you have a claim upon our gratitude, and we should like to befriend you."

Bob's heart gave a great leap, and even his face grew eager and animated for once. Could it be possible that the gentleman might help to get him a place, or work of any kind? But no; that seemed too much to hope. For he was afraid there must be a mistake somewhere, or the lady and gentleman wouldn't be treating him like this. Perhaps they were taking him for some other lad; at any rate, they could not know how bad a boy he was. And his face fell again.

"Well, what is it?" asked Mr. Deveron. "What would you like us to do for you?"

"Please, sir, I'm only Bob Saunders," was the unexpected reply.

"Yes; I was told that was your name," returned Mr. Deveron.

"And I ain't a good boy, sir. I'm a reg'lar bad 'un, so they say. They call me 'Surly Bob.'"

"At any rate you're an honest fellow," said Mr. Deveron, with an amused smile, "you don't try to pass off for anything better than you are. And now you've told us thus much about yourself, tell us what it is you would like us to do for you? What was the wish that came into your mind just now?"

"Please, sir, it's a place as I wants so dreadful bad. But nobody won't take me 'cause I'm so slow and stupid you see, sir."

This was rather a long speech for silent Bob, and he seemed astonished himself at his courage in making it, for his face grew redder and redder as he went on.

Little Edgar standing by, looked as if he was wondering at Bob's strange request, and was, moreover, a little disappointed at it. "Why doesn't he ask papa for a nice new coat and trousers?" he was saying to himself, "for those he has on are so very shabby and ragged. And he might have asked for a better cap too, in fact a whole new suit of clothes. And then he might have said he'd like to have a jolly dinner, with plenty of plum-pudding and mince-pies, for I'm sure he looks hungry enough. Oh, he might have asked for such lots of things, and I know papa would have given them to him! But instead of that he just asks for some work. I'm sure I'd have said something very different!"

Mr. Deveron, however, did not seem to be of the same opinion as his little boy, for he looked pleased at Bob's request; whilst Mrs. Deveron, turning to her husband, said, "You'll be able to help him in that way, will you not?"

"I dare say I shall; I will see. But what sort of work are you wanting to find, my boy?"

"I'd do anything, sir, if somebody 'd only try me. Leastways, I'd do my best, but I know I'm stupid, so p'raps there ain't much as I could do."

And as this view of his own qualifications presented itself to poor Bob, a hopeless look came over his face.

"A willing spirit is better than any amount of cleverness, my boy," said Mrs. Deveron, laying her hand kindly on his shoulder. "So cheer up, for I dare say we shall be able to find some kind of work that you may be able to manage."

"Yes, I will consider it over, and you can come out to my place this afternoon and ask for me," said Mr. Deveron. And having told the lad his name, and described to him where he lived, he turned to go farther on.

But little Edgar, who had been listening attentively to the whole conversation, came running back before they had gone many steps, and holding out a bright new sixpence, he exclaimed, "There, Bob, that's for you! for your own, to do what you like with. Mamma says I may give it to you. I'd meant to buy some chocolate with it, but I'd ever so much sooner you had it. And now you can go and get some buns, or something nice, can't you? for you look so hungry, I'm sure you must want something!"

And the little fellow, scarcely waiting to be thanked, ran off again, though looking back once or twice to give a friendly nod and smile.

The tears fairly came into Bob's eyes, and he almost forgot to brush them away as he stood looking at the bright coin lying on his palm.

"No; I ain't a-going to spend that in buns, though I be hungry," he said to himself, shaking his head at the idea. "I wouldn't go and change away that in a shop for anything! but I'll keep it all my life to 'mind me of that little chap. I never came across any fellow afore as made me love him all in a minute like that 'ere little 'un. My word! I am glad as nothing happened to him that day, and I wish there was something else as I could do for him, for I wouldn't stop at anything. But to think of their coming and thanking of me! First time anybody's ever had anything to thank me for: it's been mostly cuffs and scoldings as I've always got—not as I mean to say I haven't deserved 'em; I know I've been a bad boy, and I know I've a reg'lar temper, but I means to try and be different now. But I wish the afternoon would come that I might go out to the house."

(To be continued.)

"THE QUIVER" BIBLE CLASS.

297. In Leviticus xxii. the people of Israel are commanded not to sacrifice any animal to God which was blemished. What prophet do we find blaming the people for having done this?

298. Where is the growth of nettles mentioned as a mark of desolation?

299. What especial power was given to the first followers of Christ? Quote passage.

300. In St. Matthew xxiii. 35, mention is made of "Zecharias, son of Barachias." In whose reign did he prophesy?

301. Quote a passage which shows David's gratitude to God.

302. In what way did Jesus excuse His disciples for sleeping during His agony in the garden of Gethsemane?

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS ON PAGE 736.

286. "Who raised up the righteous man from the east, called him to his foot, gave the nations before him, and made him rule over kings? He gave them as the dust to his sword, and as driven stubble to his bow. He pursued them, and passed safely, even by the way that he had not gone with his feet" (Isaiah xli. 2, 3).

287. That all raiment of the poor should be returned at sunset; and that a widow's raiment was never to be taken in pledge at all (Deut. xxiv. 10—17).

288. Because a band of men who had come with the Arabians to the camp of Israel had slain all the eldest sons (2 Chron. xxii. 1).

289. "For every kind of beasts, and of birds, and of serpents, and of things in the sea, is tamed, and hath been tamed of mankind" (James iii. 7).

290. After the battle against the Moabites and Ammonites (2 Chron. xx. 25).

(Drawn by M. FITZGERALD.)

DETHRONED.

FOND things have oft to thee been said,
Dame Fortune! kings and clowns,
Trembling before thee, bow the head.
I heed nor smiles nor frowns!
O'er flatt'rers wave the magic wand,
Bless this with rank and that with land,
Then sudden close thy lavish hand!

I serve a nobler mistress, life
With me is sober, sure;
Fate, fortune, splendour's giddy strife
In vain ye cast the lure;
Steadfast my queen smiles, in her train
A quiet conscience free from pain
Of anxious lookings on I gain.

Thus, through th' all golden summer day,
That crowns man's stormy Spring,
I wear the tranquil hours away,
Nor dread that fickle thing,
Its slaves call Fortune: let me wend
The way where Duty's footsteps tend,
My God my only guide and friend!

THE BRIDGE BETWEEN.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE TROUBLES OF CHATTY AND MOLLY," "THE DINGY HOUSE AT KENSINGTON," "QUEEN MADGE," "AGAINST HERSELF," ETC., ETC., ETC.

CHAPTER XXIX.—WATCHING THE SUNSET.

"DOROTHY," said Netta, early the next morning, "I want to send a note to your knight, George Blakesley, where does he live?"

"Oh, Netta, what can you want to write to him about? Besides, he starts for Liverpool to-day."

"Let me do as I like, dear," the Beauty answered, tenderly looking up at her sister's flushed face. "I want to say good-bye to him before he goes; I used to be so rude to him once." Then Dorothy caught at the idea; perhaps if he saw her again things might come right after all, she thought.

"Tom will take the letter if you ask him. Mr. Blakesley is staying with his aunts. Yes, do write at once, Netta!" for the Beauty had found out Dorothy's secret, and there was no longer any reserve between the sisters.

So Netta sat up, and wrote a note, and sealed it before Dorothy returned from asking Tom if he would take it before he went to business, for fear it should be too late if entrusted to the post. "He will be sure to come," Netta said, hopefully, "for I have told him how ill I am." So all through the day Dorothy waited, first patiently, and then impatiently, but no answer came to the note, and no George Blakesley appeared. "He will be sure to come," Netta repeated, "for, of course, the note got to him before he could have left home; so, cheer up, Dorothy." Still he did not come, and when the sun began to set poor Dorothy's tears fell fast. "Oh, Netta!" she said, "it is too late; I shall never see him again." Then, suddenly, there came a quick sharp ring at the door-bell, and Netta looked up and nestled down again among the shawls on the sofa.

"Let me get out of the way," pleaded Dorothy, her courage failing when she needed it most.

"No; stay, dear, I am not well enough to talk," pleaded Netta. Mrs. Woodward had gone out with Sally. So Dorothy folded her hands and waited. The door was opened, a rustling of silk was heard,—and instead of George Blakesley there entered his two maiden aunts.

"I came to see you, my dear," Miss Blakesley (dear kind Tabby, as, without a thought of disrespect, Dorothy always called her at heart) said to Netta, "I was so sorry to hear from your brother, when he came with a note this morning, how ill you were," and then she and Black-and-White sat down and talked, and presently the latter mentioned the name Dorothy was trembling with longing to hear. "I am so sorry your note came too late, Lady Finch. My nephew started by the mail last night for Liverpool. My sister sent him on his morning letters, and yours with them, for he does not sail till this evening, so he probably has it by this time."

Poor Dorothy's heart sank. "He is gone," she thought, and could think no more, but rose, longing to escape. Then Black-and-White unconsciously came to her aid.

"I am so glad to see you back in your old house," she said; "and George has often told me about the garden; I should so like to see it if it would not be troubling you too much, dear." Neither of the old ladies showed that they saw that the rooms were filled with their nephew's furniture, though the sight of the old things they had known so long touched them sorely.

"It is a very wild overgrown old garden," Dorothy said, almost humbly, in an apologetic tone, as she took Black-and-White down the mossy pathways; "but we have known it like this all our lives, and would not have it done up for the world."

"No, dear, I dare say not," Black-and-White answered, with the nervous little laugh that had now and then something almost sad in its sound; "my nephew has often spoken of it, and said how he liked it because of its wildness. And there was the cat's grave, I have often heard of that, too," and she laughed again.

"Here it is, Miss Mildred, under this tree." She stopped under the shady boughs, and looked half-wistfully half-sorrowfully up into the old maid's face. It had been a pretty face once, and showed evidence of past summers still; but there were lines, hard sad lines, around the eyes and the gentle simple-looking mouth. Perhaps, she had had her history, too, Dorothy thought, as she stood still, longing to throw her arms round Black-and-White's neck, and ask her if she thought whether by any wild chance George Blakesley would ever see or care for her again; but this was impossible. Half mechanically she sat down, and then rose, as if ashamed of her momentary forgetfulness.

"I should like to rest a minute, too, if you don't mind," Black-and-White said, pleadingly. So they sat down, but neither seemed inclined to talk. Dorothy's face was turned towards her companion, but her eyes wandered to the mists beyond gathering over the pleasant fields of Hampstead, and her memory went back with a bound to the different phases her life had known in sight of them; and then she thought suddenly of George Blakesley, who was probably on board the ship which was to take him, oh! so far away, and with almost a start her eyes dropped to Black-and-White. There was a look in her face that somehow made Dorothy droop her head down on to her shoulder.

"What is the matter, my dear? You looked so sad just now, and yet, you know, you ought to be very happy," she added, with the nervous laugh again, "for George told me he thought you were engaged to Mr. Fuller, and that he knew he was very fond of you. Dear George was so glad, for he thought you had always liked him." Dorothy raised her head, and answered Miss Mildred almost passionately, "I am not engaged to Mr. Fuller, Miss Mildred—I never was and never shall be. It is all a mistake."

"But are you not fond of him?"

"No, certainly not; oh, no, no, no!" and then her excitement died away, and the tears filled her eyes.

"Why didn't you tell George this? He might not have gone to America then."

"He doesn't care for me now," exclaimed Dorothy, a wild hope springing up in her heart.

"I don't know," answered Black-and-White, in the nerveless manner which was her wont. "One never knows anything, my dear; but he was engaged to you once, and he must have liked you then, and he used often to talk to us of you; but he thought you liked Mr. Fuller. I often wondered why you never cared for George," she added, simply.

"I was not in love with him at the time I was engaged to him," Dorothy answered; "I was very different ——" and she stopped herself. "But I always admired him more than any one I ever knew. If there is anything good in me, Miss Mildred," she said, earnestly, "I owe it to him; and now I don't suppose I shall ever see him again."

"Perhaps not, dear; one never knows," and Black-and-White turned her eyes towards the dim fields and the fading sunset, and Dorothy's gaze followed hers for a moment.

"Let us come in, Miss Mildred; Netta is not well enough to talk much," she said, so they went back to the sitting-room, and found Adrian Fuller there talking to the elder Miss Blakesley and Netta.

"It is very bad taste in him to come, considering all that occurred yesterday," Dorothy thought, and received him stiffly and coldly.

"Do you know," said Black-and-White to her sister, when they were outside the door, "I can't help thinking that perhaps our dear George may not have gone, and that he may marry little Dorothy yet."

But George Blakesley was safe on board the good ship Syren, watching the sea and sky, and sailing slowly but surely away from his native land; and it was not till late in the evening that, looking over the packet of letters that had been put into his hand just as he stepped on board, he read Lady Finch's note.

"Probably the Beauty knows nothing about it," he said, after a long pause; "and if she does, well it's too late now," and so he passed on under the evening sky, farther and farther from the old house and the overgrown garden at Hampstead.

(To be continued.)

THE BLADE, THE EAR, AND THE FULL CORN.

BY THE REV. W. BOYD CARPENTER, M.A., VICAR OF ST. JAMES'S, HOLLOWAY.

St. Mark iv. 25—29.

IT has been thought by some that this parable describes the state of the Christian Church after Christ Himself had ascended into heaven.

According to this view, the man who cast the seed into the ground is the sower of the parable in verses 3—13 of this chapter, that is Jesus Christ; for so St. Matthew tells us our Lord interpreted His own parable. Having accomplished the work which He had to do—having planted His gospel in the hearts of His disciples, He then left it, as the farmer, having sown his seed, leaves it to the ordinary processes of Nature to bring forth the fruit at the harvest time. There is much in the history of the Christian Church which harmonises with this interpretation. In its earlier years the immediate presence of Christ, and the special gifts of the Holy Ghost, the signs and wonders wrought by the apostles, were as tokens of the fostering love of God. But, as years rolled on, the Church was left to herself. The power of the seed was the same as before, but the immediate and obvious superintendence of the Lord was removed, and the gospel seed was left to work silently in the world.

This suits the analogy of things about us. The Almighty does not interpose to teach men what they can learn for themselves. Nay, so true is this principle, that though suffering and perplexity have been occasioned by human ignorance of the laws of Nature, yet man has been left to discover them for himself. God made no special revelation in medical science, though small-pox was a death-scourge throughout Europe. It was left till the patient study and keen observation of Jenner discovered a preventive, if not a remedy. The mariner's compass must have been the means of saving thousands from perishing on the pathless ocean, yet the invention is not anticipated by any direct Divine intimation. Innumerable instances of the same class will occur to the reader; and the same has been seen in the growth and progress of the Christian Church.

But this view of the passage places one point at least in a very ambiguous light. It is difficult to see, if Christ be the man who cast seed into the ground, how it can be said of Him that He knoweth not how the seed springs up and grows (ver. 27). And farther leaving aside this expression, the above view hardly does justice to the general drift of the parable.

A little attention to the earlier verses may serve to clear the way to the general meaning. The object of a light is to give light. The candle when lighted is placed on the candlestick; and even if for a while it is hidden from view, it is only that it may come forth with fuller and stronger light (ver. 22). With this the parable comes into strict harmony. The Gospel which, as a light, is to give light, is as a seed also which must first be hidden in the ground, but this hiding in the ground is only that it may come forth, stage by stage, into fuller and richer beauty and benediction. Slow though this manifestation of life and loveliness may be, it follows the simple and natural cycle of all growth—the blade, the ear, the full corn.

But the temporary concealment of the good leads naturally to the thought of the sanctuary in which it is concealed. It is to the heart that the words spoken, of good or ill, naturally penetrate. Hence the caution, "Take heed what ye hear." To this, and its accessory warnings, correspond that part of the parable which speaks of the native energy and natural reproductiveness of the soil. "The earth bringeth forth fruit of itself." The heart does so likewise; whatever is sown there will grow. These two points the parable seems designed to illustrate, and to them, in the course of it, our Lord adds a third, which intimates that there is in all spiritual, as in all natural or physical processes, much that is beyond man's power of explanation: the seed groweth up but he knoweth not how.

I. There is the natural reproductiveness of the soil. In the parable, it is said that the earth bringeth forth fruit of herself; and this is certainly true. There are very few plants which do not multiply and grow without the intervention of human agency. Man may improve their culture, and aid them in their efforts to reach the typical form after which they seem to strive; but their mere growth continues, though men neither plant them nor sow them. This, however, is not the exact point of the expression, "The earth bringeth forth fruit of herself." It rather refers to the native energy of growth in mother Earth, so that whatever is cast into the soil will grow; for the corn-seed which is spoken of here is a plant which dies out without human cultivation. Though it will grow where it is sown, yet it is said, that it will not spread and increase without man's care.

It is simply then to the natural reproductiveness of the earth that the words apply. Of this our Lord gave indication in the former parable of the sower; no matter what the quality of the ground--rocky, thorny, or good—it showed that the power of growth was natural to it, since all brought forth some returns for the seed sown.

There is indeed what we may well call a fatal fecundity in the earth. The man who owns a plot of land dreads the thistledown as much as he yearns for the corn-seed, for he knows that the latent energy of the soil will give life to both alike. It matters nothing to the indifferent earth what you sow; but whatever it be, good, bad, or indifferent, food or poison, flower or bramble, that mother Earth, faithful to her calling, brings forth as the seasons roll. In illustration of this may be mentioned a weed well known to gardeners, which now is the enemy of every little stream or miniature lake. Notwithstanding all the most strenuous efforts to banish it, as the seeds drop they are caught and reared by the invigorating soil. Bountiful as Nature is in the teeming benedictions she she bestows, she is an undiscerning nurse, and nourishes the weeds as readily as the corn and the wine and the oil for the food of man.

This fatal fecundity is paralleled by the natural fruitfulness of the heart. This is the soil on which all things moral and immoral are sown. Here, too, they spring up and grow. Whatever is once received into the heart never lies dormant there. The inherent natural activity of man is too great. Thought will revolve, analyse, ponder, and bring forth in changed form the thing sown, tinctured perhaps with the individual character, as the corn is flavoured by the soil. The feelings, the wishes, the desires, are all called into exercise, and supply their contribution to the reproduction of the seed. No illustration of this is so striking or so painful as in the case of families. Children grow up pert, forward, cunning, false, incorrigible. Parents wonder; but the seed was dropt perchance by themselves into the busy little hives of feeling and reflection, the hearts of the children. Do they wonder at this child's insolent bearing, when the decencies of common courtesy have been wanting in the home, and neither father nor mother have treated one another with respect? They are appalled, perhaps, at the sudden (as it seems to them) exhibition of cunning or baseness in the child, and yet perhaps in younger days the mother has shielded it with artful phrase and ambiguous kindness from some well-deserved punishment, or with ready wit framed the plausible excuse which has nurtured into precocious aptitude for artifice the mind which has been thus taught to dread punishment more than sin, and to think it a comfortable blessing to avoid a penalty but no disgrace to have degraded or blunted the moral sense; they marvel perhaps at the impenetrable reserve or obstinate falseness and utter unlovingness of a child whose innocent wishes they have thwarted, whose artless affection they have crushed, and whose proffered confidence they have repulsed.

The earth bringeth forth fruit of herself; and none the less surely will this life reproduce the fruit of that which has been scattered on the too ready and open soil of the heart.

But this has a bright as well as a gloomy side. The heart cannot indeed be said to be like the earth, indifferent to the seed that falls. There is unmistakably a greater readiness to reproduce the evil than the good. The foul word or the blasphemous word will find quicker echo from the child's lips than will the kind or the godly speech. But notwithstanding this, the energy of the heart is not paralysed, and when the good seed has really taken root there, it will as surely spring up. It is too often the habit of our minds, taught by sad and depressing experiences, to disbelieve in the natural processes of spiritual growth. It is against this Christ warns us. There is, He says, a native vigour in the heart, which brings and must bring into fruit the seed that has been hidden there. Your duty is not to be wondering, but to be working. As the farmer sows the seed, and then leaves it to the forces of Nature, so must the Christian parent or the Christian teacher cast in the seed, pray to Him who can truly sow it there, and then leave it to grow. The heart is so constituted, that whatever it receives at all, it must reproduce in the life. All that remains for man to do is to gather the stones which lie scattered on the surface, lest they crush some up-struggling stalk, or to pluck up the brambles of ill habits which might entangle and choke the tender blade.

II. The natural fecundity of the earth is great, but it is not hasty. It is impossible on any extended scale to quicken the processes of Nature. The days when the cycle of spring and harvest shall so rapidly succeed each other that the reaper shall overtake the sower, belong to the days when the sceptre of righteousness shall rule unquestioned in the earth. Ordinarily the stages of growth are slow and methodical: first the blade, then the ear, after that the full corn in the ear.

This gradual and tardy progress is reflected from every side of Nature. The earth on which we tread gives evidences of the vast periods of physical gestation which preceded our era. Pine and fern and moss have risen and fallen ere oak and elm could grow, and cattle graze, and man live upon the earth. The history of thought and discovery tells the same story. If Kepler could say that it pleased God to wait 6,000 years for an astronomer, he only expressed the fact that the march of intellectual progress has been slow. If it be a wonder that the Christian world existed 1700 years without a Sunday-school, it is saying what our Lord here implied, that the outcome of Christian fruit in life and in practice would be but gradual.

Are we to expect that when we come to the growth of this faith in the individual heart we are to see a different law? No! here too, by the often insensible increments of Divine blessing on the means of grace, the character is built up to reflect in form and symmetry the image after which it was created.

The full corn in the ear will not—nay, cannot—come till the stalk has lengthened and been strengthened to bear it; nor can the stem rise from the soil till the tender blade has spread abroad its little fan-like crest, to gather the healthful virtues of the atmosphere. The young and earnest susceptibilities of the awakened heart break bright over the dull level of life, to find the discipline of life lead to the establishment of character and the strengthening of faith in the Father; but not till the maturer days of Christian life does the blossom drop and the fruit appear, and even then the full corn is often concealed from view in the enclosing ear. Nor will its full weight—the thirty, the sixty, or the hundred-fold—be known till the sickle has been thrust in, the harvest come, and the good grain gathered into the garner of God.

Gradual as the process is, there is easily to be seen the marks of a wise forethought. Early fruit is no real gain to the gardener. Unseasonable ripeness perplexes him more than it profits him. That the fruit may endure is Christ's wish, and He will not hasten the day lest a premature ripeness should be followed by an early decay. "The husbandman hath long patience," says St. James. "God is patient, because eternal," said St. Augustine. Christ is patient with us and over us. Let us be patient, and in us let patience have her perfect work. The stages of this progress are distinctly marked—first the blade, then the ear, after that the full corn in the ear.

These readily correspond with the general features of heart-growth—freshness, strength, usefulness. The blade, which appears first above the soil, is tender and fresh and green, like the early feelings and impressions of the awakened soul. There is a freshness about these early impressions; they are diffused throughout the whole framework of the soul; the thought is keen to drink up new truths; the conscience is roused into energy; the affections are warm and susceptible. But, like the little blade, the soul is sensitive and pliant; every little breeze thrills it, every strange thought or whispered misgiving makes it tremble lest the new-found life should ebb away. Doubts, like the February gales, shake the thoughts and the experiences, and toss and trouble the young growth.

But through all the little plant weathers its way, for its true life is hidden deep below, and draws its power and nutriment from hidden sources, and in its next stage appears strengthened. It is no longer the tender leaf-like blade, it is the firm and hard stalk. The impressions and experiences have crystallised into convictions and knowledge. With less perhaps of religious sensitiveness there is more of religious character; with less of the freshness there is more of the power of a Christian life. Indeed, it is upon the character that the change becomes most clearly seen; it is more in the general habit than in actual deeds; it is in the high principle, the unswerving fidelity, the untiring regularity, the circumspection, the quietude, the purity of the life, that the next change is noticeable. There is not so much of visible fruit, but the ear is there, rounding itself to encase the full corn which is forming from within. Such a one is less occupied with testing his own experiences than with methodising his own life, less careful about the emotions than about the actions, less looking back on the past than looking to the tendency of the present and watching the opening opportunities of doing good. In this comes the last stage, with the full corn in the ear, when the era of experience has given way to the era of character, and this has issued out in the era of action and true usefulness. He who has tasted the love in the heart has tested it in the life, and now seeks to scatter it.

And at the last stage, when the full ripened corn droops expectant of the sickle, there opens up the final, but the richest analogy of all, that it is only in the fall of the tall bearded ear that the truest usefulness is reached. The sickle must cut down the corn ere the new seed, discaged from the ear, can be used to sow new fields for future harvests.

But we are reminded of one point, which it is important to bear always in recollection. Though there is a natural reproductiveness in the heart of man, so that the thoughts of truths lodged there cannot long live there without coming out into the life, yet in the growth of all life, and most of all of the life of man's spirit, there is a point beyond which man cannot really penetrate. It is a matter of experience, indeed, that the seed will grow when cast into the earth; but many a sower has flung bushels of grain broadcast over the earth, and reaped in whole acres of rich corn-fields, without knowing how it is that this wondrous result has come to pass. The philosopher, or chemist, who has studied the properties of matter, may explain to him that certain elements of the soil, in conjunction with the virtue of rain and the power of sun, assimilate with the decaying seed, and send it forth in renewed vigour and perfect form; but though he may explain thus far, there is a question which starts up which he cannot solve. The fact he knows, the analysis of the fact he knows; he has pierced through one veil of the temple but to find another beyond, and into that holy of holies none can pierce, for his explanation yet needs explaining. It springs up and grows, but he knoweth not how.

It is alike in all Nature. The movements of the celestial bodies were a mystery to men till Newton discovered the law of gravity; and then, as far as science goes, the mystery was explained; but still the law is only the statement of the fact in more general terms, and is in no high or true sense an explanation of it. They move, they move by law, that law is gravity, but who will explain the explanation or tell the secret of this mysterious affection of all things? They move, they roll, but after all he knoweth not how. To question further is useless, profitless; the margin has been reached when the facts have been observed and the law derived.

Precisely parallel is the fact in the domain of the Spirit. The fact of growth is noted, the sources of growth are known, the means of support are known, a certain fitness in the method of it is observed, but the full explanation lies beyond, and baffles the thoughts that strive to penetrate the veil.

The readiest and most important illustration of this is taken from the central Christian doctrine of the death of Christ. As a matter of Christian experience the cross of Christ brings gladness to the heart; in it there is the pledge of love and the assurance of pardon; in it the accusations of conscience or the taunts of the wicked are all silenced; the soul which has been harassed and uneasy finds indeed rest when it learns that it has redemption in Christ's blood, that peace has been made by the blood of the cross. But when the restless mind begins to turn over the reason of this, it finds itself baffled at every turn. A certain fitness he may note, but to the full understanding of the reasons of this fitness he will never attain. To fly restlessly forward into the infinite wastes of speculation which lie beyond is but to find ourselves beating our enfeebled wings against the barriers of time and space, and to sink at last, baffled and blinded, back to the same little spot whence we started. It is well for us to sow the fields, to reap the harvest, to observe all that may aid us in securing the fullest benediction from the earth which God has made so prodigal of energy, but it is not well to let the earth run waste while we probe problems which can only end in barrenness; and neither is it well for us to seek the "why" of every Christian mystery, but rather be content to grow in grace, though we know not how; be content to rejoice in the new life we have found, though we are in much a mystery to ourselves; and put aside the pertinacious inquiries of metaphysical Phariseeism with the true answer of heart gratitude—"I know not, I cannot answer all these speculative questions, but one thing I know, whereas I was blind, now I see. I cannot explain to you how it is I am what I am, but by the grace of God I am what I am. I cannot tell you all that I shall grow to be in the future, but I know that I shall be like Him, for I shall see Him as He is. I cannot give elaborate demonstrations of the happy assurances I now enjoy, but the life I now live in the flesh I live by the faith of God, who loved me and gave Himself for me."

SCRIPTURE LESSONS FOR SCHOOL AND HOME.

SCRIPTURE STORIES. Second Series. No. 13. The Unmerciful Servant.

Chapter to be read—St. Matthew xviii. 21—35.

INTRODUCTION. Ask who always accompanied Jesus? how many disciples were there? why did Jesus keep them with Him? what were they to do after His departure? But before they taught others must themselves learn. What Christ told them often very different from what had previously learned; sometimes apostles great difficulty in understanding; used to come and ask questions; made Peter their spokesman; so now.

I. The Question asked. (Read 21, 22.) What was the question? Who was Peter's brother? Very little told us about Andrew. Remind of his bringing Peter to Jesus when had found Him himself (John i. 40, 41). Perhaps the brothers sometimes quarrelled, as brothers often do, or perhaps Peter was only putting a case to Christ. What was the teaching of the law on the subject? (See Matt. v. 38). But Christ came to give a new law, that of love. Remind of sermon on Mount; how had taught to do good to enemies (Matt. v. 44, &c.). So now, what answer did Christ give? Seventy times seven, meaning an infinite number of times; as often as is the offence, so must forgiveness be. But Peter would say, Is it possible? can I forgive such repeated injuries? Surely I must have revenge. So Christ answers by a parable.

II. The Question Answered. (1) The forgiving master. (Read 23—27.) Describe the scene. The king, after an absence, taking account with his servants. Had entrusted them with money to be spent for him; perhaps been away for long time; reckoning time not expected just yet; suddenly all are called to account; some approach joyfully, money all ready, have good account to give of money entrusted, receive smile of approval, and pass out of royal presence. Another comes, pale and trembling, accounts made out; what does he owe? an enormous sum; what has he to pay? nothing! What does the king command? Explain that, as now, in the East, slaves, with wives and families, absolutely the property of masters. So decree goes forth: servants approach, proceed to bind the slave, and carry him off. What can he do? throw himself on his compassion. Let children notice that he acknowledges the debt, and justice of sentence. Simply appeals to his lord's compassion; offers to do all he can. What effect did it have on the master? Yes; was moved with pity—had prisoner's bonds removed—forgave the debt, and set him free. What effect would it have upon the servant? Surely will make him full of gratitude and love to master, and gentleness to fellow-servants. We shall see. (2) The unforgiving servant. (Read 28—35.) Once more describe the scene. The servant going out freed, forgiven, joins fellow-servants; is congratulated, becomes elated, thinks he will take account too; finds one who owes him money, how much? an infinitely small sum. Surely he will at once forgive him! Does he? Nay, he cannot refrain from violence; seizes him at once, treats him more harshly than his lord had treated him. What does the other do? Uses precisely the same words that he had; but with what effect? Who had been with him to see all? Cannot contain their indignation; go and report to their lord; tell the whole story. What does he do now? Sends for him. Can fancy the eagerness with which fellow-servants would drag him in, place him before the master, and then listen to what he would say. What does he say? (v. 32, 33) he makes him see his wickedness and hardness of heart, and then gives him up to punishment till could pay all his debt.

III. The Application. (Verse 35.) This is so simple and natural that children cannot help seeing the general application at once; the particular application to themselves is more difficult. (1) God's forgiveness. See that they clearly understand who is the master; how is God our master; we are His by creation (Psalms c. 2). He has a right to us; He can do with us as He pleases. What do we owe Him? Worship as to God (Psalms xcv. 6); obedience as to a King; love as to a Father. Have we always given Him these? What have we cared for more than God? Perhaps made idols of friends, pleasure, idle books, &c. More than that. Show how God, as holy God, requires perfect holiness in His children; all sin then is a debt. Have all our lives given way to it—evil tempers, idle words, sullen looks, disobedience to parents, if not grosser sins; owe more than 10,000 talents. What can we pay? nothing! Have no holiness to give. What then can we do? simply cry for mercy, like Peter on the sea (Matt. xiv. 30); like the Publican in the temple (Luke xviii. 13). And what will God do? Yes, He delights in mercy, will forgive for Christ's sake all who ask (1 John 1—9). (2) Man's forgiveness. Just as God forgives, so must we. Our forgiveness then must be free, without making a bargain; full, so as to treat the person who has wronged us just the same as before, just the same as if he had not wronged us. This very difficult, but very necessary. Remind of Joseph's forgiveness of his brethren, Moses bearing with the Israelites, David sparing Saul, Christ praying for his murderers. Show children the true joy this will give to both. Remind of miserable feelings when have done wrong, confession made to father or mother, forgiveness obtained, the exquisite pleasure of being again taken into favour, evident joy of parents at being able to receive child back, as figured in parables of Lost Sheep and Prodigal Son (Luke xv).

Questions to be answered.

1. What was Peter's question, and how was it answered?
2. What had Christ taught in the sermon on the Mount about forgiveness?
3. What debts do we owe to God?
4. Show the nature of God's forgiveness.
5. Give examples of forgiveness of injuries.
6. What parables teach us the joy of forgiveness?

STILL AND DEEP.

BY F. M. F. SKENE, AUTHOR OF "TRIED," "ONE LIFE ONLY," ETC.

CHAPTER LIII.

BERTRAND DE L'ISLE had listened with ever deepening attention and seriousness, to the simple yet earnest words with which his wife told him the source and nature of her hopes on Laura Brant's behalf, and when she paused in her momentary agitation, he still sat silent for a few minutes before he spoke.

"Well, Mary, I hope it may be as you expect," he said at last, thoughtfully; "and after the account you have given me of poor Pemberton's ceaseless prayers, one might almost believe that a miracle of grace would indeed be worked on the woman who injured him, because of his noble devotion; but it will be in very truth a miracle I think if Lurline is ever brought to anything like real religion, for I am convinced that she is godless and false to the very heart's core."

"She has never known God, certainly," said Mary, "but I think that has in part, at least, been more her misfortune than her fault; and in other respects I believe there is greater ground for hope even in her natural character than you would be disposed to admit. I imagine the root of the evil in her case lies simply in the fact that she has never at all realised anything beyond this outward visible world and her personal existence in it; this present life, and her own happiness throughout its duration, is all she has ever thought of or aimed at or desired; she has not even recognised a moral law as applying to herself, and therefore has not scrupled to use any means, however full of falsehood and cruelty, to gain her own ends. She has been kept from graver evils mainly by her instincts as a lady and her position in society; but I think that if once her spiritual sense could be awakened to a knowledge of the truth of God, of the love of Christ, and of the immortality that surely awaits her, there are good and hopeful qualities within her, which will help her at once to respond to such a revelation."

"You have evidently studied her character more than I have, my wise little wife, and you may be right."

"At all events, Bertrand, I have your full sanction, have I not, for trying my best to fulfil John Pemberton's charge, and for my other plans with regard to Laura?"

"Certainly you have, my darling. If he who suffered so much more by her than we have done could thus forgive and serve her to the last, we well may do what in us lies to help her now. We will go together at once, dear, to find rooms for her, and to arrange for her removal, and you may be with her in your efforts to influence her for good, as much as you please till the time comes for our return home."

(Drawn by W. SMALL.)

"Mary had turned to the window."—p. 779.

Two days later Mary de l'Isle was seated by the side of Laura's couch, which had been drawn near the open window of a pleasant room, very different from the attic in which she had found her. The poor suffering Lorelei was already looking much better, though still excessively pale and wasted, the burning feverishness had evidently almost left her, and she seemed tranquil and at ease, though very weak. It had now, however, become strangely evident how completely her beauty had depended on her brilliant colouring and animation, for no one at this time would have called her even a pretty woman; her features had always been defective and irregular, and now that her eyes were sunken, and her cheeks wasted, there was not the slightest remains of the ephemeral loveliness that had allured so many to their fatal injury. She was much more subdued and simple in her manner, and there was a touch of real feeling in the thanks she was expressing to Mary for all she had done for her.

"I never thought the day would come when I should be a dependent on your charity, and that of Bertrand Lisle," she added, while a flush tinged her wan cheeks; "I think, in a sense, you both have your revenge in that very fact, though I know you do not do it with the intention of heaping coals of fire on my head."

"No, indeed," said Mary, warmly; "we have been giving ourselves pleasure in trying to be of use to you."

"You have saved my life; but was it worth saving, Mary? I must come back to that, though I am glad not to be called upon to face God with all my sins upon my head at this time; but you don't know with what dread I look forward to the dull monotonous existence that seems to be before me. You are going to leave me here with Mrs. Parry and this poor sickly baby, and I know that your kindness will ensure my having everything I absolutely require, but what shall I have to brighten life, or to give me happiness?"

"That which alone can give happiness to any one on earth, whatever their external existence may be—the love of God, the hope of serving through the eternal ages the Lord who suffered and died to purchase for us endless bliss."

Laura sighed. "I never was religious, you know, Mary; and although I have no doubt what you say is true, these prospects are too far off to have any reality for me; church-going used to be simply a weariness to me, as I dare say you remember."

"Yes, and I suppose even now you do not care to have such matters spoken of, though you have been very near what seems to you so far off, Laura dear."

"I do not dislike your talking of religion, Mary, because you never were either canting or self-righteous. But although it is true, no doubt, that if I had died as I expected I should have been brought into the midst of all that the Bible teaches of the unseen world, I only felt terrified at the thought of God's just anger, and my probable punishment; and I must say all that is happiness in this life seems to me very far removed from anything that religion can offer."

"I think that is just where your mistake has been, Laura. You have imagined that the gifts which this present visible world can bestow are capable of conveying happiness to the immortal beings whom God has created to find bliss only in Himself, and I think even your own experience might show you now what a fallacy it is to suppose the soul can ever be satisfied with earthly pleasures. You used to think that riches and society and amusements were all that was most desirable, did you not?"

"Yes, and I fought hard to win them."

"And you succeeded; for some months after your marriage you had all these supposed advantages, had you not? You had wealth untold, and you lived in a round of gaieties, and won a great deal of admiration and homage?"

"That is true enough," said Laura.

"Then, tell me, were you happy in the midst of it all?" and Mary fixed her dark earnest eyes on the faded face.

"Never for a single moment," answered Laura, energetically; "but there were a thousand causes to prevent it. I had rivals in society who were more courted than I was, and it worried me beyond endurance not to be able to emulate their success. Then I used to spend heaps of money in giving splendid fêtes to numbers of people, not one of whom I ever cared to see again, and I reaped nothing from them myself but disappointment and weariness. I got tired to death of the theatre when I went to it every night, and soon my state of health incapacitated me from much fatigue, and at home Mr. Brant and I were always quarrelling. Oh, I have been very wretched, but that was the result of my special circumstances, not because a life of pleasure cannot give happiness!"

"You would find that there are always circumstances to mar the enjoyments which belong to this world only; the very satiety they produce would do it, if nothing else did."

"But look at your own case, Mary; you are very happy, as well you may be—Comtesse de l'Isle, with wealth, and position, and everything you can desire."

"I am happy because I have my Bertrand," she answered, simply; "but the very love I bear him would turn to utter anguish if I had no hope beyond this life; for, think how precarious all such happiness is—at any moment death may take him from me or me from him. I do not know how I could bear the thought of all earth's changes and chances, if it were not for the prospect of the steadfast peace into which I trust we both may enter when this incomplete existence is broken off or ending in decay. As to those other so-called advantages of which you speak, they are absolutely nothing in themselves, and altogether valueless, excepting for the power they sometimes convey of being useful to our fellow creatures."

"Then, do you mean that earth has no joys at all for any one, Mary?" asked Laura.

"No; far from it! There are many sources of happiness, pure and sweet, many tranquil pleasures which our Father in heaven gives us to cheer us in our difficult journey to our home; but they are only like the flowers growing by the wayside, which may enliven our path a little way, if we can but be sure that we ever see before us that Bright and Morning Star, the true Light of the world, which alone can really fill our hearts with joy, the perfect joy of His eternal love."

Mary seemed almost to have forgotten to whom she was speaking as she uttered these words, while her eloquent eyes were lifted up to the pure blue vault, seen through the open window, with a look which told how intense was in that moment her realisation of the great truth she was expressing.

The worldly woman at her side lay still and silent, gazing at her with mingled wonder and envy, and not daring for a time to disturb the thoughts she could so little understand.

CHAPTER LIV.

It might have made a striking and suggestive picture if Mary de l'Isle and Laura Brant could have been depicted in that moment of silence, as representatives, the one of the children of light, the other of the children of this world. Mary had turned to the window, and the full glory of an Italian sunset was streaming on her pure spiritual face and large dark eyes all luminous with the light of faith and hope, her snowy garments shining in the vivid radiance with the dazzling whiteness of an angel's robes, while Lurline lay back amid the shadows with her grey faded face and lustreless eyes, and the weary care-worn expression of one whose spirit knows no peace. She broke the stillness, and recalled Mary to herself at last by saying, with a heavy sigh, "I wish, oh how I wish, I could feel as you do! but for me it is hopelessly impossible."

In an instant Mary had turned.

"No, dear Lurline, you must not speak of hopelessness, that word has been obliterated in every spiritual sense by the cross of Christ. I came here to-day to give you a message, which I think will help you, from one who already knows the full secret of the love of God. Tell me, Laura, where do you suppose John Pemberton to be at this moment?"

"Oh, poor fellow, I am sure I do not know! living at home perhaps, or reading for orders somewhere, trying to redeem the time he wasted on me. Of all my evil deeds, Mary, my conduct to John Pemberton was that which terrified me the most, when I believed I was going then and there before the judgment-seat of Christ. I know that I did him a deadly injury by drawing him away from all his holy aspirations, and then I deceived and betrayed him after all, and sent him from me in despair. Oh, I was far more cruel to him than to Bertrand, for he loved me truly, and I do not think your husband ever really did. Wherever John is now I am sure he must be thinking of me with the bitterest hatred and contempt."

"Oh, Laura, how much you are mistaken," said Mary, softly. "Dear John is even now at the feet of his beloved Lord; in His bright immediate presence, and there, I doubt not, if he is permitted to do so, he prays for you as ardently, as incessantly, as he did while still he struggled through the shadows of this twilight world."

"Mary, what do you mean?" exclaimed Laura, starting from her reclining position; "where is John? not dead—oh, say he is not dead!"

"Dead to this mortal state, but alive unto God for evermore," said Mary, reverently.

"Then I shall never see him again, to ask him to forgive me, as I fully meant to do?" said Lurline, falling back sadly on her pillows. "Oh, Mary, I am justly punished for my cruelty towards him! I thought nothing of it at the time, when I was only straining every nerve to escape at any cost from Chiverley and the dull monotony of my unmarried life; but the sense of my unkindness to poor John Pemberton was brought home to me when I found myself the wife of a man who married me to suit his own convenience, and in the midst of persons who called themselves my friends for the sake of promoting their personal interests, and whose pretended attachment to me was as false and hollow as that with which I had mocked the devotion of his true and tender heart. I was stung with remorse concerning him even then, before I had been brought face to face with death and judgment, and I made the most earnest resolution that I would try to be a true friend to him in all the years to come. I looked forward most anxiously to meeting him again, for that very purpose; and now, all in a moment, I hear that it is for ever impossible; it may be a just decree, no doubt I have deserved it; but it is almost unendurable to feel that the one who loved me more than any one else ever did should have parted from me for the last time on earth in such exceeding bitterness."

"There was no bitterness in his feelings towards you at the last, Laura; of that I am quite certain from the manner in which he spoke to me of you a very short time before his death; but I do not believe that he ever at any time cherished an unkind thought of you, even when he was in the midst of his keenest suffering."

"He did suffer much, then, by my conduct, as I feared; tell me all you know of him from the time he left Chiverley. I never heard a word about him after that last letter he wrote to my father. Was he very unhappy, Mary? I want to know all the truth."

"I will not hide it from you, Laura, though I fear it must pain you to hear it. He was indeed almost broken-hearted then; but it was rather because he had fallen from his pure allegiance to his Saviour than from the utter loss and ruin that had fallen on his earthly love; his remorseful penitence drove him to test himself by serving God in some severe and painful way, before he dared allow himself to enter on the sacred duties of his first vocation as a clergyman; for this reason he came to Paris to work among the sick and wounded of the war, which was, of course, a task full of danger and self-sacrifice."

"To Paris! then was it there he died? and were you near him at the time? how did it happen, Mary? tell me all!" said Laura, clasping her hands tight in feverish agitation.

"I was near him; I had seen him only a few hours before; and I was the first to hear of the sudden termination to his beautiful life. He was shot down in the streets while saving a little child from the fury of some French soldiers, who were trying to kill her as a Prussian spy; she was the daughter of the people with whom I lodged, and she came flying to me at once with the terrible news, and I hurried to the spot, but too late to see him alive; he was lying under the sunset sky in the arms of death, an image of perfect peace."

"And it was thus his life was flung away!" said Laura, bitterly, "in a foreign country, in the midst of an alien struggle which had no claim on him, and a warfare in which he had no part; and he was driven to that city of death by me! It seems to me, Mary, that I am just as much responsible for his untimely fate as if I had shot him through the heart myself."

"No, Laura, I believe that he was taken in merciful response to His own intense longing for the Lord whom he loved. You were, doubtless, the cause of his leaving his native land, but good was brought out of evil, and if you had seen his smile in death you could never have regretted for a moment that his deep desire was granted, in that early passing of his soul to the bosom of the Father."

"You said he gave you a message for me before he died," said Laura, whose tears were now flowing quietly down her pale cheeks.

"Yes, he charged me with a special mission to you, and I think his prayers brought me here to fulfil it.

"What was it that he wished, Mary?" said Lurline, in a low awe-stricken voice; and the answer came in tones of deepest reverence.

"Laura, from the moment that John Pemberton left you at Chiverley, all through the siege, on the ramparts, in the night watches, by the side of the sick and dying, there was continually going up from his faithful heart an earnest prayer for you—the prayer that you might be brought into the love and peace of Christ; he knew that he never should see you on this earth again, and therefore he charged me most solemnly to seek you out and implore of you in his name to turn away from shadows and delusions to the true and only Light, to endeavour with all your heart to find that God to whom he has gone in joy unspeakable and full of glory." Mary rose, and knelt down by Laura as she spoke.

"Dear," she said, "will you listen to the voice of this your faithful friend speaking to you through my lips from the very grave? Will you turn even now to the God and Saviour who is so willing to receive you? Will you ask Him to draw you to Himself; to teach you His love; to show you in His own very being the way, the truth, the life—the fulness of joy for evermore? I know you feel yourself weak and blind and ignorant; but, Laura, He who reads the thoughts of all humanity knows what you require far better than you do yourself. He will be to you wisdom, and sanctification, and redemption; only fly to Him, cling to Him, cast yourself upon Him, wrestle with Him in the very darkness of your unbelief, tell Him you will not let Him go except He bless you, and He will dawn in your heart the Day-Star of a new existence, He will reveal Himself to you as that Deathless Love, which alone can satisfy your soul!"

Mary had clasped her hands in almost an agony of entreaty, while her voice trembled and her eyes shone through tears of deepest feeling. The effect of her earnestness was almost like the miracle of grace Bertrand had anticipated; for the hardened selfish heart of the worldly woman melted like ice-bound waters beneath the heavenly sunshine, the springs of its purer impulses were broken open, and, flinging her arms round Mary's neck, Laura exclaimed, in utterances half choked with strong emotion, "I will! I will! Oh, Mary! I will turn to God with all my heart if only you will help me, teach me, guide me; I will ask Him to give me faith, and a true sorrow for all my evil life, to show me His will, to grant me His love, to wake me out of my dead indifference and apathy, and I feel, I know John's prayers have not been all in vain, for already I have at least the wish to become a follower of Christ, and so if it be true that the very angels in heaven rejoice over the sinner that repents I think that he too—my poor lost friend—must be very glad in his home of rest this day."

She broke into hysterical weeping as she ceased to speak, and Mary would not allow her to say another word, but soothed her as if she had been a tired child, till she dropped into tranquil slumber.

(To be continued.)

"ABOUT MY FATHER'S BUSINESS."

BY THOMAS ARCHER.

WITH THE PRISONER—(concluded).

BUT let us see what are the means adopted by the Society for helping discharged prisoners. Of course the procedure must begin with the prisoners themselves, in so far that they must express their willingness to accept the aid offered to them, and make known their decision to the governor of the prison where they are confined, and where the rules and provisions of the Society are displayed and explained.

This refers to the convict prisons, since only these are eligible, the prisoners from county gaols being assisted by other organisations; therefore, discharged convicts from Millbank, Pentonville, Portland, Portsmouth, Chatham, Parkhurst, Dartmoor, Woking, and Brixton, are able to seek help; and it is gratifying to know that, according to the prison returns, of 1,579 male prisoners discharged from these places in 1873, 796 sought aid from this and local provincial societies having the same object, the number of applicants to the London Society being 524, or nearly two-thirds of the whole. On any convict, male or female, accepting the offer of the Society, and making that decision known to the governor of the prison, the latter forwards to this office at Charing Cross a printed document, or recommendation, stating full particulars of the prisoner's age, date of conviction, number of previous convictions (if any), degree of education, religion, former trade or employment, ability to perform labour, and general character while in prison, together with the amount of good-conduct money which is to be allowed for work performed during the period of incarceration. This good-conduct money may amount to a maximum sum of £3, and the Society takes charge of it for the benefit of the prisoner, disbursing it only as it may be required, and supplementing it, when necessary, by a further grant of money, or even by advances or loans as may be deemed desirable in certain cases.

These reports from the prison governor reach the office about six weeks before the discharge of the convicts named in them, and following them come other papers, each of which contains a graphic personal description of the prisoner referred to, and a fairly-executed photograph, which is usually not without certain striking characteristics, though you will be surprised to find how often you fail to discover the lineaments which you have associated in fancy with lawlessness and crime. At the time of their discharge, the men and women are conducted hither by a plainly-clothed messenger from the prison, appointed for the purpose, and take their places in yonder back room, where they are immediately identified by means of the descriptions and photographs, and are then questioned as to their capabilities and the particular employment in which they desire to engage. It is manifestly impossible that the Society can provide them with employment in the particular trades which they may previously have followed, since there may be no openings in those industries, or they may be such as would be obviously unsuitable for persons who are still on probation.

Should the prisoner have friends or relatives able and willing to receive or assist him, they are communicated with, but should he be entirely dependent on personal exertion, the agent or secretary at once procures for him a decent outfit of clothes, and a lodging as far as possible from the scene of his former companions. A small sum of money is advanced for immediate subsistence, and he usually has employment provided for him, either in a situation, at manual labour, or by being set up in a small way at shoemaking, tailoring, or carpentering, either as journeyman, or, where possible, on his own account.

From six to twenty prisoners at a time are discharged from one or other of the convict establishments and brought to the Society's offices, and of the younger men a considerable proportion are assisted to go to sea, others—but, alas! too few—to emigrate, while a number obtain work as builders and contractors' labourers; and others again resume former occupations, as potmen, waiters, or employés in various situations, where the masters are always (if they take them on the recommendation of the Society) fully apprised of their position. A good many are set up again as costermongers, and in that case the agent of the Society quietly accompanies them to market, and advances the money for their first purchases; others go into the country and obtain work, and not a few of the better-educated or more skilled soon obtain engagements of various kinds, by personal application, and without reference to the Society, though they continue to report themselves, and to be kept in view by the agents, and, being separated from evil companionship, and feeling that they are not altogether friendless, retrieve their position and regain an honourable reputation.

Of 514 men and women who were received by the Society last year, 180 obtained employment in London and are doing well; 156 were sent to places beyond the metropolitan district, and were placed under the supervision of the local police; 32 were sent to relatives and friends abroad; 57 obtained berths on board ship; 50 had failed to report and notify their change of address, as required by Act of Parliament; 23 had been re-convicted; 6 were not satisfactorily reported on; one had died; and 9, who had been recently discharged at the end of the year, were waiting for employment at the time of the Report. To read the Report Book, recording the visits of the agents or secretary to men employed in various avocations, and to their friends or relatives, is very encouraging, for it shows that of a large proportion, say seventy per cent., there is a good hope of reclamation by their long continuance in industrious efforts to retain their situations and to work honestly in various callings; while the reports of country cases by clergymen in the provinces is equally satisfactory, especially as they frequently record the return of the former convict to his family and friends, amidst whom he earns an honourable subsistence.

The female convicts, who are also received at the office, are, if they cannot be sent to relatives and friends, mostly taken to a Refuge which has been established by the Society at Streatham, where they find a home until situations can be obtained for them; and it is to the credit of some earnest ladies who are willing to engage these discharged prisoners as domestic servants that the result is often most favourable. A very large proportion of the women return to friends, however. Of fifty-three who left the Refuge at Streatham last year, thirty were received by friends, eighteen obtained situations, three returned to Millbank Penitentiary, one emigrated, and one died, twenty-five remaining at the Refuge at the time of the report.

In the case of these discharged female prisoners, as well as for the sake of those men who would eagerly seize an opportunity of beginning life anew in a new country, it would be most desirable if greater facilities existed for promoting and assisting the emigration of such as gave satisfactory evidence of reformation of character. The Society finds its own funds, supported by contributions from the public, barely sufficient to maintain, and insufficient largely to extend its useful work. One of the committee, a resident in Canada, has rendered invaluable assistance to emigrants recommended to his notice by the Society. The governor of Dartmoor Prison in his last Report, says:—

"I cannot too strongly again express my conviction that an emigration scheme connected with the Aid Societies would be an invaluable aid to the restoration of many casual criminals to a position of respectability and honesty. It would be especially appreciated by those (unfortunately a too numerous class) who had incurred the shorter sentences of penal servitude as punishments for breaches of trust of various kinds. These men are often cast off by their respectable friends, and, from the shortness of their sentences, are unable to earn the additional gratuity. With no lasting means of subsistence, and an overstocked market for their labour, it is not to be wondered at if such men speedily add a second conviction to their criminal career." We trust that practical steps will be taken to remove this difficulty.

SURLY BOB.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "SHAG AND DOLL," "HUGH'S HEROISM," ETC.

CHAPTER XIII.—A NEW HOME.

BOB still lingered on where he was, but his mind now was full of pleasant thoughts of Mr. and Mrs. Deveron and Master Edgar. Their kindness had cheered and warmed his heart, whilst their words had excited bright hopes within him. And though all these agreeable reflections did not quite drive away his feeling of hunger, yet he still kept to his resolve not to part with that bright sixpence, which, after looking at it long and almost lovingly, he slipped into his pocket for safety.

Almost at that moment a gentleman on horseback came riding up, and, stopping at the door of a house opposite, looked around for some one to hold his horse. Bob sprang forward to offer his services, which were accepted; and when the gentleman again came out a few minutes afterwards, he slipped some coppers into the boy's hand before riding off.

Bob was indeed in luck to-day; and as the coppers had no special value attaching to them, like the sixpence had, he at once went off to an eating-shop, to indulge in a meal which was breakfast and dinner all in one. Then he thought it must surely be time to be starting in search of Mr. Deveron's house.

It was situated about half or three-quarters of a mile out of the town, and stood back in its own grounds, with a long carriage-drive leading up to the door. At the entrance to the drive stood a pretty Gothic lodge, all covered with ivy and creepers, which hung over the rustic porch, and climbed up the latticed windows. Evergreens grew plentifully around, so that, though the tall trees were bare of leaves, there was something green to look upon, even in this wintry weather; whilst in the little garden a few pure white Christmas roses were rearing their lovely heads, and, in spite of all the cold ungenial weather, were expanding into beauty.

As Bob drew near a carriage passed through the gates, which were opened by a woman, who came out of the lodge on purpose. She did not immediately re-enter the house, but remained for a few moments looking about her, and then stooped to pick one of the Christmas roses.

Her face was so pleasant and kind-looking, that Bob felt encouraged to draw near and ask if this wasn't where Mr. Deveron lived.

"Yes," replied the woman, turning to look at him. "Do you want anything of him, my lad?"

"He told me to come out here this afternoon to speak to him. He thought p'raps as how he'd be able to find me some work," added Bob, with more unreserve than usual.

"Are you the boy he told me about then? The boy who stopped Master Edgar's pony?" asked the other, looking at him with interest.

Bob nodded his head.

"Come in here then, my lad," said Mrs. Heywood, leading the way in-doors. "Mr. Deveron said I was to keep you when you came; and he'd either speak to you himself, or ask my husband to see you. There, sit down," she continued, at the same time seating herself and taking up her knitting.

"And now tell me how it happened that Master Edgar's pony ran away, and you managed to stop it. I've never properly heard the rights of the story yet; but 'twas a brave thing of you, my lad! and a fortunate thing for you too: for Mr. and Mrs. Deveron will never forget it. You've made them your friends for life, if you'll only show yourself a deserving lad; for they aren't people to forget any service done them. And their hearts are bound up so in Master Edgar, that it makes me shudder whenever I think of the danger the little darling was in, with that pony of his running away. If any harm had come to him—but, there, I can't bear to think of that! only I've been giving thanks over and over again that somebody was at hand to come to his help. For he's the only child; so you may fancy how his papa and mamma dote on him; and he's such a darling, bless him, with his sweet little face and his loving ways, that we should all feel it pretty nigh as much as the parents if any harm came to him!"

Thus Mrs. Heywood talked on, as if for the purpose of setting Bob more at his ease; and her pleasant genial manner and kindly face were not without their effect upon him.

As he looked round upon the cheerful room, so neat and spotlessly clean, with a bright clear fire on the hearth before which a handsome black cat was sitting, and a pretty bay window, through the latticed panes of which the sun's rays were streaming, and reflecting themselves in the bright polish of the mahogany chest and table and comfortable Windsor chairs—as Bob looked upon all this, and then glanced at the neat figure and comely smiling face of the mistress of the house, who sat beside the fire busily knitting as she talked, he thought to himself that he had never seen any place to be compared to this pretty lodge, nor any person, except Mrs. Deveron, at all equal to his new friend.

After a little while a step was heard on the gravel outside; and Mrs. Heywood, who seemed to know in a moment whose step it was, rose to open the door.

"Is the boy come yet?" asked a man's voice.

"Yes, he's waiting here, come in," and Mrs. Heywood returned, ushering in a fine-looking man, who, Bob concluded, must be her husband.

He stood up, and pulled at his front lock of hair, by way of showing respect, whilst Mr. Heywood, looking kindly and yet searchingly at him, said, "So you are Bob Saunders, are you?"

"Yes, sir."

"And Mr. Deveron says you are wanting to find some work."

Bob nodded, and then glanced anxiously at the speaker, as if entreating him to say some work could be found.

"Well, I'm looking out for a boy to help about the garden and the grounds, and go on errands sometimes, in fact, do anything that is wanted, and make himself useful in any way. Should you like such a place?"

Bob's face expressed more than did his brief, "Aye, that I should, sir!" and Mr. Heywood, though not prepossessed with his appearance, yet remembering Mr. Deveron's wish, and moreover the part the lad had so lately acted, expressed himself willing to try him, and teach him what would be necessary for his work, provided he showed himself steady and industrious, and willing to be taught.

That settled, he told Bob he was to go up to the house, to speak to Mr. Deveron.

Bob's spirits and hopes were high, though it all seemed very unreal and like a dream, as he found himself walking along the beautifully kept and winding carriage-drive towards the great house, which, as he now caught sight of it, looked very grand and imposing. It was the finest he had ever seen; whilst the grounds, which stretched out all around, were most tastefully laid out, and in exquisite order.

It had frozen hard the night before, and the hoar frost still lay round about upon everything, marking out each blade of grass as well as each leaf of every shrub, with its own silvery touch of beauty. The sun was still shining brightly, for he had yet some distance to travel before he would be hidden from sight; and as his beams fell around, the delicate crystals of the hoar frost, which lay sprinkled on the ground as if a fairy shower of tiny gems had descended in the night, sparkled and glistened, and seemed to rejoice when they caught his rays.

Moreover, the road under foot was hard and crisp, and the sky overhead of a deep blue, whilst the air was clear and bracing, and everything combined to make Bob feel the exhilarating influences around him. He thought he had never enjoyed a walk so much, in spite of his shyness, which made him dread the task before him of knocking at the door of that great house—even though it were only the back door.

But to his relief he was spared that ordeal, for Mr. Deveron, who had seen him approaching, came to meet him by another path.

"So Heywood is willing to try you, I see, by his sending you up to me," he began. "Well, my lad, I hope you will show yourself willing and industrious, and then you will always find a friend in me, and in Mr. Heywood too, I am sure. Only you must try and remember all he tells you, for he is very particular. But I can assure you, my boy, you couldn't be under a better master; for if you do your best to please him, and make the most of your opportunities, he'll turn you out a thorough good gardener; and, in time, who knows but you might rise to be what he is—head gardener to some gentleman."

Mr. Deveron's smile was reflected on Bob's face; for these words had called up such bright pictures before his mind's eye, that he could not but smile with pleasure at the mere idea of them. To think of his ever having a nice little lodge like Mr. Heywood's to bring Johnnie to, where he could grow well and strong, whilst Bob maintained him by his work! Oh, how happy they would be together! and how many pets Johnnie could have, without the fear of losing them like the poor little dove. Why, the very ideas of such delights was enough to make him feel ready to work day and night to please his new master, or masters.

Then Mr. Deveron went on to say that as he did not seem to have much of a home, and as, moreover, it was best for him to be as near his work as possible, he had, at Mrs. Deveron's suggestion, asked Mr. Heywood if they would be willing to let him live with them, as they had no children of their own, and more rooms in the lodge than they used.

"Should you like that plan, my boy?"

Like it! No possible words could have half expressed Bob's intense satisfaction at the arrangement, which was so very far beyond anything he had ever hoped, or thought of.

"You must pay something out of your weekly wages towards your board, and I will make up the rest for the present. So we may consider the matter settled, as Heywood agrees to my proposal, and I know he won't meet with any opposition from his wife. You must try to be a good boy, Bob, and not give them cause to regret having consented to take you in."

Bob tried to stammer out some words of thanks to Mr. Deveron, but altogether failed to express one-twentieth part of the grateful feelings that were stirred within him. For what a prospect was opening before him! To live in that pretty lodge which he had admired so much that he had felt half disposed to envy the cat which seemed so much at home there; to work in those beautiful grounds under such a master as Mr. Heywood; to be constantly seeing that kind Mrs. Heywood who had spoken so pleasantly to him; and, moreover, sometimes, perhaps, catch a glimpse of Mr. and Mrs. Deveron and Master Edgar, and have a word from them! it all seemed such happiness that his heart felt quite full, whilst at the same time it was difficult to believe in it all. For that very morning he had stood hungry, homeless, friendless, and now home, friends, work, had all come to him. It must have been his Heavenly Friend who had sent them all. He had heard his cry that morning, and had taken pity on him. Oh, how kind of Him! how he must love Him in return!

(To be continued.)

"THE QUIVER" BIBLE CLASS.

303. Quote a passage which shows that the city of No was a very famous one.

304. What prophecy did Christ give as to the thorough destruction of Jerusalem?

305. What king was punished by God with a fearful sickness for two years on account of his idolatry?

306. It is a common saying, "He may run that readeth it." Where do we find this mentioned in the Bible?

307. What indignity was practised upon the servants of David whom he sent as an embassy to the King of the Ammonites?

308. In Luke xi. 12, it says, "Or if he shall ask an egg will he offer him a scorpion. In what way might this be possible?

309. Where is it implied that the moon has an injurious influence upon mankind?

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS ON PAGE 752.

291. Nehushtan (2 Kings xviii. 4).

292. Because St. Paul had cast out the evil spirit from a certain damsel who dwelt there, and who brought much gain to her masters by soothsaying (Acts xvi. 16—24).

293. God sent lions among them, which destroyed several of them (2 Kings xvii. 25).

294. Iddo, the Seer (2 Chronicles xii. 15).

295. "But prophesy not again any more at Bethel: for it is the king's chapel, and it is the king's court" (Amos vii. 13).

296. "But He that cometh after me is mightier than I, whose shoes I am not worthy to bear" (Matthew iii. 11; see also Mark i. 7, and Luke xiii. 16).

(Drawn by M. E. EDWARDS)

COMING BACK.

HERE let me rest! the air is sweet with clustered blossoms in their prime;
And golden arrows, bright and fleet, strike through the shades of beech and lime;
The splendour of the sunset lights
Lies warm upon the woodland heights.

The mass has thickened on the wall; between the chinks of crumbling stone
The burnished beetles slowly crawl. How long and rank the grass has grown,
And how the red geraniums burn
Beside wild plumes of waving fern!

Those roses, white as angel-wings, around my chamber-window clung,
And even now their fragrance brings thoughts of old dreams when life was young—
Old dreams! I think that unawares,
Such dreams were often changed to prayers.

God set me in a lowly vale, but I looked upward to the hills;
I can but climb, I said, and fail, content to fail if so
He wills;
But now, at times, methinks I stand
Too high above the sweet low land.

For when we rise, we leave below some things that we were fain to keep;
Beyond our early hopes we go, till triumph only makes us weep
For simple homely joys that crowned
Our path along the level ground.

Aye, I am glad to come again to this old home of other days;
But is it bliss or is it pain I meet in these familiar ways?
Ghosts of old faces seem to rise
Between me and the sunset skies.

Old voices call from walk to walk, now far away, now sweet and near,
Fragments of half-forgotten talk blend with the leaves' soft music here;
Half happy, and half grieved, I see
My bygone youth come back to me.

SARAH DOUDNEY

THE BRIDGE BETWEEN.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE TROUBLES OF CHATTY AND MOLLY," "THE DIN Y HOUSE AT KENSINGTON," "QUEEN MADGE," "AGAINST HERSELF," ETC., ETC., ETC.

CHAPTER XXX.—THE WAY HOME.

"LADY FINCH, do you sing still?" Adrian Fuller asked, that evening. They formed such a silent group, for Netta was tired and worn-out, and Mrs. Woodward was sad, and Dorothy was in the far corner, trying to hide her sorrow.

"No," she said, wearily.

"Dorothy, why don't you go and play," Mr. Woodward said.

"I will if you like," she said, and went slowly over to the piano. Then Netta rose.

"No, I want to sing," she said, and took the seat at the piano. "Go and sit in your corner again," she whispered; "I know all about it, dear."

"Oh, Netta," asked Dorothy, "how did you learn to feel and to be so unselfish?"

"I learnt the first long ago in secret," she answered, almost bitterly; "and the latter you taught me to wish to be—not that I ever shall," she added, as she began the prelude to her old song, "Jock o' Hazeldean."

A minute later, and the same song which had charmed her hearers in that same house many a time was heard again; but oh, the difference! There was something in the sound of the broken wheezy voice that once had been so beautiful, that brought the tears into the eyes of those who listened now. Then suddenly she stopped, and would have fallen back but for Adrian Fuller, who caught her and lifted her to the sofa, and Dorothy sprang forward and saw that the Beauty's favourite white wrap was stained with blood.

They carried her up-stairs, and sent for the doctor, and telegraphed for her husband, who came in hot haste. Not that he had ever been violently in love with his wife, for he had married more from the desire to possess a wife whose beauty and grace would do him credit than for any other reason; but he came, and was kind and tender.

"Do you know, Dorothy," Netta said, faintly, in one of those last days, "I have missed so much in life. I have had perfect sympathy with no one in life but you, and you never knew it till lately, dear. Stoop down and kiss me once more, Dorothy. Things might have been so different for me; but then the 'might have beens' are the saddest things in all our lives." Dorothy read to her, and tried to teach her all that she had learnt herself when Tortoiseshell was dying, and eagerly and gratefully the Beauty tried to learn the lesson ere it was too late. And so all the old worldliness died out of Netta's life, and the beauty of holiness—that beauty which was greater than any other she had ever worn—came into it; and when, a week or two later, Dorothy knelt by her sister's grave—for she never rose again—she was able to say through her tears, "Thank God she knew the way home before she died." The way home! as Dorothy called it. It is the sweetest knowledge we can gain. Our feet learn thankfully, in infancy, first to trace their way to our earthly father's home, and there is no rest, no peace, no joy in this wide world so great as that tranquil happiness which steals over us when our weary hearts first learn the way to God.

"Dorothy, your sister made no will," Sir George Finch said, a few weeks later; "but there was a thousand pounds her grandfather left, which she asked me to settle on you. She wished it, or part of it, invested in the purchase of this house. Who is the owner?"

"I do not know; a friend of Mr. Blakesley's."

"Could you write and ask him?" She hesitated;

but eager, and glad of the excuse, she wrote, only a formal little note, making the necessary inquiries; and then she waited days, and weeks, and months for the answer, but none came, and at last Dorothy got tired of waiting, and angry and impatient. At length a message came to her through his aunts, "Tell Miss Woodward I will write soon." That was all; but still no letter came, and Adrian Fuller was always with her; and she could see, though he was silent, all he felt; and so the winter passed, and spring went by, and summer came again.

(To be continued.)

THE BUILDER OF THE TEMPLE.

BY THE REV. W. W. TULLOCH, M.A.

FOR so great a king, for so prosperous and important an empire, for so splendid a capital, great and beautiful buildings were needed. First in importance and grandeur was the Temple. This great building, with which the name of Solomon is indelibly associated, may be said to be the great work of his reign. His father had cherished the idea of building a great house to Jehovah ever since he had conquered Jebus. The new capital seemed to him the very place for it; and, with this in view, he had the ark borne to Mount Zion. Whether we believe the chronicler, when he ascribes to David the planning of the Temple to its most minute details, or not, it is quite certain that some steps towards its building had already been taken during the reign of that monarch. Its site—the threshing-floor of Araunah, on Mount Moriah, not otherwise particularly suitable, but remarkable for its sanctity in connection with the great plague—had been marked out by David. Materials for its construction had already been partially gathered in, and moneys collected in large sums. The all-essential help of Hiram, if not already employed, had been at least made secure. Besides Tyrian workmen, Solomon employed Phœnicians from the city of Gebal. Hiram, the son of a widow of the tribe of Naphtali, and of a Phœnician father, presided over the metal-work. The preliminary work was executed in Lebanon and other places, the entire force employed being reckoned at 70,000 porters, 80,000 wood and stone-cutters; over these were 3,300 overseers. Many of the workmen were "strangers"—Canaanites—whose lives were made "bitter with all hard bondage." As the work began to multiply, the forced aid of the Israelites themselves was however called in. This compelling of so many men (1 Kings v. 15; 2 Chron. ii. 17, 18) to leave their homes, and engage in this work, could hardly have been effected without a great deal of murmuring and dissatisfaction. The chief work was done in the quarries. The stones were there hewn, and fitted to one another, so that when the building was begun, there was "neither hammer, nor axe, nor any tool of iron heard in the house." The very silence in which the building was proceeded with was reverently vocal. It seemed as if it were the work of Nature—

"Like some tall palm, the noiseless fabric sprang."

The foundation stone was laid in the month Zif (May), in the fourth year of Solomon's reign, and the building was completed in the month Bul (November), in the eleventh year, about 1005 B.C., according to the received chronology. As every one knows, it was erected on the model of the Tabernacle, and when completed, it presented an appearance singularly unlike any modern building. In it were to be seen the influences of Phœnician, Assyrian, and Egyptian architecture, while "the pleasant precincts, the means of ablution, and the almost universal absence of imagery, can be found nowhere but in the sanctuaries of the only other existing Semitic religion, the mosques of Islam" (Dean Stanley).

The dedication of the Temple took place in the twelfth year of Solomon's reign, on the 14th day of the month Ethanim (October), and the ceremonies in connection with it were joined on to, or rather immediately preceded those of the great national Festival of Tabernacles; the united celebrations lasting altogether for a fortnight.

The sacred tent, the ancient brazen altar, the candlestick, the table of shewbread, the brazen serpent—how many associations would they all recall!—were borne in procession from the lofty heights of Gibeon. On Mount Zion those bearing these time-honoured relics were met by another band, carrying for the last time still older memorials of the old life of their race—the ark of acacia-wood covered with the small winged figures. As the Levites, clad in their snow-white garments bore it on their shoulders, the air was dark with clouds of incense, and the roads ran red with the blood of innumerable sacrifices. In that ark lay the two slabs of granite from Mount Sinai, upon which the Commandments were written, and no doubt it was an object of awful interest and sacred reverence to the wondering crowd. Onwards, through the people and into the Temple, it was borne, to "the place of its rest" (Ps. cxxxii. 8—14), and received under the shadow of the wings of the golden cherubim. The sound of music was in the air, and voices, jubilant and clear, gave forth joyous bursts of song. Perhaps that noble hymn was sung—"Lift up your heads, O ye gates, and be ye lift up ye everlasting doors, and the King of Glory shall come in!" and we know that musicians and singers were "as one," as they burst forth with the refrain—"O praise the Lord, for He is good, for His mercy endureth for ever" (2 Chron. v. 13). Through all the pageantry and magnificent spectacle of that day the king was the chief spring of movement, and the chief centre of interest. On the east of the altar he sat enthroned, and watched all the proceedings. As the priests came forth from depositing the ark in its resting-place, and a thick darkness settled over the Temple, he came forth, and breaking into praise, blessed all the people as they stood before him. A mysterious awe was in his heart as he saw God in the darkness, and felt that at last a settled worship was to be the portion of his people. And now he turns to the west, and dropping on his knees in the then novel attitude of supplication, with hands stretched to heaven, and eyes gazing upward, he broke forth in prayer. Long and earnestly he prays, dwelling on the eternal incomprehensible nature of God, His infinite "far-awayness," yet ever near His people to rule and govern them, to hear their prayer, to give them all things that are good for them, and daring to hope that the "Divine mercies would be drawn down on the nation by the concentration of the national devotion." Who can doubt but that the great heart of a great man was then poured forth in words worthy even of that never-to-be-forgotten scene. Oh that he could have learned the yet higher law, that obedience is better than sacrifice! He then rose from his knees, turned toward the east, and once more gave the people his benediction. For a fortnight the services of the festivals lasted, and at the end of that time he received himself the blessing of that motley crowd of worshippers, who went back "to their tents" with songs of joy and thanksgiving on their lips, thankful "for all the good the Lord had done to David His servant, and to Solomon, and to Israel His people" (1 Kings viii. 60).

Next to the Temple perhaps the building of greatest importance was the palace. The house occupied by David seemed too poor and small for the dignity and immense treasures of Solomon. Accordingly, he built a magnificent edifice, in keeping with the grandeur of everything about him, probably upon the southern continuation of the hill on which the Temple was built. It was not completed for eight years after the dedication of the Temple, though it was begun about the same time. Like the sacred edifice, it was distinguished by the lavish use of costly ornament. The beams of its roof, the supporting pillars, the panels of its walls, were all of cedar. In its great hall stood the throne of ivory overlaid with gold, where Solomon sat in judgment, his feet resting on a golden footstool. Here he lived in royal state, surrounded by all the luxuries that could be obtained, and all the means of sumptuous pleasure which could be devised. His drinking-cups were of gold—"none were of silver." His fare was so costly and varied, his servants so numerous and so richly attired, as to excite the wonder and admiration of the Queen of Sheba. His gardens were extensive, beautiful, and fragrant, full of rare plants and splendid trees. Thither the king would drive at dawn, "the scarlet shafts of sunrise" glittering upon his splendid equipage, glossy horses of great swiftness, himself clothed in white, his magnificent retinue of attendants clad in purple, their long dark hair dusted over with gold and streaming behind them. There he loved to pass some of his leisure, and while he enjoyed to the full, as we know he did, the beauties of Nature, the noise of fresh cool water made music in his ears.

Amid all his royal magnificence, amid all the incessant superintendance which his building would require, amid all his plans for the prosperity of the nation and the welfare of his people, he had however time not only to be a sharer in the intellectual development of his age, but to a great extent to lead it and give it character. Of that golden age of commercial prosperity and of intellectual achievement, he was not only, as Dean Stanley remarks, the Augustus but the Aristotle. "God gave him wisdom and understanding exceeding much, and largeness of heart, even as the sand which is on the seashore" (1 Kings iv. 29). The nation had struggled, and had struggled manfully and well, to attain its present position, and in doing so not only had the foundations of historic, legal, and perhaps also scientific literature, been laid, but the sublimest heights of poetry been reached. But now that it has time to compose itself, to pause and regard its position from the plains of peace and prosperity, it ceases to be so intensely subjective. Thoughtful men turned their attention to the position of the nation as a nation, to themselves as individual members of it, to the daily life lived under their eyes; they began to philosophise; they had time to study the intellectual development of other nations, and even to endeavour to rival them in their special features. The divine desire to know, to discover, to "find out," took possession of them. It took possession of Solomon; and the desire in his case was united with the creative and assimilating power of genius, and fostered and stimulated by all the intellectual activities of the time in which he lived. It is difficult for us to discover how far his proverbial wisdom has been identified with the great leap that all thought took in his time, nor can we tell how much he may have owed to wise men about him, whose names have not come down to us, but we see no reason to doubt the verdict of the inspired writer, "Solomon's wisdom excelled the wisdom of all the children of the East country and all the wisdom of Egypt, for he was wiser than all men" (1 Kings iv. 30, 31). His knowledge was so extensive and varied, his spirit of inquiry so restless, that he delighted in the propounding and answering of those "dark sayings" so much in vogue at that time, and at this kind of "Socratic dialogue" he appears to have been unequalled, and may be taken as the first possessor of that true philosophic spirit which, from that day to ours, has won such varied triumphs and achieved so much. This same eager spirit led him to become the founder of Hebrew science. "He spake of trees, from the cedar tree that is in Lebanon, even unto the hyssop that springeth out of the wall: he spake also of beasts, and of fowl, and of creeping things, and of fishes" (1 Kings iv. 33). No one can read his works without noticing what a close and acute observer he was of all things animate and inanimate. "In the brightness of his youth," too, he sang. "His songs were a thousand and five, or five thousand" (1 Kings iv. 32, Heb. and LXX.). The Song of Songs is aglow with the poetry and passion of life; in it his heart "leaps up" to the manifold beauty in the world. As we read it we seem to see the earth carpeted with the flowers of spring: we enjoy their exquisite colour, we inhale their fragrant perfume, we listen to the singing of a thousand birds, and the voice of the turtle is heard in the land. Exquisite as it is as a sweet fresh pastoral, its interest is no less dramatic, for in it human passion runs its course, and human voices are heard through its shifting scenes. The 2nd, 45th, 72nd, and 127th Psalms are, by their titles or subjects, supposed to be his, and he must have done much in modelling others for the Temple service, the magnificent music of which is due to his love of the praise of God.

ENGLISH SACRED POETRY.

WITH the venerable names of Drummond, Crashaw, Donne, and Herbert, our sketch of the history of Early English sacred poetry will conclude. Not inappropriately, for with them and their contemporaries died the religious poetry of the old world. When they had passed away a new epoch commenced. With them faded away much of the massive splendour, the wealth of imagery and illustration, the brilliant rhetoric, so dazzling but at the same time so subdued and stately, the condensation, energy, and pregnant thought, which characterised the style of our earlier poetry, the ecstatic enthusiasm, the inspiration and sublime purpose which characterised its spirit. In Milton English sacred poetry found its culmination; but we have ventured to exclude him from the illustrious quartette whose names stand at the head of this paper; first, because he may be said to form an epoch by himself, as he had no immediate models and no immediate imitators; secondly, because it would be impossible to do him justice in the few lines we could devote to him here, and as most of our readers are more or less intimately acquainted with his works, we prefer to leave them free to their own opinions, and to discuss claims less popular but scarcely less worthy of consideration.

The recorded lives of most poets have been unromantic and uneventful; but the lives of Drummond and Donne have each a pathetic story attached to them. William Drummond was born on the 13th of December, 1585, and was educated at the High School, Edinburgh. Like many of his tuneful predecessors, he was intended for the law, but, like them, found the Muses more attractive. The death of his father, in 1610, put him in possession of that beautiful spot, which has always been associated with his name, Hawthornden. Its very title is redolent of poetry. Here the young poet devoted himself to literature, penned most of his graceful sonnets, and received the visits of his friends. Hither too, in 1618, Ben Jonson made his celebrated pilgrimage from London, walking the whole distance; but the two poets appear to have met each other with more affection and enthusiasm than they preserved. Ben Jonson's insolent intolerance and overbearing dogmatism disgusted the sensitive sonnetteer, and he has been accused of traducing his visitor's memory. Every poet must have his heroine, and Drummond fell in love with a very lovely girl—Mary Cuningham, daughter of the laird of Barns. She appears to have been all an idealist could picture—a beautiful face, a graceful figure, and most engaging manners, won the admiration of all who saw her; her character corresponded with her features. Drummond was fortunate enough to win her affections, and their nuptial day was fixed. But she died suddenly of a fever. This fearful calamity sunk deep into the poet's heart; he was never the same again. His poetry took a deep tinge of melancholy; he became a changed man. For several years he attempted to alleviate his sorrow by travel, and appears to have passed much of his time on the Continent. At last he returned to Hawthornden, and, in 1632, married a woman of humble extraction; but his works show that his heart was in the grave of his first love. He died December 4th, 1649, in his sixty-fourth year. With his secular poems, which consist for the most part of sonnets, we have nothing to do. His principal sacred poems are "Urania," a series of thirteen short poems; "Flowers of Sion," a large collection all sacred; and, inserted among his posthumous verses, "Divine Poems." These latter are for the most part hymns. We would particularly invite the attention of our readers to these little works of Drummond; they are genuinely beautiful, will amply repay perusal, and are not half so well known as they ought to be. For instance, take the commencement of his Hymn of the Ascension, you might imagine you were reading a Christian Pindar:—

"Bright portals of the sky,
Embossed with sparkling stars,
Doors of Eternity,
With diamantine bars,
Your arras rich uphold,
Loose all your bolts and springs,
Ope wide your leaves of gold,
That in your roofs may come the King of kings!"

Drummond is often very happy in terse aphorisms, as:—

"Trust flattering life no more, redeem time past,
And live each day as if it were thy last."

"Wisest death makes us our errors know."

Such weighty verses as the following remind one of Shakespeare:—

"Gigantic frames held wonders rarely strange,
Like spiders' webs are made the sport of days,
All only constant is in constant change;
What done is, is undone and, when undone,
Into some other fashion doth it range:
Thus goes the floating world beneath the moon."

But having introduced Drummond, we must pass on to our next poet, Richard Crashaw. Richard Crashaw, the most eloquent and glowing of all our sacred poets, was born about 1616, was educated at the Charterhouse, elected a scholar of Pembroke Hall, Cambridge, in 1632, and became a Fellow of Peterhouse, in 1637, having taken his degree in 1633. Of his subsequent life we know nothing connectedly, and very little with any certainty. He was ejected from his fellowship during the great rebellion, in 1644; and, alas! embracing the Roman Catholic religion, he betook himself to Paris. In 1646, it is said that Cowley, then secretary to Queen Henrietta Maria, found him in great destitution, and that the queen having given the unfortunate poet letters of introduction to Cardinal Palotta, at Rome, Crashaw became his secretary, and was subsequently appointed to a canonry at Loretto. He died there somewhere about 1650. Fire, splendour, and a gorgeousness of expression and imagery almost Oriental are the chief characteristics of Crashaw's genius. But delicate and tender, full of piety, zeal, and fervour, as his poems are, they are perverted by that conceited style of writing so common in his day which, originating among the Euphuists, tainted English poetry for more than half a century. Almost all Crashaw's poems are religious; the titles describe them—"Steps to the Temple," "Sacred Poems," "Epigrammata Sacra," among which is the original, of the celebrated verse about turning the water into wine.

"Lympha pudica Deum vidit et erubuit."
(The modest water saw its God and blushed.)

As the poet had become a Roman Catholic when he penned these effusions, many of them are either addressed or refer to the Virgin Mary, Mary Magdalene, or to other members of the Roman Catholic hagiology. It is impossible to do justice to Crashaw by quotations, but we submit two or three short extracts which will give an idea of his fervid highly-coloured style and marvellous music. Of the Infant Saviour he writes:—

"WELCOME.

"To many a rarely-tempered kiss,
That breathes at once both maid and mother,
She sings Thy tears asleep, and dips
Her kisses in Thy weeping eye;
She spreads the red leaves of Thy lips
That in their buds yet blushing lie."

Perhaps one of his most striking poems is the one with the title—"On a Prayer Book sent to Mrs. M. R."

"Here's a friend shall fight for you,
Hold but this book before your heart,
Let prayer alone to play his part;
Dear soul, be strong,
Mercy will come ere long,
And bring her bosom full of blessings,
Flowers of never-fading graces,
To make immortal dressings
For worthy souls."

This is how he describes the ecstacy of the soul when God's power falls on it:—

"Amorous languishments, luminous trances,
Sights which are not seen with eyes;
Spiritual and soul-piercing glances,
Whose pure and subtle lightning flies
Home to the heart, and sets the house on fire,
And melts it down in sweet desire,
Yet doth not stay
To ask the window's leave to pass that way."

His hymn on the Epiphany, and on the name of Jesus, are both splendid compositions, and will repay careful perusal. Crashaw is the minstrel of Divine ecstacy, and cannot fail to be the treasured companion of any who may share the same religious fervour and impetuous zeal for God's glory.

With Dr. Donne—the great leader of the metaphysical school of poetry, the celebrated satirist, the eloquent Dean of St. Paul's, so eccentric, that he began life by defending suicide, and ended it by dressing himself in his winding-sheet and rehearsing his own funeral in his bed-chamber—we are most of us acquainted from Walton's life of him. As a boy he was so precocious, that in his tenth year he was sent to Oxford, where he greatly distinguished himself. From Oxford he passed to Cambridge, it being common in those days for a student to be entered at both Universities. Some time after this he travelled about on the Continent, and on his return to England became private secretary to Lord Elsemore. He did not enter the ministry till late in life, and died dean of St. Paul's, in 1631. The early life of this staid divine was marked by an interesting romance, which Walton tells with chuckling sympathy. While Donne was in the household of Lord Elsemore, he fell in love with his niece, the daughter of Sir George Moor, by whom his affection was returned. Sir George, not thinking this a suitable match, did all in his power to break it off; but the young couple, after vicissitudes enough to furnish a novel, were finally united. Shortly after the marriage, when Donne went abroad on his travels, occurred the famous ghost story, which may be found at length in Walton's "Life of Donne." Most of the dean's poetry is of the secular order; what concerns us are his "Divine Poems." These are weighty, and often eloquent, though still oftener perverted by those conceits which have made Donne's name a proverb. We would call attention especially to "La Corona." "The Litanie" also merits attention. As these poems are rare we cite one as a specimen:—

"A HYMN TO GOD THE FATHER.

I.

"Wilt Thou forgive that sin where I begun,
Which was my sin, though it were done before?
Wilt Thou forgive that sin through which I run,
And do run still, though still I do deplore?
When Thou hast done Thou hast not done,
For I have more.

II.

"Wilt Thou forgive that sin which I have won
Others to sin, and made my sins their door?
Wilt Thou forgive that sin which I did shun
A year or two, but wallow'd in a score?
When Thou hast done Thou hast not done,
For I have more.

III.

"I have a sin of fear that, when I've spun
My last thread, I shall perish on the shore;
But swear by Thyself that at my death Thy Son
Shall shine as He shines now and heretofore;
And, having done that, Thou hast done,
I fear no more."

Holy George Herbert—who knows not him? Who has not hung over honest Izaak Walton's memoir of him, pure, sweet, and limpid as the life it describes? We most of us know the events of Herbert's comparatively uneventful life—how, after being educated at Westminster School, he went up to Cambridge, and became a Fellow of his college and orator of the University; how he then went down into the country, had a romantic marriage, and finally became Rector of Bemerton near Salisbury; and how, three years after, he died peacefully and gradually, of a consumption, aged forty years. Such a life as Herbert's is not a record of transitory incidents, it is essentially the record of a spiritual life. The few years he remained on earth sufficed to give his brother men the picture of a great, true, simple character; and the pen of Walton has preserved the picture of that character for all time. The significance of a man's life is only indirectly written in his surroundings and in the incidents which befal him on the way; his true life is the record of the influence he has on his fellow-men. It has often happened, unfortunately, that there is as much dissimilarity between the actual life of a man of letters and the spirit of his works as there is between the brightness of the day and the darkness of the night. Herbert is a happy exception. There was an exquisite harmony between his deeds and his words. Walton's truthful transcript seems to be throwing the poet's works into a concrete form. That refined piety, pristine simplicity—quaint perhaps sometimes, but charming always—that thorough unworldliness combined with the deepest sympathy with the feelings of his fellow-men, the tenderness, the purity, which characterised Herbert as a boy, as a college tutor, as a public functionary, as a country clergymen, are faithfully reflected in his "Divine Poems." These beautiful compositions, as they are the most popular, so they are the most fascinating in the whole body of our sacred literature. Without the obscurity and occasional roughness of Donne, without the fierce fervour of Crashaw, they breathe the gentleness of the bird to which the Holy Spirit loved to compare itself. They are, moreover, as various as they are excellent, not monotonously characterised by one tone, but diversified by every species of utterance: now marching along grave and stately, as in "The Church Porch" or "The Sacrifice;" now light and joyous, as in "Praise." What could be more charming than his lines on "Virtue?" beginning—

"Sweet day! so cool, so calm, so bright,
The bridal of the earth and sky,
The dew shall weep thy fall to-night,
For thou must die," &c.

What more condensed, thoughtful, and happy than the poem entitled "The Pulley"? What more lovely than the verses on "Peace"? But we have no space for more allusions, and can scarcely conclude this paper more appropriately than by advising the reader who has followed us thus far to turn to Herbert and read for himself the poems to which allusion has been made. In Herbert and in many other of our early sacred poets, there is, as we have endeavoured to show, a rich spring of the truest poetry; much that fulfils the highest purpose of song, to exhort and encourage, to charm and cheer. The beauties of these poets are not all on the surface, but need patience to discover, and reflection to enjoy. Herbert and Drummond would do honour to any literature, and, once thoroughly appreciated, will be life-long worthy companions. At a time when the separation between secular and religious poetry is so wide, and becoming, alas! every day wider, it is a blessed privilege to be able to fall back on these old poets who, for splendid genius, healthy tone, and mere literary excellence, are a match—and more than a match—for those who are so ostentatiously not fighting in the Lord's van.

The purpose of these imperfect sketches will be fully answered if, at their suggestion, any reader shall be induced to turn to the authors themselves.

GRANDFATHER.

GRANDFATHER sits by his cottage door—
The passionate heat of his day is o'er—
A reflex light on his sweet old face
From the nearing heaven and the crown of grace.

There is peace in his eye and calm in his breast,
From a hope on high, and a heart at rest;
His evening sky has its golden bars,
And his "gloaming of life" will be full of stars.

He has done with toil, he has done with care;
His life itself is a restful prayer;
And no dark doubt finds a resting place
In the reverent light on his aged face.

The children round him are bright at play,
He smiles with a smile as bright as they;
There's not a cloud on the first or the last,
With them 'tis to come, with him it is past.

From the noonday turmoil, when cares increase,
To look at his angel-face is peace—
Like a sweet benediction on all my pains,
And a giving of thanks that a rest remains.

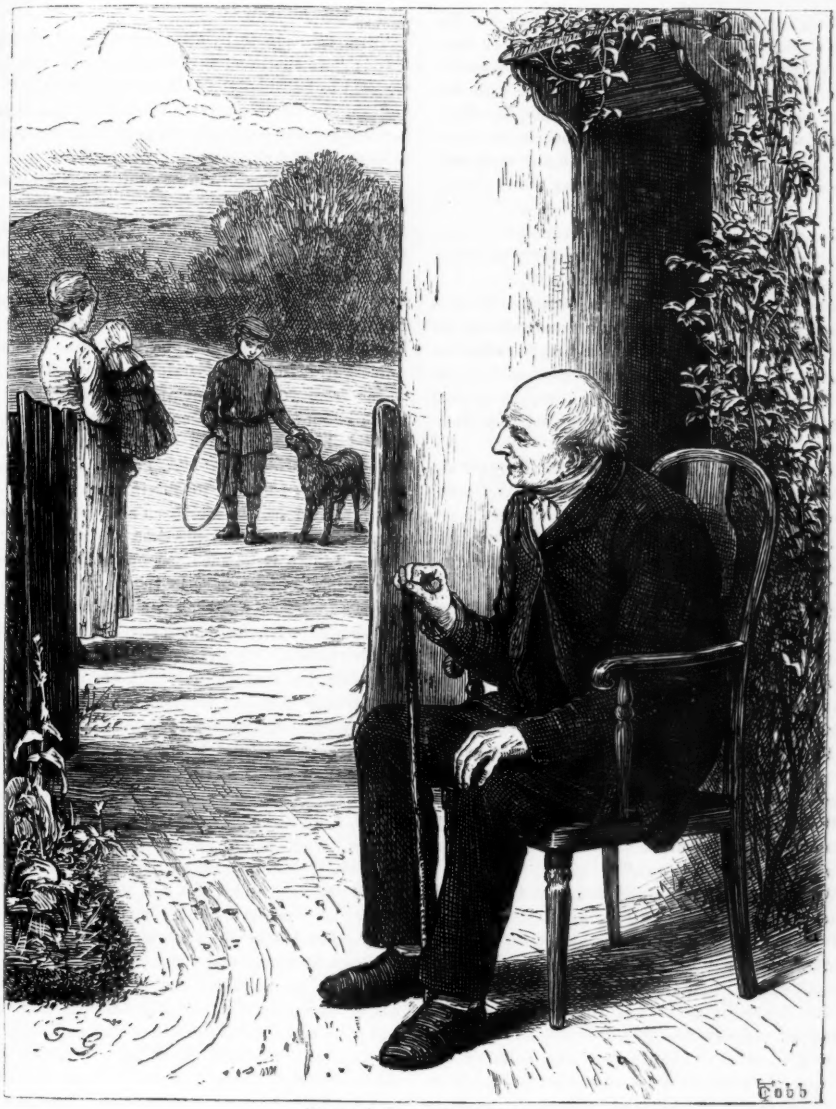
I know the reason that makes him so—
He taught me the secret long ago—
Trust God and walk in the way upright,
And the evening hour will be peaceful light.

Dear old man! may the beams that shine
On his evening hour be as bright on mine;
May the light of the nearing heaven on his face
Be as calm on mine when his steps I trace.

J. H.

STILL AND DEEP.

BY F. M. F. SKENE, AUTHOR OF "TRIED," "ONE LIFE ONLY," ETC.



CHAPTER LV.

MARY DE L'ISLE carried out her plan of summoning nurse Parry to her aid, on behalf of Mrs. Brant, and two or three days later she and her husband drove to the railway station to meet their old friend, who had telegraphed her consent to the request.

Many of the Italians who were sauntering about in expectation of the passing excitement to be found in the arrival of the train, watched with admiring eyes the pleasant picture presented by the young couple, as they stood side by side on the platform waiting for its appearance. Bertrand had quite recovered his good looks, as well as his strength and activity; and although his bronzed complexion still bore traces of the open-air life he had led during the campaign, yet his handsome face had regained all its brightness of expression, and the somewhat massive proportions of his stalwart frame contrasted well with the grace and delicacy of the pretty figure by his side. Mary did indeed look fair and lovely as the white rose, to which his father always likened her, and his blue eyes shone with joy and pride as he turned them on her each time she spoke to him with her low soft voice.

"Oh, there she is! Look, Bertrand, does it not make you think of the old days at home to see her dear kind face again!" said Mary, as she caught sight of Mrs. Parry.

"Yes, indeed; I can recognise the little twinkling eyes behind her spectacles even at this distance," exclaimed Bertrand, and they hurried forward to meet her as the train drew up in the station, while she, with beaming countenance and incoherent ejaculations of delight, almost precipitated herself from the carriage in her eagerness to join them. No sooner, however, was she fairly landed on the platform, by the aid of Bertrand's strong arm, than the good woman fell into the wild state of perturbation and flurry which was her normal condition at a railway station, and it was not until the De L'Isles had placed her comfortably at rest in their own rooms at the hotel that she was able to hold any rational conversation with them.

(Drawn by TOWNELEY GREEN.)

"Grandfather sits by his cottage door."—p. 792.

"Well, my dears!" she exclaimed, when she had made a good dinner, and was ensconced in an easy-chair in front of the sofa where they were seated, "it is an untold happiness to me to be with you again; and you look so bright and bonny, my Mary, that it does my heart good to see you; at the same time I must tell you I never came to any work with a worse will in my life, and that for more reasons than one."

"Oh, nurse, I am very sorry to hear that!" said Mary, "and surprised too, for generally you are so kind and ready to help any one who is ill."

"Yes, my darling, when it is a Christian person, and not a piece of painted falseness and selfishness; I can tell you Mrs. Laura Brant is just the very last in the world I want to nurse or be good to. I have been hearing about her. I know that she is your worst enemy, my Mary, as well as poor Mr. Pemberton's."

"Not now, dear nurse," said gentle Mary; "she is much changed, and will be very different for the future from what she has ever been before, I am sure; and, besides, she is in sorrow and suffering, so we must forget everything but that she requires our help."

"Ah, that is just like you!" said nurse Parry, nodding her head. "I don't pretend to have an angelic temper, and to be always forgiving and forgetting; but somehow you never fail to make me seem almost as sweet as yourself when there is need of kindness to be shown to any one, and I dare say it will be the same this time; but Mrs. Brant will be very much mistaken if she thinks I have come to her willingly."

"What other reason had you for not wishing to undertake this task, nurse?" asked Bertrand; "you said you had more than one."

"Well, my dear boy, I did not like leaving the Brunots, the children are still very sadly."

"I did not know that any of them were ill," said Mary, anxiously; "I would not have asked you to come if I had thought they required nursing."

"Nor do they; it is not that they need, but country air and change; they are very low and weak, one and all of them, but especially Valerie; she has never got over the shock to her nerves which she received that sad day when she witnessed Mr. Pemberton's death. She fell into such a melancholy unnatural state for a child after you went away that I really should not have been able to leave her now at all if it had not been for Mr. Davenant."

"Charlie Davenant! has he been with you?" exclaimed Bertrand.

"Yes; I have not had time to tell you about him yet," said nurse Parry, "though I am sure I have been talking as fast as I could" (which she certainly had). "He has been with us for a week, and I left him with the Brunots; but there is quite a pretty story about his first visit to the house, which you will like to hear."

"Let us have it by all means then," said Bertrand; "we shall feel as if we were the good children we used to be when you told us tales long ago."

"Ah, Mr. Bertrand," said the old woman, shaking her head, "Mary was always good, but you were as full of mischief as ever you could be."

"And so I am still, nurse; but never mind that, let us hear your story."

"Well, my dears, it was about a week ago that he came. I heard some one shown by the servant into the outer room. I went in to see who it was, and there was a pleasant-looking young Englishman, who told me his name was Charles Davenant. Then he said he was sure I must be nurse Parry, from the descriptions he had often had of me from you. I remembered having heard you speak of him, Mary, so I asked him to sit down, and he did, but he was in a great hurry to ask some question, and he said, 'Mrs. Parry, I have come all the way from England to obtain some news of Miss Trevelyan; I have never been able to hear how she passed through the terrible time of the siege.' 'Ah,' says I, 'there is no such person as Miss Trevelyan any longer,' but I was sorry the moment I had said it, for he went as white as a sheet, and caught me by the arm, crying out, 'Oh, surely, surely, it cannot be! is it possible she has really gone quite away from this weary, wicked world!' 'No, no,' says I, 'she is safe enough with her husband; but she is married now, and she has become Madame de L'Isle.' 'Married!' says he, 'and to her own true love; for I suppose you mean it is Bertrand Lisle that has got her.' Then he drew a long breath, and said, heartily, 'Well, I am right glad of it, for now I hope she'll be happy, though she can be my bright particular star no more.' 'No, indeed,' says I, 'she is nobody's star but Bertrand's, and I can tell you she is a countess now.' 'A countess!' cries he, 'she is fit to be a queen, and better than a queen. There never was anybody like her, and there never will be!' and with that he asked a great many questions about where you were going to live, and Bertrand's property and title, and I answered them all; and then, when he was quite satisfied about Mary, he said to me, 'And now, Mrs. Parry, will you tell me where I can find John Pemberton? I want to see him very much.' You may fancy it gave me quite a turn to hear him say that, without a notion of the truth, so I answered, hastily like, 'You'll have to wait till you get to heaven before you can see John Pemberton, Mr. Davenant,' and the poor young fellow gave a great cry. 'You don't mean to tell me he is dead, Mrs. Parry! after all his trial and sorrow it would be too sad!' But I was obliged to tell him it was unhappily true, you know; and when he had heard the story of his death he fairly broke down, and sobbed like a child, till it made my heart ache to hear him. He was sitting at the table with his head laid down upon his folded arms, and he was just opposite the door of the inner room, and presently he raised himself to ask me some other question, and lifted his eyes, and there, in the doorway, stood little Valerie Brunot, in a blaze of light from the sunshine streaming down on her out of the window behind, with her dress shining white and glistening, and her hair all golden, like a glory round her head, and she was looking straight at him, with her great clear eyes, and her beautiful young face so solemn and tender; he stared at her for a minute like a man in a dream, and then whispered to me, 'What is it, Mrs. Parry? is it an angel?' but before I could answer Valerie began walking forward slowly towards him, and she came and stood in front of him as he drew his chair back from the table, and said, in her sweet clear voice, 'Did you love Mr. Pemberton, sir?' 'Oh, I did indeed,' he said, 'he was my dearest friend.' 'Then I will love you,' she said, and she put her two little hands in his, and he stooped down and kissed them.

"Then she sat down by his side, and said, 'Now I will comfort you—though I am glad you cried for my dear Mr. Pemberton; but none of us must cry for him any more now, for he is happy, happier than any of us, safe at the feet of the dear Lord Jesus," and she bowed her pretty head as she said the sacred Name. Well, my dears, Mr. Davenant kept looking at her as if he really did think she was an angel out of heaven, and from that moment those two became such friends as never was. He asked me if he could lodge in the house, and I got him a room, and there he has been ever since. He has done Valerie all the good in the world, taking up her time and attention, and making her forget her sad thoughts. They walk out together, and she helps him with his French, which is worse than mine, and that's saying a good deal, and he is ever so fond of her; he seemed delighted when I told him I left her quite in his care—for her father is out all day selling his Bibles, and her mother is but a poor creature at the best of times."

"I have no doubt he will be kind to her," said Bertrand, "since you have often told me, Mary, what a good fellow he is; but it is seldom a young man will take so much trouble about a child under any circumstances."

"I am not surprised at it when the child is Valerie Brunot; there is a peculiar charm in her character which has its effect on every one who knows her," said Mary; "but I am so glad, dear nurse, that Mr. Davenant came to take care of her just in time to set you free. You must rest here quietly to-night, and then to-morrow I hope you will come with me to Mrs. Brant."

CHAPTER LVI.

Lurline had been moved by the De L'Isles to more comfortable rooms before the arrival of Mrs. Parry, and it was therefore to a large airy apartment, where the open windows let the light fall freely upon the invalid, that Mary conducted her old nurse the morning after her arrival. True to her loyal devotion towards the De L'Isles, whom she believed Laura to have cruelly injured, the good woman grumbled at the task before her all the way from the hotel, and continued to grumble as she went up the stairs to the very door of the sick room; but the moment her eyes fell on the wan mournful face of the sufferer all her unwonted sternness gave way, and her kind heart went back with a great revulsion of feeling to its natural compassionateness and ready sympathy; and when Mary, with her usual quiet tact, placed the fragile neglected infant in her arms, the victory over her motherly instinct was complete; in an instant she was lavishing endearments on it, and tending it with an artistic skill which brought a smile even to Laura's pale lips, while she became so completely engrossed by its various requirements that she heard nothing of the conversation which was soon commenced between Mary and her friend. Two or three days had passed since that eventful evening when Lurline first heard of the death of the man whose ill-fated love for her had been indeed strong as death, and might be said to shed its light upon her even yet from the very darkness of the grave, and she had said no word to Mary of what might be passing in her mind as regarded that conversion of her own soul to love and truth for which she had promised so earnestly to strive; yet there were many indications that her thoughts were dwelling on it anxiously, and her manner was much more subdued and humble than it had ever been in all her life before. She was slowly improving in health, and it was quite plain now that she was likely to recover completely under the tender care which surrounded her; but on this morning, when Mary asked her how she had slept, Laura answered that she had passed a very restless night.

"Thinking, always thinking, Mary, till my brain reels and my heart is so weary. I seem possessed by my past life, it is continually passing in review before me, with the light from the Sun of Righteousness bringing out in hideous aspect all its wickedness and treachery and selfishness. I long, I pine, for pardon and peace, but I seem as one dead. I have no power to enter into that faith and love which John Pemberton so earnestly desired for me. I do as you told me, Mary, I appeal to the merciful Christ direct, I scarce cease to call on Him night and day; but it is with me as with the disciples of Baal, there is no voice nor any that answers, sometimes I think that even the prayers which rose from that pure heart of which I was so unworthy, cannot be heard for such as I have been."

"They have been heard," said Mary, softly, "of that I am very sure, and when it shall seem good to the Most Merciful He will answer them; do you remember how He said even to those whom He knew were about to forsake and deny Him, 'I will not leave you comfortless, I will come to you?' and to you too, Laura, in an hour when you think not the Master will come."

"I trust it may be so," said Lurline, with a heavy sigh; "but, Mary, one idea has come to me on which I should like to act if you will help me with your advice; it seems to me, that perhaps I have no right to expect that I can be permitted to win even faith or hope until I have given some proof that I mean in future to try and do the will of that God whose mercy I am seeking. I seem likely to live now, and I must come to some decision as to my manner of existence in the years to come. I want you to tell me what you think it would be my duty to do."

"I can have very little doubt on that point; it seems to me perfectly clear."

"But wait, Mary!" exclaimed Laura, with a good deal of feverish anxiety in her tone, "you do not know yet what possibilities there are for me; it is certain that I cannot return to England, for my poor father is dead, and Mrs. Wyndham was left without any provision, and has gone to live with her brother and his family; but there is an opening for me here. I had a note this morning from an Italian Marchesa, who was one of my principal acquaintances, but who was absent when my misfortunes came upon me, and has only just returned. She writes to offer me a home with her if I will give her my services as lady companion; the duties would be quite nominal. I know very well why she wants me in her house; it would be a very gay pleasant life, Mary;" and Laura looked up, somewhat wistfully, at her friend.

"But would it be right?" said Mary, gently; "you have others to consider besides yourself, Laura; even in any temporary arrangement are you sure you could attend to your child in the Marchesa's house?"

"He would not be there," said Lurline, hesitatingly; "she says he should be put into the care of a nurse in some village."

"Oh, Laura! you could never consent to so wrong and unnatural a scheme. She cannot be a good friend for you, I am sure, if she could make such a suggestion."

Even in her worst days Laura had been frank and outspoken when there was nothing to be gained by being otherwise, and now she had strong motives to incite her to truthfulness, she answered, therefore, at once, while a tinge of colour rose in her white cheeks: "I will own to you, Mary, that she is not very good in any way. She is scarcely received in society now, and it is for that very reason she wishes to have me with her. She thinks that having the companionship of a lady, and especially an Englishwoman, might help her to regain her position."

"Then surely that settles the question, feeling as you now do, you cannot have entertained the idea of going to her at all seriously."

"Perhaps I hardly did, only I could not help thinking what a bright luxurious life it would have been," said Lurline, with a sigh.

"A life utterly unblest; and besides, Laura, I do not think that you ought to accept the most unexceptionable offer of a situation that could be made to you; there can be no doubt whatever that it is your duty to join your husband."

"Oh, Mary, I felt sure you would say so, and I quite dreaded to hear the words!" said Laura, turning round to bury her face in the pillow, with almost a wail of pain. "You do not know all that is involved in such a proposal; bitter humiliation certainly, and perhaps misery and want."

"Still, dear Laura, you would have God's blessing on your life, and that blessing can turn all that seems most dark to purest light."

"I have not written to Mr. Brant yet at all," said Laura, half impatiently.

"Then I think you ought to write without delay, and offer to go to him."

"It is not a question of offering," said Laura. "I must beg him to take me back; we parted on very bad terms; he was so indignant with me for refusing to go with him then, and share his misfortunes, that he declared I should never enter his doors again, unless I prayed and implored of him to receive me, and I scoffed at the very idea, and said I never would."

"But you were not then trying to do right, Laura," said Mary, very gently; "you had no wish as you have now, to find the Blessed Christ, who pleased not Himself."

"No, that is true; but I seem far enough from finding Him, and I do not suppose that humbling myself to Mr. Brant would help me in my search for Him."

"But it would, dear, most essentially; for you would be going after Him by the way of holiness, and that is the very surest path by which He may be found."

"Well, if you think so, Mary, I will do what you consider right, and ask my husband to let me go to him, bitter though it will be to do it; but from the moment that you told me of John Pemberton's life and death the whole world has seemed changed to me, and I feel as if nothing was of any consequence, except to win eternal life in the Love of God, if only it be possible to me."

"You have taken the first and surest step towards that now, dearest Laura, for you have proved your absolute sincerity, and I have the strongest hope that not only you will win the higher blessing which you seek, but that even in the very return to your husband, which you so dread, you will find more of earthly happiness than you could anywhere else."

"It is not a very bright prospect at present," said poor Lurline, with a sad smile; "but, Mary, if I take this painful step according to your advice, I may, I think, ask you if you would help me to gratify one strong desire which I have in connection with it."

"I am sure I shall be only too glad if I can help you in any way; what is it that you wish?"

"It is that I might stand just once by the grave of John Pemberton before I leave Europe, never to return to it, which will be the case if I rejoin my husband."

"I think that might be managed with very little difficulty," said Mary. "As it happens, I had thought of proposing that, so soon as you were able for the journey, you should go to Paris with nurse Parry, for she is anxious to go back and attend to Madame Brunot's children, who are not very well, and you would be more comfortable in many ways there than you could be by remaining here."

"Oh, I am so glad it can be," said Laura, "but is there any hope that you could be there yourself, Mary? I would rather go with you than with any one else to visit that sacred grave."

"I think that too could be arranged," answered Mary, "for Bertrand has promised to take me to Paris in a few weeks to see a monument which we are having erected over John's resting-place, and we could time our journey so as to meet your wish."

"Thank you so much, dearest Mary; how good youare to me! Well, at least, I will obey you now without delay, and write that painful letter. Mr. Brant will be surprised indeed when he receives a petition from me to be taken back by him."

"Surprised and pleased," said Mary, smiling, as she kissed her, and she felt she had gained a great step in Laura's reformation.

(To be continued.)

SCRIPTURE LESSONS FOR SCHOOL AND HOME.

SCRIPTURE STORIES. SECOND SERIES. No. 14. CHRIST WITH THE YOUNG.

Chapter to be read—Mark x. (part of).

INTRODUCTION. What was the last lesson about? Who were with Christ on the mount? Now, once more, read of all the disciples. All loved Christ; liked to be with Him; sometimes made mistakes; did not like others to come to Him too much; shall see that in this story.

I. CHILDREN BLESSED. (Read x. 13—16.) The story being familiar, let the children notice the conduct of the different persons. (1) The parents. Whom did they bring, and why? (See Matt. xix. 13). That He might lay His hands on them and pray. This form of blessing a very ancient Jewish custom. Remind of Isaac blessing Jacob, and Jacob blessing Joseph's two sons (Gen. xlviii. 14). Parents had seen Jesus Christ's love in His miracles, and heard His gracious words; wished this holy Man to bless their children. Such prayers avail much (James v. 16). (2) The disciples. Who wanted to keep the children away? Why did they? Perhaps thought children would trouble Jesus; that this great Man who worked miracles could not care about children; or, perhaps, did not like other people to come too near their Master; they even rebuke the parents! (3) Jesus. What did Christ do? How did He feel? Many touching sights when Christ on earth—touching to see widow's son raised and given back to mother—but this perhaps most touching. Picture the scene: Jesus, loving looks on face, loving words on mouth, stooping, taking the babes one by one from mothers, handling them gently, perhaps kissing them, smiling on them, laying hands on each, and saying words of blessing, then giving them back to the mothers; disciples looking on in wonder and silence; mothers looking so pleased. What did Christ say? Yes, suffer them to come. His love boundless; will bless even unconscious babes. What did He say to the disciples? They must be like these little babes—full of faith, meekness, gentleness—or else cannot enter God's kingdom.

PRACTICAL LESSONS. (1) From the parents, the privilege of bringing others to Christ. How can we do so still? He still the same; always ready to bless, and will bless all who are brought to Him. (2) From the disciples, the danger of keeping back from Christ This the only time we read of Christ being much displeased. How can we keep children back from Him? By neglecting to pray for them, to teach them, to help them; by setting bad example; by leading them into sin; dreadful warnings to all such (Matt. xviii. 6). (3) From Jesus Christ, His tender love. Children need not be afraid to go to Him, to look up to Him. His love greater than a mother's, because never fails. His blessing makes happy, now and for ever.

II. THE YOUNG MAN UNBLESSED. (Read Mark x. 17—22.) Who came next to Christ? How did he show his eagerness?—by running; his respect?—by kneeling. What question did he ask? What title did he give to Christ? How did Christ answer him? Yes; but was not Christ good? Was not He God as well as man? Therefore wanted to draw out this further faith in the young man, to look to Him not only as a teacher but as God. What did He tell him next? Which commandments did He put before him? These contain the practical duties of life. What answer did he make? He had lived uprightly before men; done his duty to his neighbour. What more was wanted? Not merely must abstain from sin, but must do good to others. What did he lack? Had been living to himself; spending his money on himself; thinking only of himself. What was wanting? Remind of lesson on Rich Man and Lazarus, as to Christ's requirements. Must live for others; regard money as stewardship, for which must give account. So what did Christ tell him to do? Part with treasures, which he loved so much. How could he do this? what reward would he receive? Whom was he to follow now? and what treasure would he have hereafter? What was result? Did he comply with Christ's requirement? He could do other things, but not this one, so he went away sad and unblessed.

PRACTICAL LESSONS. (1) The nature of Christ's requirement. Why was he called upon to give up his riches? Abraham, Solomon, David, were rich; why might not he be? Because, evidently, his riches came between him and God. So with us. Does anything keep us back from prayer, from doing right, from serving God, it must be given up, however dear. What was Abraham required to give up? Did he do it? What was his reward? (Gen. xxii. 2—17.) So apostles gave up all to follow Christ, who gave up his life even. (Acts vii. 58.) What are we giving up? (2) The blessedness of Christ's service. How did Christ feel towards this young man? How much more would He not have loved him had he followed Him! So we love Him because He first loves us. His ways are blessed, His paths peace, but they must be known by experience, by trying them, by giving up all inconsistent with following Christ, by taking up daily cross, doing unpleasant duties for His sake; then shall not lose reward.

Questions to be answered.

1. Describe the blessing of the little children.
2. How can children be brought to Christ now?
3. What lesson can we learn from the conduct of the disciples?
4. What was there lacking in the young man?
5. What is the nature of Christ's requirement?
6. What other lesson can we learn from the subject?

SURLY BOB.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "SHAG AND DOLL," "HUGH'S HEROISM," ETC.

CHAPTER XIV.—WORKING FOR HIS LIVING.

T this instant little Edgar, who had come out to look for his papa, catching sight of them, came bounding towards them.

"Have you found a place for Bob, papa?"

"Yes; he is going to work under Heywood, and live with him too; so you will have frequent opportunities of seeing your new friend."

"I'm so glad!" returned Edgar, with a frank pleasant smile, as he looked towards Bob. "And if he is going to work about the garden he may help me keep mine in order, mayn't he, papa?"

"You must ask Heywood about that, he settles those matters," answered Mr. Deveron; "but I dare say he won't object to give your small piece of ground into Bob's charge."

"Then I'll show him where it is at once. He can come with me, can't he, papa?"

"Yes; Heywood won't expect him to begin work till to-morrow, so you can show him all round, and then he will feel more at home."

Edgar, all eagerness, took his companion to his favourite haunts, and even led him into the conservatory, where Bob, who had never seen anything half so beautiful before, was struck dumb with wonder and admiration.

"My word, ain't it fine!" he exclaimed, in a low tone, as if almost afraid to allow his voice to be heard in such a place. "It beats anything as I've ever seen!" And then, to himself, he added, "Don't I wish as Johnnie could see this 'ere place too! wouldn't he be mighty pleased!"

"It is pretty, isn't it?" said Edgar. "People say it's the prettiest conservatory anywhere round about here; and it always seems to me like fairy-land; doesn't it to you?"

"I don't know, 'cause I've never been to that 'ere country, nor ever heard tell of it neither. Where is it, Master Edgar?"

"I don't know exactly; I've only read of it in fairy tales. But come along, we'll go and see my garden."

Arrived there, Edgar discovered something that needed tying up, and asked his companion if he had a bit of string.

The latter thought he might possibly have some, and putting his hand into his pocket to search for it, came upon the body of the little dove, which had lain there since he had picked it up so tenderly and placed it there so sorrowfully in the early dawn of that very day which had been so eventful and had seemed so long, that he could scarcely fancy it was that same morning he had been feeling so miserable and so lonely.

All that had been happening had to some extent drawn off his thoughts from the little dead favourite; but now the sight of it recalled not only its loss, but the fit of passion to which he had given way on the previous day. Therefore, humbled and ashamed, he gazed down upon the bird silently and regretfully.

"Why, what's that?" exclaimed Edgar. "It's a dove, I declare! a dear little ring-dove. And it's dead! oh, what a pity! Did it belong to you, Bob?"

The latter, drawn on by Edgar's questionings, by degrees gave the whole history of the bird; which, of course, led him to talk of Johnnie as well; whilst the other listened to all, deeply interested. But when he came to hear that Johnnie was to have his leg off, his tender little heart was so touched that the tears came into his blue eyes. And to think of his dear little bird being killed!

"Oh, Bob, how dreadfully sorry you must have been! and I should think you must have been angry too. I know I should have been; for 'twas such a horrid shame to kill a dear little dove like that! But you must bury it, Bob."

"Yes; I've only been waiting for a chance; 'cause I should like it to be somewhere as I could know just where I laid it, and, may-be, show it to Johnnie some day."

"I know what you shall do, Bob. You shall bury it here, in my own little garden, and we'll put something over it to show where it is, so that we shan't go digging it up by accident. And then when Johnnie gets well, and comes out of the hospital, you can bring him here—can't you?—and let him see what a nice little grave we've made for his dove."

Bob looked mightily pleased at the idea, though it all appeared so strange that he—"Silent Bob"—should be telling his troubles thus to another, and moreover finding another entering into them so freely, that it still seemed to him, as it had done all that day, that he must be dreaming.

"Which would be the best corner, Bob?" asked Edgar, looking round his little domain. "Oh, I know; just under my beautiful rose bush. We shall always know then just where we laid it; and in summer the rose leaves will fall down upon it, and strew it all over, and make it look so pretty!"

The boys had only just finished their task of digging a grave for Mary Jane, and placing her in it, when Edgar was summoned in-doors, and Bob, meeting Mr. Heywood at that moment, was told by the latter to go back to the lodge, where Mrs. Heywood was expecting him, and say that he would soon follow, but she need not wait tea for him.

Bob set off at a brisk pace down the long carriage-drive, and then tapped gently at the lodge door.

"Come in," said Mrs. Heywood, opening it to him; "and another time you can lift the latch yourself and come straight in; because this is to be your home now. And I hope you'll be a good lad, and try hard to please those who are set over you, and then you'll be happy, I know. And now, would you like to take a look at the little room you're to sleep in?"

Bob signified that he should like to do so extremely; whereupon Mrs. Heywood, leading the way up-stairs, opened the door of a pleasant little chamber, neat and spotlessly clean, with a latticed window looking right over the grounds, and through which he could catch a peep of the sun, just at that moment sinking in the West like a glowing ball of fire. Compared with his late quarters it seemed princely accommodation; and as he looked at the snowy sheets, and pretty patchwork counterpane of the bed, he felt he should always be obliged to keep himself very clean, or he should never be able to venture to get into it. And, moreover, there was actually a strip of carpet by the bed, whilst the boards were so white any one might have eaten off them.

And this was to be his room! He could scarcely believe it all.

Then they went down-stairs; and Mrs. Heywood, taking the tea-pot from the hob where it had been standing, bade him draw his chair to the table, whilst she poured out a cup of tea for him and another for herself.

"Come closer to the fire, my lad," she went on; for Bob still remained sitting awkwardly on the edge of a chair, as if he felt unworthy to take possession of the whole of it, at some distance from the table.

"There, take that seat," continued Mrs. Heywood, placing one for him; "and drink off your hot tea, for I'm sure you look cold enough."

Then she cut him some thick slices of bread-and-butter, and afterwards handed him a piece or two of delicious buttered toast, which she was keeping warm in front of the clear bright fire.

Very cosy they were, with puss sitting between them on the hearth, and purring loudly whenever either of them stroked or noticed her. Moreover, Mrs. Heywood's kind motherly manner soon dispelled Bob's shyness, so that he found himself, before tea was over, talking freely to her about Johnnie; the interest and sympathy she showed leading him on to be more and more communicative, until he had told all about his little brother's illness, and the operation which the doctor had told him yesterday must be performed.

"Poor little fellow! poor little dear!" exclaimed Mrs. Heywood, feelingly. "But when is to be, Bob?"

"Soon, he said. He didn't tell me what day."

"Well, I'm going into the town to-morrow, so I'll go and inquire for him, and bring you back word. For you'll be longing to know all about it, I'm sure. But it's quite true what the doctor told you, that he won't feel anything of it at the time, because they'll give him something that'll prevent his even knowing what they're doing to him; and as you say he has had to go upon crutches for a long time, that will be nothing new to him when he begins to get about."

Bob did not reply, but he looked as if Mrs. Heywood's words were comforting him a little.

CHAPTER XV.—BOB'S PROPOSAL.

A NEW life had begun for Bob now; and very different it was from the old one. The kindness shown him by all around seemed to act upon him much as the bright sunshine does upon the flowers, causing the better side of his nature to expand and unfold itself, and nourishing into fuller growth those desires and strivings after higher and holier things, which in his time of loneliness and trouble had sprung up.

And he was happy in his work. He tried hard to please Mr. Heywood, and never forgot anything he once told him; whilst Mr. Heywood on his side, though particular, and always expecting that everything should be done in the best manner possible, was kind and patient, and Bob soon learnt to look up to him with respect and regard. To win a word of approval from him, was to the lad a sufficient motive and reward for any exertion or effort.

Then the quiet talks which he and Mrs. Heywood often had together in the evenings were a great help to him. Her kind heart had opened towards the motherless boy, and she had felt a warm interest in him from the first; chiefly perhaps because he seemed so much in need of some one to take him by the hand, and draw out the latent good that was in him, which had been so overlaid by the evil which had been uppermost, that at one time it had seemed almost as if it were quite extinguished.

He was grateful for her kindness: and his gratitude soon began to show itself in the attempt to render her any little service in his power. First he began by lighting the kitchen fire in the mornings, so that when she came down she might find it burning brightly, and be able to warm herself at once. Then he bethought himself that he might always get in the coal and wood, and so provide her with a supply for the day, all ready to hand, before he went out to his work. Moreover, he took upon himself the care of the fowls, of which Mrs. Heywood had several; and he soon learnt to take the greatest interest in them.

Thus various little ways of helping her gradually occurred to him; until Mrs. Heywood declared she never had known such a useful boy, and she couldn't think how she could have managed to get on before he came; whilst Mr. Heywood would look pleased, and give an approving nod and smile to Bob when, morning after morning, he found his boots, at breakfast time, beautifully cleaned and polished, set beside the fire ready for him to put on.

"Where did you learn such thoughtful ways?" said Mrs. Heywood to him one day when they were alone. "Did your aunt teach you them? Did you use to do these things for her?"

"No," returned Bob, shortly.

"She wasn't so kind as you," he added, in explanation.

"But to have taken charge of you two boys all these years was a much kinder thing than anything I have done. I hope you always showed yourself grateful, Bob!"

The lad made no reply. He could not say that he had done so; but Mrs. Heywood's words had started a new train of thoughts, and placed things in quite a new light.

He pondered over it when he went to bed, and next day, as he went about his work, he still found himself thinking on the same subject. The result was that he came to the conclusion that he had been a very ungrateful boy. He had never done a thing of his own accord for his aunt, it had never occurred to him to do so. He had gone on errands for her when sent, but had never volunteered to render her a single service, when he might have done for her all that he now did for Mrs. Heywood.

But he hadn't loved his aunt, and he did love Mrs. Heywood! That, however, he was honest enough to acknowledge, was no excuse for him. He ought always to have remembered what his aunt had done in giving them a shelter, when otherwise they must have gone to the workhouse. And he had left her without a word, and hadn't ever been back since.

Well, he would try if he couldn't make up for it. The first money he received should some of it go to buy some little present for her or the baby—for the latter, perhaps, would be the better—and he would take it in, and tell her, "he knew he had always been a bad boy to her, and she had been a deal better to him than he deserved." And then, perhaps, he should find some way in which he could be of use to her, for he knew she always had her hands full with all the children, and the baby so often ill. It had certainly been very bad of him never to have tried to help her before. But when he got on, and earned more wages, he would set aside some part for her as a little return for all she had done for them.

(To be continued.)

"THE QUIVER" BIBLE CLASS.

310. What methods of catching fish are spoken of in the Old Testament?

311. In whose reign is an earthquake reported to have taken place?

312. What restriction was put upon the apostles of our Lord who had witnessed the Transfiguration?

313. We are told that Jesus dined with one who had been a leper. Who was this?

314. Quote a passage in which the withholding tithes and offerings from God is spoken of as robbing God.

315. What reason does Jonah give for refusing to go and preach at Nineveh as God had ordered him to do?

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS ON PAGE 768.

297. The prophet Malachi (Malachi i. 8—13).

298. In Zephaniah ii. 9.

299. "And these signs shall follow them that believe; In my name shall they cast out devils; they shall speak with new tongues; they shall take up serpents; and if they drink any deadly thing, it shall not hurt them; they shall lay hands on the sick, and they shall recover" (Mark xvi. 17, 18).

300. In the second year of Darius (Zechariah i. 7).

301. "Seven times a day do I praise thee because of Thy righteous judgments" (Psalm cxix. 164).

302. "The spirit truly is ready, but the flesh is weak" (Mark xiv. 38).

(Drawn by G. R. Ashton.)

NORTHWARD HO!

BLOW, breezes, blow a steady gale,
Although you bear my love from me,
And I in sorrow watch his sail
Fly like a sea-bird out to sea;

His last words, spoke in manly pride,
Were, "Duty takes me o'er the main
Dear Annie, but should good betide,
'Tis love will bring me back again."

To Arctic regions he is bound,
  One of a bold exploring band,
Whom Science, in her need, hath found
  Ready to quit this fertile land,
To wander by that heartless zone
  Where Nature speaks no word of cheer,
And Winter from his crystal throne
  Strikes blind the sun through half the year.

But pleasant memories may cling
  About twin souls, though far apart,
And sweetest consolations bring
  To touch in troublous times the heart;
And that High Power that sent the spheres
  Careering on their heavenly way,
Doth mark the simplest sorrower's tears—
  Doth heed the feeblest lips that pray.

So when the struggle 's most severe,
  May happy recollections come
To my true love, his life to cheer,
  And help him win his passage home;
And I will daily, hourly ask,
  The Arbiter of human fate,
To aid the toiler at his task,
  And, humbly trusting, watch and wait.

JOHN G. WATTS.

THE BRIDGE BETWEEN.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE TROUBLES OF CHATTY AND MOLLY," "THE DINGY HOUSE AT KENSINGTON," "QUEEN MADGE," "AGAINST HERSELF," ETC., ETC., ETC.

CHAPTER XXXI.—SALLY SETTLES THE QUESTION.

"DOROTHY," Mrs. Woodward said, one day, "your father and I having been talking about you. We don't think you are treating Mr. Fuller quite rightly. He is evidently very fond of you; and you have let him shilly-shally about the place for years."

"But what can I do, dear mamma?" she asked. "I can't remark that I don't care about him, and don't mean to marry him. Besides, it is not for my sake that he hangs about the place, but because he is fond of us all," and Dorothy tried to think that she was speaking the truth.

"That is all nonsense," Mrs. Woodward answered; "besides, he told your father that he was very fond of you, and it is spoiling his career in life keeping him in uncertainty."

"But he need not be in any uncertainty, mamma. We should never suit each other, and he will never do any good work in the world."

"But you might spur him on to do some if you married him, and make a clever man of him; it is certainly in him to be one."

"If I could do this," thought Dorothy, that evening, "it would be a great and distinct work to offer to God, and with which to ennoble my life;" but her thoughts flew to the far-off land in which he who must be her life's hero still toiled; and the tears rushed into her eyes, and the old pain, years old now, it seemed to her, came into her heart—"If he had only cared for me as I did for him in the end!"

"I think Fuller is an awfully unlucky beggar," Tom observed that evening. "He never seems able to stir himself up, and he does nothing but hang about. I wonder he doesn't try to do something. He 's very clever, you know."

"Tom, do you think he would do better if he had some one he cared about to spur him on?" she asked, hesitatingly. She had learnt to believe in the wisdom of her sturdy brother, and to ask his advice in many things. He thought for a minute.

"No," he answered; "it would only arouse him for a little while. Laziness is only selfishness, and it smothers up an awful lot of better feelings when it has been allowed to grow so long in triumph."

"How do you know, Tom?"

"Noticed it in the beggars at the office and lots of other people." Then he was silent, for he began to think of how his selfishness had taken another and more distinct form in bygone days; and Dorothy, too, began to think of those same days, and of the long idle hours spent in the garden in vague dreams no future could realise.

"And that too was selfishness," she thought. "And it was a dozen other things that were wrong as well."

"What a dreadful thing laziness is, Tom!" she said at last; "and yet at first sight it does not seem a very great fault. It is like the weed which looks rather pretty at the beginning, but gradually chokes up the river."

"Yes," replied Tom; but he thought of the advance that had been promised him that day, and the praise he had received from his employers; and thought too that there still were greater faults than laziness, and that for all his prosperity he had to thank the girl before him, whom he felt proud and thankful to call his sister. "Doll, do you remember long ago how we used to loll about in the garden, and tell stories, and have games?" he said, musingly, after a minute; "and then you stirred yourself up and worked—what made you do it? I remember I used to spend all my money on myself till you shamed me out of it." She could hardly keep back her tears as she answered him.

"It was Mr. Blakesley, Tom;" and she told him of the conversation they had had on an evening long since, and how, for her part and work in the world's great workshop she had tried to make the lives of those around her a little more beautiful. "I have only tried to do so, Tom dear," she added; "I dare not even hope that I have really succeeded."

"You have made mine a little less ugly, at any rate," and then they were silent, and watched the twilight steal over the dear old garden, as they had watched it hundreds of times before. At last Tom spoke again. "Why didn't you tell me about this before, Doll? it 's a grand idea, you know, and every one who hears it must long to try his hand."

"But there are other reasons too, Tom, besides its being a grand idea, why we should try to make our lives better," she said, softly, thinking of Tortoise-shell's dying words. Then Sally came down the pathway.

"Dorothy," she said, "I have been thinking of a new design for Christmas cards; some with texts intertwined, and some with bits of poetry."

"And what is your favourite quotation, Sally?" her sister asked, almost mechanically. The grave child looked up into her sister's face, and answered, "'Ye may not do evil that good shall come.'"

She sat pondering over the words after Sally and Tom and Will had gone in-doors and left her alone above Venus's grave. "No, it would not do," she thought; "and I should only be doing a great wrong to Mr. Fuller and to myself." He came out to her a little later. They had told him where to find her, and he came and sat down by her on the rickety seat on which they had sat so often. She turned and looked at him—at his clear-cut features and the broad graceful shoulders—and thought of the days, those first days of that glorious summer after his return to England before he had ever made love to Netta. "They were very happy days," she thought. "I shall always think kindly of him, and have a grateful feeling for him, because he has given me so pleasant a memory; but I could never be in love with him again; he does not seem great enough to love."

"Well, Dorothy, what are you thinking of?" he asked, at last.

"I was thinking," she answered, "that we ought to teach ourselves only to consider things beautiful according to their goodness and greatness."

"What a queer child you are, always thinking of these odd things," he said, impatiently. "I came out here to ask you something I shall never ask you again, Dorothy," he added, coldly, almost sadly.

"Ask me what?"

"Shall I keep this, or throw it away?" and he opened his pocket-book, and between two folds of silver paper showed her a faded yellow rose. She looked at it for a moment, while her thoughts went back to the day on which she had given it to him.

"Don't throw it away," she pleaded. "Our lives must divide here," she went on, firmly; "there is the world before you, and a career you must not lose—but our lives divide, for you must not spend so much time here; you are wasting your best days, you are indeed, but keep the rose still, Adrian. Because the winter is cold it is no reason we should forget the summer."

"And we can never be more to each other?" he said, in a low voice.

"Never," she answered, gently; "it is too late." The words were said before she knew it. He bowed his head down in his hands for a moment.

"Very well, Dorothy," he said, sadly, and put the rose tenderly back into its old place.

After that evening Adrian Fuller seldom came to Hampstead.

CHAPTER XXXII.—THE BRIDGE BETWEEN.

It was late in the summer, and the evenings were getting chill and cold. "A long summer," sighed Dorothy, as she went over to Miss Blakesley's one evening. "I think we ought to measure our age by our feelings rather than our years, and then I should have grown so old this year." Yet in spite of the sigh with which the words were said there was contentment in her heart, although, like all her feelings, it had a tinge of sadness, a strange tranquil satisfaction, gained by the knowledge that she was neither useless nor passive in the world, but that her hands and head and heart found work to do and thoughts to occupy them, and that at any rate that most precious thing, the time entrusted to her, was not wasted.

"My dear, I have a letter for you from George," Miss Blakesley said, when she appeared. "He is coming home immediately, almost as soon as his letter, he says." She hardly knew how she took it, or walked home that evening. She did not dare open it till she was safely locked in her own room, and then at last she read the few words it contained. "My dear Dorothy"—she was so thankful to see those first three words; she had been so afraid that he would call her "Miss Woodward." She could hardly read the rest of the short note at first, though it was merely to the effect that he was coming back immediately, and had been at the point of returning for months, or he would have answered her inquiries sooner, and that now he would do so in person, and he hoped it would be very soon.

Then she waited. She felt now that it was all right, that the old coldness had been swept away, and that he was coming back, not merely to England, but to her. "I won't meet him under the sycamore-tree," she thought; "I should like to be in the sitting-room when he comes, where he first told me that he cared for me." Then sometimes a doubt would creep into her heart, if after all he were only coming home to be on the merely friendly footing. "Oh, it would be dreadful," she said to herself one evening—for she had given up all hope of seeing him that day—as she stole out of the garden gate and on to the fields beyond—the fields she had walked across the first night on which she had been engaged to George Blakesley, long ago, and had thought her fate so hard. There were the same dim shadowy trees, the same long dewy grass. It brought it all back to her memory; and the tears came into her eyes. "I did not care for him then," she said; "and oh, if when he comes back he does not care"—she stopped, for she heard a footstep behind her, and turning round, she saw, only a few yards from her, the face there was no mistaking. She did not move an inch forward, only stood half hesitating, half trembling, till he came nearer, then she put out her hands. He looked at her for a moment, into her face, and her clear truthful eyes flashing with a light he had never seen there before; then, putting aside her outstretched hands, he drew her to his heart.

"My dear little girl," he said, presently, "to think I have you at last. There is no mistake this time, is there, Dorothy?"

She raised her head for a moment, and answered, with a long sigh of happiness, "Oh no, none at all."

"And when did you learn to love me, Dorothy?" he asked, at last.

"Long ago," she answered; "long, long before you left England."

"If I'd only known it. I tried hard to keep away from you, my child, and only left England to be out of your reach."

"And what made you return?"

"A little note your sister Netta sent me, and another letter aunt Mildred wrote, but I was very uncertain till the last moment, till I saw the look in your eyes, Dorothy."

"And have you loved me all the time?" she asked.

"Yes, all the time," he answered. "You were always everything to me, my child." Then she was satisfied.

"I am so happy," she said presently, with a long sigh of relief, "and we will work on together, George?"

"You used to hate work."

"But I love it now."

They walked on silently to the garden gate, and then Dorothy pulled up. "How surprised they will be to see you," she said.

"Oh no," he answered, laughing; "I have seen them already, and Tom told me where to find you. He saw you go through the gate. I wonder if this will fit you, my child, it will at any rate till I get you another," and he drew off a ring, and put it on her finger.

"You've been spooning," Tom said, calmly, as they entered.

"Tom!"

"Well, it's nothing new, Doll, if you have, so don't be unhappy."

"But you haven't told me to whom this house belongs," she said, a few days later; "I should so like to buy it with Netta's money."

"There is no occasion, my child, it is yours already, for it was I who bought it, and I shall settle it on you."

"Oh, George, you bought it! You were so good to us, too, in our trouble"—but he stopped her mouth.

"Do you know," she said presently, "I am very glad for my own sake that all those dreary days came, they taught me so much. I look far back at the old life in the garden, and look forward to the new life with you" (it was only a week before their marriage), "but I would not have missed the days that intervened. The sorrow taught me so much, dear, and to understand so many things of which I knew nothing before: it made a road from the old life to the new—A BRIDGE BETWEEN."

TRUE LIFE.

BY THE REV. GEO. A. CHADWICK, M.A., PREBENDARY AND RECTOR OF ARMAGH.

"I am come that they might have life, and that they might have it more abundantly."—ST. JOHN x. 10.

THERE is a well-known legend of a sculptor, the beauty of whose own statue haunted him so oppressively that he prayed to heaven to animate the stone. He was heard, says the tale, and the cold loveliness of marble flushed into the loveliness of life. Let us, for one moment, suppose that the story could be true, and that we could question the awakening creature just when its pulses began to stir—just when its consciousness sprung up. We say to it, You are on the brink of a new existence—heights and depths of feeling, realities of being and solidities of service, are close to you, such as never reached before to an image chiselled out of a quarry; in another moment your destiny will be decided, but it is still in your power to recoil. Say, now, will you go forward, or go back? Will you make the glorious upward step into humanity, or sink down again into a dead cold piece of stone—beautiful stone, but lifeless for ever? It is hard to imagine that such a creature, if it understood the question, could hesitate to answer, Yes, I will go on, I will take the burdens of life for the sake of the glories and the earnestness of being all which I have hitherto merely seemed to be. The contrary choice would be contemptible indeed.

And yet there is One who continually makes just such a proposal to us. First, by His spirit, He makes men aware of life and death, of an apathy which clings to them, and an energy which might inspire them; they know that they are dead, and they also know that they may live. Then He says, "I am come that ye may have life." Then, if they listen and accept His proposal, He adds, day after day, "I am come that ye may have it more abundantly."

And there is not one solitary plea which a man can urge for refusing to be a Christian which a stone also might not use for refusing to be alive. There is not one inducement which contents men with a poor and sluggish life towards God that would not justify the other in retaining somewhat of the marble's coldness of heart and its sloth of limb.

It is life which men refuse when they turn away from Christ; and the same excuses which they urge would equally justify them in asking to be struck dead, to be frozen into stone. Lot's wife is the very ideal of what an unchristian existence would fain be.

1. Many well-disposed persons shrink from decision, and from acts which might commit them to a decided course, even from kneeling at the Lord's Table, because they fear to fail, to fall away, to disgrace themselves. And they are right to hold it dreadful to be a recreant, terrible to put hands to the plough and turn back; better to have been never born than to have been, like Judas, a traitor under the eyes of Christ. But they are not right in thinking the shame of failure an excuse for indolence. There is a brand upon the coward's brow who turned back in the day of battle, but there is a deadly and bitter curse on the neutral, the trimmer, who came not up to the help of the Lord, to the help of the Lord against the mighty. "You may fail!" So may the merchant who embarks his substance in commerce; so may the advocate who rejoices to be entrusted with his first important brief; so may the general whose heart, nevertheless, burns to direct the storm of war. And substance, reputation, fame, will be forfeited if they are not successful. There is nothing to be won by the craven souls who imagine that nothing is to be dared. Nay, to breathe is to risk much. You need only be a little slothful, a little stupid, or vain, or easily led, and you will find out what heavy stakes are sometimes forfeited in this game of life which all must play! If you died, there would be an end of these hazards, and yet people strive hard for life.

Is it any wonder that the higher life, the divine life, also calls men to dare, to make the grand venture of Peter, who fixes his eyes on Christ, and springs from the deck of his vessel upon the abyss, into which, nevertheless, he does not sink?

A man who recedes from the new life because he fears the risk, would shrink back also from the threshold of his natural life, and prefer to be a block of stone for ever. He is false to his manhood in renouncing Christ.

2. Some do not fear personal danger so much as responsibility for others. To be a decided Christian is to be a marked man, whose errors are a scandal to the weak, a burden to the tender, and an excuse to the wicked. But the same burden is upon the shoulders of every living man; and it only presses specially upon the Christian because he has a second and a deeper life to live. There is no little child whose behaviour does not make ill-behaved children either ashamed or shameless. There is no young man or maiden whose very look has not an effect upon the words and acts of some comrade, since God has allowed the cruel frost of utter isolation to close over no human heart. The merchant influences the morality of trade; the lonely student cannot deepen the flood of thought without also cleansing or defiling it. To dread responsibility is to dread life. It is only a statue that sets no example to creatures who have hands which can help or hinder, and eyes which can flash with rage or soften into sympathy. You will not be a Christian because you shrink from danger or from responsibility? Then why have you submitted for so many years to be alive?

3. To be a Christian is to labour. A cross has to be borne, a race has to be run, there are unearthly enemies with whom to wrestle, therefore, men shrink from the din of battle and the dust of pilgrimage. But yet the sap and salt, the freshness and the vigour of our daily life, would be lost if there were no contests, no campaigns, no victories. What names are great in history? whose monuments are sacred? whose birthplaces are venerable? Those which belonged to men who scorned delights, and lived laborious days; soldiers, who slept on the ground, and hungered and bled; writers, who built the lofty line in solitary days and sleepless nights, with painful thought and deep experience; reformers, who stood alone against the world; martyrs, whom they burned. These are the men whose lives we applaud. But even the most ignoble and dishonourable life is full of labour and vexation. To refuse all toil is to groan under the hatred of strangers and the reproaches of kinsmen; to indulge every appetite is to writhe under a hundred diseases. The reveller of to-night aches and frets to-morrow. Indolence never knows the joy of bounding pulses and a well-braced system. No man is so heavily laden as he who bears no cross; none so miserable as the man of pleasure.

And since the good things of this life can only be had by toil, what are we to think of him who refuses to endure some extra labour for enormously a greater good? If he were consistent he would certainly abjure life.

4. What most men shrink from, in all probability, is none of these—not failure, nor responsibility, nor incidental toils, but the sorrows which are part and parcel of a holy life. That they are so cannot be denied, for penitence stands at the door of conversion, and our evil nature must be persistently confessed and subdued; and Christian eyes see much in an ungodly world to lament over. It is enough for the disciple to be as his Master, and his Master is the Man of Sorrows. True; but the same chapter which calls Him by that name proclaims that His sorrows are laden with future joy—"He shall see of the travail of His soul, and shall be satisfied."

And what relationship of common life is free from sorrows? Friendship has partings, and misunderstandings, and bereavements; no heart ever gave itself to another heart but with this condition implied, that one should break over the other's grave. And what is more to the point, no heart ever beats with a true and unselfish love without having to reproach itself a thousand times for coldness and dulness, for defect and transgression. Really to love another, you must consent to often hate yourself.

Who is so abject as to refuse the price? But this is exactly the same price which the faith of Christ exacts: to know the evil we have done, the good we have left undone; to mark and mourn our coldness and hardness, to confess it all frankly, and to ask forgiveness, and to trust the Eternal Friend who gives it.

There is nothing here to rebel against, except on principles which would rend the world asunder, and make life impossible, or as barren as the African sands.

So, then, the objections which Nature raises against grace are met by an appeal to Nature herself, by our Lord's name for religion—Life.

But life is not made up of peril and responsibility, of toil and sorrow. These are only conditions upon which the glorious gift is offered us. The gift itself is deeper than these; the life is more than raiment.

Life is power to love; but the deepest of all fountains from which love can flow is the story of Christ crucified and enthroned—of the sacrifice and the priest.

Life is power to know; but the profoundest knowledge of all is the knowledge of eternity, and of our eternal destinies; it is to know the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom He hath sent.

Life is power to develop; therefore, he is but half alive whose soul never grows, whose spirit is deprived for ever of the destinies and the purposes of its being, like a seed forgotten in a drawer.

Life is self-control and activity. Death is the complete absence of all self-control and energy. Christ comes to souls which are helpless and inert, as to the grave of Lazarus, and calls, and he that was dead comes forth.

So, then, while we are shrinking from religion as from a burden, or else avoiding as much as possible of what we think its exactions, Christ, who sees us with deeper eyes, knows that we are refusing to live, or to live deeply and "abundantly." "Ye will not come unto me that ye might have life." When one does put himself frankly into the Master's hand, his existence is changed as completely as when a pestilential swamp is covered with flashing and clear waters, in which living creatures rejoice, and on which the sunbeams dance. His dry and thirsty soul is flooded with the pure river of water of life, clear as crystal, which proceeds from the throne of God and of the Lamb.

SCRIPTURE LESSONS FOR SCHOOL AND HOME.

SCRIPTURE STORIES. Second Series. No. 15. A Conversation.

Chapter to be read—Mark x. (part of.)

INTRODUCTION. About whom did we read in last lesson? What was the young man told to do? How did he feel? Did he do it? What hindered him? So when he had gone Jesus began to talk to His disciples about riches, which led to a talk about many other things, as we shall see.

I. The Danger of Riches. (Read 23—27.) Imagine the Saviour walking in the road, the disciples all about Him; the rich young man going away in the distance. Christ improves the occasion. What does He say about those who have riches? How did the disciples feel? Would at once begin to think about the rich men who had entered God's kingdom. Was not Abraham very rich in cattle and gold? (Gen. xiii. 2) was not Joseph second only to the king? what did God give Solomon as a reward for his goodness? So they cannot make out Christ's meaning. How did He explain His words? What does trusting in riches mean? Trusting to them for happiness, for peace; making really a god of money; making this life all. Remind of parables of Rich Fool, of Dives and Lazarus; also how Solomon's heart was turned away from God by pleasures of this world. Therefore, a rich man would find it "hard," or difficult, to enter the kingdom. What proverb does He quote? Probably a familiar one, meaning doing anything very difficult. Again, the disciples, much astonished, ask a question—what was it? Had any rich man followed Christ? Was not Matthew, one of themselves, rich, rich enough to make a great feast? (Luke v. 29). Had not Zacchæus, another rich Publican, followed Christ? Yes; but what made them do so? Who gives grace even for such self-denial? God's grace sufficient to make all things possible. Remind children that other things besides riches may keep back from God. Sometimes worldly position, love of ease, fear of shame, may be the things making it "hard" to enter the kingdom. Still, God's grace stronger than all difficulties.

II. The Reward of Service. (Read 28—31.) Who is forward with a question, as usual? Peter asks, "What shall we get who have forsaken all?" (Matt. xix. 27). Whom had they forsaken, and what? Peter left his wife, Matthew his worldly calling, John and James their father, servants, and fishing-boats. What are they to have, even in this life? So we read that godliness hath the promise of this life as well as the next; that all things needful will be given. (Matt. vi. 33.) As instances of this remind of Job, who received double (Job xlii. 10), of David promoted to be king, James becoming Bishop of Jerusalem. (Acts xv. 13.) But what was to go with these honours? Persecution seems startling among all these blessings; but what does St. Paul say about them? (Heb. xii. 6, 7). Remind how Mark, who alone put in this word, had been repelled from doing God's word by difficulties (Acts xiii. 13); also of all the persecutions of the early Christians—Peter put in prison, Stephen stoned—must be prepared for such things in this life, but what will the end be? Yet Christ adds a caution: the first may become last. Let children see here a picture of Judas, among the first, sharing all the privileges and pleasures of Christ's disciples; always hearing His words, seeing His life; but what was his disposition? Probably his covetousness made him join Christ; thought he would get on in the world. But when hears Christ talk of His death, thinks he will make money by it. So sells Christ, commits suicide, and becomes lost. Goes to his own place. (Acts i. 25.)

Practical Lessons. (1) Encouragement. Many children have to give up much for Christ. Some have difficulties at home, some at school; must expect such; but Christ's rewards are boundless. Will have happy conscience and peace of mind now, and future glory. (2) Caution. Let each ask, why do I wish to follow Christ? If merely (like Judas) for what we can get, great danger. Christ requires whole heart, life service; only those who give such His true disciples.

III. A Prophecy. (Read 32—34.) Now where do they set their faces towards? But how had Christ always been received in Judæa? Does this daunt Christ? For the third time He tells them of His approaching death. How do they feel? What does Christ do? Not smooth over, but boldly announce all that would happen. Notice that the two trials are plainly announced—that before chief priests, and that before Pilate, the Roman (Gentile) governor. What do the disciples do? Why still follow Him? Because love casts out fear. (1 John iv. 18.) They do love Christ, and will not leave Him. They may perhaps share in some of these persecutions, but they have learned to love Him, and will stay by Him to the last.

Practical Lesson. Love stronger than fear. So still: let hearts be full of love to God, and will be able to trust Him. Future may look dark, but love believes all things. Nothing can separate us from this, not even death itself. (Rom. viii. 39.) Therefore may go on our way rejoicing.

Questions to be answered.

1. What is the real danger of riches?
2. Give examples of riches proving a snare.
3. What is the reward of well-doing?
4. Give examples of advancement in this life.
5. What practical lessons may we learn?
6. What prophecy did Christ utter, and what effect did it have on the disciples?

"NULLA CRUX, NULLA CORONA."

GIVE not for self; what though a blast
Came sweeping o'er thy summer sky?
The same rude wind by others passed,
And chilled them with its wailing cry;
The storm-king's anger is not deep,
His wings soon fold in gentle sleep.

And if the noontide blaze should fall
Awhile too fiercely on thy head,
Rich fruits best ripen on a wall
Where southern sunbeams glisten red;
If thorns should pierce thee, turn and see
The rose's beauty on the tree.

When fainting pilgrims suffer thirst
In an unwatered desert-land,
How often o'er the sight will burst,
Like emeralds sown upon the sand,
Green grassy isles where fountains play,
And fan-palms veil the burning day.

Murmurer, who in the starry night,
Whilst silver radiance floats around,
With warped and undiscerning sight
Dost darkly seek the dew-cold ground,
And see but shadows lying there,
Though all things else are soft and fair,

Shake off the self-idolatry
That reigns upon thy bended brow,
The human world sends up a cry
For help to dreamers such as thou;
Pray Charity to chase thy frown—
"Take up the cross and win the crown!"

JANE DIXON.

STILL AND DEEP.

BY F. M. F. SKENE, AUTHOR OF "TRIED," "ONE LIFE ONLY," ETC.

CHAPTER LVII.

BERTRAND and his wife returned to Château de L'Isle at the time they had previously fixed, leaving nurse Parry in charge of the invalid, but it was with the understanding that the arrangement Mary had suggested to Laura should be carried out, and that they should all meet again in Paris in the course of a few weeks.

The plan proved quite successful. Mrs. Brant soon recovered sufficiently to undertake the journey, and Mrs. Parry had the satisfaction of establishing her in Madame Brunot's house, so that she could attend to her and watch over the children at the same time. Charlie Davenant vacated his apartments, in order to make room for the new-comer; but he did not leave Paris, and took up his abode in a neighbouring street, where he could still continue his daily intercourse with Valerie.

Laura's infant passed through a dangerous illness almost immediately after their arrival in Paris, in which he was saved, humanly speaking, only by Mrs. Parry's care and skill; but both mother and child had quite recovered their health before the completion of John Pemberton's monument brought the de L'Isles to Paris. They took rooms at an hotel in a different part of the town from that in which the Brunots' dwelling was situated, not only as being a locality more suited to their new position, but also because Bertrand adhered to his determination not to see Lurline again, and he was anxious to avoid any risk of a chance meeting.

Mary went to see her on the very morning after their arrival, however, and it was arranged that Bertrand was to send a carriage to bring his wife back when she had been there an hour or two, in order that they might take a drive together in the pretty Bois de Boulogne.

"You must come here to take me up, however," he had said to Mary, with a smile, as he went down to the door of the hotel to see her drive away. "I shall not risk going near that house at all," and he was ready waiting, apparently with some impatience, for his wife's return, when she came back for him, as he desired, after her visit was paid.

"Why, how bright you look, my Mary," said Bertrand, as he took his place beside her in the carriage, and they started on their way; "surely you must have some very good news to tell me."

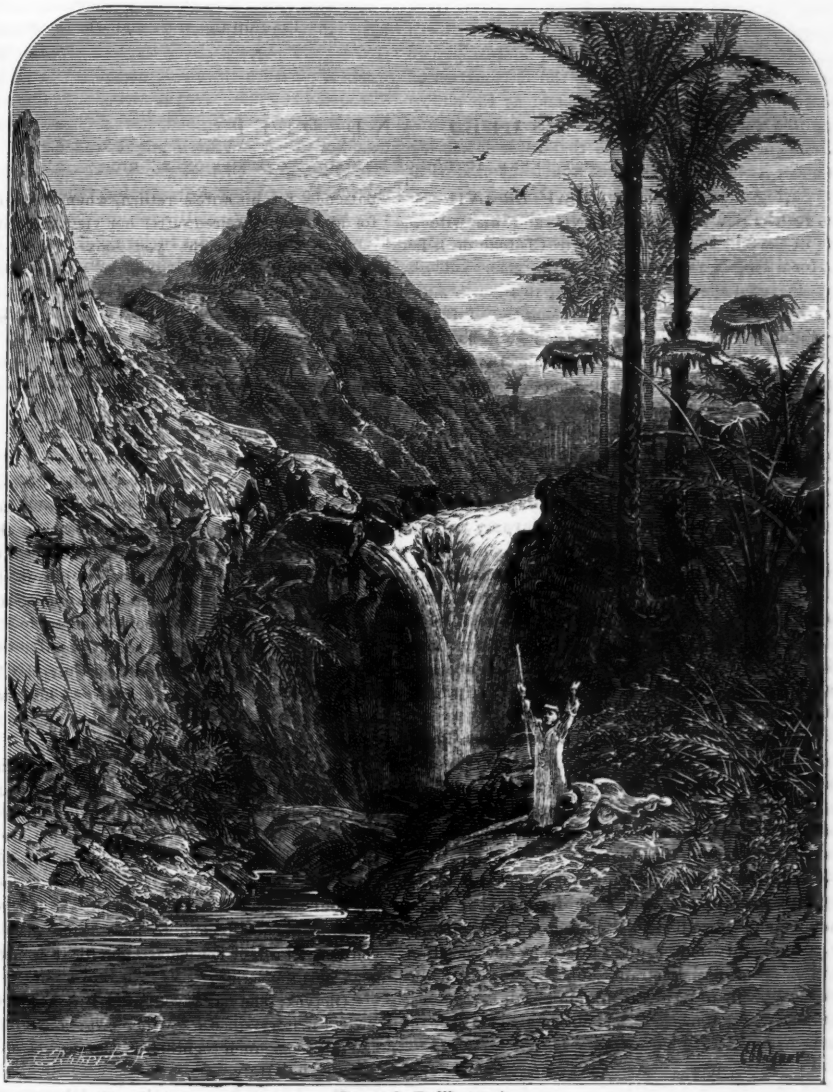
"Oh yes, dearest, I have indeed," she replied, "and I am so happy I do not know how to be thankful enough, since all that I most desired for Laura has come to pass, and the most wonderful change has taken place in her."

"What sort of a change do you mean?"

"No words can describe it so well as those which speak of one who becomes in Christ, 'a new creature'—she does not really seem to be the same person at all; she has not only become a child of God in the truest sense of the word, but she is so humble, so earnest, so sincerely anxious to ascertain what is her duty on every point, and to do it to the best of her power, that it is hardly possible to believe she was really once the Lorelei of Chiverley."

"Why, Mary, you seem actually to have worked a miracle, after all, incredulous as I was of your power to do so on such a character as Laura's."

"It has been done by John Pemberton rather than by myself, if any human being has had a share in it; and no doubt his ceaseless prayers have largely helped in winning this great grace for her; but I think a mightier power than even his pure devotion could exercise must have been brought to bear upon her soul in order to make her what she is this day."



"How did it all come to pass, then? has she told you the details of her conversion, for it seems to have been nothing less."

"Oh yes; she has given me a full account of her mental history since I saw her last; as you know, we had talked so much together on the subject of religion before I left Italy."

"Yes, I know how greatly you laboured to bring her to God; but you did not seem very hopeful when you parted from her, if I remember rightly."

"No, it is true I was not, because, although poor Lurline did really try conscientiously to repent and believe, she had at that time the greatest difficulty in realising the truths of the Christian faith at all."

"And how did you overcome her scepticism? by giving her books on the subject, I suppose."

(Drawn by E. WAGNER.)

"Green grassy isles where fountains play,
And fan-palms veil the burning day."—p. 807.

"No, I did not make any attempt of that kind, because I do not think a true and living faith can be gained from external evidences, even if they can convince the intellect. I gave her but one piece of advice, Bertrand," continued Mary, in a low tone, "I begged of her to appeal to Christ Himself, to ask Him day by day, and hour by hour, unceasingly, to make Himself known to her as the Saviour whose love would be to her eternal joy, and as the sinless King who claimed her pure obedience upon earth—and she did so. She tells me that after I left her she never let an hour or scarce a moment pass without pouring out her whole soul in this one supplication, for the realisation of what she felt was her only hope in the midst of her earthly misery, and she says that for a long time it seemed all in vain, and though she persevered she felt quite in despair; then, soon after her arrival in Paris, there came the illness of her child, and although, up to that time she had thought herself quite indifferent to it, she found out how much she loved it when she believed it was going to be taken from her, so it seemed to her as if her wretchedness in this world were becoming almost more than she could bear, and she longed, with indescribable desire, for that hope and rest in the love of Christ, of which she could imagine the ineffable sweetness, even while she seemed to have no part in it; but at last there came a strange and wonderful night to her, which she described to me in language that seemed quite inspired by her rapturous gratitude. She was kneeling by the side of her child, convinced that it was surely dying, and she was repeating again and again her one ceaseless prayer, that the crucified Lord would reveal Himself to her, the same prayer that she had made through so many weary weeks, and then, suddenly, even in that hour, the long-delayed answer came, full, complete in very perfection of blissful certainty, for at that very moment as she knelt there, crushed and despairing, there passed into her soul a distinct perception that she was no more alone, that even while her lips were still repeating the same ceaseless prayer which so long had been unavailing that the crucified Lord would reveal Himself to her, there had come unto her, in real and living presence, One whose unutterable tenderness and sympathy flooded her very being with ineffable comfort—One whom she felt and knew, with a conviction as clear and undoubted as it was incomprehensible, to be her very Lord and Life, the world's Redeemer and her own. The effect on Laura of this marvellous revelation of the very Being of Christ actually present with her there, was as if a new nature had been infused into her by contact with that Divine Personality, and at once there rose within her the longing desire to give herself up wholly, at once and for ever, into His blessed hands, and she did thus resign herself to Him then and there, praying Him henceforth to show her all His will, that she might obey it, and beseeching Him from that time forth for ever more, so to deal with her as should bring her in each instant of her life nearer and nearer to Himself. She told me, Bertrand, that when she uttered this petition she made it a deep and almost awful reality to herself, by giving consent in her heart that its fulfilment should involve, if such were God's good pleasure, even the loss of the child, for whom her natural love had awakened in such great strength when she feared it was about to be removed from her. She imagined, in that strange moment, that her new-found Lord might well call on her to give it up, in token that she would trust Him even though he slew her dearest; but it proved that her very first experience of His acknowledged sovereignty over her soul was to be in love and mercy, for the child, so far from being taken from her, began to recover from that very hour; whilst the faith she gained in the climax of her sorrow has never failed her since, and if the friend who prayed for her so long and well can see her from his place of rest, he sees in her a true and devoted servant won for the Lord he served."

"It is a striking history," said Bertrand, thoughtfully, as Mary ceased to speak; "and I think we may well believe that this poor erring soul was really granted to John Pemberton's strong pleading in the first instance, at least, while many who are struggling and perplexed might take courage, could they know how her own direct appeal to our Lord Christ accomplished so much more than any amount of intellectual study could have done."

And Mary answered, softly, "You remember the words, 'If with all your hearts ye truly seek Me, ye shall ever surely find Me,' they have indeed proved true in this case as in all others."

CHAPTER LVIII.

THE wish which Laura Brant had expressed to Mary de L'Isle, while they were still in Italy, that she should, in her company, visit the grave of John Pemberton before leaving Europe altogether, had been dictated in the first instance only by remorse for her false and selfish conduct towards him, but since she had learned, in the blessed experience of her renovated nature, to believe that she owed to his devotion, under God, the very gift of that eternal life which is in Christ, the desire to make a pilgrimage to his place of rest had assumed the significance and importance of a sacred duty in her mind. She spoke of it anxiously to her friend on the occasion of their very first meeting in Paris, and it was arranged that they were to carry out their purpose on the following evening.

Mary went previously to the spot with her husband and Charlie Davenant in the early morning, in order to see the monument which had just been erected there by Bertrand's orders, but she had a particular wish that Lurline's visit to the grave should be at the sunset hour, which was especially associated in her mind with the setting of the sun of that young life, which she so truly believed would rise again in the dawn of the everlasting day.

It was beautiful weather, and in the calm cool evening, when the two friends at last set out for Père la Chaise, the streets were crowded with the pleasure-loving Parisians, seated outside the cafés or strolling about under the trees which lined the boulevards. The whole scene was gay and pleasant, full of animation and life, so that the contrast struck Mary and Laura very forcibly, when, having alighted from their carriage, they passed through the great iron gates that admitted them into the realm of the dead.

At that late hour the vast cemetery was quite deserted, and they passed in silence up the long avenue of tombs till they reached a rising ground on the left, where they paused involuntarily for a moment, to look at the magnificent view of Paris which was there opened out before their eyes.

It seemed like the golden city of some fairy vision, as it lay beneath their feet bathed in the glory of the sunset glow; and it was hard to believe, as it shone there smiling and peaceful, with its fair gardens and its sparkling river, that so lately, in the reign of the terrible Commune, the smoke of its torment had been ascending to the heavens while its maddened children had been revelling in blood and flames.

Now all was serene and bright beneath a sky of pure pellucid blue, and Mary felt that the scene was an apt type of the life of him whose ashes they were about to visit, for his existence having closed in anguish and violence by murderous hands, had straightway passed into the peace and loveliness which for ever make glad the City of God on high.

She drew Lurline on to a solitary spot a little further up, which lay free and open to the sky at a distance from the trees and the other graves, and when they had reached it, while no word passed between them, it needed not the gentle detaining touch of Mary's hand to tell Laura Brant that she stood at last beside the sepulchre of her truest friend. It was easy to see that reverent and tender care had been bestowed on the whole arrangement of this resting-place, which made it strikingly unlike any other among the forest of tombs that surrounded it, where every variety of decoration and elaborate symbolism had been put in requisition by the somewhat meretricious taste which the French are apt to display in all that touches on religion. The narrow green mound that lay at Laura's feet had not a single wreath of everlasting flowers or other device to mar its quiet simplicity, only round it had been planted a number of violet roots, which now were blossoming again for the second time, and sending up their sweet incense through the soft still air, like the evening sacrifice; and at the head was placed the memorial, which had been executed according to Mary's direction. It consisted simply of a tall exquisitely proportioned obelisk of spotless alabaster, which shot up with its pure white shaft towards the calm and lucid sky, as if it were the very embodiment of an intense longing to reach that heavenly region. The flood of rose colour on the western horizon immediately behind it brought out in strong relief its stainless whiteness, and caused the words inscribed on it to glow as if carved in shining letters; Laura stooped to read them; first the name—which none could doubt was already written in the archives of heaven—next the date on which it was stated as a simple fact that he "gave away his life," and then below on the step that supported the obelisk was this one sentence—

"My soul is athirst for the living God."

No more; but it was enough, for it expressed all that had been the energising motive power, the very essence of John Pemberton's existence for the last and noblest year of his earthly probation. Laura stood and gazed on the fair white stone, and the green mound, and the glorious sunset beyond, from whence the pearl and opal-tinted clouds were rolling back like the gates of Paradise unfolding; and for a long time she did not break the silence, though her heaving breast and trembling lips told how deeply she was moved.

"Ah, Mary!" she said, at length, "you understood him well, and with pure and beautiful feeling you have done him honour in his grave; but think what it must be for me to know that beneath that sod lies cold and still the true heart I once trampled under foot, the heart that beat for me till it could beat no more!" and then sinking on her knees, she laid her head on the grave, and murmured, in a broken voice, "Forgive me, John, dear John, forgive, forgive me."

"Be very sure he has forgiven you long ago, dearest Laura," said Mary, softly; "and you must no more so bitterly regret the past, for all has turned out well and happily for him."

"Mary, I broke his heart; you know I did."

"Yes, dear Laura, but like a flower that gives forth its sweetest scent when crushed and bruised, that broken heart sent forth the fragrance of an undivided pure devotion to his Lord, such as he could never have offered without reserve had any mortal love retained him in its power. You see the steps by which he ascended to his Master, in the words that are inscribed on the base of the obelisk; dare we, dare even you, presume to mourn for him, when we know that his thirst is slaked now in the immediate presence of Him who is the well of Life?"

"No," said Laura, rising from her knees, "I do not indeed dare to mourn for him, but only for myself, that I so ruined the fair promise of his youth and poisoned all his earthly life. Mary, I think there is one great lesson to be drawn from his grave, which I would thankfully teach to others as it has been taught to me, for it seems to demonstrate most clearly that the greatest crimes are not those which are recognised as such in the world and punished by the law, the murders, and thefts, and open deeds of violence; but that it is the hidden treacheries, and cruelties, and hard indifference, with which under all fair seeming one human being has power to torture another, that must cry most loudly to our God for vengeance. Surely, far more deadly than the assassin's knife is the cold betrayal that stabs with a fatal wound the love of a faithful heart, and worse than any midnight thief is the false friend that robs a life of all power of joy by unkindness or desertion. Ah, Mary, I believe that when the lightning of God's judgment flashes on the souls of men, it will not be the open notorious sinners that will feel most keenly the scathing fires of His wrath, but those that in secret dealt irreparable blows at the hopes and joys of their fellow creatures, or poisoned the springs of happiness within them at their very source."

"No doubt you are right, Laura; and the unfeeling recklessness with which human beings inflict pain one upon another is among the darkest problems of our existence; but I think there is a brighter lesson to be learnt from this peaceful grave, which may well banish from your mind all gloomy thoughts connected with it. Do you not see, dear Laura, how like those rays which the vanished sun has left to illuminate all the earth from whence he has departed, so the bright true life which has disappeared within this tomb has left a shining light behind it that falls on darkened souls, and draws them after it into the full glory of the love of God."

"Yes, it has been so with me, at least; dear John did more for me in his death than ever in all his devoted life."

"Many besides yourself will have cause to say so. Charlie Davenant was telling me, only this morning, of the wonderful effect John's example has had upon himself. The influence came to him, too, in a singular manner. The Pemberton family in England had sent him the Bible John always used, to keep as a remembrance of his early friend, and when he was looking it over, he saw some words written with great care on the fly-leaf, and signed at the end with John's name, as if they were placed there to record a vow—they were these:—'As the Lord liveth, and as my Lord the King liveth, surely in what place my Lord the King shall be, whether in life or in death, even there will Thy servant be.'"

"How beautiful!" exclaimed Laura; "he applied it, no doubt, to himself and his Saviour, Christ."

"Yes, exactly; and Charlie saw this clearly, at once, and he said this revelation of the intense love felt by John Pemberton for his Divine Master filled him with such a sense of the blessedness of union there must have been between the Saviour and the saved, that he determined to take no rest till he, too, found that blest Redeemer and claimed Him for his own."

"Another jewel added to John's bright crown," said Laura, softly; "thank you for having told me this, Mary; it will be a happy thought to take away with me."

Stooping down once more, she pressed her lips on the green sod in token of a mute farewell, and then the friends, turning homeward, left the grave to its stillness and peace beneath the blue vault of Heaven.

(To be concluded.)

THE GHETTO, OR THE JEWS' QUARTER IN ROME, AND ITS TESTIMONY TO THE FAITH.

BY THE REV. THOMAS JACKSON, M.A., PREBENDARY OF ST. PAUL'S, AND RECTOR OF STOKE NEWINGTON.

"Behold, the day of the Lord cometh, and thy spoil shall be divided in the midst of thee. For I will gather all nations against Jerusalem to battle, and the city shall be taken, and half of the city shall go forth into captivity."—ZECH. xiv. 1, 2.

WHATEVER may be the variety of opinion held concerning the election of individuals to final salvation—that is whether such election is absolute or conditional—there is no doubt as to the absolute election of individuals, families, and nations, by Divine Providence, for the maintenance and extension of revealed truth. Such was the call of Abraham, the Father of the Faithful, destined to hand down to all posterities the doctrine of the unity of the Godhead, and the necessity of atonement by sacrifice, a man the lustre of whose character was so brilliant, that there is reason to believe that he was introduced into the Oriental Pantheon, some confusing him with Orpheus, that is UR PHEU, sprung from Ur of the Chaldees. Such were the children of Israel, who were separated from the rest of the nations, and placed by God in a kind of peninsula, of which the desert represented the sea, where from age to age, notwithstanding their stiff-neckedness and shortcomings, their election was maintained. But after their wilful rejection of the Messiah they lost that election; their Temple, with its sacrificial worship, was destroyed. They had invoked upon themselves a peculiar curse, and they were driven forth into exile, to be everywhere the objects of contumely and scorn. After the destruction of Jerusalem by Titus, to which reference was made in a previous paper, vast crowds were carried to Rome in slavery. The skilled artisans among them, as well as the ruder labourers, were employed in erecting the Flavian Amphitheatre, a building which proves that they possessed great engineering and mechanical skill, a fact probably due to the training of their childhood, according to which every Hebrew boy was taught a trade, from the members of the royal family downwards—the trade of carpenter, builder, or engineer, being deemed not unworthy of a king. But though so many thousands of them were in servitude, others resided as freemen on both banks of the Tiber, and by their talents and industry obtained riches and distinction. This might partly be owing to the influence of Herod and Agrippa, and their respective households and descendants. Julius, Augustus, and Tiberius Cæsar had, before this time, welcomed the Jews to the capital. Vespasian allowed them the free exercise of their religion, but obliged them to pay a tax, which is a singular illustration of the truth of the Old Testament Scriptures. The ancient Israelites had been in the habit of paying a poll-tax of half a shekel, which, says Jennings, in his Jewish Antiquities, when the people were numbered in the wilderness, was levied upon every man from twenty years old and upwards, and was appointed for the service of the Tabernacle of the congregation, thus forming a kind of Jewish church-rate. Whether it was at first national, annual, and stated, or only levied to meet peculiar exigencies, appears to be a matter of doubt; it certainly became annual and stated in the later years of the commonwealth. The half shekel was, in value of our money, a little more than one shilling and twopence. Now, it is a wonderful fact that Vespasian, while he allowed the Hebrews in Rome, as we have said, the full exercise of their religion, forced each of them to contribute this one shilling and twopence, or two drachmæ, which had hitherto been paid into the Temple treasury, to the support of the great shrine of Jove on the Capitoline Hill. It was this impost that our blessed Lord wrought a miracle to discharge, for, when at Capernaum, they that received the tribute came to Peter and demanded payment, Our Saviour, who was always ready to obey every reasonable law, although, as King in Jeshurun, he was personally exempt, commanded St. Peter—"Go thou to the sea, and cast a hook, and take up the fish that first cometh up, and when thou hast opened his mouth, thou shalt find a piece of money; that take, and give unto them for me and thee." The piece of money was a stater, worth, say some, a little less than half-a-crown, and therefore sufficient to pay the tax for both. The value of the stater, according to others, was larger, but that makes no difference to the argument. The curious and important fact is, that this customary payment is continued to the present day, and all the Jews in Rome go annually to the Camera Capitolina to make their contribution. Thus, a custom begun in the Sinaitic wilderness, maintained through all the changes and chances of the Jewish state to the time of our blessed Saviour, signalised and sealed with His special approbation, and deflected first to the support of heathenism, has come down to our times, and the half shekel is to this day paid to a Christian state, and thus forms a valuable illustration of the truth of the Old Testament narrative. It is a testimony to the faith.

It may be fairly questioned whether so old an impost, and one surrounded with so many religious and political sanctions, is levied in any other part of the civilised world.

The Hebrew race dwelling in Rome had for many ages a chequered and uncertain career. The seat of their original colony was not far from the present Ghetto, while several families established themselves in the quarter of the Trastevere, that is, the portion of the city Trans-Tiberim, across the Tiber. The Emperor Domitian banished them to the valley of Egeria, a spot between the present basilica of St. John Lateran and the ruined baths of Caracalla. The anti-pope Anacletus, who died 1138, was the son of a baptised Jew. Chemistry and medical science had come to Rome chiefly from Arabic sources, and the close connection of the Hebrew race with Arabia manifested itself in the skill of the Jewish physicians, who threw a sort of shield over their persecuted fellow-countrymen. Eugenius IV., who was pope from 1431 to 1439, absolutely interdicted all Catholics in his dominions from buying and selling, from sharing a house, or eating or drinking, with the devoted race. They were not allowed to walk about the more-frequented streets, to build any new places of worship, or to occupy any public appointment. Mr. Augustus Hare, in his interesting work entitled, "Walks in Rome," informs us that Paul II. increased their humiliation, by compelling them to run races during the carnival, as if they were brute beasts, amidst the hoots of the populace; this barbarous custom lasted for two hundred years. We read of the races in 1667, that the asses ran first, then the Jews, naked with the exception of a band round their loins, then the buffaloes, and then the Barbary horses. Since the time of Clement IX., in 1668, the Jews have been permitted to pay a sum, equivalent to sixty pounds sterling of our money, instead of actually racing in the Corso.

But the full weight of their judicial ignominy, and the final accomplishment of the old prophecies concerning them, did not culminate until Paul IV. shut them up within the walls of a precinct called the Ghetto. This word is derived from the Hebrew chat. It signifies cut down, broken, cast-off, abandoned. Another form of the word is applied by Isaiah to Babylon: "How art thou cut down to the ground, which didst weaken the nations;" "Moab shall howl over Nebo; and every beard shall be cut off." The same expression is applied to Moab by Jeremiah: "The horn of Moab is cut off, and his arm is broken." Paul ordered that they should never be permitted to circulate in the streets of Rome, unless the women wore yellow veils and the men yellow hats. Yellow, as we know, in some countries is the sign of mourning, in others it is the symbol of ignominy. At any rate, the poor Jews were now driven into the confined precincts of the Ghetto, and walls were built around their prison. With their usual contempt for the rights of property, the popes virtually confiscated the estates which lay within the enclosure, giving to the Jews a sort of tenant-right of perpetual occupation, though the freehold was continued in the hands of the former proprietors. When Sixtus V. assumed the pontificate, remembering that the Jews were of the family from whom Christ came, he treated them more liberally, allowing them to open shops and build libraries and synagogues. But all this was undone by Clement VIII. and his immediate successors. In those days, about the beginning of the seventeenth century, they were debarred from all trade, except that in old clothes and iron rubbish, while they were forced to attend church once a week to hear a sermon against their peculiar tenets. Police agents made a raid in every house, and haled men, women, and children to the distasteful service. If at church they were inattentive or ill-behaved, or showed other signs of dissatisfaction, they were immediately stripped and soundly beaten with rods. These inhuman laws were not abrogated till the early years of the present pope, Pius IX. The first sign which he gave of a kindly interest in their welfare was when he bestowed a small alms on an aged and decrepit beggar, who was evidently a Hebrew of the Hebrews. "Sire," said somebody, "he is a Jew!" The pontiff (who is naturally a genial man) instantly replied, "What does that matter? he is a man."

Although the Jews are no longer absolutely compelled to reside in the Ghetto, yet in point of fact very few families have removed from the neighbourhood. This may be partly owing to the poverty of the great mass of the people; but it is at least equally due to inveterate habit and prejudice. The present number of the inhabitants is supposed to be between four and five thousand, and where they manage to stow themselves must be an almost insoluble problem. The remains of the portico of Octavia are yet to be seen in the very centre of the settlement—that splendid habitation, with its numerous courts and corridors, in which Titus was feasted as the concluding act of his triumph, when he returned from the destruction of Jerusalem. He went first to pay his vows to Capitoline Jove, leaving poor Simon, the last of the Pharisee patriots, at the foot of the hill, to be hurried into the dark dungeon of the Mamertine, and there, according to the tigerish brutality of Rome, to be put to a cruel death.

(To be concluded.)

SURLY BOB.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "SHAG AND DOLL," "HUGH'S HEROISM," ETC.

CHAPTER XVI.—WISHES FULFILLED.

JOHNNIE bore his operation well; and, owing partly to the extreme care that was taken of him, and his own patient happy little nature, he went on favourably afterwards, and made steady progress towards recovery.

When Bob was first admitted to see him it was indeed a joyful meeting between the two brothers. Bob, for once in his life, talked quite fast, for he had so many questions to ask Johnnie about himself, and so much to tell him of all the good fortune which had befallen him since he had last seen him, whilst the little fellow lay, with a bright pleased smile upon his face, wondering at it all, yet rejoicing in it heartily.

"Dear old Bob, I am so glad! It must be fine to be you now!"

"Aye, I never thought as such luck would fall to my lot! I don't know what to make of it all; they're so kind, every one of 'em. You would love Master Edgar, I know; and Mr. and Mrs. Deveron are the nicest lady and gentleman as I ever come across. And Mrs. Heywood—don't I just like living with her! And, Johnnie, she says she'll come and see you some day, as soon as ever the doctor 'll give leave. But he said I was only to stay a few minutes this first time; and there's the nurse I do believe coming already to say I must be a-going. But you'll make haste and get well now, won't you, Johnnie?"

That evening, as Bob and Mrs. Heywood sat beside the fire together, Mr. Heywood being out, the two had a long talk, as they often had when they were alone like this. For Mrs. Heywood had a way of winning confidence from every one—even little Edgar used to confide all his secrets to her, whilst Bob by this time had come to feel he could tell her anything almost as well as he could Johnnie.

They had begun by having a little reading, as Mrs. Heywood, for the sake of the lad's improvement, always made him read aloud whenever there was an opportunity, whilst Mr. Heywood used to set him copies, which Bob tried hard to write beautifully. But this evening the book was soon laid down, that they might talk about Johnnie.

Bob was in great spirits at having seen him again, and at having been assured by the nurse that he was going on well, and fairly on the road towards recovery. Without this assurance he would have been vexing himself, and fretting greatly over the pale thin little face which had looked so fragile and so delicate.

"I wonder how soon he'll be able to come out of the hospital," he was saying. "He says they've all been so kind to him there, he'll be quite sorry to leave 'em, only when I told him how dreadful bad I'd missed him, he said he'd wanted me too just as bad. But it's a puzzle to me," and Bob ran the fingers of both hands through his hair, making it in a state of wild confusion, "what he's to do when he comes out, and where he's to go."

"Won't he go back to your aunt's as before!" asked Mrs. Heywood.

"I s'pose he must," responded Bob, with a sigh.

Mrs. Heywood looked up from her work, and glanced at him.

"There's nowhere else for him to go, is there?"

"No. Not till I can earn enough to keep us both, unless ——"

"Unless what?"

"Well, I was a-thinking as p'raps—" and again Bob stopped.

"What were you thinking?" asked Mrs. Heywood, seeing that the lad had something very much at heart, but was hesitating about speaking it out. "What were you thinking?"

"Johnnie's such a little fellow; it wouldn't take more to keep him than me, would it?" was the unexpected inquiry.

"No; I should think it might take rather less than more," returned Mrs. Heywood with a smile.

"Then," continued Bob, making a bold plunge in a sort of desperate manner; "I've been a-wondering whether you'd let him come here in my place, and I'd pay all I earn every week for his keep."

"But what are you going to do? Where are you going?"

"Oh, I'd make shift somewhere; I shouldn't care for anything so long as I could see Johnnie every day, and know as he was happy. And oh! wouldn't he like to be here! why he'd get well and strong in this place in no time!"

"But though you seem to think you could do without a bed at nights—only I don't see how you could manage to sleep out of doors this weather——" began Mrs. Heywood, when Bob interrupted her.

"Oh, I could find some barn, or place like that, perhaps. May-be Mr. Deveron would let me sleep in his barn out there, for I wouldn't do no harm; anyhow, I could manage somehow!"

"But, supposing you could manage about the sleeping, how should you do about the rest? for if you gave all your week's wages for Johnnie, what would you have to live upon yourself? How would you get your own food?"

Bob looked puzzled for a minute. He seemed to have forgotten that he could not live entirely upon air. But he was not to be daunted. His mind was too much set upon this plan of his; and now that he had once broached it, he seemed to desire it more eagerly than ever.

"Oh, I could do upon very little; next to nothing I dare say. And p'raps I could work more hours, or do something in the evenings just to earn a crust of bread. I'm sure I could pick up that somehow; and I shouldn't want nothing else if only Johnnie could be here. Oh, he would like it so!"

Bob was looking eagerly and wistfully at Mrs. Heywood as he spoke, as if all his hopes depended upon her answer. But she did not at once give a direct one. Laying her hand kindly on the boy's arm, she said, "You're a good brother, Bob, to little Johnnie; and I'm glad to see it. It'll keep you from a deal of harm to have always one soft warm place in your heart; and as long as he is your first thought and care, and you can put yourself aside for him, I shan't fear much for you. Mr. Heywood says he never had a lad so steady and hard-working, and I expect little Johnnie is at the bottom of it. You're always looking on to being able to make a home for him, isn't that it?"

Bob nodded assent, whilst his cheeks glowed at Mrs. Heywood's words of praise. But after all, it wasn't praise for himself but permission to make that exchange with Johnnie which he wanted.

"Then may he come here in my place?" he asked, earnestly. "'Cause he'd be so miserable back at aunt's without me! He'd be worse off than he was afore. He couldn't nohow go back there all by himself!"

"Well, well, we'll consider what can be done," returned Mrs. Heywood. "But I should have thought the room and bed up-stairs was large enough for you both," she added, with a smile. "You are getting a big fellow I know, but still I should have thought you two could have managed there!"

"Do you mean——?" began Bob, with an eager look, and then stopping short.

"I mean that I'm not going to let you turn out to sleep in barns, or any such places as those you seem to have taken a fancy to. If Johnnie comes at all you must share your bed with him, unless, as I said before, you think it wouldn't be big enough for you both."

Bob smiled at the idea, as he exclaimed, "I never thought as you'd be willing to take the two of us; but Johnnie would be so good you'd scarce know he was in the house. Oh, how nice it would be!" and Bob's eyes grew bright at the thought of having his brother with him in that pretty little room up-stairs. How snug they should be together! How different it would be from their late quarters, where they used to lie shivering with the cold in that out-house of theirs!

But nothing more could be said on the subject then, as Mr. Heywood came in at that moment, and his wife turned to speak to him.

One fine afternoon, a day or two afterwards, Bob was at work in the grounds, when he heard the sounds of carriage wheels coming up the drive, and, lifting his head for a moment, he saw that it was Mrs. Deveron and Edgar returning from a drive. He again bent over his work, whilst the carriage drew up to the front door, and then drove round to the stables.

A few minutes afterwards he heard his name called by Edgar, who came running towards him.

"Bob, mamma wants to speak to you, so make haste and come to her. There she is, walking towards us; and she has something to tell you, Bob. We've been to the hospital and seen Johnnie;" and Edgar, who could no longer keep back this piece of news, turned to see what effect it had upon the other.

The latter looked surprised and pleased enough to satisfy the eager little fellow, and by this time they had reached Mrs. Deveron, to whom Bob touched his cap, after which he waited for her to speak.

"I dare say my little boy has already told you where we have been this afternoon," she began; "and I know you will be glad to hear that Johnnie is going on well, and getting on as fast as could be expected. He is a dear little fellow, Bob."

How Bob's face lighted up at these words! No one at that moment could have said it was either heavy or unpleasing.

"And now I want to have a little talk with you about Johnnie's future prospect, and what he is to do when he is well enough to come out of the hospital; for I am quite interested in him, and so is my little boy here," and Mrs. Deveron glanced at Edgar.

"Yes," began the child, "and I want him to come and live here, because you know, Bob, you'd like to have him with you; and whatever would he do away from you!"

"Yes, it would never do to separate you two, as you stand so alone, and seem to be all in all to each other," said Mrs. Deveron; "for he told me what a good kind brother you've always been to him, Bob. Besides, he will want good fresh air and food to help him to get up his strength, so we must have him out here, at least for a time, until we see what can be done. I know Mrs. Heywood will be willing to have him, for she was talking about it this morning. But she must go and see him herself, and then she will long to bring him out here, and do all she can for him. So I shall propose her paying him a visit to-morrow."

"But if Johnnie comes," she went on, "it must be at my expense, for you have as much as you can manage to pay for yourself. Mrs. Heywood told me of your plan," added Mrs. Deveron, with a smile; "but we couldn't allow any one working for us to have no place to sleep in at night, or to be going about half-starved by day. But you know if you go on steadily and industriously, you will soon be able to earn higher wages, and then you can help to maintain little Johnnie, and be as independent as you like."

How happy Bob felt, when, after a few more kind pleasant words from Mrs. Deveron, he returned to his work, whilst Edgar followed him, and stood by, chattering fast, as he told him all about their visit to Johnnie, and how he had promised to go and see him again if his mamma would allow him, and then he would take him one of his picture books to amuse him.

"Perhaps mamma will let me go to-morrow with Mrs. Heywood; I'll run and ask her."

And off flew Edgar, who, young as he was, had already learnt to feel and think for others, and found no pleasure so great as that of ministering in his little way to those around him.

(To be concluded.)

"THE QUIVER" BIBLE CLASS.

316. Quote a passage showing our Lord's love to Jerusalem.

317. Where do we find Miriam, the sister of Moses, mentioned as a leader of the children of Israel?

318. In India it is stated that serpents are ofttimes found in people's houses. Quote a passage which implies that this occurred also among the Jews.

319. What words in the Old Testament correspond to those of our Lord in Matthew x. 35, 36?

320. What reason did our Lord give why He was not present at the death of Lazarus?

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS ON PAGE 784.

303. "Art thou better than populous No, that was situate among the rivers, that had the waters round about it, whose rampart was the sea, and the wall was from the sea?" (Nahum iii. 8).

304. That there should not be left one stone upon another that should not be thrown down (Mark xiii. 2).

305. Jehoram, the son of Jehoshaphat, King of Judah (2 Chron. xxi. 18, 19).

306. Habakkuk ii. 2.

307. One half of their beards was shaven off, and their garments were cut off at the middle (2 Sam. x. 4).

308. Because the scorpion has the power of rolling itself up into a round ball similar to an egg.

309. "The sun shall not smite thee by day, nor the moon by night" (Psalm cxxi. 6).

(Drawn by F. CARLESS.)

DESOLATION: A PICTURE.

LOOMING in shadow through the dark'ning night,
A time-worn castellated tower uprears
Its hoary frontage grey with weight of years,
Battered and crashed by many a long-past fight:
A dreary waste of sombre moor and fen
Stretches in gloomy solitude around:
Nor beaten track nor faintly-echoed sound
Tells aught of habitation there of men:

Around the walls, coarse lank grass waves its head:
Now and again the marsh-frog's croaking note
Disturbs the silence; in the empty moat
A sentry stork stands sleeping; from their bed,
'Mid crumbling stones by twining ivy wooed,
Grim night-owls gaze on Nature's solitude.

G. W.

THE GLORY OF GOD AND THE GREATNESS OF MAN.

BY THE REV. JAMES SPENCE, D.D., AUTHOR OF "HOURS WITH DANIEL," ETC. ETC.

"Thus saith the high and lofty One that inhabiteth eternity, whose name is Holy; I dwell in the high and holy place, with him also that is of a contrite and humble spirit, to revive the spirit of the humble, and to revive the heart of the contrite ones." —ISAIAH lvii. 15.

"CANST thou, by searching, find out God? Canst thou find out the Almighty unto perfection?" (Job xi. 17.) There is but one reply to this question of Zophar, the Naamathite: Man cannot by his own searching find out God. Vain is his boasted power of reason, and feeble the flights of his intellect in this grand pursuit. "The world by wisdom knew not God." Nor is man alone in his incompetence for this sublime task, for angels partake of the same inability; the Divine glory dazzles them, and they have to veil their faces with their wings in the presence of the effulgent Majesty of Jehovah.

But what neither men nor angels could do, God Himself has done. He has come forth from the chambers of His mysterious self-existence, and revealed Himself; He has come down to us, and made His glory to pass before us in the grace and gospel of His incarnate Son. Jesus Christ was the brightness of the Father's glory, and the express image of His person. But long before this personal embodiment of His character and glory in the Messiah, there were frequent revealings of Himself to holy men of old, who "spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost." Here, in most sublime language, by the mouth of the prophet Isaiah, He declares Himself, in terms which have ministered consolation and imparted hope to the children of men in every age. The ground of this declaration seems to have been the unbelief and indifference of the people of Judah. They evinced an awful hardihood, in mocking God, and practising the grossest idolatry; yet, notwithstanding their backsliding and sin, He assures them of His willingness to receive, pardon, and save the contrite and penitent. Two things are here prominently brought before us: the glory of God in the light of His condescension; and the greatness of man in the view of his imperfection.

I. The glory of God in the light of His condescension.—Condescension is a relative term. That which is condescension in one person in a certain station of life, might be no condescension in another occupying a different station. But here is condescension in connection with infinite glory. We may justly exclaim with the Psalmist, "What is man, that thou art mindful of him? and the son of man, that thou visitest him?" (Ps. viii. 4.)

There is the glory of position:—"The high and lofty One;" "I dwell in the high and holy place." These terms clearly express majesty and supremacy. Jehovah is King of kings and Lord of lords. Feeble is human language to convey any idea of the glory and attributes of God. We speak of the king of a country, and may be able to form some idea of the extent of his dominion, how large soever it is, but how can we estimate the dominion or illustrate the supremacy of God so as to comprehend them? Our ideas of space may grow from a parish to a county, from a county to a country, from a country to a continent; but how can we grasp the idea of illimitable space and boundless dominion—of power everywhere displayed, and presence everywhere proved? Pass in thought from the plain or prairie to the hill, from the hill to the mountain height, as of some Alpine peak, which pierces the skies, and your idea of expanse rises wonderfully. But when you pass in imagination to some point in the airy empyrean, whence the globe itself on which we dwell is only a speck amongst myriad worlds that roll in immensity, the mind seems lost in wonder and awe. Our notions of space confound us with their impressiveness and power. Yet God is supreme, above all, reigning in majesty, the high and lofty One, dwelling in the high and holy place. How ineffable His glory! Yet He dwells with men!

There is the glory of duration—"the high and lofty One that inhabiteth eternity"—a marvellous expression, which no human power can grasp. Here we are creatures of a day, but Jehovah is for ever and ever, from everlasting to everlasting. He inhabits eternity, and fills it too. Go step by step up the ladder of time until you reach the top, and then try to gaze forth upon a past eternity. It is, indeed, confounding to feeble and finite apprehension! Jehovah always has been. We can go back a few years in our own remembrances. In history we can go back to Calvary, and range over eighteen centuries with certainty and sure footing; yea, we can go back to a hoarier antiquity —to Sinai, to the time when the pyramids of Egypt were still young and when the foundations of the Tower of Babel were laid, to Paradise and Eden "when the morning stars sang together and the sons of God shouted for joy." Then God was, self-existent, eternal. Modern science leads us still farther back, amid cycles of unknown ages, when mysterious changes were proceeding to make this globe fit for the habitation of man, but we get no nearer the idea of a past eternity. And God always will be, for He inhabiteth eternity. When time is no more, and the heavens shall be rolled up as a scroll, when the elements shall melt with fervent heat, and all things as now seen shall have changed and passed away, then God will be, without variableness or shadow of turning. He is the King eternal, immortal, immutable. Such knowledge is too high for us; panting thought toils after it in vain. Yet this God is our God, and condescends to dwell with men. Here is the glory of the Maker and the greatness of the creature.

There is also the glory of character, described in the one designation, "holy"—"Whose name is Holy; I dwell in the high and holy place." This designation He has chosen, for His name and nature are one. In Jehovah holiness is everything, the goodness and perfection of His being, and men are summoned to give thanks at the remembrance of it. The main idea, perhaps, in relation to ourselves, is His perfect separation and infinite distance from all evil. What impurity is we know, and God is infinitely removed from that; so is He from injustice, unkindness, and every aspect and influence of moral evil—at an infinite distance from all. None but the pure in heart can see God, "Yea, the heavens are not clean in His sight." The whole economy of Moses was calculated to produce the impression of the Divine holiness; the idea of the ineffable purity of God was present in all the arrangements and requirements of the Levitical law. The grandest proof of this character of Jehovah is in the character of Jesus Christ His Incarnate Son, who was "holy, harmless, undefiled, and separate from sinners," and whose redemptive work was to put away sin by the sacrifice of Himself. The anthem of Moses at the Red Sea found its refrain in the words—"Who is like thee, O Lord, glorious in holiness?" And the anthem of the angels in heaven is—"Holy, holy, holy is the Lord God Almighty, which was, and is, and is to come" (Rev. iv. 8). The whole Church in every age is summoned to give thanks at the remembrance of His holiness. Yet this God of infinite purity condescends to dwell with men. Here is the glory—the high and lofty One who inhabits eternity, and whose name is Holy visits the contrite heart, and revives the spirit of the humble. Here, therefore, we see also—

II. The greatness of man in view of his imperfection.—His imperfection is suggested by the word contrite, for we are sinners, and have offended God, and contrition is our right position before our Maker now. Our greatness is seen in the fact that the heart, when contrite, is capable of receiving God as its guest. There is no greatness for us like this wondrous capacity of our nature. Our tendency is to find or fancy some measure of glory in association with the rich, the learned, the great; but God's presence with us is our loftiest possession and greatest honour. Wealth, learning, genius, may belong to a man, and make him great in the world's esteem, but a broken heart is by far the finest evidence of human greatness, the very thing which proves his degeneracy and imperfection, for it shows his power of resisting God and at the same time his capability of receiving Him again. The being who can oppose the Divine will, is the being who is capable of a living and loving harmony with the Almighty, because he can receive and welcome His presence. To be conscious of our imperfection, and to be contrite, is the first step towards our true greatness.

1. Contrition, then, is the condition of greatness. Now, contrition implies sin, and expresses sorrow; humility is the lowly feeling flowing, as a habit of mind, from such contrition. The one springs out of the other: the one is the blossom, while the other is the fruit. Sin shows a tremendous power—the power of opposing God—and is the casting down of our glory; hence a broken heart is the first token of a man's returning greatness; it is the first coming of the contrite prodigal son to himself, and then returning to his father. "The sacrifices of God are a broken spirit: a broken and a contrite heart, O God, thou wilt not despise" (Ps. li. 17). Are we not transgressors? Are we not sinful, prodigal children? Are we not guilty, and have need of repentance? For a man to possess true greatness is for him first to become contrite and humble, that God may come in to him. Who was the greater—the Pharisee, boasting of his good deeds, satisfied with himself, and conscious of no spiritual need; or the publican, striking on his breast, and crying, "God be merciful to me a sinner," without daring so much as to lift up his eyes to heaven? God will not come to dwell with men who are not contrite, and who do not feel their need of him. "To this man," says He, "will I look, even to him that is poor and of a contrite spirit, and trembleth at my word" (Isaiah lxvi. 2). Repentance is the beginning, the point from which every man must start to reach the reality, consciousness, and joy of his own true greatness. Think of it: not intellectual eminence, but contrition; not grasp of genius, but penitence; not earthly honours, but humility; not store of worldly riches, but poverty of spirit; then the high and lofty One will come and dwell with you, to show you His glory. This will be greatness, indeed, which, in some sense, angels themselves may envy, and it is within your reach.

2. Consider the realisation of this true greatness. The contrite spirit is the scene of the Divine presence. God manifests Himself to the humble soul as He does not to the world. The broken heart becomes, through the Divine healing, a living temple, where God unveils His glory, and where He condescends to dwell. You value the presence with you of a dear human friend, the very beaming of whose eye upon you lights up your soul with pleasure, and with whom interchange of thought gives you elevation and delight. What then must the in-dwelling of the high and lofty One be to the humble soul? "I will come in to him, and sup with him, and he with me"—the fellowship of the Infinite with the finite, of the perfect Father with the imperfect children. God gives, and the contrite receives; the humble one longs, and God satisfies and fills him out of His own fulness. This is a privilege which cannot be described, and which is known only to those who enjoy it. To be penitent is to be great; to be nothing, that God may come in and be everything, all that we need, and all that we can desire. The truly great men are those who are habitations of God through the Spirit, living temples of Him whose name is Holy.

The contrite spirit is the sphere of Divine operation—"to revive the spirit of the humble, and to revive the heart of the contrite ones." Many are the evil influences which work in the human heart to distract it, deaden it, and accomplish its desolation and ruin. How blessed and glorious then to have God—the God who created us—working in us "to will and to do His good pleasure!" His working is for the true refreshing of the soul and its renewal of life. Thus only is it fortified against all spiritual foes, raised above the world, and bound up "in the bundle of life with the Lord God." The influence of the world is stupefying and destructive; the in-dwelling of God is quickening, cheering, purifying; it dispels darkness, dissipates doubt, casts out fear, and fills the heart with gladness and hope. Man's power may be seen, as, alas! it is often seen, in resisting God and opposing His will.

This is a tremendous human prerogative. The Almighty rules among the orbs of heaven, among the fruits, and flowers, and rocks of this earth, among the material influences of time, and meets with no resistance to His will; but man has the terrible power of resisting Him. On the other hand, man's true greatness is seen in his capacity of receiving God and in welcoming Him to reign within, so that he may be the Divine workmanship created anew in Christ Jesus, and, bear again the image of his Maker. Here, then, is greatness offered to all the sinful and guilty. The glory of the Mighty God will dwell in you if you be converted and become as little children. If you are in sorrow, mourning for sin, and broken-hearted, God Himself will visit you; Christ will live in you; and though He is King and Lord of all, He will make your souls, as His temples, radiant with the tokens of His presence, and rich in the possession of His power and beauty; only in His indwelling can you realise the true dignity, or reach the true destiny of your manhood. "Blessed are the poor in spirit: for theirs is the kingdom of heaven." "Blessed are they that mourn: for they shall be comforted." Thus do we, the feeble, the finite, and the fallen, come to partake of the nature and the fulness of the Almighty and the Infinite—heirs of God and joint-heirs with Jesus Christ. The way to greatness is the way of humility; the way to rise to the throne is to lie lowly at the footstool.

THE GHETTO, OR THE JEWS' QUARTER IN ROME, AND ITS TESTIMONY TO THE FAITH. (Concluded.)

BY THE REV. THOMAS JACKSON, M.A., PREBENDARY OF ST. PAUL'S, AND RECTOR OF STOKE NEWINGTON.

THE streets of the Ghetto are lofty and narrow. On either side there branch off blind alleys, in some places not more than five or six feet in width. They seem to end in nothing, and are indescribably squalid and miserable. In some of the overcrowded lanes of Continental cities the eye and the nostril of the traveller are regaled with pots of roses and tubs of flowering myrtles and oleanders, placed on the sills of the windows or at the sides of the front door. No such pleasant signs of civilisation greet one in the Ghetto. Some of these lanes remind one irresistibly of the Vicoli of Pompeii, which are scarcely wide enough for two people to walk abreast. The candlestick, with its seven branches, which is figured on the arch of Titus, is often to be seen over the Jewish doorways, even in the most uninviting corners. It is said that there are elegantly furnished apartments concealed behind all this squalor, but the Jew, with characteristic timidity, buries his wealth, and enjoys his luxuries in secret. One may purchase almost anything in the quarter, but generally in a damaged condition—diamonds, rubies, and emeralds, Venetian mirrors, the laces of Seville, the embroidered and gilded leather of Morocco, the highly-tempered blades of Toledo, and the diapered scimitars of Damascus, all are to be found here, mingled with heaps of lachrymatories, mediæval ironmongery, antiquities real and forged, coins of the Emperors, of recent manufacture but admirably imitated, and, in short, the complete contents of an old curiosity shop. A German traveller, quoted by Mr. Hare, admirably describes the crowded precinct, and at the same time adds a forcible quotation from Scripture, showing how exactly its condition is a fulfilment of inspired prophecy. "I have often seen," says he, "with a feeling of pain, the pale, stooping, starving figures laboriously plying the needle. . . . Misery stares forth from the tangled hair, and complains silently in the yellow brown faces, and no beauty of feature recalls the countenance of Rachel, Leah, or Miriam —only sometimes a glance from a deep-sunk piercing black eye, that looks up from its needle and rags, and seems to say, 'From the daughter of Zion all her beauty is departed; she that was great among the nations, and princess among the provinces, how is she become tributary! She weepeth sore in the night, and her tears are on her cheeks; among all her lovers she hath none to comfort her; all her friends have dealt treacherously with her. They are become her enemies. Judah has gone into captivity, because of affliction and because of great servitude; she dwelleth among the heathen, she findeth no rest; all her persecutors overtook her between the straits. How hath the Lord covered the daughter of Zion with a cloud in his anger!'"

The experience of Mr. Stillman Hillard, an eminent American, corroborates that of the observant German. "On entering the enclosure," says he, "the aspect of the place and its inhabitants leaves a uniform impression of poverty, desolation, and filth. The streets are narrow, crooked, and dark; the houses, which have a look of mouldy decay, are crowded with life, so that in fine weather the occupants swarm out like bees and sit on the steps or on the pavement in front of the door, and there pursue their usual avocations. There are many shops, but usually of a humble class. The Jewish race is here seen in its saddest and lowest plight, not gilded by even a ray of its old glories. There is nothing that betokens the existence of wealth, and the power that wealth bestows. There are no dignified forms; no keen and penetrating brows; none of those beautiful children who, in other lands, remind the Hebrews of the youth of their nation; none of those superb black eyes which blend the passion of Judith, the softness of Esther, and the sadness of Rachel. The general countenance is commonplace, stamped with the impress of cares and homely occupations, touched by no sparkles of pride or hope. The complexion seems colourless, reminding one of plants that have grown in the dark, the result of meagre living, dark abodes, and imperfect ventilation. The imagination of D'Israeli would find nothing here suggestive of proud recollections or animating hopes, but only a forlorn and crushed life, which dwells in the petty wants and works of the present, and borrows no dignity from the past or the future."

The author of this paper visited Rome in the early spring of the present year, and found the Ghetto exactly as the foregoing travellers have described it. Just at the beginning you behold the small church of Santa Maria del Pianto, bearing a Hebrew and Latin inscription, which laments over the traditional hardness of heart of the Jewish race—"All day long I have stretched out my hands to a disobedient and gainsaying people." Hard by is the chief synagogue, comparatively speaking a handsome and well-adorned building, its splendour forming an honourable contrast to the squalor and misery around it, and showing that the descendants of David still think more of the glory of the house of the Lord than that of their own private dwellings. Reversing the order of the builders of St. Peter's, the choir is at the west end; but opposite, on the eastern wall is the holy of holies. Unhappily, I had no opportunity of seeing the interior, so I must content myself with the accounts of others. On arriving at the Pescaria, or fish-market, the nostril is afflicted with fearful odours of fish in the last stage of putrefaction. Hard by appear the ruins of the Theatre of Marcellus, a building begun by Julius Cæsar and completed by Augustus. The twelve arches still standing on the outward wall of the auditorium harmonise with the dirty surroundings of the neighbourhood. They are occupied by tinkers and tinsmiths, and dealers in old iron and bronze. Thither go the cognoscenti, to try and find some old Roman key or hinge or lamp, or the fragment of a sword, or of a rare marble or mosaic, of which, it is said, the modern blacksmiths always keep a sufficient supply; while within a short walk is the ancient church (Santa Maria in Cosmedin), the portico of which contains a singular round slab of marble, probably dating from the times of the emperors, something like a human face, and containing a narrow slit in the centre. This hole, in the Middle Ages, was used as an ordeal for suspected perjurers, the mouth-like aperture being said to close upon the fingers of the perjured person. A modern traveller, on visiting the spot, placed his hand in the hole, and used words to this effect, "The Jews' quarter in Rome is the cleanest and most delicious spot upon the face of the earth;" but the bocca della verita, for so the disc is called, remained just the same as before.

The Ghetto is perhaps the most densely-peopled spot in any European city, and, as we have said, it consists of streets parallel to the river, and connected by narrow lanes. The thoroughfare nearest the river itself is called Via de' Fiumari. Old Father Tiber is just as uncertain and inconsistent a river as he was in the days of Horace and Ovid. He overflows his banks; he sends down great quantities of dirt-coloured mud from the upper country—it is a mere pretence to call this mud yellow. The sweepings of Regent Street, in London, turned into the Regent's Canal, and well stirred up, might be favourably compared with the Tiber during a flood. The melting of the snow on the Apennine mountains generally precedes these inundations. The first bad effects of them is felt in the Jewish quarter. The street and alleys nearest the river are covered with a layer of mud, mingled with sewage filth, varying with the height and extent of the inundation. It might be presumed that such a catastrophe would be highly prejudicial to the health of the inhabitants, but in point of fact it seems to exercise no appreciable influence upon the locality. This has been attributed to various causes. First, to the frequent ablutions of the people, who are for the most part, nominally at least, Pharisees of the straitest sect. They practise the custom of washing their hands and feet before their meals—a custom so strictly commanded among the Jews at the time of our blessed Redeemer, that to neglect it was, according to Dr. Hammond, to be held guilty of a capital crime. "He that taketh meat with unwashen hands," says one of their rabbis, "is worthy of death." The same custom was observed before offering a sacrifice. It was also usual in old times to offer water to a stranger to wash his feet, and where the host wished especially to welcome a stranger, he washed that stranger's feet himself. It was a studied slight to our blessed Redeemer when the Pharisee neglected to perform this customary duty. This healthiness has also been partly attributed to their copious use of olive oil, both as a medicine and an article of diet. On this point, I regret to state, I have not been able to obtain any reliable particulars. Another cause, much more readily appreciable, is the habit they practise of whitewashing their houses on the return of their great festivals.

Should the brilliant plans of Garibaldi for the deflection of the Tiber and the formation of a new port at Fiumicino on the shore of the Mediterranean be carried into effect, the probability is that the Tiber will no longer overflow its banks, unless the works are permitted to get out of repair. The alluvial deposits of the Tiber cause the delta at its mouth to advance on an average upwards of twelve feet annually; thus any port has a tendency to silt up. The channel into the sea must be kept open by artificial means. Now, if when the snows melt on the Apennine and Alban mountains, the rising waters can be turned aside by a weir or dyke, and sent by a straight canal to Fiumicino, the hope is that the scour will keep open the mouth of the new harbour, while a sufficient quantity of water, regulated by sluices, will still remain to fill the ancient channel, and prevent any inconvenience from being felt in Rome itself. In such a case, the healthiness of the Ghetto would be materially increased. But the realisation of the plan is at present problematical, chiefly on account of the poverty of the Italian exchequer. It has been conjectured that, if only the course of the river as it passes through Rome could be dried up for a twelvemonth, the spoils to be recovered buried deep beneath its alluvial bed would amply suffice to pay the cost of the undertaking. But what capitalist would be inclined to advance money upon the contingency?

It may be naturally inquired, why should the Ghetto at Rome have been selected as an illustration of the fulfilment of inspired prophecy concerning the perpetuation of the Jews as a separate people, and the bitter wrongs they have endured from Christian and Mahomedan powers, when the same evidence might have been obtained by a short and compendious description of their adventures in many centres of population, as, for instance, London? The answer is, that just as biography is a more pointed instrument for imparting instruction than history with its impalpable generalisations, so by considering a limited precinct like the Ghetto in detail the mind of the reader is more likely to be informed and impressed. But what is to be the future of this strange and peculiar race? Standing on the Appian Way, on the very blocks of lava which St. Paul might have trodden, and musing over all that Israel lost in rejecting the Messiah, the traveller cannot help thinking that a time is shortly coming when they will look with the eye of reverent, regretful, penitential love on Him whom they formerly pierced, and, as St. Paul argues, "If the fall of them has been the riches of the world, and the diminishing of them the riches of the Gentiles, how much more their fulness? If the casting away of them has been the reconciling of the world, what shall the receiving of them be but life from the dead?" Well might the eloquent apostle sum up his prediction concerning the final conversion and salvation of Israel with the magnificent apostrophe, addressed to the Christians at Rome—"Oh, the depth of the riches, both of the wisdom and knowledge of God! how unsearchable are His judgments, and His ways past finding out! For who hath known the mind of the Lord? Or who hath been His counsellor? Or who hath first given to Him, and it shall be recompensed to him again? For of Him, and through Him, and to Him, are all things: to whom be glory for ever. Amen."

SCRIPTURE LESSONS FOR SCHOOL AND HOME.

SCRIPTURE STORIES. Second Series. No. 16. Two Miracles.

Chapter to be read—St. Mark v. (part of).

INTRODUCTION. Children must have noticed how Christ went to all classes of people. Let them name some. Also remind of the women who were His friends, Mary Magdalene, from whom went seven devils, the two sisters of Lazarus, who were they? To-day shall read of two persons coming to Him—a ruler and a poor woman.

I. The Ruler's Daughter Raised. (Read Mark v. 22—24, 35—43.) What was ruler's name? (See Luke viii. 41). How would he know Christ? Now the people throng Him again. What had seen Him do? Were always wanting Him to do miracles. He would not do them merely to gratify curiosity, but would gladly give relief to those in distress. Now comes Jairus, one of the rulers of the synagogue; what is his request? What a sad tale—a little girl, twelve years old (see ver. 42), lying at the point of death. What was Christ asked to do? Did He ever lay His hands on people? Remind of the children being brought to Him; of His touching the leper (Matt. viii. 3); putting His hands on the blind man (John ix. 6); &c. What did Jesus do at once? He never refused such an appeal, and now all the people went with Him. What a crowd in the street; He can hardly move; we shall see presently what happened; now we follow to the ruler's house. Who are those hurrying to meet them? They are servants from the ruler's house. What is the news? Is the child better or worse? Alas! she is dead; it is no use, they say, troubling this clever doctor any more—it is all over. Never had they heard of a dead person being raised; He might have healed her if He had come in time, but it is now too late; He need not be troubled to come to the house. But what does Christ say? Only believe. Now they reach the house. Whom do they find? Hired mourners, according to the custom of the country, already assembled. To the eye of God death is only a long sleep, from which all will wake at the great day of judgment. It pleased Christ to waken this child sooner. What did the people do when they heard what He said? Why this laugh of scorn? Whom did He take into the room? The two parents, the three chosen apostles—which were they? Now picture the wondrous scene: the child lying, pale and dead, on the bed; the weeping parents; the expectant disciples; the Saviour, calm and compassionate, standing by the bed-side; He takes the child by the hand—how cold her hand would feel—He speaks, "Arise!" Now life-blood once more rushes through veins; her eyes open, looks around, sees parents, gets up, walks about the room, goes up to them. They, filled with greatest wonder, forget that she must be hungry; Christ orders some food for her, and bids them keep the news quiet, lest they should throng Him unduly.

Practical Lessons. (1) Christ's power over death. The ruler and his friends believed in His power while life still remained, but not afterwards. As with natural life so with spiritual life. Christ not only sustains, but gives life (see Eph. ii. 1). He can cause dead soul to hear His voice, and it can live. Remind of conversion of Saul, of gaoler of Philippi (Acts xvi. 31), and others. (2) Christ's tenderness. Notice how gentle throughout, no rebuke to father; simply says, "Only believe." Takes child by hand, lifts her up, orders food to be given. Shows was a man like ourselves. Has same tender feelings now; therefore we may go to Him still with boldness (Heb. iv. 15).

II. The Woman Healed. (Read 25—34.) Describe the crowd pressing round Christ on way to ruler's house; who wanted to get near Him? What was the matter with the woman? Notice that she had only heard of Christ; perhaps never seen Him do one miracle; still she believed. What did she do? What happened immediately? What did Christ say? Did not He know who touched Him? Yes, but wanted public confession of Him. What did the woman do then? Confessed, i.e., told her tale, how she believed in her heart, came near, touched Him, was made whole. How did she feel? Like Peter, after draught of fishes (Luke v. 8), fearful of being in immediate presence of God. How did Christ encourage her? Bade her go in peace; be of good cheer; her faith had saved her.

Practical Lessons. (1) The power of faith. This woman believed after hearing of Christ. Faith cometh of hearing (Rom. x. 17). We, too, have heard all our lives—by God's word, by sermons, books, &c. Have we ever honestly sought Christ, put trust in Him, asked Him to forgive the past, and to help for the future? This is true faith. (2) The duty of public confession of Christ. He expected this woman to acknowledge her being made whole. So He does still (see Rom. x. 10). All healed by Christ were called upon either to follow Him or to tell others about Him. So now, cannot be secret disciples. Must publicly acknowledge Him and tell others of Him; so shall be blessed ourselves and be a blessing to others.

Questions to be answered.

1. How many people did Christ raise to life?
2. Which disciples went with Him?
3. Describe the raising the child to life.
4. What lessons does this miracle teach us?
5. Describe the conduct of the woman.
6. What two lessons may we learn?

XUM

STILL AND DEEP.

BY F. M. F. SKENE, AUTHOR OF "TRIED," "ONE LIFE ONLY," ETC.

CHAPTER LIX.

THE de L'Isles did not at this time remain very long in Paris. They had already organised many duties and occupations for themselves in their own home, to which they were anxious to return, and Bertrand adhered to his determination not so much as to see Laura Brant again while he remained in her vicinity—his honourable nature had been so revolted by her former conduct that, although he had honestly forgiven her, and accepted in theory Mary's assurances of the change that had passed over her, he still was unable to think of her otherwise than as the false and dangerous Lorelei who had been the source of so much misery to John Pemberton as well as to himself and his wife. Mary felt convinced that a single interview between him and Lurline, such as she now was, would be sufficient to change his impression of her altogether; but she did not press it during their stay in Paris, for she thought there might be a better opportunity for such a meeting just before Laura's final departure from France, if it was decided that she was to rejoin her husband. She had given a real proof of her entire repentance by writing humbly to Mr. Brant to ask him to receive her back again, and she was waiting now, in great anxiety, for the answer, which she hoped would not be very long delayed. Mary could see that Lurline felt Bertrand's avoidance of her most keenly, but no words passed between them on the subject, and they parted, at last, without knowing, in the uncertainty as to Laura's future, whether they would ever meet again. Bertrand and Mary did not, however, return home alone. Charlie Davenant went with them to spend a few weeks at Château de L'Isle, and they were also accompanied by Valerie and some of her little brothers and sisters, as it was thought that a month or two in the fresh country air might do much towards the restoration of their health, which had necessarily suffered greatly during the siege.

We find the whole happy party assembled together one bright autumn day, in the flower garden at Château de L'Isle, when the warm sunshine was streaming down on the gay blossoms, which testified by their blooming appearance to the care bestowed on their cultivation by the young wife of the comte. Mary was seated there by the side of her husband, and they were watching with some amusement a merry scene which was being enacted before their eyes. A huge Newfoundland dog—the very embodiment of lazy good-nature—was being led along the grass in a most demure manner by Dorette Brunot, while her little brother Jacques, seated astride on his back, was shouting wildly to the animal in the hope of accelerating his pace; despite of the fact that his hands were firmly entwined in the shaggy hair, his position was by no means secure, partly on account of his own violent state of excitement, and partly because the good old dog every now and then manifested a strong desire to rid himself of his troublesome burden by rolling over on his back. Jacques would have made an ignominious descent from his unwilling steed more than once had he not been upheld by Charlie Davenant, who was walking gaily by his side.

On the gravel path, at a short distance from this group, the pretty little figure of Valerie Brunot was to be seen pacing slowly to and fro while she read with great earnestness from a book she held in her hand. She had at all times a charming face, from the unusual beauty of her large luminous eyes, and her rosebud mouth so full of tender expression, but on this day she seemed to look especially winning, with the sunlight falling on her long soft hair, which was drawn back from her forehead, and floated over her shoulders in shining masses. Charlie Davenant kept glancing towards her constantly while he attended to Jacques' imperative demands for assistance, and when at last the expected catastrophe occurred, and the dog finally succeeded in lying down, while the discomforted rider rolled off unhurt on the turf, he picked up the little boy with very unceremonious haste, set him on his feet, and telling Dorette that she must take care of her brother now, he darted away to Valerie's side.

Bertrand and Mary looked at each other with a smile. "Valerie is a charming little creature certainly," said Bertrand, as he watched them, "and I believe she will be really beautiful when she grows up, but in the meantime it does seem strange to see that tall fellow entirely devoted to a child so much younger than himself."

"It hardly appears so to me now," said Mary, "because I am convinced that it is really a genuine and lasting attachment which he feels for her. I quite believe that if all goes well he will fulfil his intention of coming back from Australia to marry her when she is old enough."

"If he does, my Mary, it will be in a great measure because your training and companionship have made her in some degree like yourself, he told me as much one day when he was speaking of her."

"But do you not remember nurse Parry telling us how greatly he was struck with dear Valerie the very first time he saw her?"

"Yes; undoubtedly that was the commencement of

(Drawn by WILLIAM SMALL.)

"She embraced Mary warmly."—p. 828.

his admiration; but he would never have thought of going on to contemplate marriage with her some day, if he had not found, on further acquaintance, that her mind and character really resembled yours."

"Well, the origin of his affection is not a matter of much consequence, if only he will remain constant to her till they can really be united. I think they would both have every prospect of happiness."

"But what would his people say? Valerie is hardly his equal in social position."

"I think it is just one of those rare cases, where a disadvantage of that sort would not be of the slightest practical importance. Valerie is a perfect lady both in mind and manner already, child as she is, and Charlie's relations would soon feel satisfied on that point when they came to know her; moreover, they would find, since it is quite settled that he is to be a sheep farmer in Australia, that she will be quite the most suitable and useful wife he could have. Valerie inherits from her French father and English mother the best qualities of both nations; she has all the talent and quickness in household matters which an education in France was certain to give her; while she is as steady and thoughtful and well-informed for her age as she could have been made by the most solid instruction in England."

"It certainly seems as if it might prove a really satisfactory arrangement for them some day; in the meantime I suppose we shall have a heart-rending parting between them, when he is obliged to start on his long journey, for it is plain enough that their affection is mutual."

"Oh yes; poor Valerie has given him all her little heart quite openly and honestly. She was attracted to him first because he had been a friend of Mr. Pemberton's, whose memory she reveres as a sort of saint, but very soon Charlie's kindness and tender care of her won all her love to himself. They have already decided that they are to correspond regularly for six or seven years, and then he is to come and take her back with him to Australia as his wife."

"They appear to have settled it all quite systematically," said Bertrand, laughing; "but, Mary, I can see you are very impatient for the postman to arrive by the glances you are casting along the avenue. Do you expect a decisive letter from Lurline to-day?"

"Yes, there has just been time for her now to have an answer from Mr. Brant, and if she heard from him by the last mail, this post ought to bring me tidings from her of the result of her efforts for a reconciliation."

"Do you expect his reply to be favourable?"

"I do indeed; I feel sure he will gladly accept her offer to go to him. She showed me the first letter he wrote to her from America, and it was evident that since he had got settled employment he was very anxious to establish himself respectably, and to have again a real home of his own. I am quite convinced, Bertrand, from all Mr. Brant said in that letter that he was much more merely rash and reckless than actually dishonest, and I think he may do well now in all ways, and that there is no reason why Laura should not live comfortably with him."

"It is certainly in his favour that he has accepted so humble a situation as that of a merchant's clerk, considering that he lived almost like a prince in Italy, and no doubt his talents and experience will enable him to rise to some better position ultimately; but how will Laura like the dull quiet life she must necessarily lead in such a position? I should think her wonderful conversion, such as you have described it to me, can hardly have altogether destroyed the longing for society and amusement which seemed engrained in her character."

"It has at least made her wish very much not to be exposed to the temptations which might arise from it. She told me she should prefer a quiet and retired existence now, because she should be afraid to trust herself amid the pleasures of the world, lest in any way they led her to fall back into the errors she has abjured."

"That is certainly as great a proof as she could give of the marvellous change that has been wrought in her; but there is the postman, Mary," added Bertrand, "so now you will know what Mr. Brant's answer has been."

A servant came hurrying towards them with the letters, and there, as they expected, was one for the Comtesse de L'Isle in Lurline's well-known handwriting.

"I suppose I may see it too," said Bertrand, putting his arm round Mary, and drawing her closer to him, so that they could read the closely-written pages together.

CHAPTER LX.

THE letter from Mrs. Brant proved to be one which fulfilled Mary's anxious hopes for her friend to the fullest extent; it was long, and cheerfully written, evidently under the influence of brighter prospects than poor Lurline had known for many a day. She stated that her husband's expected answer had arrived, and that he had gladly and thankfully accepted her offer of going to him, and her assurance that she would be contented with the quiet humble position which was all he could promise her in his new home; it seemed that the news of the birth of his child had been a source of the greatest delight to him, and he dwelt much in his letter on the pleasure it would be to him to feel that he now had a son to work for as well as a wife. Laura said that he assured her he would do his best to make a happy home for her, and that he was already giving all his spare time to prepare it for her reception, and that he entreated her most earnestly not to delay her arrival a day longer than she could help, as the utter loneliness in which he was living was very trying. "In short," continued Lurline, "his whole letter is so warmly and kindly written that I have begun to believe for the first time that my husband really has had a great deal of affection for me all along, and that it has been entirely my fault that we were so miserable together during the first year of our marriage. I think it so good of him to have been able to love such a one as I was then, that my heart is quite filled with gratitude towards him; and I think when I know and understand him better, as I hope to do in future, I shall not find it difficult to feel as tenderly towards him as a true wife should, and to give him not only all the help and comfort in my power, but the affection also which will make my duties light and pleasant to myself."

Laura then went on to say that she intended to join her husband at once, and that she felt sure it was the course her wise Mary would advise. There was a ship about to sail from Marseilles in a few days, which would take her to the port nearest to Mr. Brant's new home in the Southern States of America, and she had already taken her passage in it, and would be on her way to the port by the time her letter reached Mary. Her next piece of information somewhat surprised the de L'Isles, for she announced that her good and kind nurse, Mrs. Parry, had determined to make the voyage with her, as both she and the baby were still in very delicate health; but the arrangement had only been made on the distinct understanding, that so soon as the faithful old woman had seen Laura safe into her husband's care, she was to return to France, and spend the rest of her days at Château de L'Isle, as she was fully determined that no one should be the nurse and friend of Mary's children in the years to come excepting herself. Laura ended her letter with ardent expressions of gratitude to Mary de L'Isle for all that she had done for her, affirming that she owed her more than life itself, and adding that she had one most longing wish, which, if it were possible, she prayed her to gratify, and that was, that she might see her once again before they parted for ever in this world.

"Oh, Bertrand!" exclaimed Mary, "it would pain me very much to refuse Laura this last request, after all that has passed between us in the days that are gone. I should so like to go to Marseilles to take leave of her, if there is time for us to arrive there before the vessel sails. You would not refuse to take me there I am sure."

"It seems to me that I never refuse you anything, my Mary," he said, smiling; "but let me see what date she names for her departure," he added, referring to the letter: "yes, I think we could just manage to arrive there on the morning of the day fixed for the sailing of the ship, so if you do not think the journey would fatigue you too much, my darling, you shall have your wish. I shall be glad for another reason that you should see Lurline. I do not mean her to go back empty-handed to her husband, as I think we might try to spare her that mortification at least, so we will arrange that you should entrust nurse Parry with a sum of money which she can give to Mrs. Brant as your farewell gift, when you are out of reach of any unnecessary thanks on her part; but, Mary, I wish I could take you to Marseilles without being obliged to have an interview with Laura myself. I think it might be easily managed."

"Oh no, Bertrand! I hope you will not object to meet her now for this last time; it would pain her very much if you did, and indeed she is so completely changed that when once you have seen her again, you will find her quite dissociated in your mind from any unpleasant reminiscences of the past. I want you to part on friendly terms with her, dearest; it will be so much happier for us all that everything relating to our former acquaintance with her should now be forgiven and forgotten."

"Well, Mary, I have no doubt you are right, as you generally are; and, although I do not feel even now that I could have consented to keep up an acquaintance with one who was once at least the Lorelei of Chiverley, I do not object to this one last interview, which can never be repeated, so it shall be as you desire."

"Thank you so much, dearest Bertrand; you have gratified my last remaining wish as regards poor Lurline, and now I will go at once to make arrangements for our journey."

There was just time to let Laura and Mrs. Parry know by telegram of the pleasure that awaited them, and it was found that the meeting would be best ensured if it took place on board the vessel just before it started. It proved in the end that the interview could only be of much shorter duration than Bertrand and Mary had at first intended, for the ship sailed earlier than was expected, and a few minutes was all that they were able to spend together; it was sufficient, however, to remove from the minds of all concerned the last trace of bitter or painful feeling in connection with their former acquaintance, and each one of them looked back to it long years afterwards with pleasure and thankfulness, for in this world they never met again.

The fair autumn morning was very lovely, with a bright sun and a sea smooth as crystal, when Bertrand and Mary de L'Isle put off from the port of Marseilles in a small boat, and boarded the outward-bound vessel where she lay just ready to start. They were soon on the deck, and as they passed along towards the poop where the passengers were collected, they saw nurse Parry, with the infant in her arms, standing by the side of a quietly-dressed lady-like person, in whom Bertrand completely failed to recognise the brilliant Lorelei of his recollection. With an involuntary start he paused for a moment, and looked fixedly at her before he could satisfy himself that it was indeed Laura Wyndham he beheld. The beauty which had depended so much on her artful fascination of look and manner had almost quite disappeared, and she seemed many years older than she had appeared to be before her marriage, but she had now a thoughtful pleasing expression of countenance and a quiet grace of movement which was wholly without affectation.

Laura came forward with evident timidity and embarrassment, and though she embraced Mary warmly she seemed quite unable to raise her eyes to Bertrand's face, while a crimson flush dyed her cheek at the sight of him; any rancorous feelings which he might have retained vanished at once when he saw her so gentle and meek, and, taking her hand kindly, he told her he had come to wish her all possible happiness in her new home. Mary, with her ready tact, turned away at once to speak to nurse Parry, and then Laura looked up into Bertrand's face, and said, with much emotion, "I do not attempt to thank you, Mr. de L'Isle, for all your goodness to me, both in Italy and in Paris, but especially for your forgiveness; Mary assured me of it in your name, and it has indeed been the greatest boon you could bestow upon me, for I know—I know well—how much you had to forgive. Let me tell you now, in this last hour, when we shall never meet again, how thankful I am that you will have that darling Mary to be your guardian angel always, as she has been mine of late; it gives me bitter pain to remember the false interpretation I put upon her stillness of manner long ago, when I tried to persuade you that it meant want of feeling and not depth."

"Ah, Laura," said Bertrand, smiling, "I think we have both of us learnt now that my Mary is like that crystalline sea out there, still but deep."

There was no time for further words, the anchor was being weighed, and all visitors were hastening away; there was a hurried parting, half smiles, half tears, and then Bertrand and Mary were warned that they must leave the ship at once. Those pages in the record of their lives on which the name of Laura Brant was written had come to an end for ever. They descended into their little boat; it passed from beneath the shadow of the vessel; one glimpse they caught of the fair face of the Lorelei watching them with tear-dimmed eyes, and they waved to her their last farewell. Then, with the sunshine smiling on them, and their hands fast locked together, they glided away towards their happy home, and we see them no more.

THE END.

THE WISDOM OF SOLOMON.

NOT only was Solomon a poet, but he was a sage, a philosopher. We read he spake three thousand proverbs. "Not too great a number," says Ewald, "if we consider that each poem of the sort is very short, but must exhaust a complete thought in the magic circle of the verse." These "proverbs," or "parables," or whatever translation we give to the Hebrew word Mashal, are too well known for us to speak of them here. They contain the deep, sage, prudential philosophy of practical life. How marvellous is the study of character, the power of using analogy, the wise thoughtfulness, the common-sense views of life, that are displayed in them! How noble are the exhortations to lead the higher life, the life of the soul, the life that is good for time and eternity! Were aught more to be said about his wisdom, would we not find it in the Divine imprimatur of a "greater than Solomon?"

But he was more than poet, sage, philosopher. He was one of that band who, in all ages, have "knocked at Heaven's gate with earth-palsied arm," to whom not only the dark sayings of philosophy and practical life had an interest, but to whom the enigmas of life had a deeper interest still, and who, in all ages, have scrutinised into "the maddening riddle of the root, shell within shell, dream folded over dream." Without discussing the authorship of certain books it is not going too far to say that he found some sort of real solution of the awful mysteries of life, in the loving and cleaving to the good and the pure for the sake of goodness and purity, and this with all his own imperfect obedience. It is not going too far to say that upon his eyes, straining wistfully into the darkness, there dawned the bright rays of a future life.

It is sad to turn from the contemplation of the greatness of his wisdom to the mournful reality of his end. But the thought of God flooding the soul of a man must always be transcendently more grand than the life lived by man. So it was with Solomon, and so it must ever be.

As perhaps the chief among the causes which led to his downfall may be mentioned polygamy. Like David, he had his "burst of great heart," but, like David also, he had his "slips in sensual mire." A loose morality led to looseness in religion. The commandments of Jehovah broken in regard to moral conduct, were also broken in regard to religious faith. Under the name of liberty license became the rule. The sweet grace of toleration, so invaluable a possession in itself, was profaned; and tolerant men, as they have often been before and since, were made half-ashamed of a creed that could lead to such practices as Solomon encouraged. Those who so profane the principles of charity and toleration have, in all ages, much to answer for. Idolatrous altars were allowed to be erected, profane rites to be indulged in within the shadow of the holy city. Sanctuaries to Astarte, the goddess of Phœnicia, to Chemosh, the war-god of Moab, and to Milcom (Molech), the "divine king" of Ammon, were erected on the southerly height of Mount Olivet, and "worshippers" invited to join in their strange, cruel, licentious rites, giving to the Mount of Olivet the title of the "Mount of Offence." It is not indeed likely that Solomon ever went so far as to join in these rites himself. On the contrary, history seems to point to his steadfastly holding to his custom of sacrificing with regal pomp at the altar which he had erected to Jehovah. But, nevertheless, this did not keep down a growing dissatisfaction on the part of many with this state of matters; and there arose two parties among his subjects—the one favouring his easy tolerant sympathy of all religious beliefs, and only, probably, too willing to taste some of their sensuous fruits; the other keeping strong by the laws of their early religion, and resolutely opposed to innovations which they saw, under their very eyes, leading to such disastrous and ruinous consequences. The murmurs of discontent grew loud and frequent. The old tribal jealousies, which had been stilled for a time, showed that their fires were only smouldering. Ephraim was again ready to dispute the supremacy with Judah.

There were other agencies at work which helped to fan the flames of discontent. The burdens laid upon the Israelites, and the taxes exacted from them, were by no means light. We have seen how many of them were taken from their homes and pressed into service at the building of the Temple. The obligations of the king were so great that he had to appoint "officers" over special districts to levy money for his use. It was often exacted in the spirit of the insolence of office. Manliness and independence could not long brook such treatment; and the Israelites showed no disposition to let Solomon trample on them further than they could bear.

The absence of the prophetical order at the court of Solomon is very striking, and is, no doubt, a marked cause of his downfall. It is not probable that Nathan survived long after the death of David, though we find his sons holding positions of honour among Solomon's courtiers. There may have been no prophet of distinction to fill his place; and in course of time it may have appeared that the king, in his marvellous wisdom, needed no such prophetic advice as David found in God and Nathan. It might appear that in the person of Solomon the offices of king and prophet were fitly joined; and so for a time they might have been had Solomon only kept a perfect ideal before him. This he could not do; and neither the monarchy nor the prophetic office were, at this time, ripe for such a union. Only a perfect religion could produce a perfect prophet; and the monarchy was far from being in the position of producing a perfect king. As it was, the time soon arrived for the representatives of the old order to raise their voice on high, to cry out against the wrong and evil tolerated everywhere around. Thus arose Ahijah of Shiloh, and Shemaiah, and Iddo, stung into speech by the conviction that "the monarchy in Israel, by its narrow aims, was degenerating into an ascendency and violence which endangered the theocracy itself, and with it the sacred and inviolable basis of Israel's whole existence." And thus it was that during the last years of his reign the voice of that God, who had marked him out for succession, who had given him the gift of wisdom, who had shown that His favour rested upon His temple, was raised up against him. While he yet lived, the prophet to whose warning voice he would not listen had pointed out his successor; and the curtain falls upon the first act of a woeful tragedy for the house of David. After reigning forty years, Solomon died and "was buried in the city of David his father."

The time has gone by in which men vex themselves about such questions as exercised the mind of the old Fathers of the Church. But we would fain get a glimpse of the man in these later days of his misfortunes; indeed, all throughout, we desire to get a closer view of his inner character than we ever obtain. We talk of him as being one of many who have presented a union of genius and crime; yet, as we so speak, we long to see more closely the mutual relations of these. His personnel is not so shadowy as that of some others, but still it is shadowy; his inner thoughts, his every-day life, are difficult to be grasped. To obtain any knowledge of what were his sentiments and feelings, as he felt the play of life was near an end, we must have recourse to a work which probably was not written by himself, but which is supposed—and not, we think, without reason—to represent his view of life as his life was hurrying to a close. We would rejoice to think it did; for, underneath all the profound melancholy, all the deep perplexity, which characterises it, there is the same wonderfully-varied experience of life which we know Solomon possessed, there are bright gleams of hope and faith, there is the wisest and most sage of counsels. It shows us that, if he did not act always upon his conclusions, yet he had found out for himself what was the best life for man to lead, that his quest after the chief good had not been in vain.

Despite the weary cry with which the book of Ecclesiastes commences, the author resolutely sets himself to discover what life is the best for man during his brief sojourn in this world. He turns to wisdom, to pleasure, to devotion, to business and public affairs, to wealth, to the "golden mean," the "modest competence;" but finds the summum bonum is none of these. He finds it at last in the cultivation of a noble, generous, unselfish disposition, in self-denial, in doing good without hope of return. Charity is the golden rule. He resolves to take the twin-stars of duty and charity for his guide, strong in the belief that this life is not bounded by time. And thus it comes about that the conclusion of the whole matter is this—"Fear God, and keep His commandments; for this is the whole duty of man. For God shall bring every work into judgment, with every secret thing, whether it be good or whether it be evil."

If the sentiments of Solomon inspired any later Jew to write thus, what a precious legacy he has left us! Thus has the gift of wisdom not been bestowed on him in vain.

SURLY BOB.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "SHAG AND DOLL," "HUGH'S HEROISM," ETC.

CHAPTER XVII.—BOB AND HIS AUNT.

AS soon as work was over that evening, Bob, whose heart seemed to be overflowing with joy and happiness, determined to delay no longer paying that visit to his aunt which he had resolved upon. Moreover, having been saving up for the purpose, he had now enough to buy some little present to take with him, though what that present should be he was still in doubt; so, before he started he took counsel with Mrs. Heywood, who suggested two or three things which she thought might be acceptable.

Bob was still pondering over the matter, and trying to decide the question, when on turning into one of the narrow back streets which led to Rope Lane, he came upon a boy groping in the gutter, as if in search of something which he was hoping to find by the light of the distant street lamp. He was crying, too, over his loss, and Bob, whose heart seemed wonderfully softened by his happiness, instead of passing him by in his trouble as if it concerned him not, paused, saying, "Well, what's the matter? You've lost something, have you? Tell me what it is, and I'll help you to hunt for it.

The boy raised his head, and as he did so Bob found he was no other than his own cousin Sam.

The looks of both expressed astonishment at this unexpected meeting, and for a moment Bob drew back, whilst a brief struggle went on within him. But it was only for one instant; the next he was helping Sam to look for the lost shilling, which was one his mother had entrusted to him for the purchase of various things needed to replenish the empty cupboard at home.

He had been told to go straight to the shop and back again; but Sam, not being of an obedient nature, had chosen to stop and play with some boys he had met on the way. When at length they went off, and he was about to proceed to the shop, he discovered that his shilling was gone. Nowhere could he find it, though he had been searching for it ever since, sobbing and crying at the same time, as he thought of the scolding he would get from his mother, who had declared this was her last coin, and the beating his father would be sure to bestow upon him when he came in and found there was nothing for supper.

Bob, who knew by experience that his fears were not exaggerated, after a little hesitation, drew forth from his pocket the shilling he had meant to expend in the present which was to be a sort of peace-offering to his aunt, and gave it to Sam, saying, "There, you can take that, and go and buy what you were sent for with it. I'd been saving it up, 'cause I wanted to do something with it; but I dare say I can save up another in time."

Sam eagerly grasped the proffered coin; but as his hand closed upon it, some feeling of compunction seemed to smite him. This conduct of Bob's was so different from anything to which he had been accustomed that he could not make it out. For it just then occurred to him that this was the first time they had met since he had killed Bob's dove; so he should have expected he would have been trying to revenge himself; instead of which he was offering to help him out of his difficulty. No one else he knew would have given him a shilling, or even offered to lend him one. It was strange—so strange that almost before he knew what he was saying, he had exclaimed, "You don't know then as 'twas me as killed the dove!"

"Yes I do," returned Bob. "I was sure of it."

Sam's face expressed increasing astonishment.

"And yet you gives me this!" he exclaimed, with a glance at the hand in which he was holding the shilling tightly clasped, lest even now Bob should wish to take it back. "Well, I won't never kill no more of your doves! And I wish as I hadn't touched that one!"

"Well, never mind now," answered Bob, "I've got over it by this time, so we'll let bygones be bygones. And now you go to the shop, and I'll go in and see aunt a minute."

Mrs. Saunders gave Bob but a cool reception at first; but when she heard of the motives which had brought him back to see her—that he had not come to ask for anything, but rather to see if he could not be of some service to her, she softened towards him, and the result of this visit was the establishing of a better feeling between the two. She even went the length of declaring that she would be willing to have Bob back again, if he wanted to come, as she used to be able to trust him to go on errands, which was more than she could do by Sam, who always loitered and stayed to play on the road, until she never knew when she should see him back.

Bob steadily kept to his purpose of trying to repay to her in some measure all he and Johnnie owed her; and many a little comfort she would not otherwise have had came to her as time went on out of Bob's earnings; until at length, instead of exclaiming, as she once had done, "Thank goodness he ain't my son!" she was often heard to wish that Sam and her other children would take after him, as then she should have some comfort in her life.

But we have been anticipating, and must now go back to little Johnnie.

It was a bright lovely day in early spring when he first came to his new home; and very delighted he was with it. It would be difficult to say which had looked forward to the day the most eagerly, he or Bob; but when it came at last both were as happy as it was possible to be, and could scarcely believe that such good fortune could be theirs.

"Hasn't God been kind to us!" exclaimed Johnnie, when they were alone together in their little room up-stairs, which he had admired so enthusiastically that even Bob was satisfied. "Hasn't God been good! 'Cause we didn't deserve anything like this, did we, Bob?"

"I didn't," replied Bob, with a stress upon the pronoun, as if thoroughly convinced of his own unworthiness but unwilling to rank Johnnie with himself. "I was a dreadful bad boy in them days when we was at aunt's, afore you went to the hospital, when I never tried to please anybody, but just went my own ways, and was always a-quarrelling and a-fighting. I wouldn't go back to that 'ere time for anything; for I've found out that it 's a deal better and happier to try and please Jesus, and do what He tells me, even though 'tis dreadful hard to do what 's right sometimes. But it's all along of you, Johnnie, that I began to try."

Johnnie lifted up his little face in surprise, as he exclaimed, "Along of me, Bob!"

"Yes; 'twas all along of your begging of me so to forgive Tom Lane, and your talking about that Good Shepherd as you loved so much, and was your Friend. And then, when you was gone to the hospital, and I missed you so dreadful bad, and was so lonesome, I began to ask Him to be my Friend as well. And I asked Him to take care of you too, and make you well again. And He has, Johnnie; He has done all I asked Him. And I thought I'd tell you some day."

"Oh, I'm so glad, Bob—so glad!" said Johnnie, heartily. "And He has done a deal more for us than we ever thought of asking, hasn't He, Bob?"

"Aye, that He has; for 'twould never have come into my head to ask for all this."

CHAPTER XVIII.—CONCLUSION.

THE pure country air, the good wholesome food, and the happy way in which the days now passed, all did wonders for Johnnie, who seemed to gain health and strength with almost every hour, and thus did credit to the kind care which Mrs. Heywood bestowed upon him.

He speedily made his way to her heart, until she declared to her husband that she didn't think she could have loved him better if he had been her own child; certainly she could scarcely have been kinder or done more for him. But if it was upon Johnnie that her chief cares were lavished, owing to his helplessness and delicacy, she did not forget or neglect Bob, whose honest nature and true heart she had come to knew and trust so thoroughly.

"He may be a bit rough outwardly," she remarked once to her husband, "but he has the making of a fine character in him; for he is upright to the core, and as tender-hearted as any lad that ever lived."

"Aye, aye; he's a good steady lad; and he's mightily improved since he's been here," responded Mr. Heywood. "I think you've had a hand in that, wife. You've smartened him up somehow, wonderfully."

"He only wanted a friend; some one to show him a little kindness, and help him on sometimes, and I'm sure he has proved himself a grateful fellow!"

Johnnie, whose presence they seemed to have forgotten, overheard this conversation, and a proud happy look came into his little face. How different this was from the time when he had never heard Bob spoken of but as the "bad boy" of the school, as the most troublesome and quarrelsome of all the scholars; in fact, as "Surly Bob."

The next morning Johnnie was sitting out in the garden, as the weather was so warm and fine that even puss was out basking in the sunshine. The little boy found plenty of amusement in looking round upon the flowers, or in playing with the cat, or in turning over the leaves of a pretty picture-book lying on his knee, lent him by Edgar.

After a time Mrs. Heywood came out to see how he was getting on; whilst just at that moment the large gates of the drive were pushed open, and a lad passed through, evidently bent on some errand to the house, for he was carrying a basket on his arm.

Hearing voices, he turned his face in the direction of the lodge, and at the same moment exclaimed in tones of astonishment, "Johnnie Saunders!"

"Tom Lane, I declare!" cried Johnnie at the same moment. "Why, whatever brings you here?"

"I've come with something for somebody up at the house," returned Tom, "for I'm errand boy now to Mr. Cross. But where have you been all this time? and how is it you come to be here?"

Johnnie began to explain; but when he came to tell of Bob's stopping the run-away pony, Tom interrupted him.

"I know more about that than you do, for I saw it all," he exclaimed; "and 'twas me as told the gent Bob's name. If 't hadn't been for me he wouldn't have known it; but I spoke up, and told him where he lived."

"That was right of you, my boy," said Mrs. Heywood, who was standing listening to the conversation.

"Well, I'll tell you why it was; 'cause if you knew how Bob and me used always to be a-fighting one another afore, you'd wonder may-be as I should have troubled myself about him. But he'd done me a good turn, and I'd promised to do the same by him if I had a chance."

And then Tom, who was fond of telling a tale, especially when he had two such interested listeners, went on to relate the affair of the church tower, and the part Bob had acted, whilst Johnnie, who had not heard a word of it from his brother, looked very pleased.

"Anyhow you're happy now," exclaimed Tom. "I shouldn't mind being you to live in this 'ere place!"

When Johnnie went on to explain how it was through his being in the hospital and losing his leg, that they'd come to be so kind to him and sorry for him, and so had brought him out there to be with Bob, Tom replied, "Well, I never should have thought all that harm could have come of a tumble! I remember that day we teased you so; but I didn't knock you down a-purpose, Johnnie! I just took it into my head to have a slide that minute, and I didn't notice as you were in the way till 'twas too late to stop myself. Besides, I thought you'd take care to move off in time. But I'm real sorry you should have got hurt so."

"I'm so glad you didn't do it on purpose!" exclaimed Johnnie, with a bright smile; "I told Bob may-be you didn't mean it; but he thought you did, and he was angry at first. So 'twas real good of him to help you, when he might have taken his revenge; wasn't it now?"

Tom nodded his head; whilst Mrs. Heywood remarked, "It was indeed; it was more than many a boy would have done. But we must tell Bob how you gave Mr. Deveron his name," she added, turning to Tom; "for I don't think he knows, and I'm sure he'd like to thank you for it. You must come out here again some day, when you've a little leisure and would like a walk."

"I'll come!" said Tom, preparing to depart; "for it's no end of jolly out here; very different from our place at home!"

And now we must take leave of Bob and Johnnie, after merely saying that the latter, for an amusement, as he sat in the garden, began to take to cutting out little things in wood with Bob's pen-knife, and he soon showed such a genius for it, that it attracted Mr. Deveron's notice, who determined to have him taught the art of wood-carving. Such rapid progress did the boy make, that not only was Bob prouder of him than ever—if that were possible—but Mr. Deveron himself was highly pleased, and prophesied that he would hereafter make himself quite a name among wood-carvers. At any rate he was provided with an interesting occupation, and would always be able to earn a comfortable livelihood, whilst Bob was steadily working on towards the object of his ambition, namely to become a first-rate gardener.

THE END.

"THE QUIVER" BIBLE CLASS.

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS ON PAGE 800.

310. Angling and catching them in a small net, or a large net called a drag (Habakkuk i. 15).

311. In the reign of Uzziah, King of Judah (Amos i. 1, and Zechariah xiv. 5).

312. That they should tell the vision to no man, until the Son of Man be risen from the dead (Matt. xvii. 9).

313. Simon, of Bethany (Matthew xxvi. 6).

314. "Will a man rob God? Yet ye have robbed me. But ye say, wherein have we robbed thee? In tithes and offerings" (Mal. iii. 8).

315. Because he knew that God was a gracious God, merciful, and slow to anger, and of great kindness, and would therefore forgive the people when they repented (Jonah iv. 2).

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS ON PAGE 816.

316. "O Jerusalem, Jerusalem, how often would I have gathered thy children together, even as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wings, and ye would not!" (Matt xxiii. 37).

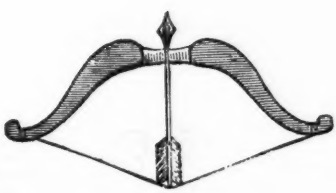
317. Micah vi. 4.

318. "As if a man did flee from a lion, and a bear met him; or went into the house, and leaned his hand on the wall, and a serpent bit him" (Amos v. 19).

319. "The son dishonoureth the father, the daughter riseth up against her mother, the daughter in law against her mother in law; a man's enemies are the men of his own house" (Micah vii. 6).

320. That his disciples might believe (John xi. 15).

THE BENT BOW



BEING

THE EXTRA PART

OF

THE QUIVER.

CHRISTMAS, 1874.

CASSELL, PETTER & GALPIN:

LONDON, PARIS & NEW YORK.

XUM

CONTENTS.

PAGE

I. THE SOUTHERN CROSS AND CHARLES'S WAIN. By the Author of "Poverty Pastures," "Episodes in an Obscure Life," &c. &c. With Two Illustrations by F. Barnard 1

II. WHERE IS THE PROMISE OF HIS COMING? By the Right Rev. the Lord Bishop of Gloucester and Bristol 15

III. THE FIFTH P. By the Rev. P. B. Power, M.A., Author of "The Oiled Feather," "Dinah's Fiddlestick," &c. With Four Illustrations 19

IV. BY RIGHT OF LOVE. By George Barnett Smith, Author of "Alden of Aldenholme," &c. Illustrated by A. Hopkins 29

V. THE PROFESSOR'S DREAM. By the Rev. W. Boyd Carpenter, M.A., Vicar of St. James's, Holloway... 35

VI. SEPARATION: A Tale of Brotherly Love. By R. St. John Corbet. Illustrated by M. Fitzgerald 40

VII. HUGH'S HEROISM. By the Author of "Shag and Doll." With Three Illustrations by William Small 47

VIII. THE THREEFOLD MESSAGE OF THE ORACLE: An Idyll. By the Rev. S. J. Stone, M.A., Vicar of St. Paul's, Dalston; Author of "The Knight of Intercession," "Lyra Fidelium" ... 61

IX. "CHRIST IS BORN." Christmas Carol. Words by the Rev. S. J. Stone, M.A.; Music by John Stainer, M.A., Mus.D., Organist of St. Paul's Cathedral... 64

THE BENT BOW:

BEING THE

EXTRA CHRISTMAS PART OF "THE QUIVER."

THE SOUTHERN CROSS AND CHARLES'S WAIN.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "POVERTY PASTURES," "EPISODES IN AN OBSCURE LIFE," ETC.

CHAPTER I.

A HOT wind was blowing—a stifling flow of arid air, like the breath of a myriad of furnaces. Lungs laboured like dry pumps. Skin seemed turning into scorched leather. The smarting eye could nowhere find repose, but ached as it turned from the blinding blue of the sky to the red earth cracked like a fever-patient's lips, and the burnished bronze of the bush, above which, here and there, showing that it was on fire, rolled sluggish wreaths of smoke; and then again to the blue lagoon, separated only by a spit of glaring sand from the bluer ocean. There was no coolness for the eye in either. From both the blazing sunbeams flashed like spears rebounding from shields of polished steel. Sunshine, sunshine, everywhere; scarce half an inch of shade. The heavens, as the Eastern despot served his victim, seemed to be choking the earth with molten gold.

It was Christmas Day, but Christmas Day in the Australian bush. On the rough-hewn door-step of a hut which looked out on the lagoon and sea sat a young man, lightly clad in an unbuttoned blue-and-white shirt, moleskin trousers, and unlaced boots. He was tall and spare and tanned—so far, like a "corn-stalk"—but he had not the deep-set eyes and other peculiarities, more easy to recognise than describe, which characterise the "native Australian"—i.e., white native, or "currency"—physiognomy.

Fred Leicester was a young Englishman, acquiring, like many a young Englishman before his time and since, "colonial experience" which he had not anticipated. Any one might be excused for being languid on such a day, but there was an especial languor in the way in which he lolled and reluctantly lifted his limbs, and a pallor in his face beneath the brown, which showed that he had not yet completely recovered from a severe illness. Had not this been the case, a young fellow naturally so active, would not have taken such a "crawler's billet" as a hut-keeper's. His two shepherd-mates were away with their flocks, and would not be back until sun-down, when the three would begin to keep Christmas with a better supper than usual. Fred was cook, but it was "a long cry" to sun-down. Having made himself a "Jack Shea"-ful of tea to drink cold, he had stamped out the wood embers in the brick fire-place, which bulged with its chimney from one end of the hut, and now sat listlessly beneath the overlapping sheets of glistening silver-grey and brown bark which formed the roof, and were propped up with unbarked posts to form a verandah also. Beside him, in such shade as it could find, lay his dog, puffing and shaking like a high-pressure steam-engine, and showing its tongue, as if supplicating some doctor to cure it of its fever. The locusts made a shipwright-like clatter on the trees. There were plenty of trees for them to make a clatter upon. Thinly scattered about the hut, they sloped down into thick brush upon the banks of the shrunken river, which ran, or rather crept, into the lagoon. Fred's eyes, with no delighted speculation in them, roamed over the lofty gum-trees, some of them higher than the Monument, and others dropping manna; silver wattles, red cedars, tea-trees, gracefully towering cabbage-tree palms, mint-trees, musk-trees, violet-scented myall, aromatic sassafras, grass-trees, tree-ferns, giant nettles, giant fig-trees, smothered in mosses, orchids, and epiphytical ferns, and, lashed together with "bush-ropes," gracefully curling, curving, intertwining creepers.

Fred was weary of Australia, and found no beauty or grandeur in that striking scene—striking, at least, if studied in detail. His thoughts had flown away to a land in which the trees stood bare and black, unless frost and snow had turned them into white coral. How he wished himself back in England, if only he could be back, free from the disgrace of having returned a beaten man! If that were to be the condition of his return, he was determined never to go back, but rather die in his land of exile, which, in spite of its sunny skies and balmy air, he had come to loathe, because he had been unlucky in it, and yet felt tied to it.

The locusts kept up their monotonous clatter —ear-torturing on such a day. Buzzing insects made their more harmonious hum; but otherwise, save for the harsh scream of an occasional flock of parrots flashing athwart the full blaze of sunshine, the fluttering of the magpies, and the croak of the crows hopping about the black jagged tree-stumps and rugged iron-bark logs, and the twitter of the diamond sparrows chasing one another in spite of the intense heat in and out of the scrub, the bush was almost dreamily still. A few butterflies flitted about noiselessly. A wasted iguana, which no amount of heat could make more wrinkled - mummy - like than it was born, solemnly writhed up a tree, putting out its hideous head now on this side and now on that of the trunk, as it watched Fred and his dog with wearily wary old eyes, that looked as if they had not winked for centuries. A few little bright-eyed lizards basked on the loose charcoal inside the tree-stumps' craters, and a black snake lay stiff as a stick, with its head in a dried-up "crab-hole," in full sight of the dog, which was too lazy to stir, although famed for his prowess as a vermin-destroyer. The harsh chuckle of a couple of laughing-jackasses, perched on a tree hard by, startled the stillness, and told the hour of noon, but Fred still sat on. It was too hot to take the trouble of going indoors for anything in the shape of dinner. What little appetite he could manage to get up he must reserve for the Christmas banquet in the evening.

Down came the laughing-jackasses, with their crests up, and pounced upon the snake, which soon wriggled off with the clumsy wide-mouthed birds, jabbering like idiots as they hopped round it, or swooping on it to give it another prod with their long, strong, sharp beaks.

This little hubbub over, Fred's thoughts again went back to England.

"Let's see," he said, "they'll soon be coming out of church now. What a fool I am!" he added; "they're not up yet. It's only two o'clock in the morning in England. Ever so much of my Christmas Day was yesterday with them. What a nuisance it is! It's worse than the distance. It makes a fellow feel as if he had drifted into another world somehow."

That he had ever been in England had begun to seem to him almost like a dream, although it was not so very many months since he had left it, and every lichen on the walls of his old home was fresh in his recollection.

It was his house no longer. Its former owner, an uncle, who had promised to make him his heir, and suffered him to grow up without a profession, died. His will was disputed. The son of a brother older than Fred's father obtained the real property, and of the personal which he had been taught to expect, Fred only secured a fraction. This he gave up for the support of his widowed mother, who had lived with him at his uncle's, and with him had been ousted from the cosy old house by his triumphant cousin. It was not a large estate; but to be owner of seven or eight hundred acres of English land, with capital enough to farm it yourself with profit, is a very pleasant position for a person with country tastes. Fred had been "somebody" in his circle so long as he was reputed to be his uncle's heir. It was a wrench to have to descend from his position and find himself almost literally penniless, with his way in the world to make, and no special training for any way of making it. But there was something harder than this to bear. He had felt himself bound in honour to give back her troth to his Helen. They had sworn unflagging mutual fidelity when they parted, and Fred had painted a glowing picture of the rapidity with which he was going to make his fortune in the Land of Gold for which he was bound; but he had at the time a keen appreciation of the chances against him. Kind though his Helen's mother tried to be when he called to say good-bye, he had noticed the marked difference in her manner towards him—her evident satisfaction at the thought that he was going to put thousands of miles of salt water between himself and Helen. He knew, too, that the cousin who had dispossessed him was an admirer of Helen's, and though he had not sufficiently lost conceit in himself to doubt for a moment that Mrs. Wilson would prefer him to Philip as a son-in-law if they competed on equal terms, yet to run penniless against Philip as master of Brock Grange would be, he knew, a heavily handicapped race for him. As for Helen, he did not believe that she would ever willingly give him up, but "they'll bother the life out of her, poor girl," he thought, "if I don't soon come back a rich man. And, after all, it would be a shame for me to spoil her chances—to keep her waiting, waiting on for ever so long."

In spite of these approaches to forebodings, however, Fred had left the London Docks as steerage passenger in good hope, which had been kept up and increased by the comically roseate anticipations of the queerly miscellaneous throng of Micawbers into which he was thrown. Every one on board his ship was going to make a sudden fortune somehow, although their notions were of the vaguest as to the first steps that should be taken towards that end.

The silent ships, deserted by their crews, that lay in thronged Hobson's Bay, raised rather than damped Fred's spirits. Perched with a batch of shipmates on their luggage in the lighter chartered to carry it from the bay to the drays on Queen's Wharf, at rates which saddled the owners with a very considerable addition to their passage-money, Fred, like the rest, cheered lustily as they went up the winding tawny Yarra Yarra, startling the pelicans sleepily meditating on the muddy banks, and exciting the compassionate contempt of the crews of colonial craft they passed.

"Ah, cheer away, you poor critters; you'll need all your spirits," the acclimatised sailors shouted back.

Scarcely was the tent—belonging to his messmates who had invited him to take a bed in it until he could find something to do—pitched on Emerald Hill before Fred was struck down with "colonial fever," ending in dysentery. On Emerald Hill, in fœtid Canvas Town, in the swampy valley opposite, and along the then bush-bordered Sandridge Road, there were sundry doctors' brass plates incongruously attached to tents, but not a doctor would come near Fred, because he had not money enough to fee one according to the current rates for his services. The auri sacra fames had corrupted even doctors—as a rule the most generously self-sacrificing of men. His Scotch messmates, however—who had taken a fancy to the jolly young Englishman—nursed Fred, when they could find time, in their tent, and when at last they had managed, by engaging it before the house was finished, to rent a room in a cottage, they carried Fred thither, and at last set him on his feet sufficiently to enable him to get about and deliver his Melbourne letters of recommendation. The recipients had scarcely time to say a civil word to him. Then he applied for situations of all kinds, which the little strength he had recovered would, as he fancied, enable him to fill; but scores—in some cases hundreds—were applying for such situations, and he was always unlucky.

When he thought himself strong enough to stick on a horse again, after some fashion or other, he tried to enlist in the Gold Escort; but the kindly commandant told him, "You see, I must have some personal knowledge of the men I take; and, besides, my poor fellow, you've been awfully pulled down. You're fitter to be inside the sheets than in the saddle."

At that time the Melbourne Argus daily headed its columns of "Wanted" with

"Wanted, a Governor."

"I must go in for the governorship, they can't get anybody for that," said Fred, bitterly, when he returned from his escort application, and seated himself panting on one of the boxes which supplied the place of chairs and table in the room which he shared with his Scotch friends. "If I'd only got the pith of a cat left in me, I'd go in for the road-gangs, earn my ten shillings a day, and work my way up to the diggings; but it seems as if I wasn't fit for anything—so people say—not even the Government stroke."

"Hoot, man, dinna talk daft like," answered one of his Scotch friends.

They did not merely like him as a pleasant companion, but had a warm regard for him on account of the attention he had bestowed—sitting up in the sick bay with him, and so on—on an invalid countryman of theirs, who had died upon the voyage, and been buried in the bright blue waters just before the look-out shouted, "Land oh!" at sight of Cape Otway.

The Scotchmen took counsel together, and knowing that Fred had a bigger sheaf of letters of recommendation for Sydney, offered to lend him on his I O U money enough to take him by a sailing coaster thither, and to keep him there for a week or two.

The kindly Scotchmen accompanied him to his craft—a smart little brig moored on the left bank of the Yarra—and bade him a hearty God-speed.

Picturesque Port Jackson is a very different harbour from dreary-looking Port Phillip. As soon as you run in between the frowning Heads, and see the lovely expanse of inosculating bays, bordered by silvery sand, and rocky, wooded, villa-dotted shores, with wooded islands floating, as it were, here and there like Deloses, you take a fancy to the place; and after the raw look and mad rush of Melbourne, Fred found refreshment in the time-mellowed buildings and more leisurely pace of life in Sydney. But though Fred's Sydney letters were read more leisurely, and obtained a little more polite recognition than his Melbourne ones, practically they were as useless to him. In Sydney, as in Melbourne, there was plenty of demand for capital and for brawny muscle; but Fred had no capital, and had not recovered his brawn. He was obliged to sell almost everything he had for a mere song to support him whilst he went about right and left applying for employment. At last, his money being nearly gone, he went in desperation to a Labour Agency Office, determined to take the first situation that was offered to him, and about a week afterwards he found himself on the Coogee Coogee run, engaged as hut-keeper at an out-station for a twelvemonth.

He had held his sleepy billet for about nine months when this little story begins, and as he was recovering strength, although not very rapidly, he had begun to look forward impatiently to his release for more active employment in the following March.

"I'm making my fortune in a hurry at this rate!" he said, bitterly, as he got up to prepare the Christmas feast for himself and his mates.

On the Saturday before they had drawn raisins, extra sugar, &c., with their usual rations from the head station store. Accordingly, Fred, first of all, concocted a "plum duff." The ordinary ration meat was put aside—salt beef, beefsteaks, and mutton chops they could get any day. In the morning Fred had been down to the lagoon, and shot a brace and a half of black ducks. Duff and duck, with milkless tea, damper with caraway-seeds in it in honour of the occasion, and a dessert of water-melon, constituted the banquet. The three bachelors might have had the use of a cow a-piece, if they would only have taken the trouble to look after them; it would have literally cost them nothing to keep pigs and poultry, and very little pains would have kept them well stocked with vegetables; whilst, if their predecessors had only been thoughtful enough to plant a few fruit stones and cuttings, the bald hut might have been smothered in green and purple clustered grape-vines, and bowered in orange, peach, and fig-trees. But, except where there is a woman, with cravings for home-cosiness, Australian bushmen lead a very rough-and-ready life, and content themselves with fewer comforts than they could get in the forecastle of a merchantman. A water-melon vine, spreading in a little patch of ground meant for a garden at the back of the hut, up which it climbed, to sprawl again upon the roof, and a prickly pear and a hacked initial-notched aloe in front, were the only botanical beauties of the hovel in which parched Fred was playing—or rather working very hard as—cook. The sun was sinking, the cooking was nearly over, and Fred went to the door to look out for his companions. A great flock of white cockatoos came screaming home to roost, making the she-oak on which they alighted suddenly burst out in big white blossom like a baobab-tree. Two clouds of red dust converging over the tree-tops from opposite quarters showed that the two flocks were coming home, and soon the sheep made their appearance, stopping now and then to crop sparse grass-blades, which looked about as succulent as tinder, with the listless shepherds and their panting dogs crawling at a funeral pace behind. Fred's dog mustered up energy enough to rise and lounge towards the two other dogs, with whom, having exchanged confidences, he returned to his master, who had sauntered to the hurdles to count in the sheep.

When they were securely folded, the banquet was served on the verandah, and partaken of "after the manner of the ancients," the revellers reclining at full length, with heads, however, often propped on both elbow-supported arms. The three dogs sat on their haunches in a row just outside the verandah, wagging their tails, and beating tattoos with them on the hot ground, snapping at the bones thrown to them, and then, after crunching them, screwing up their noses in comically coaxing silent petitions for more.

Fred's human comrades were utterly unlike him, and one another. The elder, who answered to the singular name of "Uttoxeter Uz," was an "old hand," i.e., ex-convict. Uzziah—as I suppose his Jew-Christian name should be written, at full length—was a Staffordshire man, who had been "lagged" (transported) for manslaughter, close treading on the heels of murder, committed in a poaching affray. In Australia he still sometimes strolled out after birds—it was with his gun Fred had shot the ducks—but as he was free to kill as many as he liked, sport had no longer the attraction for him which it possessed when forbidden by Game Laws. The whilom ferocious poacher, moreover, had mellowed or faded into an easy-going lazy old fellow, who dawdled about after his sheep, giving offence to no one (for with all his dawdling he and his dog between them managed never to lose a sheep) during by far the greater part of the year. All that time he never touched a drop of anything stronger than tea, but as soon as he had got his year's wages, he marched off to the nearest township, entered the first public-house, and having handed over his money to the landlord, proceeded to "drink it out" personally and by proxy, "shouting," as treating is called in colonial slang, for every one who entered the "Royal," "Currency Lass," "Macquarie Arms," or whatever the name of the place might be.

When this senseless operation had been got through—the landlord being the only authority as to the extent to which the money went—the old man would shake himself, "hump the swag" (shoulder the trifle of impedimenta with which he encumbered himself), whistle for his dog, and slouch off perhaps back to the station he had left, but more probably, since he was an ingrained nomad, in search of a new situation. There used to be scores of men in Australia who led purposeless tieless, dreary-seeming lives like old Uz's.

Fred's other companion was a "new chum," dubbed Yard o' Tape by the Uttoxeter wit, because he was thin, pale, short, and had been a draper's assistant in England. He ought never to have left the home counter, being, unlike Fred, one of the men who could never by any possibility be turned into thriving colonists. It was lucky for him that such a "crawling" occupation as shepherding was open to him; but Yard o' Tape loathed shepherding, loathed everything connected with the colony, and when he could get any one to listen to him, strove to console himself under his calamity of having been fool enough to come to it by abusing it rancorously in toto, and indulging in the most ludicrous rigmaroles about the ease and dignity he had enjoyed in England.

Neither Uttoxeter Uz nor Yard o' Tape was a very congenial companion to Fred, but when men are thrown together day after day for months, they must either get up some kind of sociability, or else hate one another with a virulence which makes life a burden all round. The three, stretched on the hut verandah, got on passably well together, and, after supper, smoked the evening pipe—which seems inevitable in up-country Australia—in peace.

It was too hot even to talk much, but now and then they drawlingly exchanged remarks.

"What fools English people are to come out to this beastly, beggarly place!" said Yard o' Tape; "you might as well live in an oven."

"Whoy deedst thee coom, lahd? nobbudy axed thee," answered Uz.

"I don't care for the heat now, I'm getting up my strength a bit, though it is precious hot to-night, hardly cooler than it was in the afternoon; but I can see that fortunes aren't tumbled into by anybody here all of a sudden any more than they are at home," said Fred, "unless it's up at the diggings. That's where I'm off to as soon as ever my time 's up here."

"Wa-ell, lahd, ah wish thee look," returned Uz. "Meap tha may do wa-ell; moor loike tha' woon't. Ah've troyed 'em. A hoonderd toimes ha-arder life than this 'tis, and then me'ap yow doan't yarn yer groob. If ah was a sma-art yoong chap loike thee, ah'd goo stockman, horse-breaker, or soomat loike that. They'd meak thee a yowverseer when they got to knaw thee, and then tha wouldst work the way oop to be a cove afore tha doyed. Tha arn't loike Ye-ard o' Tape yon. Sooch as him should stick at hoam; boot tha'lt goo hoam a rich man yet. Ah doan't want to goo hoam to stick, boot ah'd loike to see th' old Dove now. There's better rivers at hoam than here, and a deal better feesh. Many 's the troot ah've gotten."

Such were the old poacher's sentimental reminiscences. Yard o' Tape woke up from the mosquito-disturbed nap into which he had fallen, and growled—or rather grumbled, since his voice was not deep enough to growl—"Call this Christmas! what a fool I was to come out!"

"Tha'rt roight, lahd," assented Uttoxeter Uz, not very complimentarily, adding with equally uncourteous sincerity, "and soa tha'rt loike to be wherever tha' be."

Uz, after a fashion, had a patriotic pride in the country to which he had been sent as a punishment for his sins, and never missed an opportunity of giving "a lick with the rough side of his tongue" to any one who ran down Australia simply because he was too pluckless or shiftless to adapt himself to its circumstances. Fred's thoughts went back to the merry Christmases he had spent at Brock Grange. His mother had not been a guest there that Christmas, he felt sure enough—but had Helen? How was he to go home and claim her fairly if he did not speedily begin to do something far better for himself than he had yet done in Australia? It was not by any means a "merry" Christmas evening Fred spent, as he lounged on the hut-verandah in the sultry air, which brushed his face and hands like scorched feathers.

The stars had been out for some time.

"Wa-ell, lahds," said yawning Uz, "ah'm gooing to toorn in here. Yow new chooms are a loively lot. Rare spoort ah've seen at Christmas toime, boot yow two 's as loively as if yow was at a buryin'."

So having spoken, Uz turned on his back, and went to sleep upon the verandah, with his head between his hands. Yard o' Tape, whose English shopkeeper notions of "respectability" made him think that it was "low" to sleep out of a bed, went in to his rough couch in the close hut, while Fred, followed by his dog, marched off to his sentry-box beside the hurdles.

A little mob of young kangaroos that had just thrown off the maternal apron-strings bounded past him in quest of pasture, scurrying away when his dog barked at them, chattering like startled school-girls. A dingo slunk up towards the folds, but soon slunk off again, when Fred came out of his box at the bark of his vigilant fellow-watcher. Opossums jabbered at the foot of the gum-trees, and scampered up them like men-of-war's men "laying aloft" to reef. Uncouth flying-foxes floated through the gloom. A nankeen crane stalked past towards the river, looking like a ghost and croaking like a score of frogs. The sad whistle of the curlew came up from the lagoon. The huge-headed night-jar glided by on wings silent as a bat's, clamorously demanding "More pork! more pork!" Like golden-downy wing-dust the Magellan clouds were brushed upon the sky, and the kite-like Southern Cross shone faintly in the unfamiliar-looking heavens.

Thinking over the unhomelike first Christmas Day he had spent in Australia—only the second he had not spent at home—Fred at last fell asleep.

CHAPTER II.

At last the time came for Fred to leave Coogee Coogee.

"Well, mates, I'm off," he said in the calm clear March—i.e., early autumn—morning, as Uttoxeter Uz and Yard o' Tape let out their flocks, and Fred came out of the hut with his bundle over his shoulder and his dog at his heels; "good-bye."

"Wal, lahd, ah wish thee look," answered Uz, and the draper-shepherd added his less hearty good wishes.

Fred's way lay at first through cedar-brush, beneath cedars, gum-trees, fig-trees, with gleaming crested pigeons shaking down their fruit. Wild vines swayed against his face, and creepers drooping fading blooms, once like cups of purple and rosy-red-stained alabaster, and here and there a gorgeous wasatah could be seen still glowing in the scrub. He took pot-luck in the bark-roofed gunyahs of the sawyers, hearty fellows, but in dress, and look, and talk, and life, almost as wild as any savages. In spite of his shepherding, Fred was not used to real rough life in Australia yet, and shuddered as he sat by the sawyers' fires at dusk, and listened to the stories which they told, as things to be boasted of and considered admirable jests—of the atrocities which they and their fellows had committed on the blacks.

He toiled over ridge and gully, and along wide plains, camping out with the star-spangled sky for his bed-curtains, when he had not been able to reach the shelter of a shepherd's hut.

At last he drew near to the extemporised little township, which did duty as the head-quarters of the particular gold-rush which had attracted him.

The road—a mere track, which to liken to a ploughed field would be a very bad compliment to the field, a rough red stretch of earth, cracked with long chasms, pitted with deep holes, ridged, rutted, blocked with jagged black tree-stumps; here and there corduroyed with a few logs—ran between bush which looked very gloomy in the lessening light.

Fred did not care for the gloom, however; he was drawing near to the end of his long tramp; was about to start in the race for wealth which, having grown sanguine again with recruited health, he felt sure would end in his return to home and Helen. A little way farther on, the road branched into two arms like a Y. Fred had gone some way along the broader arm, when he heard the sound of hoofs behind him, and looking back saw three men galloping towards him. They soon pulled up by him. Their horses seemed to be blood, well-fed and well-groomed. The eldest man of the party—a shock-headed, jungle-bearded, sullen-looking fellow—was dressed in ordinary rough bush style; but the two young men, almost youngsters, with him—slim colonial striplings—were bush dandies, wore patent leather boots beneath as well as belts over their parti-coloured moleskin trousers, gold chains, ear-rings, white linen, jauntily-tied black silk cravats, and jauntily-ribboned cabbage-tree hats. The harness of all three horses was first-rate. All three men bristled with pistols, in holster, belt, and breast. Fred had a six-shooter in the breast of his blouse, but he did not lay his hand on it. He would have stood a poor chance, even with his faithful old Shag to help him, against three men armed to the teeth, and besides, they did not look in the least disposed to stick him up, whatever might be their felonious purposes towards others.

"Which way did you come, mate?" said one of the young Claude Duvals. "Up country, I guess, to try your luck. You don't look as if you'd had much yet. Have a drink?" and he handed Fred his flask.

"You're right," answered Fred, as he handed it back; "I'm padding the hoof to Roper's Gully."

"Has a chap," asked the other young bush-ranger, "passed you, or struck out of the bush on the left, on a switch-tailed, high-stepping horse, a black with a white stocking and a star in the forehead—a big, square-built, heavy chap, that rides as if he wanted to break his horse's back—with a valise and a pair of big saddle-bags?"

"No," answered Fred, "I haven't long been in the road; I came a short cut. You're the only three folk I've seen since morning, except the people of the house I called at, and some troopers galloping off somewhere in a great hurry."

The two young men laughed, but the sullen one growled, with an oath, "Come along! The old rascal gave us the slip by striking off the road before he got to Cypress Swamp, I'll go bail; but we'll catch him yet if we ride fast;" and putting their heels to their horses, the three went off at racing speed.

Night had quite fallen when Fred reached a roughly-knocked-up dreary roadside public-house, which looked very much as if it were a bush-rangers' house of call, kept by "bush telegraphs." At any rate, the host and hostess were by no means anxious to secure his modest custom; and learning from them that Roper's Gully was "only an easy three mile, or less may-be," farther on, he determined to stumble on in the dark.

He had got about a mile beyond the disreputable shanty when he heard a faint cooey. It did not seem to come from any great distance, but as if it were faint through pain. Fred cooeyed back, and when he heard the voice again, struck off the road in the direction from which it came, and at last, guided by it, reached a man tied hand and foot. He had been gagged as well, but had managed to get the gag out of his mouth. He was cramped from his tying, and weak from the blood he had lost. He and Fred managed to bandage up between them, after a fashion, the fortunately not very serious wounds he had received, and then he said, "Thank 'ee, mate. I wish you'd happened to come up a bit sooner. Perhaps, then, I shouldn't have been cleaned out, if you've a barker. Gold and notes, watch, ring, pistols, horse—everything they've taken, the beggars!"

Fred proposed that he should help the wounded man to hobble back to the shanty.

"Not if I know it," answered his new acquaintance, who was a well-known gold-buyer. "It was to give that as well as the Corner a wide berth I cut across the way I did this morning, but the rascals were too many for me. I'll be too many for them, however, yet, or my name's not Jack Wilkins. If you'll be a good chap, and stick to me, I'll get into Roper's Gully to-night, though it's still a good three miles off. If you don't, I must camp out, and I should like a doctor to look to my hurts before they're quite stiff."

Leaning on Fred's shoulder, now and then sitting down to rest, the gold-seller reached the top of Roper's Gully before all the lights of the higgledy-piggledy township sprawling about in it were out.

The chance fellow-travellers went down the sloping main street to the principal hotel, a building by no means imposing in looks, whatever it might be in charges. Here a doctor soon arrived, and dressed the gold-buyer's wounds. They were not so serious that he was not able, before he went to bed, to give the police, and an excited section of the general public that had been admitted, an account of his adventures.

"I've known Master Fireball before to-day," said Mr. Wilkins; "so as I'd heard that he and them two young scamps of Parkinsons that go about with him now were hanging close about here again, for all the scare they'd got when they tried to stick up the mail—only two nights ago they were at the Corncob—and I'd to leave Wattle Flat latish this evening, I thought, instead of coming round the Corner, or striking off at Cypress Swamp, as I generally do, I'd take a new cut I've found that brings you out a good bit nearer home, though it's rather rough riding. But I'd scarce got out of the scrub when up canters my gentleman, and catches hold of my coat. 'Hand over your gold quietly, and I won't hurt ye?' he says. 'Catch me giving it up, Mr. Fireball,' says I; 'I know who you are,' and I lashed at him with my whip. Off went the two horses at a fine pace. Fireball still stuck on to me, so I dropped my whip and lugged out my revolver, but one of the young Parkinsons was thundering behind, and he sings out, 'Look out, Bill, he's going to shoot!' Fireball knocked mine out of my hand with his, and fired three times, I think. The first wasn't much, but I lost my stirrups at the third, and fell off with Fireball on me. Then the three set on me, dragged me off the road, and bailed me up with a gag in my mouth, and off they went grinning, and saying that they would send word with my love to my wife. Every bit of swag I had with me they carried off. And there I might have been lying now, if it hadn't been for this young chap. He heard me cooeying, and came up, and loosed me, and got me home. I owe him one turn, and Mr. Fireball and those nice young friends of his another; and I hope, I do, I shall be be able to pay 'em both."

When Fred woke next morning he found that the township of Roper's Gully consisted of a jumble—here and there presenting the semblance of a street, but for the most part scattered "as if dropped out of a bag"—back to back, gable to front, and sloping off from one another in all kinds of directions—of tents, calico-houses, asphalted-felt houses, corrugated-iron houses, wooden houses, tilted drays, and mere bark gunyahs, arrested, as it were, in the act of sliding down to the stream at the bottom of the valley. Along this stream and the creeks running into it more queer tenements and tents were pitched beside holes shallow and deep, gaping shafts, and heaps of dirt, gravel, and stone. Here and there was a gaunt-looking rough steam-engine. In the township, at least, a good many flags were hoisted, and by way of trade-signs illustrated sheets of calico and canvas were displayed like those hung out in front of shows at fairs. Dotted about in the middle of the so-called streets tree-stumps had been left, on which passengers sat down to chat.

A curiously motley population had begun to move about—motley in costume, cut of feature, colour, dialect, language, blood. Already a little fighting might be seen; as the day grew older there was sadly too much drunkenness; but scarcely any, if any, regular work was going on, because it was Sunday. All the time Fred had been a hut-keeper he had never been able to go to church. He would scarcely have known when Sunday came round, had it not been for the fact that the week's rations arrived the day before. On Sundays, as on other days, from the time the sheep went out to the time the sheep came home, he had next to nothing to do except to move about in and round the silent hut.

But now, in this queerly crowded little city, in an intenser solitude than surrounded that dull shepherd's cot, several denominations had the opportunity of worshipping God in their own ways, and largely and reverently were the services attended, although the places in which they were held were very primitive sanctuaries; sometimes simply the arch of heaven, cathedral-columned with white gum-tree boles.

When, for the first time for months, Fred heard, morning and evening, the once-familiar words of his own Church, his heart went back to England with a leap which brought a lump into his throat.

The gold-buyer advised Fred before he started as a digger on his own account, to work for wages, in order to gain experience, and gladly gave him employment on a claim belonging to himself as a hired hand. In this way Fred supported himself, and put a little into his pocket, the first time he handled pick and shovel, whilst some men who were working for themselves earned nothing—were simply eating up their little capital, which they saw with heart-sick, almost despairing horror, dwindling day by day; and others, by labours far greater, earned far less money than they would have been in receipt of if they had stuck to their original callings. But it was not to be a hired labourer that Fred had come to the diggings. That was not the way to make a fortune, win Helen, and give his mother a comfortable home once more.

In about a month's time he started with a mate on a prospecting expedition up the river. They had bought a horse cheap to carry their flour, tea, sugar, &c., of which they took as little as possible, trusting to supplement their commissariat with bush birds, beasts, and so on, and beyond their guns, necessary tools, and a blanket a-piece, they had scarcely any personal swag.

It was not long before they came upon signs of gold, and though they had not found it in paying quantities, the traces grew, or they fancied they grew, richer, and so the two went on merrily, especially as they had scarcely diminished any of their purchased provisions, except the tea, which they used very sparingly. They shot—not for sport, but for food, since they wished to make their powder and shot, as well as other things, go as far as possible—wallabies, wild turkeys, black swans—going in for size in their game. Fred's mate was a thorough bushman, understood black fellows' ways as well as whites', and taught his comrade not to despise snake grilled on wood-ashes when it had been killed before it had a chance of biting itself. He taught him how to find honey, and water lodged in the hollows of the bottle-tree, and what wild plants to gather for their seeds or fruits, their stems and leaves, or roots, and what to avoid, as table vegetables, and how to bake and pound and so on those that needed cooking.

But they mounted to a more sterile region, where nothing but gloomy trees seemed to grow, and from which animal life also was almost absent. Here they had to live solely on their stores, and these began to diminish at a rate which made them pull long faces. Poor old Shag, who had accompanied his master, did his best to cater for himself, but was obliged to content himself with short commons.

One morning, after camping at a water-hole in a steep rise, as they were toiling up the rest of the hill, their horse fell dead lame.

Fred's mate gave a rueful whistle. "Tell 'ee what 'tis, Fred," he said. "I'll rise the ridge, and have a look round, and when I come back I'll tell 'ee what I'm goin' to do. You stay here with the horse."

When Jem came back, he said, decisively, "Tell 'ee what it is I'm goin' to do."

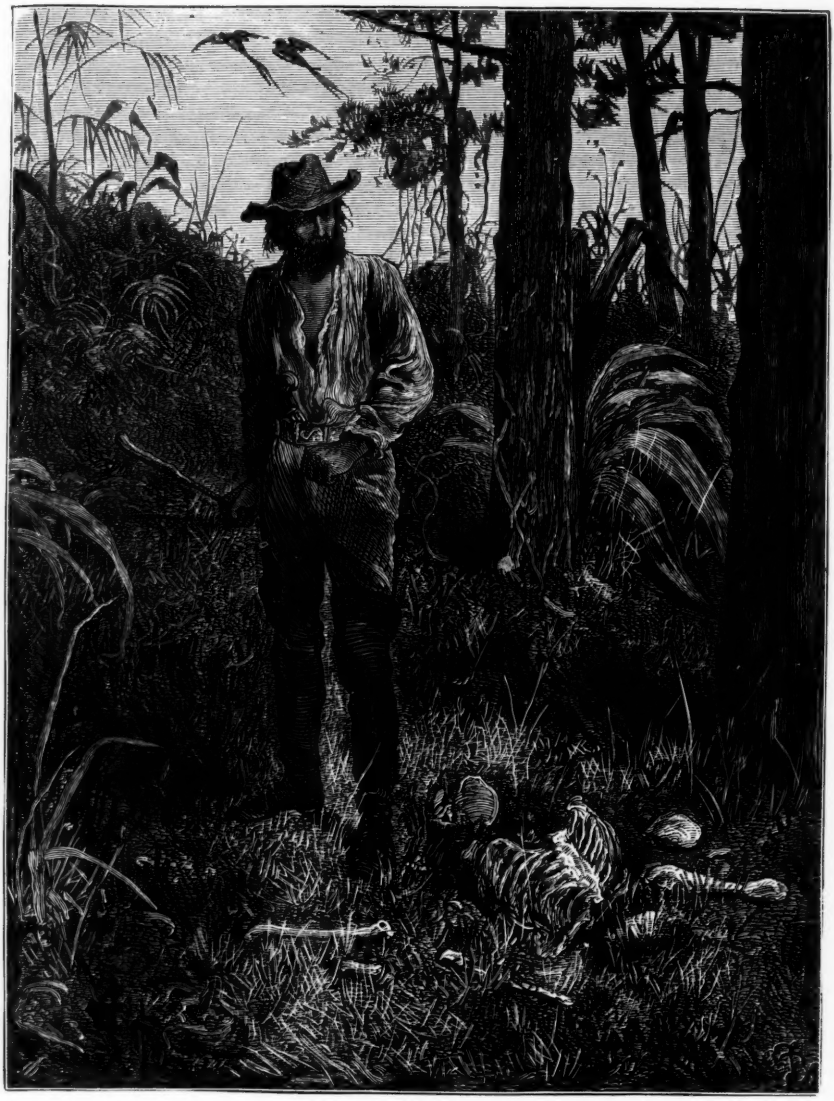
"Well?" asked Fred, eagerly.

"I'm a-goin' back, that's what I'm goin' to do," answered Jem. "Nothin' but trees like these 'ere, goin' up an' down, up an' down, all round as far as ever you can see. Next to ne'er a sign o' water or grub. We'll turn the old horse loose; mayhap he'll manage to pick up summut for hisself, and hobble down to better feed than this when he's rested hisself a bit; anyhow, we can't afford to wait for him. There's just about left to carry us back to a livinger land than this."

But Fred wouldn't hear of returning until he too had had a look from the top of the hill. True enough, there was nothing but bush to be seen on all sides, undulating like a vast gloomy sea beneath the sunny sky, whose brightness it did not reflect. But Fred had caught sight of a gully, the trend and general look of which somehow reminded him of Roper's Gully, and when he returned to his comrade, he told him that he was resolved not to beat a retreat until he had explored this gully.

"Don't be a fool, man!" said the other.

But Fred was obstinate.



"Well, mate," then said the old bushman, "I can't take 'ee by the scruff o' the neck an' trot 'ee on afore me as I should like to do, so we'll share fair an' part friends. You shall have the bigger half, for you're like to want grub wuss than me, though we may both want it precious bad, I guess."

He took the bags off the horse, took off its halter also, and the poor thing stumbled off on three legs between the trees in search of something more succulent and satisfying than it had lately had.

When the stores had been divided, and the two men had thrown their respective shares across their shoulders, Fred's mate said to him, "Do 'ee be persuaded at last, and let's cut back together 's fast 's ever we can go. Can't be such wonderful fast goin' anyhow."

But Fred would not be persuaded; so the two shook hands and parted, Fred toiling up the hill with Shag after him, and Jem hurrying down.

When Fred had found, or thought that he had found, the gully which he had seen from the hill, he planted his stores at the foot of a tree, which he marked for a starting-point, and made excursions from it for a day or two. Having hit, as he supposed, the right track, he dug up his stores, and followed his lead, at first very hopeful; but as time passed on, his hopes died away like a failing pulse. Water was very scarce. An awful stillness brooded in the wide-spreading bush, not the hush of a dense moist English wood, but the arid silence of a seemingly limitless forest of tall trees, whose unshadowing leaves let through the sunshine to parch the bladeless ground and raise an almost chokingly dry aroma from clumps of scrub that looked as sappy as if they had been made of tinned iron and verdigrised copper. Fewer and fewer birds flashed across the blazing sunlight. In some places even the hum of insects could scarce be heard. Shag grew weaker and weaker, and one day did not return from his self-caterings. Fred's allowances had been getting less and less as his load lightened; he ate scarce enough to keep life in his body, for he well knew now that there was no going back for him. What he had must carry him on to some place where he could find succour, or he must die alone in that awful wilderness.

(Drawn by F. BARNARD.)

"What is this?" – p. 9.

Helen, mother!—his fate would be utterly unknown to them. They would think he had forgotten them. The thought was harrowing to him in his passionate craving for sympathy.

God only would see him die; and brought thus all alone, as it were, beneath the Omniscient ken, he shuddered. What had his life been? Not so bad as scores, not worse than hundreds, perhaps, but still no better—a mere frivolous, self-seeking existence.

He was faint from lack of food, but hunger was not his most poignant pang. Thirst often maddened him, and he wandered wildly right and left in quest of the impossible water which purled in his semi-delirious ears. His life became a nightmare, through which there ran, like a ghastly fugue, a constantly recurring—"It's all real, and lonely death alone can break the spell."

One day he felt, so to speak, that a dog was following him. He thought that Shag had come back; but when he turned, he saw a warrigal slouching after him. He was bushman enough to know what that meant. The beast would never venture to attack him so long as he had life enough left in him to move a limb, but was patiently following him in quiet speculation that he would soon drop helpless.

He raised his languid arm in sudden fear and wrath, and gave an unearthly cry that scared himself. The vermin shied, and shambled off to the scrub; still ever and anon Fred saw, or fancied that he saw, the horrid dingo dogging him as, according to sailors' superstition, sharks follow fever-stricken ships.

But, oh joy! what is this? A battered powder flask, a rusty buckle; and here there are other little signs of human occupancy. Eagerly Fred ran down the tracks, and soon came to some well-picked bleached human bones, littered about in a tumbled jumble of mouldering once human-owned rubbish. He did not wait to bury the remains of the predecessor, or predecessors, who portended his own fate. He made an attempt to rush past, and then——

He remembered nothing more until he came to himself on a bed somewhere, and heard a voice that somehow seemed familiar, saying, "That's right. Now, we're quits, lad, and I'm as jolly as a sand-boy. Fireball was taken last week, and you'll soon be as right as a trivet. I grudged those two young Parkinsons getting off, but I won't, now you're coming round. They're sure to be caught sooner or later—justice 'll overtake them, I'll warrant. You're a sharp lad in some things, but never you go prospecting again on your own hook till you know the lay of the land. It was the merest chance in the world I took it into my head to rise the Barren Spur, instead of heading round it. From what I can make out of the way you started and headed, it beats me how in the name of common sense you could ever have worked round there. But there you were, going on like a mad thing. It's lucky you were next door to starved, or you'd have floored me and the two that were with me. We had to hunt you like a kangaroo, and when we'd run you down at last, you fought like an old-man with its back against a tree. But here you are, safe and sound, thank God! I say it, and I'm sure you ought to, lad!"

It was, of course, Mr. Wilkins who spoke. Fred was lying at the back of a building which the gold-dealer had put up, as blended gold-office, bank, and store, on a creek fifty or sixty miles from Roper's Gully, where another diggers' township was growing up.

Of course it took Fred some time to recover strength; but before Christmas he was working half-shares with his old mate of the prospecting expedition in a claim which was turning out remarkably rich. Fred had already netted a considerable sum, which his friend Mr. Wilkins had enabled him to place at the best of the high interest then procurable in the colonies. He was anticipating a good bit more with certainty. Still it was not exactly a merry Christmas which Fred spent with his good mate in their diggers' tent, where they feasted on fowl and salad that had put a price into the pocket of the industrious Chinaman who had raised them which would have made an English gardener and poultry breeder of that time open round eyes of envious wonder—and drank, "Absent Friends" in (what was paid for at any rate as) the very best champagne. The toast was not needed to remind him that it was some time since he had heard from his mother, who had once written regularly by every mail. He forgot that after the first mail or two he had been a very remiss correspondent. As soon as, in his own phrase, his luck had turned, he had written eagerly enough, but previously he had soon grown weary of writing, to quote from himself again, "merely to say, I'm still alive, and still unlucky." Nevertheless, his mother's silence made him very sore, for he hungered after news of her—and Helen.

CHAPTER III.

THE claim continued to yield remarkably. When Fred was starting for Sydney next year during the winter, i.e., mid-year, rains, he said to his mate, "After the rains I shall be back. I mean to go on working with you, old fellow, until the year's out. Then I shall sell my claim, and be off home. I shall think I've made my pile—at any rate, enough to begin with, for that's what I chiefly want it for."

When Fred, however, reached Sydney he found waiting for him at the post-office, a letter, part of which ran thus :—

* * * I am sorry you have received so few of my letters, since I have written by nearly every, if not every, mail. I suppose they must have miscarried, for you wrote regularly at first, and I have received so very very few since you landed in Australia. I received two you wrote on the voyage—one you sent by a ship, and another posted at the Cape. The others, I think, must have miscarried, like mine. There have been so many alterations in the arrangements. How thankful we were to receive the one you wrote at the end of last year! But, oh, what scenes and sufferings you must have gone through! I thank God night and day for His goodness in preserving you in that wonderful way from the most awful death in that dreadful wood. Do not you feel yourself bound, my dear boy, to devote yourself especially to His service, after so mighty and marked a deliverance? And to think that my Fred should have been a mere drudge to common shepherds! Are you quite sure, my dear boy, that what you are doing now will end in anything? I should like to have you back, rich or poor, for I am growing old, and I miss my boy. I cannot help thinking that you would be quite as likely to get rich in dear old England as in an outlandish country like Australia. Of course, I should like you to come back at once rich, for your own sake. Dearest Helen, who has been a great comfort to me, is greatly tried. I believe she loves you as much as ever, but she cannot help wondering a little that all this time you have not done anything to enable you to claim her. You see, dear boy, you have been away from England three Christmases, and yet you seem just as far off as ever from doing anything in Australia, and Mr. and Mrs. Wilson declare that if you are not back by Christmas able to make Helen such an offer as an honest man like you would like to, she must give up all thoughts of you. They do not wish her to take your cousin Philip if she dislikes him, but they say that it is preposterous for her to tie herself up for ever for your sake. But I believe that, now that they cannot get you, they would very much like her to marry him. He is a respectable young man, and there cannot be a doubt that he is very fond of her. We ought not to be prejudiced, ought we, Fred dear? After all, he only took what the law gave him, and we should have done the same, shouldn't we? only perhaps in a pleasanter way. But I must confess that I should not like him to have my Helen.* * *

When he had read thus far in his mother's letter, Fred made a hasty calculation as to what he could get for his share in the claim, and added to this what he had realised from it. The two together came to a very pretty little sum indeed—enough to enable him to farm at home more land as a tenant than his cousin farmed as a landlord. Fred had all his old love of an English farmer's life, but he had come to understand that money is invested in English land not as a pecuniarily remunerative investment, but for sentiment of some kind; and the only English acres for which Fred had any particular sentiment were those he could not get, because his cousin held them. Fred marched off and offered his half-share for sale, soon found a purchaser at a trifle higher figure than he had calculated, and as soon as the purchase was completed, made his arrangements accordingly.

The first was to take his passage in the first vessel bound for London. The war had deprived the colonies of their mail steamers.

When all his preparations for the voyage had been made, when his good-bye letters and presents for his up-country friends had been despatched, when his colonial presents for his English friends had been purchased and packed, he found himself left with a fortnight on his hands, and nothing to do in it. During this time he rushed about the busy city, trying to make believe that he, too, had some business there; he lounged in the beautiful Botanic Gardens, chafing at the inactivity of the ships of war moored in Farm Cove, and the merchantmen anchored in the stream. But at last the eventful day arrived. The good ship, flying the Blue Peter at her fore-royal mast-head, had cast off her moorings from the Circular Quay, her anchor was coming up with a clink and a chorus, the tug was fussing alongside, eager to be off. The decks were crowded with passengers and passengers' friends, some of them prepared to go outside the Heads before they said good-bye. Of the cabin passengers all were well-to-do, a few exceedingly fortunate; of the intermediates, the majority the reverse—colonial failures; but regarded with eyes of envy by still greater unfortunates lingering on the quay, wishing, how bitterly, that they had money enough to get away from what to them had proved so deceptive a land of promise. As Fred's ship steadied on upright keel down the beautiful harbour in the wake of the panting tug, she passed a ship with a swarm of just-arrived emigrants hanging over the bulwarks. How—rejoicing at having at last reached El Dorado—they stared in utter astonishment at the excited home-passengers hurrahing with frantic joy at the thought of having got away from it.

But the ship was at sea; the tug had cast her off; valedictory friends were being conveyed to it in whale-boats, which bounded like corks on the huge billows which heave outside Port Jackson Heads.

Having gathered on the steamer's deck, they gave the ship three hearty good-bye cheers, were answered from the ship, and then she gracefully shook out her white wings, and swept off in her long ocean flight.

As Fred, though not generally sentimental, watched the Australian shore growing dimmer and dimmer, things in general grew dream-like to him. It was a dream that he had ever come to Australia, that he had ever lived in Australia; it was a dream that he was going home to England—England was a dream. The only thing that seemed real was that he was out at sea, on board a ship, with the draught of the mainsail blowing down his neck in spite of the raised collar of his pilot jacket.

Then followed the usual sea-medley of pleasantnesses and unpleasantnesses. At first all things were at sixes and sevens; everybody was new to everything and everybody else. But folks got their sea-legs, grew used to one another, things settled down, and there dawned a premature gleam of universal brotherhood and peace. Next, parties and private friendships were formed, and broken up, and re-formed, with a considerable amount of evil-speaking and heart-burning all round. There was sometimes a good deal of wrangling on board, sometimes a good deal of fun; pretty generally a good deal of ennui. The general temper of a ship's company depends largely on the rate at which the ship travels and the state of the weather.

There was plenty of weather to try the temper before Fred's ship got round the Horn. On she plunged through leaden gloom, always carrying away something or other, shipping seas, or getting "pooped" by monsters that cascaded down smashed skylights, made nothing of covered hatchways, and set everything afloat in a dirty deluge, to the music of crashed crockery and jingling tin-ware. But she struggled past the purple-frowning Horn, through "the roaring Forties," up into the regions of rainbow-painted silvery spray, seas like a solution of sulphate of copper, broad-vanned albatrosses, gauzy-flashing silvery-splashing flying-fish, filmy white sails gliding by in the distance like ghosts of ships; delicious all night long on the deck, and dip into the huge, vat-like tubful of fresh-pumped salt water in the morning!

Still the voyage was growing wearisome through having been protracted, and Fred was longing to be home. On the night on which the mate told him Charles's Wain would first be visible, Fred went out on to the bowsprit to see it rise.

Wind, water, weather generally, roughened greatly as he drew near home; but he felt all the better for that. He rejoiced greatly when he got into the converging crowd of vessels which excites a London-bound voyager, who has crossed far-off, almost sailless seas, much as the rustic stage-coach traveller used to be excited when he got into the throng of vehicles which told him that in a very short time he would be in the great city, whose multitudinous lamp-lights had been growing stronger and stronger on the sky before him, "flaring like a dreary dawn." What a leap Fred's heart gave when he was fairly in the thick of the converging vessels, running up Channel by night, watching ship-lights on all sides of him, dancing over the black sea against the black sky.

On the following day his ship, having taken her pilot in the course of it, brought up for the night off Deal, whose line of shore-lights twinkled in feeble emulation of the frost-sharpened stars above; and a shore-boat having come off, Fred went back in it, and spent the first night of his return to England in a Deal hotel.

How strange it seemed to be awoke in the night by the waits, and in the morning by a knock at the door, and a musical "Here's your hot water, sir."

Fred had grown a luxuriant beard which defied such effeminate appliances.

How cosy was the clean, nicely-appointed English breakfast, before the clearly-glowing, roaring, flapping sea-coal fire in the comfortable old coffee-room. Fred, however, did not linger over it, but hurried off for London.

Leaving behind the old castles, the boatmen lounging beside their boats drawn up on the pebble sea-wall, the sunlit Downs in which some of the anchored ships had hoisted their flags as if they meant to spend their Christmas Day there, others were weighing anchor with their tugs fuming about them as if impatient to spend their Christmas Day in the Thames, and others again were quietly gliding past north and south, as if commerce took no count of holidays, he rattled behind horses whose hoofs clattered on the marble-hard turnpike-road, and behind the snorting iron horse, whose breath hung in snowy rolling wreaths in the keen air, through pleasant Kent.

"How old, how trim, how pretty, how funny, how beautiful, how jolly it all is!" he thought, as he passed ruined hospitals and hermitages, beam-and-plaster houses, leaning over to one another across the streets as if they wanted to whisper secrets, Romney Marsh sheep munching frosted turnips within iron hurdles, the Stour sparkling in the sunshine, ivy-clad Richborough Castle, Canterbury's venerable towers and countless gables, the wigwams of stacked hop-poles glittering with rime, the thatched cottages clustered round the little churches open for morning service, the red-comfortered, heavy-heeled, smockfrockkins, grinding in merry line along the black slides on the ponds and ditches.

All the holly had not been picked, its glossy leaves and coral berries gleamed and glowed here and there in the stripped hedges, over which philosophical old horses and bullocks looked down with grave wonder into the little winding lanes, whose general stillness was startled by the merriment of passing knots of holiday-making pedestrians, and carriage company crowded three in a gig. Other horses and cattle kept Christmas more comfortably, in deep-littered straw-yards, in company with pecking poultry, and pigs snoring in the sunniest corners on their sides. The ducks seemed to quack more cheerfully than usual as they waddled down to the holes which had been broken for them in the frozen horse-ponds. The geese and turkeys kept up a cheerful gabble and gobble round the rick-surrounded farmhouses, as if they were rejoicing greatly because Christmas had come again, and yet they were alive. Even an impounded donkey had had an armful of sweet hay thrown him, and was keeping Christmas after his fashion. Rusty implements rested in the silent fields, and dim blue-and-red wagons seemed to be dozing in the old cart-lodges, whose dusty old cob-webs had been turned into strings of silver and glass beads by the frost that was melted into flashing jewels, cushioned on greenest velvet where the sunshine lay warmest on the moss-patches upon their black mouldy thatch.

Every now and then, as he was whirled through the restful and yet rejoicing country, Fred caught a glimpse or a hint of some family or friendly gathering.

"My word!" he said to himself, "this is a different Christmas Day from my last at the Creek. It 's like a dream. It 's jolly to see folks take things so easy; they lift their legs as if it didn't matter for five minutes or so when they put them down again. And how red their cheeks are! I wonder what poor old Jem is doing now? But, bless my heart! he's turned in by this time—it'll soon be to-morrow morning at the Creek. I'm glad I shan't wake there. It 's jolly to be back, and Christmas Day 's just the time to come. Only I wish I could have come a little sooner; it makes a fellow's mouth water to see all this hand-shaking and kissing, and no one to give you a welcome. However, my turn is to come, I hope."

His idea of the "jollity" of an English Christmas was not intensified as he got near the end of the first stage of his journey. Christmas spent in the cramped murky streets over which the trains rumble into the London Bridge station must be a depressing festival.

The only cheerful face he saw amongst the porters—working whilst others played—was that of the one who called his cab, and whom, not having yet learned the English tariff of douceurs, he tipped with diggers' liberality. The driver noticed the gratuity which the porter had received, and regulated Mr. Fred's cab-fare accordingly. Neither did London generally seem to Fred a particularly lively place to spend Christmas in during his rapid transit from one station to another.

However, he was soon bowling into the country again on another line. There was only another occupant of the carriage in which he sat, and Fred was much amused by the queerly mingled look with which his fellow-traveller regarded him, half of deep sympathy, ready to be proffered at a moment's notice, half of profound distrust.

When, during the latter part of their journey, the ice was sufficiently broken to allow of a little chat between the two, Fred's travelling companion anxiously seized, or rather made an opportunity of explaining, that he was travelling on "imperatively urgent business, which could not be postponed even at this festive season."

To the average respectable Englishman, for any one to be taking a railway journey of any length on Christmas Day who is not hurrying, a belated guest, to some home, or hospitable friend's, or who is not suddenly summoned from Christmas festivities by some such call as, say, the impending death of a very near relative, is, per se, sufficient proof of the traveller's utter disrespectability, inasmuch as it shows that he has nowhere to go to—belongs to nobody.

When Fred had explained his Christmas travelling by saying that he had just come off a long voyage, his interlocutor's manner relaxed.

"Going far down the line?" he asked.

"To Parcham," answered Fred; "but then, unless I can hire a trap of some kind to go faster—and I suppose that will be hard at Christmas-time—I shall have a long ten miles' ride by omnibus."

"Omnibus, my dear sir! There is no omnibus at Parcham except the one that runs to the station from the 'George.' May I ask where you want to get to?"

"Restington."

"Oh, then, you oughtn't to have taken your ticket to Parcham. You must have been abroad some little time. The Restington 'bus was taken off quite two years ago. You should have booked to Ponder's Road. That's a little station they've opened between this and Parcham. That's where you must get out, but you will have to leave your luggage and walk. There's no trap to be got there. Pretty little place, Restington."

"Very, to my fancy," answered Fred

"I've a slight acquaintance with Mr. Philip Leicester, of Brock Grange; do you know him?"

"I've heard the name," said Fred.

"Highly respectable man. He's to be married in the spring, I'm told. Time he was; and it isn't the fault of his wife that-is-to-be that he was not married ever so long ago. She has been throwing herself at his head until he's tired, and so he has given in. He must be a brave man—rather it was him than me. None but the brave deserve the fair. She's pretty, I've heard, though she's getting oldish—and not a penny. Watson, or Wilson, or some such name. There was a cousin of this Philip's, as rich as herself, who wanted to have her, but, of course, Miss was too wide-awake for that, and then the young fool went and drowned himself, or took to drinking, or ran away to Australia or somewhere, when he'd robbed his poor old mother of the last penny she had left."

Such are the veracious histories which a man travelling incognito may hear of himself and his friends.

"Ah, here's Ponder's Road!" added the male gossip, as the train pulled up in a little station. "Sorry to lose the pleasure of your company. Good evening."

"Why should I?" asked amused Fred, who had not yet recovered the English sense of graduated social proprieties.

"Oh, if it's all the same to you, old John will be glad enough of the job," answered the porter, with diminished respect; and Fred started for Restington, seated beside John, in his ramshackle little "For this my son was dead, and is alive again."—p. 15.

"Good evening. Thank you for your information," said Fred, drily, as he stepped upon the already star-lit little platform.

"You're lucky, sir," when the train was gone, said the station-master, who was also porter and general factotum of the little place. "Old John Bines of Restington is here with his pony, waiting for a box that ought to have come yesterday. He'll take your luggage, and you too, sir, and glad, if you don't mind riding in a light cart."

pony-cart. Old John had not recognised him at once, as Fred had expected, and so he did not say who he was. He had plenty to occupy his thoughts without the old man's chat, as the pony trotted merrily along the hard road, with Charles's Wain spread broadly brightly golden on the sky.

"Beats the Southern Cross out and out!" Fred muttered to himself; "you've to look for that."

Old John was shy, and therefore had not ventured to begin a conversation with his strange passenger from town; but old John was also inquisitive, and therefore listened curiously to his queer talking to himself.

"Ah, there's the old Drewry Barn!" said Fred presently, noting another landmark which showed him he was nearing his goal. Old John pricked up his ears.

Soon afterwards Fred muttered, "And there's the 'Fox under the Hill.'" This was too much for old John to bear in silence. He was driving with whip and reins in one hand, the other for warmth's sake being thrust deep into his pocket. Raising reins, whip, and forefinger all together, he made an attempt to touch the brim of his Jem Crow hat, and—still not venturing to express his conviction affirmatively—inquired, "Been in these parts afore, sir?"

"Once upon a time—ever so long ago."

"Well," continued old John, not satisfied, "I was born and bred in these parts, and man and boy I've lived in 'em pretty nigh as long as anybody, but I can't recollect 'ee, sir; though that aint so wonderful, if you was only staying somewheres for a bit, or passing through as a stranger like, as you might be now. But if you ever lived as you might say, sir—downright lived here—it beats me as I shouldn't recollect 'ee, it do."

"Let me see, now," said Fred, for fun, "isn't your name Ephraim?"

"I knew I was right!" triumphantly exclaimed the old man. "Anybody who knew anything about these parts, would know as I'm old John Bines."

"Well, I didn't say your name wasn't Bines."

"Ah, but you said as it was Ephraim, sir," chuckled old John.

As they drew nearer to the village Fred pointed to a house in the distance, the windows of which were almost all lighted up, and asked what place that was.

Again the old man chuckled. "I knowed as you couldn't ha' lived long in these parts," he said. "Why, that's Brock Grange, sir."

"And what of that?"

"Why, sir!" exclaimed the astonished and somewhat scandalised old man, "that's the grandest house we've got in the parish: we haven't got no real squires."

"Who lives there?"

"Leicesters, as long as ever I can remember, and my father afore me. Mr. Philip 's got it now, and it aint for me to say a word agin' him, but a better man had it afore him, and that was his uncle; and though the lor give it to Mr. Philip, there was another nevvy the old gentleman had brought up to look for it, but the lor went agin him. He was a nice young chap, full o' sport, and not a mite o' pride. Many 's the game he 's played me when he was a boy. Run off with my cart, he would, and hide, when I'd left it standin' outside a place. But the lor went agin' him, and he went abroad, and most like he's dead now, poor chap, for his mother never talks to me about him now, though she's main fond of him, and used to talk about him fast enough when he fust went. They say he give up to the old lady all the lor had left him afore he went. But here's the Grange, sir. What a sight o' company there must be, sure-ly! You can see 'm bobbin' back'ards and for'ards on the blinds."

"Is Mr.—Mr.—Lincoln, didn't you call him?—married?"

"No, Mr. Philip aint—Leicester's the name, sir—but they say he's like to be, come Easter, and to a young lady that's main good to me, and as that poor Master Fred I was telling 'ee about was main fond on, and it's my belief she liked him too; but now, they say, she's took up with Mr. Philip. There's no accounting for women's taste, sir, as I used to say to my old 'ooman; but she'd take me up and say, 'No, there aint, or else I should never ha' had you, John.' Mayhap, the young lady's going to take Mr. Philip, but she looks at him, to my thinking, much as if he was a toäd as she wouldn't touch with a pair o' tongs. But where shall I put 'ee down, sir? There's only one inn here where such as you would like to sleep."

"No, John," said Fred, suddenly; "don't take me to the 'Woolpack'—drive me to mother's place."

The old man almost bounded from the cart. "You've give me such a start, sir," he said. "Yes, you're Master Fred fast enough. That's your own nateral voice. But how on earth was I to know 'ee wi' all that hair about your face like a fuzz bush? I'm main glad to see 'ee back. I hope you've done well in furrin' parts, sir."

"I might have done worse," answered Fred, and he gave the old man a sovereign for his fare. John soon put down Fred most reverentially at his mother's, and then tottered about to disseminate the startling news of which the old carrier had the first-hand monopoly.

Mrs. Leicester was not alone—Helen was with her. As she had been "a good girl," and consented, in case Fred should not make his appearance as required that Christmas, to comply with her parents' wishes—at least to the extent of giving him up—she had been allowed to decline her invitation to the Christmas party at Brock Grange, and to pay what was supposed to be a kind of farewell visit to her old friend, Mrs. Leicester.

They had spent a very sad pensive Christmas Day together, the chief comfort of it being their liking for one another, and the tie of common affection which connected them.

In spite of his beard, they knew Fred at once. The widow caught her truant in her arms, and pressed him to her breast and lips, but could say nothing until she had fallen upon her knees, and then all that she could utter articulately was, "For this my son was dead, and is alive again; he was lost, and is found."

The lovers' greetings may be imagined. It seems to me to take the bloom off such pretty scenes to describe them in print.

News spreads like wildfire in a village. Long before Mr. Philip Leicester's party broke up all his guests had heard that Mr. Frederick had come back from Australia. Mr. and Mrs. Wilson, therefore, were not startled at seeing him when they called for Helen, but they were greatly astonished by his news.

The five stopped up talking late into the night, and when they parted, Fred was once more Helen's accepted suitor.

Old Mr. Wilson at first seemed a little vexed when he could no longer even pretend to be sceptical as to the reality of Fred's success; but his tone soon changed, and he summed up matters by saying:—

"Well, I'm glad my girl will have her whim; it went against our hearts to cross her, and you know, Fred, we always liked you better than the other. I only wish you'd got the Grange, then you'd have no rent to pay. After all, though, it's better to earn your money than to heir it; you're a deal likelier to make more of it."

Philip did not break his heart, but rapidly transferred his tepid affections to another young lady; and when Fred was settled, with his wife and mother, on a first-rate farm in the neighbourhood, known throughout the country-side as "a very warm man, sir; a fine, pushing fellow, for he made his money in a month, they say, with his own pick and shovel, out at the Gold Diggings," Mrs. Philip Leicester was very fond of inviting Mr. and Mrs. Frederick Leicester to Brock Grange, for some reason taking scrupulous care never to omit her address in her notes of invitation.

"WHERE IS THE PROMISE OF HIS COMING?"

BY THE RIGHT REV. THE LORD BISHOP OF GLOUCESTER AND BRISTOL.

2 Peter iii. 4.

AMONG the serious questions which the great festival of the Lord's first coming brings with it, none perhaps at this particular time is felt more—felt, though not always expressed—than this which forms the text of these meditations. He has come once, even as ancient prophecy foretold; will He return again, as He Himself promised? Is this a real promise? Will it be verified truly and completely, or have the words to be taken at less than their literal meaning? and is mere vague expectation, if even that, to take the place of the sure and certain hope that "He that cometh will come, and will not tarry"?

These are days when such questions are asked with increasing depth of interest; and it is well at times to try and answer them. So let us, at this holy and happy season, when we look back on a holy past, look forward to the blessed future, and turn to the thoughts which such a truly searching question must at once awaken in the heart of every thinking man among us.

"Where is the promise of His coming?"

O serious and, in some respects, dreadful question!—question strange and incongruous at all times! Strange indeed in those early days, when some were yet living who could have answered with all the fervour of an assured soul and spirit—"The promise? Where? Why, heard we it not ofttimes from His own blessed lips? on the wayside as we walked with Him; on Olivet as we sat with Him; in the upper room ere we sang with Him our last hymn? Yea, heard we it not from angels' lips when the cloud that shall bear him back again was receiving Him out of our sight?"

But what of the answer of our own days? God be praised, my dear readers, that as yet the bulk of the Christian community would answer readily and heartily such a question as that of our text if solemnly addressed to them. If the words of these mockers of the past were now to be directed to a Christian congregation, I will not believe that there would be much hesitation about the reply. If it were now said to us, "Where is the promise of Christ's coming?" would not our answer be promptly and eagerly given—"Where? Why, everywhere! In the blessed Word of God; in the prophecies of the Old Testament, and in the revelations of the New Testament; in the deep anticipatory longings of the human heart; in the signs of the times; in present developments; in the hopes of the future, in the fears of the future; in the very course and current of all human things, written word and unwritten presage alike bearing their mystic witness that He that cometh will come, and will not tarry."

Such I doubt not would as yet be the answer of this and every Christian congregation gathered together in our land on Christmas Day. But will there be this loyal response always?—nay, more, are there not many now who might outwardly answer with a conventional affirmation, and yet be conscious of a doubting hesitating heart within that could not shake off its secret uneasiness at the coarse yet plausible reference to experience which gives force to the scoffer's question?

Let us proceed to consider the question in connection with the reasons, secret or avowed, for its being put forward. Why did these scoffers put such a question, and on what did they found it? The question is worth answering.

First, who were they?

Some knowledge of their principles may be of use to us in estimating the force of their tacit objections, and in forewarning us, if it should indeed appear that the scoffers of the days of St. Peter present some outlines of resemblance to the doubters of our own times; and if similarly mixed motives and principles are apparently to be discerned in those who, whether in earlier or later days, deem that the promise of the Lord's coming is out of harmony with the course of his own providence. Who were these scoffers of the last days, and what were their principles?

Perhaps the question cannot be answered with complete precision. Learned men, as probably many of us know, have identified these doubters with early sects connected with the many varying forms of Gnostic errors.

Some have seen in the description of St. Peter the characteristics of the corrupt class that associated themselves with the name of Carpocrates; some have thought that the error of the Sadducee had won for itself some supporters even in the Christian community; some have thought that the licentious Nicolaitan of the Apocalypse is here more especially designated and condemned. Such attempts to identify these scoffers with known classes of early heretics may be more or less plausible, but with such things we need not now concern ourselves. The Apostle has clearly delineated the principles of those evil men, and it is these principles and not the mere name with which they might have been associated, that it is now our object to consider. These principles, as I have said, are clearly defined. They involved evil both in its practical and in its speculative form. The hapless men that are represented as putting the question, were, on the one hand, lawless and corrupt in life and practice, and on the other, doubters in fundamental truths and impugners the most consolatory article of the Christian's creed—the return of the Lord who died for us. So this powerful epistle depicts these men; such in principle were they from whom the question emanated—corrupt and lawless in life and practice, perverted in faith, and doubters in first principles.

Oh, my brethren, what a hint, what a significant hint is there in this union between corrupt life and false faith! How warningly this Epistle reminds us that speculative misbelief is often the direct issue and outcoming of fleshly sin, and that sensuality and worldliness often form the dreary background of what, on the first view, may seem only to be doctrinal or speculative error! What teaching there is for the present in this simple delineation of the past! What a strange and even dreadful light it seems to throw on the apparently marked increase in crime, and especially in sins of the flesh, of which we seem to have now so much melancholy evidence, and in the apparently equally marked development of novel and dangerous opinions, claiming—just as the opinions condemned in the Epistle claimed—a sort of justification in the result of so-called philosophical observation and inquiry. "Where is the promise of His coming? Where? For since the fathers fell asleep, all things continue as they were from the beginning of creation." In other words, "Experience is a safer guide than the revelation of God."

Verily there is a teaching in these errors of the past to which we of the present shall indeed be wise to attend; there are combinations now which present to us such striking reproductions of all that the apostles denounced long ago, that no wise and sober man can fail to regard them with the deepest anxiety and disquietude. The same evil principles, the same union of evil principles, though apparently standing in no natural connection; the same confident appeal to experimental knowledge; the same reliance on intuitions rather than on revealed truth; the same disinclination to admit the change or suspension of apparently known laws; the same hapless issue in the denial of the most holy and most consolatory truths.

Let us follow further this instructive line of thought.

We have spoken of the principles of these men, and we begin to feel the inward and secret reason of their scoffing question, "Where is the promise of His coming?" Could they wish Him to come? Could they, who walked (as the Apostle specifies) in the lust of uncleanness, desire to behold the Lord of the holy and the pure? Could they, who vaunted of liberty, and were the slaves of corruption, bear, even in fleeting fancy, the thought of the return of Him who cometh quickly, and whose reward is with Him to give to every man as his work shall be. No! the whole course of their life and practice made them dread that coming, and dread of that coming led them to doubt that coming, and doubt expressed itself and shaped itself in the sort of outwardly avowed reason on which the doubt is assumed to rest. But observe that the real reason, though it may be the scarcely realised reason, lies in the background. The doubt assumes the outward form of the words immediately following the text; it makes its appeal to experience; it alludes perhaps to their current speculation; and as it appears before us it wears the garb of semi-philosophical deduction; it asks, as if in the tone of honest and anxious inquiry, "What can be the meaning of a promise that stands in such complete opposition to the ordinary course of things?" All seems outwardly fair and specious, but doubt and the reasoning on which that doubt expresses itself, both really come from an inward corruption of heart—either from proud self-will or from some of the many forms of sensuality that are alluded to in earlier portions of the Epistle. St. Peter, in one clause, lays bare the true and inner reason of the doubting question. One clause tells all. "Scoffers," he says, "shall come in the last days"—scoffers, walking after their own lusts, and saying, Where is the promise of His coming? Walking after their own lusts! Ah, there lies the real ground of all doubt and query! That godless walk leads to the godless question. Self and selfishness either in some more refined or some coarser form, gives the first impulse to the inward scepticism. It is most worthy of notice that St. Jude especially marks the same characteristic in the mockers against whom his short but powerful epistle is mainly directed. Nay, more, he refers to it as forming part of the solemn declaration made years before by the Lord's Apostles as being that which men on whom the Holy Ghost had visibly descended, and by whose tongues He vouchsafed to speak, had specified as the concomitant of all spiritual error. "Beloved," says St. Jude, "remember ye the words which were spoken before of the Apostles of Our Lord Jesus Christ; how that they told you there should be mockers in the last time, who should walk after their own ungodly lusts." Yea, my brethren, this is the real though unwelcome truth; earthly desires and selfishness in some felt form or other are the associates if not the propagators of the worst forms of doubt. The startling question of the text is here set forth to us in its true light, as the outcoming of an inward consciousness of sin, and as the outward expression of a secret dread of its chastisement. Such things, my brethren, are not unworthy of our most serious thought. Such disclosures may well serve as beacons and warnings in these anxious days of specious doubt. Most gravely may they remind us that much that may claim to be considered philosophical investigation and may ground itself on appeals to so-called critical or scientific principles, may yet be only the natural issue of intellectual pride, self-will, and all that is included in the comprehensive terms specified by two inspired Apostles—man's own ungodly lusts.

Let us, however, not forget to observe as a natural sequel to these meditations, that the holy Apostle has not only supplied us with the clue which we have hitherto followed, but has been moved to record, for the sake of those whose doubts and anxieties may be of a less selfish and less corrupt form, the true answer to the question of the text whenever it presents itself, as it often does, in the way of a temptation. When the poor heart says—Where is the promise? Will He ever come? suns rise and set, moons wax and wane; years fleet onward; generations pass away; centuries are silently added to the long centuries that have elapsed since the promise was uttered—and yet He comes not. All things seem subordinated to order and to law—will there be, can there be, such an infraction of the order of things, such a sudden termination of the whole world's history, as must needs be implied in a literal and visible advent? When the heart in its doubt and disquietude puts to itself such questions, what answer has the Holy Spirit of God enabled it to minister to its own anxieties? What answers stand recorded in the inspired pages of the Book of Life to the question which forms our text?

Two, dear reader, both deeply comforting and reassuring, both carrying with them conviction to every honest though anxious spirit. First, that the history of the Flood supplies us with an exact parallel—a sudden and judicial termination of the then order of things. Secondly, that what seems to us lengthened delay is not really so; that a thousand years are with God as one fleeting day, and that though we, according to our own human estimate of time, may deem the promise long in being realised, yet that with our heavenly Father it is far far otherwise; nay, more, that what seems delay is but another proof of His boundless mercy, and that He (as the Apostle declares) is "long suffering to us ward, not willing that any should perish, but that all should come to repentance." These are the two great answers to the text. These, properly considered, and faithfully estimated, will, with God's grace, minister reassurance to every anxious and inquiring spirit among us. In hours of doubt recall them; in seasons of faintheartedness or of impatience, bear them well in mind. Remember, in the first place, that the reality, the suddenness, and the attendant circumstances of the Lord's coming, are vouched for by another event in the world's history, equally real, sudden, and judicial, of which not only the inspired Word gives a full account, but of which every nation of the world, civilised or uncivilised, has some traditions and some traces. Remember in the second place that the seeming delay is to be accounted for, on the one hand, by man's limited conceptions of duration, and on the other, by the enduring mercy of his Maker, who prolongs the season of probation and repentance.

Such are the answers of an inspired Apostle to all faint or doubting hearts.

Such the answers,—God grant that we may all be enabled savingly to apply them to ourselves. Nay, rather, God grant that we may never need them; that we may be of the happier number of those who neither inquire nor doubt. Yea, God grant that our belief in the Lord's literal and visible advent may ever remain fixed and loyal, and that each day that He vouchsafes to us may be spent in preparation for that which the lapse of every day brings nearer and yet nearer. How near it may be we know not. Signs there are, many and mysterious, that might lead us to think that it is not far distant. Strangely increased knowledge, unrest, sanguinary wars, mysterious aggregations, the increasing goodness of the good, and deepening badness of the bad, artificial civilisations thinly covering systematic depravities, frightful and now constantly recurring crimes, and, last of all, and most ominous of all, a gradually declining faith in the miraculous and supernatural, and an increasing unwillingness to accept the Holy Scripture as the blessed Book of final appeal. All these things may well call up strange longings and expectancy in the hearts of the faithful. Yet other things there are, which, calmly considered, must greatly tend to modify excited hopes, and to restrain unauthorised speculations. One thought of the wide realms of heathenism, one minute of reflection on the still hardened heart of Judaism, may well dispose us to think of those times and seasons which the Father has put in His own power with reverential awe and most guarded and most solemn reserve. We may hope, and we may pray; yea, we may behold the developing signs of the times with an increasing glow of blessed expectation and with the quickened pulses of a deepening love—a love that seems to whisper that the time is short—but of anything like defined prognostication of the approach or otherwise of that hour that no man nor angel knoweth, nay, not even the Son of Man in His humanity, we must most carefully and most solemnly beware. It is to the promise itself that we must cleave—the blessed cheering promise—not to mere anticipations of the time or the season when that promise is to be fulfilled. We must show the working and realisation of that promise in our hearts and lives; we must see Him ever as though nigh; we must feel His holy presence as ever ready to be manifested; we must look forward more and more as seeing Him who is invisible. This is our true attitude in a time of failing and endangered faith; the tranquil eye of love fixed on the heavens from which will come the descending King; the heart and conversation there long ago; the treasure there eternally. The tenor of a life then becomes the practical answer to the question. The blessed promise of His coming is seen reflected in daily acts; the deep deep hope breathes in daily words, and burns in daily prayers. We ourselves answer the question as the Coming One would have us answer it: we answer it by our faith, we answer it by our hope, we answer it by our love. Oh, most of all by our love! It is love for Him that makes what it longs for seem nigh; it is love that by its blessed sympathy makes others feel as we feel; it is love that imparts the holy glow of our own deep longings even to the cold and the careworn; it is love that unites us with all the true and the faithful here below; it is love that binds us in one blessed bond with the waiting saints in the Paradise of God.

THE FIFTH P.

BY THE REV. P. B. POWER, M.A., AUTHOR OF "THE OILED FEATHER," "DINAH'S FIDDLESTICK," ETC., ETC.

CHAPTER I.

"THIS here marrying is a serious business," said Mr. Joseph Peggins to his nephew by the mother's side, Mr. Robert, or, as he was commonly called, Bob Ryecroft.

At the time of delivering this sentiment, Mr. Joseph Peggins was standing in front of a young man who was sitting down with a small pot of paint between his knees, which paint he was stirring about with a little piece of stick. It was quite fit that Mr. Joseph Peggins should find his nephew at this work, for painting was his line of business, and the young man aspired some day to be a "Plumber, Painter, and Glazier, with general repairs neatly executed at the shortest notice, and on the most reasonable terms." So far, so good; Mr. Peggins—who had rather a shaky view of young men in general—was pleased to find his nephew Bob at his work; it argued that there might be some hope of him yet. Under the circumstances this was not to be despised; for "when a man was married he was done for," so thought the worthy old gentleman; and because he himself would not be done for by any person, or for any consideration, he had remained single, and desired that his nephew Bob, on whom all his affections were fixed, should do the same.

Mr. Joseph Peggins had been fished for by many hooks, and he had cruelly and basely eaten off many baits, and then swam right away; and had there been any such wholesome institution in the country as a matrimonial police, Mr. Peggins, in the estimation of several ladies of various ages, would not have been allowed to remain at large a single day, but would have had first six months' solitary confinement, and then six months on the treadmill, and then six months of some other general disagreeabilities, it did not exactly matter what.

He had been fished for with mince-pies at Christmas, and roast goose at Michaelmas, and ducks and green peas in the early spring. One cunning single lady had tried to catch him as in a net with an antimacassar, but he swam through the meshes of it as if he were merely the tail of a tadpole. The effect of a teapot on him was most unexpected; to escape all dangers from such a quarter henceforth and for ever, he gave up tea and took to cocoa. As the cocoa agreed with Mr. Peggins remarkably well, he accepted this as a further proof that bachelorhood was the proper thing for man, and that matrimony was altogether a mistake. As to the argument once pressed upon him that the world could not go on unless people married, and that it must come to an end, he replied he was sorry to say there would always be fools enough to keep the world turning, and that if the worst came to the worst, it was business good enough for the world to take care of itself. When a certain Miss Stuff thought to pin him in a corner, and asked him, in a decided tone of voice, one day, "Mr. Joseph Peggins, how can you remain single?" she felt as if she had run against a stone wall when she got the freezing answer, "You see, ma'am, I can."

The reader will not wonder that, such being the opinions of Bob Ryecroft's uncle, that gentleman now stood opposite his nephew with a very determined air. He had come to give him a bit of his mind, and he meant to do it.

Now, the reason why Mr. Peggins came at this particular time was that it had come to his ears, beyond any further possibility of doubt, that his only nephew was about to get married.

For some time there had been rumours to this effect, but the worthy man contented himself with disbelieving them, and by way of precaution lifting up his stick, and uttering the one word "Beware!" when he met his nephew in the street. Speak to him upon the subject he would not, for fear of putting such a thing into his head, when perhaps it was not there at all; but should it unhappily be there, then the young man's own conscience would tell him what that serious word meant.

And in truth Bob Ryecroft had frequently been startled and puzzled by this eccentric conduct of his uncle. If the old man and he espied each other at a distance, Bob always saw the stick arise in a menacing attitude, and thus approach him, from even half a quarter of a mile off; and before the uncle said "Good day," he said "Beware!" or perhaps simply said "Beware!" and passed on. Suddenly, round a corner, or under any other circumstance or place, up went the stick; so that now it was quite a relief to the young man to find out the meaning of all this, as his uncle said, "This here marrying business is serious—"Beware!"

"Oh, it's all about Rhoda Garnsey," said Bob, as he stirred the paint round somewhat hurriedly, as though he was annoyed; "that's what uncle is on."

As Bob said nothing out loud, the old gentleman, seeing he would not be drawn out of his shell, determined to pull him out of it there and then. Accordingly, like a ready-boiled periwinkle, he looked his nephew straight in the face, and said, "Robert Ryecroft, are you going to be married?"

"Some day, uncle," said Bob.

"Then, sir," said Mr. Peggins, lifting his hand, "beware!" and with a mingled look of indignation, sorrow, surprise, and vexation, the worthy man turned on his heel and made for the door.

Short, however, as was the distance he had to travel, a multitude of thoughts seemed to rush into his mind, of which he felt it absolutely necessary to get rid before he left the premises.

"Joseph," said he, "marriage means rent and taxes, and rates, and repairs, and painting, and papering, and white-washing, and food and drink for two or perhaps twenty-two, and ribbons and laces, and flies, and a certificate, and babies, and doctors, and schooling, and the measles, and vaccination, and the chicken-pox, and cutting teeth, and bibs, and being asked questions, and having to walk the room all night with a baby, and nobody knows what. Beware!" and the old gentleman vanished through the door.

On looking out of the window, Bob Ryecroft saw him walking rapidly and in an excited manner down the street, with his stick held up in a menacing attitude, which must have seemed, to say the least of it, slightly peculiar to the passers-by.

"Beware!"—p. 20.

CHAPTER II.

Up to forty-five years of age Mr. Joseph Peggins had lived in a baronet's family. He had been butler, and seen good living, and enjoyed the large slice thereof which fell to his own share. On this he had thriven and grown fat; and he could not understand how it was that any one could live or rather waddle through life—for this had been the manner of his own existence—without good living. When Sir Charles Trenchard died, Mr. Peggins found himself the possessor of £100 a year for life. Moreover, his own father died very much about the same time, and left him a house which was calculated to be worth £30 a year more.

With these two sums, and savings which made the income up to £150, the worthy man determined to withdraw from anything in the way of public life; to trouble himself no more with dinner-parties and the like, but to retire into lodgings, and be his own master.

One fixed idea the former butler took with him into private life, and that was, that there could be no happiness in wedded life without plenty of money. Sir Charles had always spent lavishly, and Mr. Peggins could not understand how a house could be kept up without lots of money. It was true every one could not have a mansion; still, to keep house involved lots of money, according to the condition of life in which a man was. "Pooh! pooh! don't tell me of moderate means. I'm well off in lodgings with £150 a year, but even in a four-roomed house I should be badly off with double the money. Folk have no right to marry until they can keep good houses." And as he reflected on these things in his own mind, as he sat before the fire on his return home, for want of his stick he seized the poker, and holding it out threateningly, cried, apparently to some one up the chimney, "Beware!"

"That was a turning point in the young painter's life."—p. 22.

That very night Mr. Peggins determined to bring matters to a point, and if his nephew were indeed meditating matrimony, to put an end to the idea if he could; so he sat down, and, after much thought, composed the following letter:—

"Mr. Robert Ryecroft. 'Sir' (that is 'my nephew'—according to which way you take this letter), I am told you are going to get married. If you are, I'm not going to leave you a three-penny piece. More people marry than keep good houses. 'Beware!' If you are 'my nephew' I say 'Beware!' and if you were nothing, only a plain 'sir,' I should say 'Beware!' 'Beware!' is the last word of your affectionate uncle, or your obedient servant, as you take this letter, JOSEPH PEGGINS.
"P.S.—In either case 'Beware!' N.B.—'Beware!!'"

It is quite true, good reader, that Bob Ryecroft was going to be married some day to Rhoda Garnsey.

Rhoda was the daughter of the schoolmaster of the parish where Bob lived. Indeed, Bob had been taught by him, and had been his favourite pupil. A man to reverence and love was that old man; and it was Bob's pride that he should ever have been thought worthy of his daughter.

And Rhoda herself was some one to be proud of. Well brought up—taught that poverty may be adorned with beauty—that work was wealth—that house should be home—that there was a nobility far above the titles of earth—that true love was neither to be bought nor sold—that God had put on woman great responsibility and honour in life, if only she lived up to the position in which He had placed her—all that was really noble was Rhoda Garnsey, and all this Bob Ryecroft knew, and upon him all this had its effect. For Bob had ever, as it were, a model before him, and he would have been ashamed to act in a manner unworthy of such a girl.

All these good things of which I have spoken were to be read in Rhoda's dark hazel eyes. They were those wonderful deep-set eyes from which the soul seems to look out; and when, from time to time, Rhoda seemed a trifle absent, Bob knew well, by the look of her eyes, that she was thinking, and that something good and practical would surely come of it, for Rhoda was not the woman to dream any part of life away.

And Rhoda had cast in her lot with Bob Ryecroft; and Bob, as I have said, was much the better for it. He would have been ashamed not to do his best, when he knew that she would look at his work, and when she was sure to say to work badly done, "Bob, that's no noble man's work, but a poor hireling's; that's not done to God but man." Once Rhoda had said that, and that once was enough. Bob, I say, was much the better for it in a general way; and, indeed, I might say always, though one day he made a sad slip, and as that slip has much to do with the present state of things, I shall relate it here. Bob Ryecroft felt that dreadful day, as Rhoda stood opposite a door he had just grained, and uttered those words, for all the world as if she had breathed out some scorching wind upon him, that shrivelled him up and half made a cinder of him; and the little that was left of him seemed to sink down into his boots—down at Rhoda's feet, and even that seemed too good a place for such a common fellow as he. If you had offered Bob Ryecroft two-pence halfpenny, ready money, for himself at that particular moment, he would not have considered himself worth the odd coin, so good-for-nothing did he seem in his own eyes.

"Bob," said Rhoda, as she looked him full in the face, "it is what God thinks of our work that is of most consequence;" and, seeing how her lover blanched before her deep, real eyes, she said, "Bob, we must be true to all—true to our employers and ourselves, true to our God, true to one another, true to our home;" and then those hazel eyes sent forth from their deep settings such a soft stream of light, such breathing looks of love, that Bob Ryecroft felt music running all over his nerves—little vibrations and shakings, so gentle as to be scarce vibrations and shakings at all, thrilling all over him, just as if all his bones were funny-bones and had been touched half an hour ago, and the sensation was only now dying finally away. For a moment or two he seemed to hesitate as to which Rhoda was—a saint or a witch, for one or other of the two she certainly must be. I don't know what passed in his mind, but probably he settled she was half-way between the two, for Rhoda, true to the wound-binding instincts of her sex, kissed her lover, and with that laying aside of self wherewith woman so often conquers, whispered, "Bob, you will be always what a 'man' should be; and I will always try to be worthy of you."

For two minutes Bob Ryecroft stood opposite the door like a man in a dream; then he deliberately dipped a brush in some red paint, and walking up to his ill-done work, dabbed it over as if it had the small-pox, and that in the worst possible form, so that there was no chance of its recovery; and the sooner it was removed to the hospital for fear of infection the better.

That was a turning-point in the young painter's life. Henceforth he determined that, come what would, he would be true—true to his God, true to himself, true to Rhoda, true to home, and true to his fellow-man. Had Rhoda not poured oil into the wound which she had made, she might have excited her lover's anger and done him no good; but she knew that the reproof in which there is no love is often of little use, and like the One she served, she was ready, when a wound had done its work, to pour in a soothing balm.

"Faithful are the wounds of a friend." Most faithful of all wounds are those of the Lover of our souls. Fear them not, fear Him not; let Him say what He will, let Him do what He will.

"Love's wounds, O blessed Lord, I feel,"
"Those wounds," says Jesus Christ, "I heal."

CHAPTER III.

Don't you think, good reader, that because Rhoda Garnsey's hazel eyes were so full of deep realities, they were not also full of human tendernesses and love, and that they could not be full of merriment too. The same still deep blue lake that reflects in its depths the high mountains, and the very stars, can ripple in the sunshine with sportive little waves, which chase each other as though they were not playing on the surface of great depths at all. And now Rhoda laughed heartily as Bob said he'd given the door the small-pox, and Rhoda should see it again some day if ever it recovered. And as Rhoda had kissed Bob, it was but fair and just, and being quits, and a thing that no lover of fair play could object to, that Bob should kiss Rhoda. This he did after a fashion of his own, for he was very enthusiastic; and that fashion was putting three, and as near as possible four, kisses into one, which after all was an economical kind of way of doing the thing, leaving it to his intended wife to separate them at her leisure, and if she could not succeed, to come to him to help her, and show her how it was to be done; or, if on reflection she thought he had given too many, then she might return what she did not want to keep, and no harm would be done.

This little performance ended to the satisfaction of both parties, and Rhoda, having taken her departure, Bob Ryecroft sat down opposite the spotted door, and did what it would do us all good to do a little more—he began to talk with himself, and that pretty seriously, too. Bob was tackling himself pretty tightly, and he didn't mean to let himself off without going into this matter pretty thoroughly. You see, good reader, that kiss which Rhoda had so wisely given him, and that sweet look which she had so sweetly fixed on him, prevented his going into matters in a sour and melancholy spirit, in which spirit a man seldom does anything right.

"Aye," he said, "she's right; that door is not up to the mark. Rhoda won't have anything but what's up to the mark. Well, I'm not up to the mark myself, by long odds," said Bob, smitten somewhat by his conscience; "but a man may try to be, if he isn't; and here goes. I'll begin upon that door. Now, first-class work, if you please, for me for the future; or if people won't pay for first-class work, they shall have second-class if they like; but they shall know it—first quality so much, second quality so much, but every man shall know what he's getting, and every man shall get what he pays for. I'm paid first price here, and it must be first-rate work; aye, as good as if I were doing it for my own little house. House—house—Rhoda wouldn't let me talk about 'house.' Well, our own little home. No bad work there. Let me tell you," said Bob, "that the graining there shall be fit for an exhibition." So saying, he took up a cloth and rubbed the door clean, and went home.

CHAPTER IV.

There were two old gentlemen much concerned at this particular time in the affairs of Mr. Robert Ryecroft and his intended wife Rhoda Garnsey. One of these was Mr. Joseph Peggins, the other was Rhoda's father, Mr. Garnsey, or, as he was commonly called, "the Doctor."

These two individuals looked at the future of these young people in different lights. Mr. Joseph Peggins, as we have seen, was going in for the chicken-pox, measles, vaccination, together with rent and taxes, and eventually the bailiff; while the Doctor was forecasting much happiness for his daughter and her intended husband, thinking of how many of the elements of true happiness were independent of money. The one was thinking of a house, the other of a home.

Not that the Doctor scorned the idea of chicken-pox, teething, measles, vaccination, and rent and taxes, and bread-and-butter, and meat, and milk; he expected all these things; he had met them all himself bravely with Rhoda's mother, and come well through them all too; but he felt that, as long as the world was, these things must be, and that God had given men the means of meeting them.

The Doctor would not have let Rhoda do anything rash, even if she had been inclined so to do; but there was too much purpose and thought in those deep-set eyes for anything of the kind; and Mr. Bob was to "paper, and paint, and execute all repairs at the shortest notice, and on the most reasonable terms," for some time before he was to be allowed to have Rhoda, or begin housekeeping or making a home. Meanwhile, he had not to peep at Rhoda over a hedge, or lounge about in the twilight like a cat prowling after a mouse or a bird, but he went in and out of the Doctor's house like an honest man upon his lawful business, as indeed his courtship of Rhoda really was.

Rhoda Garnsey wore no fine clothes, but she contrived always somehow to be very attractive in Bob Ryecroft's eyes, and, for the matter of that, in other people's too; for what she had, though plain, was tasteful, well chosen, and well made. And then she always wore those wonderful eyes; and as to new fashions, there were looks of all kinds out of those eyes, and smiles of all kinds played from time to time round the corners of her mouth, and over her countenance; and give me the freshness of these above and before all the queer Frenchified cuts and shapes, and no-shapes at all, promised a most delightful tea, when a knock was heard at the door—a sufficiently unusual occurrence to startle the little party.

XUM

"I'll go to the door," said the Doctor. 'Tis Willie Kennedy come to tell me whether his sister is better;" and accordingly the good man went.

"A room was ready, and a welcome too."—p. 28.

I call some of them, which come from the other side of the water. Bob Ryecroft, too, was very tidy, as he took his seat at the Doctor's table. Even if Rhoda had on two pair of green spectacles, he could have imagined how those eyes would have looked behind them, at his appearance in dirty things all smelling of paint in her home.

The fire was burning brightly on the hearth, and the Doctor had just commenced the crisp piece of toast which Rhoda had laid for him, and all Great was his surprise to see, instead of little Willie, the dim figure of a portly man; for the light was not strong enough to reveal that it was Mr. Peggins in the flesh.

"Is a misguided young man of the name of Ryecroft here?" asked a decided voice.

"Robert Ryecroft the painter is here, if it is him you want," answered the Doctor, quietly.

"If that misguided and going-to-ruin young man is here tell him that he is wanted."

"Who shall I say wants him?" said the Doctor.

"Some one that would save him from ruin."

"Indeed!" said the Doctor, somewhat startled; but before he could ask for further information (for in a moment all sorts of terrible thoughts about Rhoda's future happiness shot across his mind), Bob himself, recognising his uncle's voice, came to the door.

"Well, uncle!" said Bob.

"Young man—misguided young man—beware!" was all Mr. Peggins vouchsafed in reply; and with one hand lifting his stick threateningly, and with the other thrusting the letter he had recently written into his nephew's hands, Mr. Peggins disappeared almost as quickly and mysteriously as he had come.

The little party at the Doctor's tea-table had not to wait long to know the contents of the letter. Bob Ryecroft read it out, and when he had done so, laid it down on the table, and said, "What is to be done?" His first thought was to pursue the old gentleman, and bring him back, and reason with him. But the night was dark; perhaps he might not have gone home at all; and even if he could be found, he was of that impracticable nature on the subject of matrimony and house-keeping, that there would be but little use in catching him, always supposing that he could be caught.

"What's to be done?" said Rhoda Garnsey, echoing her lover's words. "Why, nothing is to be done, and everything is to be done. We must not depend on others. If your uncle, Bob, chooses not to give us the money, let us remember that you might have had no uncle at all; and you are no worse now than you would have been then. I don't think we can do anything about him, but we can do a good deal ourselves. You can work and carry out all those P's, and then we shall have a "home," Bob, and a home together, which is better than lodging by oneself."

"He saw that their faith was a real thing."—p. 23.

"What are the P's?" asked Rhoda's father; "there seems to be something between you two about them; and they seem to make you very independent of Mr. Peggins. I don't want to know every little secret between you two," said the Doctor, "but if 'tis anything that's going to help you along, as it appears to be, I should like to know it, if I may."

"Well, father," said Rhoda, "if Bob likes, he may tell you."

Bob Ryecroft could not get married just yet, but it seemed to bring him somewhat nearer to the honourable estate of matrimony if he called the Doctor, "father." So he said, "Well, father, 'tis just a little thing between Rhoda and me. My uncle Peggins has been and let out at me for thinking of marrying Rhoda, or any girl at all. He says I shall be ruined; and I've been talking to Rhoda, and she says she's not afraid, if we're P-patient and P-persevering, and if we look before us—that she says is another P-preparation—and she points to my new watch-guard here—though it didn't cost much—and says, 'P-prudence, Patience, Perseverance, and Preparation. Bob, I'm not afraid of facing the world if you have these to face it with.'"

"I believe, father, there's a fortune in those P's. Now, I spoiled a door to-day just for want of those P's. If I had prepared my paint properly, and had patience with my work, and persevered, I dare say I should have done it all right. I don't know exactly how to work in the Prudence, but no doubt it comes in somewhere."

"Well, 'tis plain enough where it comes," said the Doctor. "Nothing can be more imprudent for a tradesman than to do bad work; it will lose him his custom, and give him a bad name, and the want of it in any of the affairs of life is enough to ruin a man, or at any rate to prevent him from getting on. But, Bob, there's another P that I have found work well in life, though too many don't care about it now-a-days; and, indeed, whatever jibes and jeers they have they keep for that. Now, guess what that 'P' is."

"Oh, father, I'd never make it out," said Bob. "I never could have put anything on to these P's; it was Rhoda who did it. You know you have made a great scholar of her, and she knows no end of words; and these are very good ones, and I mean to stick to them when I'm married."

"Well, you must guess."

Hereupon Bob Ryecroft first put his two elbows on the table, and buried his head in them, and began to mutter—"P, P, P, P, P-pears, P-pence, P-pipes, P, P;" and Bob changed his position, and, folding his arms, looked up to the ceiling, as though he hoped to find what he wanted there. "P-plenty, P-paint, P-price, P-piecework, P, P, P——"

Meanwhile, a serious expression had been stealing over Rhoda Garnsey's face; and the Doctor was surveying his former pupil and intended son-in-law with a face full of interest and earnestness.

"P, P, P," continued Bob, still looking at the ceiling, and finally turning to the right and left, as if by some lucky chance he might find it there.

A little turn of Bob's head to one side, and a slight movement of Rhoda's bringing her's nearer to his, and a little whisper from her half-parted lips, and Bob blurted out in a moment, like a shot out of a gun, "P-piety!"

"That's it," said Mr. Garnsey, quietly. So long as Bob had the idea, the Doctor did not particularly care where he got it from; but he was too well up to prompting in class not to suspect that Rhoda had supplied the word, and got her lover out of his difficulty.

"Piety," said the Doctor, "is sneered at, and no doubt many people professing to be pious have so behaved themselves as to bring discredit on the word; but, after all, that is not just, Bob. They have merely shown that they were not pious; but the real thing, Bob! ah, that will do wonders for a man! Believe me, nothing will make a man's home happier—nothing will make himself happier—than a daily walk with God. Piety works in with all those other P's; with Patience, and Preparation, and Prudence, and Perseverance. Who was the most pious person that ever lived, and, if you read the Gospels, who was so much given to all these, as Christ? Mind, Bob, when the world laughs at piety, either they know nothing at all about it or they have got hold of the wrong kind. Get the genuine thing. If your Saviour died for you, why, accept Him as freely as He offers Himself, and then live always, and in all things, as you think He would like; and that is real piety."

"I wish, Rhoda," said Bob, as she came to the door to see him off (for you see if she hadn't helped him to find his hat, there's no knowing how long he might have been getting it, considering how long he was even with her help), "I wish I had known of this fifth P when I wrote to uncle after you went this morning, and told him what you said. I think he must have written the letter he brought here to-night before he got mine; perhaps he'll feel differently when he sees we're going to be careful."

And Bob Ryecroft, having at last found his hat, was off.

CHAPTER V.

THERE never was such a hall-door painted in all the neighbourhood round as that which Bob Ryecroft turned out a week or so after this conversation with his intended father-in-law. The fact was, Bob put religion and piety into that door—aye, and there they were on that piece of wood, just as truly as if they had been put into the finest church that ever was built. To begin with, Bob put great preparation into smoothing the door and mixing the paint; then he put prudence into his work, by giving every coat time to dry, and by keeping off every particle of dust; then he gave patience to it, not hurrying over any of the finer part of the work; and he persevered at every knot and swirl of the wood, until at last he produced one of the finest pieces of oak graining that could be seen.

At first Bob was somewhat amused at the idea of P-iety (which was a very good thing in its place) being brought into his daily common work; and then he was somewhat annoyed, "because," said he, "if it comes into this door it must come into all doors, and into window-sashes, and everything else;" but when he found himself saying, "Now, I wonder, if our Lord had been a painter, instead of a carpenter, how He would have done this door?" he somehow or other always took more interest in his work, and gave it a great many little touches of grace and beauty he never would have thought of giving otherwise.

Very wonderful, under these circumstances, was a good deal of the work which our friend Bob Ryecroft turned out; so much so that his custom increased to quite an unexpected extent, and his prospects of marriage became brighter.

Indeed, the happy day grew nearer by several months than had appeared likely. Folk were sure of Bob Ryecroft's work; they knew he did not need looking after; what he said he'd do, he would do; he always let folk know exactly what they were agreeing to have, and the consequence was his little home with Rhoda was coming full in view.

How Bob would have got on in what some of his jeering friends called "the pious line" I don't know had it not been for his intended father-in-law the Doctor. That good man had planted that evening, with his fifth P, the good seed in the young man's heart; and he felt himself bound to look after it, and water it, and train it up for God. The Doctor put Bob on the right foundation. You can't walk about upon your head in the spiritual world any more than you can in the natural; nor can you make a cart draw a horse, any more in the things of the soul than of the body. The first thing must be put first, and the second thing must be put second, and so right on.

The Doctor told Bob not only to do his work as he thought Christ would have him do it, but he told him, moreover, to look in certain parts of the Scriptures, and see what work the Lord came to do; and when Bob did this, the whole thing came out as clear before him as if it had been painted with a brush, that what the Lord came for was to save men from the guilt, and punishment, and power of their sins; and when he got hold of the great truth that Jesus was honest in all He said, and meant it, and that when He said that a man who believed should be saved, then Bob took Him at His word. There were no roundabouts in the matter at all. If He said it He meant it, and if I take Him I mean it; and that was how it was done.

CHAPTER VI.

MR. PEGGINS had mysteriously disappeared from the town the day after he left the letter for his nephew. He did not mean to leave him a single sixpence; and he did not want to be living amongst people who might be expecting something from him, though the thought had crossed his mind whether it would not be better so to continue living, in order that they might be more disappointed in the end.

Mr. Joseph Peggins being a single man, and consequently not having much luggage, had little more to do than pay his bill, pack up a portmanteau and carpet-bag, and be off. I am free to confess that here single men have an advantage. Far be it from me to grudge them their little all.

The course of life on which Mr. Joseph Peggins entered when he settled down in Smallford was not conducive to health, wealth, or length of life. The last that had been seen of Mr. Peggins was his portly figure on the top of the coach, with his stick well held up before him, and the last word he had been heard to utter was "Beware!" though what it referred to none of the bystanders could exactly ascertain.

However, it would have been well for him if he had followed his own advice, for, putting up at the inn at Smallford, there he remained, taking much more port than was good for him, and finally marrying the landlady.

The reader is quite warranted in demanding an explanation of this circumstance, and requiring to know how it came about. Well, Mr. Peggins did it just to have some one to leave his money to, for not a penny should Bob Ryecroft have, and he had no other relation in the world.

But Mr. Peggins's matrimonial joys or sorrows, whichever they were, did not last long, as Mrs. Peggins died in about two years, leaving Peggins in the hotel alone. She left no will, and her husband came in for all.

What good, however, was the "all" to him? Gouty and really friendless, he was likely to become a prey to those around him. There was not much for him here, and there was nothing hereafter.

XUM

It was while gloomy thoughts of this kind were preying on his mind, one dull October night, and he was sitting up by the fireside, propped up in an easy chair, that the minister dropped in upon him, and, after some talk on things of another world, gave him some advice about this.

On enquiring into what relatives the sick man had, the only one he could hear of was a ne'er-do-well, ruined, spendthrift nephew, named Ryecroft, who had been married, but would not beware, and, if not hanged or transported, was doubtless in some jail, or, anyhow, could give no home to him. "Sir," said Mr. Peggins, "I warned him, and he would not beware."

The minister, however, was a man who liked to go into things, so he wrote to the clergyman of the town where the wicked nephew lived, and received back for answer, that there was a young man of the required name, in highly flourishing circumstances, with an admirable wife, a comfortable home, and one baby just weaned and beginning to crawl. Moreover, the baby's name was Joseph Peggins Ryecroft, which name it had been called at the special request of Mrs. Ryecroft's father, as a memento of an uncle, now probably dead, but who had paid for the young man's education in early life.

"Write," said Mr. Joseph Peggins to the clergyman, "and ask if the young man has a young wart behind his left ear, and a younger one, about the size of a pin's head, in the corner of his right eye, for nothing but those marks would persuade me he 's the man."

An answer soon came back that the warts were there all right.

"Now, take my advice," said the clergyman; "you can't be long here, and if this young man will have you to live with him, go; and he and his good wife will nurse you to the end. They'll do you good for the little time you have to be in this world, and help you on to a better one hereafter."

"But they won't have me; I know they won't! When they married they set up with four P's. They've thriven with them it seems, but what good is that to me?"

"What are the four P's?" asked the minister.

With great difficulty Mr. Peggins wriggled to a desk in the corner of the room, and took out his nephew's letter, and said to the clergyman, "There they are."

"'P-patience.' You'll want a deal of bearing with, Mr. Peggins; why, there is the very thing for you; and 'P-perseverance.' They'll often have to try to please you; but you see they'll persevere and stick to it. 'P-preparation.' There you are again, as if it was made for you. An arm-chair in the chimney corner, your bed warmed at night, your toast not burned; and 'P-prudence.'"

"Ah, they haven't much of that," said the sick man, "if they take me in." Then he buried his head in his hands for a few minutes, and at last looked up and said, "Write and say I'll go to them if they'll have me, but that I don't think they will. Oh dear! oh dear! I remember when I got that letter from my nephew, I said 'Stuff and nonsense! P-pickles, P-port, P-pastry, and P-plenty of them;' but his P's have the best of it now."

The next post brought a letter, to say that a room was ready, and a welcome too; and that Bob Ryecroft himself would come with his own spring van, which would hold a bed if necessary, to fetch his uncle, and share with him his home.

And the old man went, and he sat in the chimney corner, and thought, and lay down in his warmed bed, and thought; and at last, feeling that he must become quite bewildered if he continued thus to work his brain, he determined not to think any more. But in spite of himself, the P's would keep uppermost in his mind, and he would keep counting them up on his four fingers, saying "P, P, P, P" 'tisn't any of them brings me here." "I say, Bob, shouted out Mr. Joseph Peggins one evening, suddenly, so loud as to startle both his nephew and his wife, "what brings an unworthy Peggins here? Why has he this chair, and bed, and board, and a baby to play with, all complete, when he deserves nothing? Which P of the four has done all this?"

"None, uncle," said the young man, "'tis a fifth P that Rhoda put in, called Piety. We know our Lord would like it, and so we do it, and like to do it too."

"That's good," said the old man. "You can teach me all about that P too; if 'tis good for you 'tis good for me."

And so, in his old days, Mr. Peggins gave up all his four P's—his pickles, and port, and pastry, and plenty of them. What had they or such things done for him? And the fifth P became his joy.

It used to be the delight of Rhoda to sit by his bedside or easy chair, and answer all his questions as to what this fifth P of theirs really meant. And in his humble way he took it all in. He saw that their faith was a real thing, filling and influencing their daily life. The old man died with a hand in each of his children's, as he called them, one in Bob's, another in Rhoda's, and little Joseph Peggins, his namesake, calmly sleeping at the bottom of the bed.

And when the Ryecrofts rose in the world on all their uncle left them, they never deserted old friends—the four P's which had done so much for them in life, and the fifth, which was better than all.

"BY RIGHT OF LOVE."

BY GEORGE BARNETT SMITH, AUTHOR OF "ALDEN OF ALDENHOLME."

CHAPTER I.

GRANBY is a little straggling village in Wintershire. You scarcely know when you really come upon it, for at each extremity the houses are scattered, and few and far between, whilst those you do discover are almost embowered in trees. There is a heart to the village, however, and many important people live in it—important, that is, when regarded from the point of view assumed by themselves. Imperial and national concerns are discussed there three days after they have agitated the public mind in London, and if no real solution is afforded to any matter of profound interest, we will venture to affirm that everything is reviewed in a more original and striking manner than is the case in the House of Commons. Why, when the member for the county was recently unseated for bribery, the inhabitants of Granby met in their might to tender him their sympathy. They declared by solemn resolution, proposed by the principal innkeeper in the village, seconded by the leading baker, and supported by the master-sweep, that they repudiated the charges brought against the constituency of which they were an important section, and expressed their belief in the immaculate purity of their late member. Everybody felt that when Granby said this honour had been satisfied. The unfortunate member would of course, have preferred his seat to the resolution of sympathy, but even he must have been consoled to think that "public opinion" had thus emphatically condemned the Judge's decision.

It will easily be perceived, from this illustration of the public spirit of Granby, that whatever might take place within their own borders could not fail to awaken the utmost interest in the villagers generally. Accordingly, events of importance to individuals, but of none whatever to the State, were discussed with a fulness and a freedom which, however amusing or engrossing to the gossip-mongers, were sometimes very painful to the persons concerned. Singular is the deep solicitude which one man will take in another's business; it moves him sometimes even more than his own. He will not rest till he fathoms everything which he considers bears an air of mystery upon it; and the further removed the matter may be from any right of interference on his part, the more eager is his desire for an explanation or a solution. At any rate, in Granby twenty-four hours was a period quite long enough for the knowledge of any event to spread to the utmost limits of the village, and to be discussed over every tea-table and in every tap-room.

At the time of the opening of our story a small party of friends was assembled at Granby Hall, the residence of Squire Vincent, the lord of the manor. Mr. Vincent, to do him justice, was one of the most hospitable men alive; in addition to which, he was a kind landlord, and a model employer of labour. No wonder, therefore, that he should be exceedingly popular. Not an old man who touched his hat to the Squire, as he went to church on the Sunday morning, but really honoured him for his philanthropic heart, and would have been sorely grieved if the slightest harm had befallen him. The manners of modern society, had, nevertheless, produced little effect upon his nature, which was bluff in the extreme; and his deportment was of the most rough-and-ready description. He cared more about the pleasures of the field than of Lady Lisp's last "drum," and rarely came up to the metropolis to be bored with London dinners and engagements. He always replied to invitations, that he never went from home, but that if his friends cared to enjoy the fresh air at Granby, they were welcome to bed and board with him. The Squire's daughter, Lucy, was the exact contrast to her father. Elegant, and rather tall in figure, there was a softness, a delicacy, about her, which touched all who saw her for the first time with a strange surprise and fascination. She was very beautiful; but whether it was on account of her beauty or her father's well-known riches, that she had so many suitors, we are unable to say. Further, we do not know whether we ought to tell the secrets of Granby Hall; but at this present moment there were two persons staying with the Squire who were dying to win her hand. These were Captain Hawkins of the Blues, and Lord Durnston the eldest son of the Earl of Mountford. The captain was a dashing young officer, tall, and with the regulation features always pronounced handsome by the novelists. His gallantry was rather that of the drawing-room than the field, it is true, for he had never seen an action in his life. When he does, we should be rather afraid that it will cause him quite as much surprise and nervousness as it would to any ordinary civilian. Lord Durnston was not handsome—quite the contrary; but then he was heir to an earldom, and could not, therefore, be looked down upon with impunity. Both these men had proposed to the Squire for his daughter's hand, during their present visit, and he had asked them, as men of honour, not to breathe a word to Miss Vincent till he had had the opportunity of first conversing with her. Mr. Vincent, we are bound to confess, displayed in this matter the usual worldly weakness—he leaned towards the nobleman. The bait was very attractive; and yet in the feeling there was a good deal of pride on his daughter's behalf. He thought quite as much of the position it would confer upon her as he did of the honour to himself; only, like too many others in the same position, he forgot that Lucy's real happiness ought to be the first thing studied. What to do he knew not. He had got before him a leap which caused him far more anxiety than any which he had taken in the hunting-field. However, something must be done, and he went into the library to fortify himself for the interview with his daughter by a quiet bottle of sherry.

During this brief period of preparation we will leave him, and take a walk down Granby High Street. It is rather a warm day, and Mr. Stout, the landlord of the Granby Arms, is standing at the door of his hotel, evidently ready to take part in one of those lazy chats of which he is so fond. Coming leisurely up the street is Tomkins, the barber, of whom it is not too much to say that he is facile princeps in the scandal and poke-your-nose-into-other-people's-business line. He comes upon Mr. Stout as upon an oasis in the desert. Their conversation must be listened to, however distasteful to us may be the part of the eavesdropper.

"Ha, Tomkins! anything stirring?"

"I should rather think there was!" says the barber, with a knowing smile.

"Anything about the 'All?" says Stout, jerking his thumb in the direction of Granby Hall.

"Exactly what it is about," replies Tomkins. "I reckon there'll be fine doings in Granby presently. (This in a whisper.) Miss Lucy's going to marry a lord!"

"Phew!" says Stout, and a moment afterwards qualifies his surprise by incredulity—"Gammon!"

"No, it ain't gammon neither," returns the barber. "I knows what I knows. 'Taint everybody as shaves Lord Durnston, and 'taint everybody as has conversation with his lordship. I've 'ad the *h*onour of both."

Mr. Stout's excitement increases. There is something in it then! He presses for further information; and the two retire into the tap-room, there to discuss more privately the absorbing question.

"From what has passed between me and his lordship," says Tomkins, confidentially, "I announces a speedy marriage!"

Nothing had really passed between Lord Durnston and the barber except the razor; but the latter had a character of importance to keep up—a thing which he never failed to do upon all occasions. Beverages were called for; and the truth must be owned, that Tomkins, who, under the influence of the insinuating fluid, could never keep the profoundest secret, prevaricated so much, and showed such an utterly untrustworthy character, that the landlord was confirmed in his former opinion that there were really no details to communicate. Still, he felt confident that, although the barber had no authorised information, something was really about to take place of the nature indicated. He had simply expressed doubts of the truthfulness of his informant's story, in order to lead him on towards making a clean breast of all that he knew, or that his tonsorial brain conceived. Having thus extracted from poor Tomkins the uttermost supposition of his fertile imagination, Mr. Stout assumed the air which men generally do towards those by whom they have risen to superior knowledge, and regarded him with pity, not unmingled with contempt. This attempted superiority on the landlord's part was utterly lost upon Tomkins, who was not easily inclined to give up the rôle of oracle. He insisted in discussing with the landlord the distinguished part which their native Granby must play in the festivities consequent upon the marriage of Miss Vincent. The landlord appeared somewhat bored, and made more than one ineffectual ruse to get rid of his loquacious friend. We should be afraid to say for what length of time Mr. Stout was obliged to keep up a conversation in which he had long ago ceased to have any interest. His mind had travelled farther than that of the barber's. He was already calculating the profits which would accrue to him from the village rejoicings on the occurrence of the expected happy event. Not a bad-tempered man by nature, he was apt to become irate under the infliction of any undesirable person's company when anxious to pursue a mental investigation touching his profits as landlord of that famous hostelry, the Granby Arms. However, we have nothing more to gain by listening to his encounter with Tomkins, and we will consequently leave them to arrange matters as may seem to them wise and prudent.

Meanwhile, what was transpiring at Granby Hall? On the evening of this day the drawing-room presented a brilliant appearance. The Squire's courage had failed him earlier in the day in respect to the projected interview with his daughter; and he had determined to make the attempt after dinner. Lights had been called for, and Miss Lucy was at the piano, trilling forth most melodious strains to a touch which attested both her capacity and her love for music. Lord Durnston was assiduous in turning over the leaves for the fair vocalist and performer, and as far as any expression could be thrown into a face of so material a form, it may be said to have glowed with emotion. Lucy never could venture to exchange glances with his lordship when he assumed what he considered to be an interesting expression, for fear she should rudely burst out laughing. He was just one of those individuals who can neither do good nor harm. A child in vice, he was equally a failure at the heroic. The Squire, dazzled by his title, could never perceive this; but to suppose that a high-spirited and romantic girl could for a moment think of uniting her fortunes to those of an automaton of this description, was to mistake the whole character of woman—at least, woman of such material as Lucy was made. On the sofa Captain Hawkins was endeavouring to make himself agreeable to Mrs. Vincent. He shrewdly argued that his time would be better employed in winning over the mother's consent to his suit, rather than in professing a sentimentalism to which he could lay no claim, but which his rival was then exhibiting in full force. After giving a new effect to that fine old ballad, "The Last Rose of Summer," Lucy was persuaded by Mrs. Vincent to sing a melody whose rendering caused her some difficulty. Yet it was a simple song of love, and in itself bore no ingredients of sorrow or pathos that were noticeable. Lord Durnston listened to it unmoved, and even ventured to clap his hands mildly when it was concluded. Lucy's voice, however, faltered before she came to the last bar, and when the song was ended she closed the piano hastily, and left the room, making some excuse, and promising a speedy return. Lord Durnston, fixing his eye-glass more securely in its place over the somewhat vacant orb which it usually covered, sauntered towards Mrs. Vincent and Captain Hawkins. The conversation during Miss Vincent's absence flowed in a very wide and general channel, and as there was apparently no prospect of her return, a game at cards was proposed between the parties—Miss Murgatroyd, an elderly niece of the hostess's, forming the necessary fourth in the deal.

While the game was progressing, another scene was taking place in the library. Mr. Vincent had sent for his daughter, to communicate the proposals for her hand. Lucy was not utterly unprepared to hear her father's statement so far as Lord Durnston was concerned. She had striven all in her power—consistent with civility and politeness—to give his lordship no encouragement, and yet she dreaded the influence he would necessarily have upon Mr. Vincent if matters came to a crisis. The Squire was in an awkward fix. It was all very well to be compelled to ask his daughter's sentiments concerning Lord Durnston, but to be compelled to repeat the operation as regarded Captain Hawkins caused him no small concern. He almost wished there were no such things in the world as women, who brought trouble into every household, and upset frequently all the arrangements both of man and of Providence. Yet he loved Lucy with all the strength of a large but uncultivated soul. He knew she was beautiful, but that counted for little with him, except as a matter of pride. He was conscious that, with her disposition, however plain she might have been, she would have completely twined herself round his affections. Some madness filled his brain now, when he had resolved that she should marry the future Earl of Mountford. Had any one assured him that he could ever have behaved harshly towards his child, it would have gone hard with that individual, and he would have lost his friendship for ever. Still, here he was, meditating treason against her, for aught he knew, whilst she unsuspectingly confided in his love to release her from a difficulty, should any arise. With trepidation, rather than astonishment, Lucy obeyed his summons to wait upon him, and when she entered the library, she flung her arms round the old man's neck, just as she always did when she had some end to gain, or desired to persuade him against some crotchet of his own. The Squire was considerably crestfallen and alarmed by her tears, but when she had to a certain extent recovered herself, he discharged the first half of his burden. Captain Hawkins's proposal (which he thought it better to make known first) was declined firmly and unmistakably; and, to tell the truth, the captain would have been nettled at the half-heartedness of his supposed advocate. Lucy was equally decided in refusing the second offer, and begged her father not to press it.

"Press it, child!" he exclaimed, "why, you must be mad! I never could have dreamed you would receive such a noble offer!"

"I am very much obliged," Lucy managed to sob out, at intervals, "but I cannot, cannot yield him any encouragement."

The Squire was amazed. He half thought that the daughter whom he loved was a fool. Marriage with him was rather too formal a thing. He had never loved Mrs. Vincent, in the high and romantic sense. He had a jovial spirit and an excellent temper, and we know in what light such characters view matrimony. His daughter was far more precious to him than to his wife; and he was totally incapacitated from seeing the difference between a good match and a happy marriage. But Lucy was obdurate; nothing that he could say made the slightest impression upon her. She listened, shook her head, and avowed that she could never marry Lord Durnston. He asked, excitedly, "Why?"

"I cannot tell you, papa," answered the miserable girl; and her conduct seemed utterly unreasonable to the stupid old Squire, who had not the wit to divine the real reason of her refusal of his lordship's proposal. Mr. Vincent rapidly lost his temper. He could extract nothing from his daughter but a simple denial, followed by a tempest of emotion, whenever he attempted to bring her to reason. At last, in a fit of excitement, such as she had never witnessed in him before, he bade her go to her own room, and not address him again till she assumed a more pliable disposition. Sad and dejected, Lucy obeyed his command, and the Squire sent for his wife, to whom he explained the whole circumstances, and who strenuously took his part in the matter. Some excuse or other was concocted to the male occupants of the drawing-room for the absence of Miss Vincent, on her mother's return, and the evening—like all other evenings—passed away. To Miss Vincent, however, it was a period of new and intense suffering.

CHAPTER II.

THE circumstance which prevented Lucy from complying with the wish of Squire Vincent was that her troth had been already plighted to another. Three years ago, John Warrington, a civil engineer, and a very attractive and agreeable suitor withal, had completely won her affections. Afraid to make known the fact to the Squire, who would have stormed and raved at the prospect of what he could not but have regarded as a mésalliance, the two lovers had determined to keep their secret, and Lucy agreed to wait until Warrington should rise in his profession. That he would do so she felt confident; and even had she cherished any doubts upon the subject, the persuasive tongue of Warrington would easily have overcome them. He was now as firmly enthroned in Miss Vincent's heart as at the time of their secret engagement, and the stormy interview with her father only revealed to what a depth in her heart the roots of love had penetrated. She had heard from her lover but rarely during their separation, but their mutual trust was unshaken. Warrington had succeeded in the world to a degree beyond his most sanguine anticipations, and the time was now drawing near for him to return and claim his bride.

The excitement in Granby somewhat cooled down when the party at the Hall broke up abruptly, and only the family remained behind. Mr. Stout regarded himself as harshly treated, after speculating upon an anticipated marriage, to find that no such event was about to transpire. Everything went on as quietly as before, and gossip was reduced to discussing events of smaller dimensions and ramifications than Miss Lucy Vincent's future prospects.

In the course of a month the Squire discovered that his daughter was rapidly losing the beautiful bloom which gave her cheek such a peach-like appearance. He was an exceedingly bad hand at reading a woman's heart. He attributed the listlessness and the lack of vigour which he perceived in Lucy to the fact of her requiring a change, and he resolved to give it to her. He little knew how that loving soul had scarcely passed one day's happiness since, for the first time in her life, she found herself so steadily thwarting her parent's will. Nor was it her own conduct alone (which she could not change for the whole world) that had operated so disastrously upon her health. It was the knowledge to her that the Squire treated her less tenderly than of yore. He had been bitterly disappointed, and he vented his spleen upon the delicate and lovely being who had crossed his purposes. If he had known the miserable hours which she passed in consequence of his coldness and studious neglect, he might have repented. Every night, in her own room, she had bent over the portrait of Warrington, and watered it with her tears, her long and magnificent locks flowing over her neck and shoulders, and completely covering her face, so tell-tale of sorrow. All this was hidden from Mr. Vincent and his wife. Many a time and oft had Lucy been on the point of confessing all; but that which restrained her was an unknown dread as to what would occur when her father knew that she preferred a civil engineer to a nobleman. As for the Squire, he was hoping that time, which heals so many wounds, would put matters right. He imagined that Lucy's obstinacy would soon cease when she saw that he was bent upon the match. Doubtless he would have been less harsh had she possessed sufficient courage to reveal to him the exact state of her feelings; whilst she was nursing precisely the contrary impression. Mr. Vincent, after his failure to bring her to reason, as he termed it, engaged his wife to fight the battle. The latter was not a whit more successful, nevertheless. Indeed, Lucy had always felt that a kind of estrangement existed between her and her mother, which prevented that interchange of confession which generally takes place with mother and daughter. Between Mr. Vincent and his only child was a far stronger tie than the one that existed between mother and daughter; and this it was which had rendered Lucy's estrangement from her father so painful.

At length there came a day when the family left the Hall. Perceiving no alteration for the better in his daughter's health, Mr. Vincent resolved to try the restorative effect of a southern climate. When questioned upon the subject of her condition, Lucy contented herself by monosyllabic replies, which only exasperated her mother, and made the Squire more miserable. The jolly huntsman felt a tenderness towards his daughter that he considered himself bound, under the altered circumstances which her conduct had revealed, to repress. He was willing to lose his present happiness, to win an imaginary smile, and a yielding to his wishes, at some future day. Thus foolishly will even the noblest heart act at certain stages in its history. It was given out in Granby, when the Squire's carriage drove through, piled up with packages and boxes, to the railway station six miles away, that the family did not mean to return for a long period. The Squire was sick of England; his daughter was not well, and required a change; and Granby Hall would miss its popular occupants for at least a couple of years. The village was in despair. When the Squire was away its prosperity was at a very low ebb—the tradesmen's accounts were small, and the poor people sadly missed Miss Lucy's bounty. There was scarcely an old woman in the parish who had not at some time or other called down upon her head Heaven's choicest blessings. She had taken a genuine pleasure in alleviating distress; and, what is perhaps more, in some cases she had extended her sympathy, ever genuine and heartfelt, towards the suffering. For a time all this was now over, and the sun of Granby may well be considered to have set during the absence of the Vincents.

(Drawn by ARTHUR HOPKINS.)

"A touch which attested both her capacity and her love for music."—p. 30.

The Squire resolved first to go to Switzerland, and to travel by way of the Rhine. He endeavoured to enlist Lucy's interest at every point of the journey from London to Cologne. The poor girl was vexed with herself that she should be the cause of so much anxiety to those whom she loved. But it was her fate; she could not help it, and she was constrained in her inmost heart to confess that, if the experience of the last few weeks were to come over again, she could not act differently. She would suffer any extremity or deprivation rather than give up her love. If Warrington only knew the sacrifices she had made on his behalf, how his heart must have been still more deeply moved for her! Some day, perhaps, it gave her pleasure to think, he might know it, when the storms had passed away from her life, and the sun shone out again brightly as of old. The passage across the Channel was very calm, and Lucy drank in the fresh breeze from the sea, conscious of its invigorating power. Mr. Vincent was glad to find that the change already seemed to benefit his daughter, whose spirits appeared to be reviving rapidly. He yet hoped that he should be able to bend her to his will, or to discover the secret reason for her contumacy. We will not pursue the details of the journey, which are of little interest to the reader, but proceed to record the arrival of the travellers at Cologne. In this city they made a stay of a couple of days, and then intended to resume their journey up the Rhine. But at Cologne an incident occurred which changed the whole complexion of affairs, as well as the current of Miss Vincent's life. The boat, having left the pier, had not proceeded more than a hundred paces, when that familiar cry was heard—

"Overboard!"

Instantly there was great commotion on deck; but before any steps could be taken, a gentleman had plunged into the water. On looking over the side of the boat, the passengers perceived a young lady in the arms of one who was vigorously making for the shore. Mrs. Vincent, who first discovered the identity of the missing passenger, gave a shriek, which attracted the attention of her husband. Then Mr. Vincent perceived the situation, and was impatient till the boat had put back to the landing-stage. Arriving there, he rushed from deck, and was just in time to receive the insensible form of his daughter, as she was borne into the hotel by her deliverer. Mrs. Vincent speedily followed, and it was found that Lucy had sustained no injury save a severe shock, from the effects of which she would doubtless soon recover. Of course, the resumption of the journey was postponed, for the unfortunate occurrence necessitated the confinement of Miss Vincent to her own room for a few days.

One morning, when Lucy was strong enough to sit in the drawing-room, she had a visitor who brought a bright blush to her cheeks such as had not been witnessed for months. The moment he had closed the door behind him, they were locked in each other's arms. When Miss Vincent's emotion had somewhat subsided, she gave her lover—for it was John Warrington who had saved her, and none other—the story of her trouble, her head still reclining on his shoulder. Warrington, in return, assured her that the time had come for him to redeem his promise; and that he felt he could demand an interview from Mr. Vincent with every prospect of a satisfactory termination thereto.

The interview came earlier than he anticipated. The Squire, desirous of seeing how his daughter progressed, was thunderstruck, on opening the door, to perceive the situation. He recognised, however, that the intruder was the gentleman who saved his child's life, and besides a suppressed growl, he could not well give any other vent to his wrath. But as soon as he could collect himself, he demanded an explanation.

"Your daughter gave me her heart long ago, Mr. Vincent," said Warrington, "and I now ask you to give me her hand."

"But by what right, sir, do you approach me in this manner, when my child's gratitude is likely to operate in your favour?" questioned the Squire.

"By right of love!" replied Warrington.

The Squire beckoned the latter to follow him, and they went into Mr. Vincent's room, where a long and earnest discussion took place. The end of it was that Warrington, as he expected, fully convinced the Squire that his daughter's happiness would never be secured unless committed to his keeping. He also demonstrated that his professional prospects were such as to justify him in seeking her hand. Lucy's eyes gleamed brightly on their return, and in the course of a few days Mr. Vincent was astonished to find that she had completely recovered her health, and was even more beautiful than in time past.

Granby was not disappointed of its magnificent wedding, though the bridegroom was not Lord Durnston. The Squire surpassed all expectations in the festivities consequent upon Miss Lucy's marriage. She, as Mrs. John Warrington, is now, if possible, more popular than ever. As for Warrington, he well knows the value of his treasure, and grows happier in it day by day.

THE PROFESSOR'S DREAM.

BY THE REV. W. BOYD CARPENTER, M.A., VICAR OF ST. JAMES'S, HOLLOWAY.

HARTELBAD is a quaint little German town. The streets are narrow and crooked; the houses, half timber and half plaster, look as if they were disposed to rest their heads one against the other across the street. Modern improvements have been slow in visiting a place where ancient learning has lingered so long; and, in consequence, there is a close unhealthy atmosphere, which broods about its contracted highways and by-ways. But what is the atmosphere, when from every window, learned professors and beardless students alike launch forth volumes and eddies of azure smoke, which clusters about, and clasps hold of everything?—of the linen which is hung out in snowy copiousness in every street; of the cabbages and onions which are exposed for sale; of the rolls which the baker's boy carries about at morn and eve; till the stranger who visits Hartelbad, goes away with a hazy reminiscence of tomes and tobacco.

Among all the learned who dwelt, in pedantic indolence, within grim Hartelbad, there was not to be found a more ponderously learned or more pedantically indolent a man than Professor Gregory Hochgriffern. His knowledge of books was vast; his enemies declared that it was also vague. His figure and form were vast, in proportion; his hair was abundant; his shaven cheeks were hard and full; his voice was deep and guttural. His enemies said his forte was sound—a voice, and nothing more—and some declared he was not sound, for that he was a noted heretic. His tread was weighty—even his most malignant opponents admitted that he was a man of weight. His memory was good, his industry was great, and his collar was dirty.

He lived in the Esselstrasse, No. 25, with his only child and daughter, Annette, a fair young frail girl of eighteen who was the admiration and the rejoicing of all who knew her. The students used to call her a flower in a library, as she sat among her father's books. Often and often her bright face cheered lonely and desolate houses—children's faces brightened at her approach.

But her visits were not so frequent as she wished. Professor Hochgriffern valued his daughter. The world said he did not value her; but that was an unfounded assertion—he valued her much; her fair fingers had flown on, line after line, as she copied, from the early morn till the last ray of murky sunshine stole through smoke and lowering roofs and rested for a moment on a single spot in the front room in the Professor's house. He thought, and occasionally scribbled, in the back room; she wrote incessantly in the front room. For the Professor had a great work on hand, and though the Professor was phlegmatic in exterior, many and many a dream of hope shaped itself out of the rank clouds which hovered over the bowl of his pipe. He had been years over this great work, and during these years of sad monotony no holiday had been taken, and still her patient pliant hand sped across the foolscap paper, which, not in quires, but in reams, had been brought to the Professor's house.

The bright girlish look had gone long ago. A grave pale face was to be seen where dimple and peach-bloom should have gathered, and still the dull years moved on, leaden and lightning-footed, and the eighteen years of Annette's life had increased to twenty-five, and the Professor held on his iron-handed purpose, demolishing folios and devouring duodecimos, cutting up octavos and giving quartos no quarter. The pale face grew paler; a little cough shook the frail frame, but never disturbed the phlegmatic Professor. If at times he did note that the face of his child looked older and paler than it ought, he soon forgot or put it aside as of small moment compared with the vast importance of the stupendous work on which he was engaged. Friends looked at her, and shook their heads. Some ventured to give the Professor a hint, which he met by removing the inevitable pipe from his lips, and saying, "Eh?" He was not indifferent; but he was abstracted—the philosopher was rapt—lost in some far-off dreamy realms of speculation, and never understood, scarcely heard, the hint. Others spoke strongly to Annette. She ought to go away—there was mischief at work. But she only smiled, and shook her head, and declared herself unwilling and unable to leave her father.

But dreary times come to an end, and hope, however deferred, visits at last the patient and the persevering. The long weary years of plodding toil drew to a close; the Professor's great work was on the verge of completion. It was sent to the printer's; the proofs came home, sheet by sheet, chapter by chapter; the Professor grew gay; he hummed, he whistled, he thrummed with his fingers, he rolled his head, he slapped his sides, he talked to himself, and laughed. His time was come. All Hartelbad—the whole principality of Saxe-Walkenburg-Wölverein — knew that Professor Hochgriffern was engaged on an important work, and inquiries had been made in many quarters when volumes might be expected. Although the last proof was corrected and despatched, an interval of time, so painful to many, must elapse before the book could be ushered into the world. During the interval, the Professor's demeanour changed: he talked little, he ate little, he smoked violently, and gave himself headaches; and even after the goodly stout volumes were in his hands, he continued to show signs of uneasiness; and this continued till magazines, newspapers, and periodicals, came out with various criticisms on his work. Diverse opinions were expressed; some that were adverse the Professor treated with contempt; some that were complimentary irritated and annoyed him, because they were evidently thrown off by careless men who had never read a line of his book; some vexed him by their readiness to seize upon trifles, and to flaunt about with great show a small inaccuracy, while the main principles of his book were calmly ignored; but the minor periodicals he cared little for. The quarterlies he was anxious about; and, of all the quarterlies, he knew how much turned upon the favourable criticism of the Nördlich Deütschlander. At last it came. Somewhat tremulously the Professor cut its pages; alone at its study he paused, half afraid to read or to look. Perhaps his book would not even be noticed; but yes! there it was, its full title at the head of evidently a long article. He glanced almost feverishly at the first few lines, they swam before his eyes; he saw words; he could not gather their meaning at first, but soon he understood; his fame was assured! The oracle had spoken; he was welcomed among the profoundest thinkers of the age! His eyes half filled with tears; he thought a moment, filled his pipe, and blew forth a cloud which filled the room. He took the Review into his hand, but he could not read—he was too glad; so he gave it up, and continued to puff away in silence and inaction.

The smoke from the Professor's pipe began to shape itself into many strange forms. Now he saw a bright little rosy face, with merry eyes—then, as he watched it, the face paled and lengthened into womanhood, and finally, melted into smoke again. The smoke whirled about wildly, and a strange scene appeared. There extended before the Professor's eyes a wide sandy desert, covered with a dense mass of people. He had leisure to observe that every conceivable class and character, rank and profession, had its representatives there. Rich men and poor men, old men and young men, tall men and short men, fair girls and wrinkled dames, members of learned professions, military men and merchants, cocked hats, both of beadles and brigadiers. A crowd such as this could not be silent, and the clamour and din was equal to the shouting and jargon of Irish jarvies on Kingstown Pier, or French tide-waiters at Havre. But as the Professor moved among the crowd, curious and interested, he heard a childish voice singing, half to herself and half to another, the verse of a simple hymn; he thought he had heard his daughter sing it. Looking about, he saw that the voice came from a little girl who was seated on a bank by the feet of a feeble-looking old man. While he contemplated this strange, motley crowd, a new phenomenon appeared: the great desert clove asunder, and out of the immense fissure that formed, there began to emerge the topmost branches of a tree. Slowly and majestically it rose from beneath, spreading its noble arms far and wide over the burning sand, until it had reached its full height. All eyes were turned towards this wonderful tree, which now began to put forth its leaves, till it was covered with the most luxuriant foliage. When the tree had robed itself with leaves, the fruit began to appear; but never, before or since, did tree on earth bear such strange and varied fruit; for, wonderful to tell, it was laden with every conceivable thing which the mind of man can fancy or desire. It appeared as a huge Christmas-tree, groaning beneath the weight of very various and very substantial gifts; and the Professor noted that the most glittering and valuable things were on the highest branches, while the plainer and less attractive were within reach. Thus, jewelled necklaces, diadems, and rings, coronets and embroidered robes, sparkled far on high, but none needful in daily life. Loaves of bread, and coarse but strong clothing; turbans and helmets; cocked hats and wigs; musical instruments of all sorts; and mechanical ones of every kind. A plain circlet of gold hung from the central topmost stem, which shot up far above the encumbered lateral branches.

A shout of joy rose from the assembled populace as the noble tree reached its full height, and in disorder and clamour they jostled and trode upon each other, in their eagerness to get near it. Loud cries of pain and disappointment began to rise from various quarters of the throng. Hundreds were carried out by some of the humane, and laid down, mangled, bleeding — and some even dead—upon the sand. Meanwhile, many had approached the tree, and were anxiously scanning it in search of the object they most desired.

It was a strange medley which ensued when, from out of a little gold-linteled, pearly gate, a white-robed angel came, and proclaimed to all that vast throng that they were free to take one gift each from the Tree of Blessings. Then the clamour increased tenfold, and the cries of pain and woe rose in hundredfold intensity. The Professor trembled for the frail women who, with children in their arms, dashed madly into the thickest of the throng, and, wild and eager, strove to reach from some high swinging bough a gift.

But there was, perhaps, more to move laughter than tears in the scene.

There were stout little fellows, who fled with surprising nimbleness round the outer edge of the crowd, in search of some little creek or gap into which they might thrust their little rotundity, and so draw near the tree. There were spare, wiry little men, who seemed to pass through the closest-packed parts of the crowd, and to run in here, and edge themselves in there, and always to be able to wedge themselves into the smallest conceivable space, till they reached the spot the nearest to the gift they had picked out for themselves. There were genial, jovial-faced men, who managed to get through the crowd, and though they occupied a great deal of space, somehow they had a good-natured way of taking grumbles out of the crossest lips, and bringing a laugh over the hardest and sourest features. There were great, brutal, tyrannical fellows who went like sledge-hammers through the crush, beating down all who came in their way, and thrusting back out of the race pale weaker men, frail girls, or struggling children. These men were always successful in getting what they wanted.

There were some, however, who were equally successful, and much more shrewd, who watched their opportunity, and, with a knowing tone of voice, advised their neighbours to go another way, where the crowd was less, till they had advised everybody out of their own path.

The devices were very diverse and amusing. The majority fastened their eyes and strained their utmost to get some of the number of queer little dull-looking bags or wallets which were suspended in various parts of the tree; but in the greatest profusion they hung in three or four great circles, about three-quarters of the way up the tree. They looked very unattractive, hanging there in their dull leather skins, their necks tied up with a piece of rusty iron wire; yet the striving to reach these was certainly more than for any other gift; and as the crush and rush were greatest for these, so those who sought them displayed the greatest ingenuity in trying to lay hold of them. Some who were fortunate enough to pierce the crowd and reach the tree, tried climbing; but the main trunk, which they had first to pass, seemed very slippery, for it was hard to gain a foothold in the bark. Many fell down, and were hurt, and all had to make two or three starts before they reached the spot where the lateral branches broke from the main trunk. After reaching this, it was easier; and such as could keep their heads cool, and not allow themselves to be distracted by the howling, cheering, or abuse of the multitude below, were, without very much difficulty, successful in appropriating one of these little leather bags. Some were greedy, and endeavoured to carry off more than one; but they never succeeded fully, for as they tried to loose the iron wire which held the second, they either dropped the first, or losing their balance, fell crashing through the boughs, branches, and twigs, to be dashed in pieces below.

But all were not successful in getting near enough to the tree to try the climbing process. Some could only secure a place just beneath the edges of the branches, or at even a more respectful distance; but where men were really in earnest, their ingenuity soon suggested a way of gaining what they wanted. Some supplied themselves with stones, and pelted the branches till they brought down one of the dark little bags. Those who managed it neatly, and did not aim at the bag, but at the branch or twig to which it was attached, were not unfrequently successful in bringing down their game safe and unharmed into their hands, though sometimes a clever climber intercepted it in its fall. But those who were too eager, or too clumsy, struck with their stones the bag itself, and breaking through the skin, let loose a shower of golden coin, to the intense delight of the many, but to his own great mortification.

All, however, did not set their hearts and strain their strength and skill to reach these little wallets of gold.

There were sleek-looking gentlemen, who stole stealthily, and often unnoticed, round about, and in and out, till they found a way, and then would noiselessly glide up the branches with a skill quite wondrous, and deftly grasp a little glittering head-dress, which some called a coronet, but others a fool's cap.

There were gentlemen in black gowns and grey tie-wigs, who gently shook the lower branches of the tree, till down from one of the upper shoots there fell a skull-cap, thickly covered with short grey hair, and a red cloak with an ermine collarette.

There were tall moustachioed fellows, who made many a gallant rush and spring to reach a cocked hat with white and red feathers; and there were beadles who did the same.

There were a great number of lackadaisical looking youths with guitars in their hands, who approached the tree singing and smiling, and with great eagerness clutched at a few fading leaves, and went away discontented when they got them. There were men of diverse forms and faces—fat and lean, ruddy and pale, gleeful or cadaverous—who seemed intent upon dragging down a number of full-made blue gowns, whose sleeves and collars were turned up with silver lace; and there was one of them who got with his gown a huge massive gold chain, which was so heavy when he put it on that he could not stir a single step.

Some, indeed, had striven to reach the little gold circlet which hung at the top, but the angel then proclaimed that none could reach that crown, but that it would be given to the one who made the best choice among the gifts which hung upon the Tree of Blessings.

Others had turned contemptuously away, had twirled their whiskers, and at length had languidly called out for lemonade, which was brought them, and they sipped it through straws, and looked on.

Many and many there were that tried to reach the loaves of bread which hung just—and only just—within arm's length. Women, mothers, there were, that dashed in and fought bravely till they plucked down a little print frock or pinafore. There were women who put forth the most valiant efforts to get a few flowers, or a nice cushioned mass of silky rolls of hair. There were some who struggled much to get a little phial of auricomous fluid, or pink paste; but what they did with them when they got them it would be quite impossible to say.

Towards the close of the scene, there appeared a little body of old girls and young, who made a steady rush towards the great tree, and began simultaneously to climb up it. They all converged towards one point, where one of the ugliest pieces of gear that mortal man ever devised dangled from one of the upper boughs. It was black in colour, and cylindrical in shape, and at one end there extended around it a black lip or ledge. It was made sometimes of soft flossy silk, and sometimes of beaver. To the ordinary observer, it seemed very unattractive; but this compact little phalanx of plucky girls, one and all, made a dash at it, and thought nothing of the peril or propriety of climbing—and all that could be said was that none of them appeared to great advantage, either when striving to get it, or when they had put it on.

At length the crowd, having chosen for themselves as far as it was possible, began to retire—not without murmurs and mutual accusations; and then, as the multitude began to subside, the Professor noted that one little girl, whose voice he had heard singing among the crowd, was wandering round and round the tree, casting wistful and eager looks in all directions, and yet seemingly unable to see what she wanted. The little worn and wan face began to look shaded with disappointment, as she passed on in her weary search. It seemed strange, too, for she had only one thing to choose, and now, after the crowd and tumult was ended, the ground was scattered over with quantities of bright and valuable things. Necklaces sparkling with jewels and gold—bracelets radiant with pearls and carbuncles—the gayest clothing, and the fairest ornaments, lay in negligent profusion at her feet; but she passed them all unheeded, and still—as though loth to turn away—looked wistfully up and down. At last she uttered a cry of gladness, and darted beneath the spreading lower branches, and seized, as they lay against the trunk of the tree—a pair of crutches! and, gleeful and quick, she flew back to the bank she had left, and gave them, with tearful joy, into the hands of her poor crippled white-haired father.

Just then the angel blew a trumpet, and as the crowd turned to look, he took the golden circlet from the topmost branch, and placed it on the maiden's head, beckoning her and her father to follow him. The Professor watched them as the three—angel, old man, and little girl gold-crowned—crossed over the open space to the pearly gate. He saw them pass in; he saw, an instant after, that the little maid returned, and left the crutches outside the gate, and just as she closed the door he saw her face—a face he knew so well—which had so long and fondly bent over his folios and his MSS. He made a start forward, as though to follow; but she turned, and waved her hand, and smiled, and passed through the gate once more.

Then the people vanished, and the tree and the sand began to rise up in one great column, and then to change its colour from the glaring yellow to a duller azure hue. The Professor's eyes began to unclose, and he saw the last puff rising from the bowl of his pipe. No one ever saw him smoke again.

For an instant he sat, half-dreaming still; but there—there lay at his feet the Nördlich Review, which had fallen from his knee as he slept; and he heard a hurried knock at his study door.

Without waiting his sleepy "Come in," there rushed in Mrs. Glaubmann, and blurted out her summons to the Professor to come and see the Fraulein Annette. Scared, and yet sleepy, still the Professor followed. There, in the little front room, beneath the window wainscot, lay Annette, panting and pale, and coughing up blood.

Days of watching and anxiety followed. For once reviews and critiques and folios were forgotten by the Professor. "Away—change of scene—the sunnier South, or the fresh sea breeze. Give her air! Put aside these dingy, dusty, gloomy books. Let us get from home!"

But the doctor (good Dr. Leiniger, whom all Hartelbad loved), only shook his head, and gently said, "Let her rest." And she did rest, talking low to herself when alone, and smiling on every one who drew near.

While, hour by hour, from the dull dawn which never brightened in that little front room, till the glimmering sheen of sunset, which made a solitary patch of light upon the shutter, unwearied, the livelong day the Professor sat by his daughter's side. But he never said a word, save huskily to ask her how she felt. She did not mean to pain him, when she, smiling, said, in answer to this constant question, "Ready, father, ready!" He had been so quiet and so cold—and she was so guilelessly humble in her thoughts of self—that, though she loved him, she never thought that she would be a loss to him. She only lay and planned how she would ask her friend Lisette to come over and copy and write for her father in her stead.

One day—it was a bright Christmas morning, and the clear sun was shining down from a cloudless sky upon the snow-covered streets—as he sat beside her, she took one of his great tawny hands in both hers, and clasping it with her thin, white, ivory-like fingers, she said she had a request to make. She looked so bright and cheery as she spoke, that he almost smiled as he said, "You mean you would like to go to the South, by the sea?" But she only shook her head, and said, "No. I want you to let my little Sunday scholars come and see me!"

He could not say no; yet he felt faint when she said that. The doctor should decide, he said.

Dr. Leiniger looked at her for a while, and then said, speaking to the Professor, whose head was buried in his hands, "Let them come."

When the doctor had left, and good Mrs. Glaubmann had set off to summon the children, Annette put out her long thin fingers, and drew gently the great big tawny hand into hers again, and said, "Father!" He looked up. "I want to see the children, for I had a dream." He started. "Yes, a dream," she said. "A short one, but so sweet!" she continued, talking half to herself, and winding her pale fingers in and out of his great brown healthy ones. "I dreamed that a white-robed angel came, and took me by the hand, and placed a thin golden crown upon my head, and led me across an open space of sand to a gate of pearl, with lintels and side-posts of gold. And then I awoke. And I thought, if the angel comes for me, I should like to see my children, and tell them my dream, before I go," she added, fondling the great big hand, which trembled in hers. How weak he seemed, and she so strong, when the white-frocked little children, with happy faces subdued, came into the room!

She told them her dream. She talked to them of the fair bright land which lay beyond the pearly gate. She spoke of the good kind Shepherd who carries the lambs, even the smallest, in his bosom, over the rough and briery ways, and never leaves them till he makes them lie down on the soft green grass of the meadows which are skirted by the River of Life.

And then she asked them to sing for her a hymn she had taught them.

It was about the happy land which was far away. They had gathered round her—little soft, chubby hands were linked round hers. Sweet and low and broken were their childish voices, as they sung of those realms "far away," and when they faltered in the song, she smiled, and said, "Not far away." And when they looked, the angel had come, and taken her through the pearly gate.

The Professor was there all the while; but he was like one stupefied. He followed her to the grave. Silent! He was silent in his now lonely house.

On the day of her burial there arrived a huge official blue envelope. Listlessly he opened it, and there dropped out a gay-looking decoration, and the letter which accompanied it stated that it was sent from the king, in recognition of the distinguished services rendered to literature by Professor Hochgriffern in his great work recently published.

It was nothing to the Professor. It left him as it found him—silent and listless. Praise, which he thirsted for before, he valued as nothing.

He still wrote, but his pleasure was not there. He looked nearest like one pleased when he passed through the murky streets, and seeking out some of Annette's Sunday scholars, talked with them of the better land.

Some few years later, Christmas morning dawned upon the little town of Hartelbad. The early sunbeams crept into the Professor's study, and revealed him still sitting in his chair before his table, just as Mrs. Glaubmann had left him the previous night, and his head was resting on his hand, as though he were lost in thought. Yes! he is lost in thought. Move gently, Mrs. Glaubmann, as you dust the room this morning; but you need not fear to disturb your master's thoughts, for they are far away, in the land where his lost daughter dwells, and no call of yours will ever bring them back.

On the table before him lay a neatly-folded packet. Within it were found the decoration sent him by the king, a lock of his daughter's hair, and these words written on the paper which enclosed them:—"He who chooses the crown will find the cross. He who chooses the cross will find the crown."

Much loved for the quiet kindness and unceasing self-denial of his later years, there were few in Hartelbad who did not go to his funeral; and the children sang a hymn around his grave.

SEPARATION:

A TALE OF BROTHERLY LOVE. BY ST. JOHN CORBET, AUTHOR OF "THE CANON'S DAUGHTERS," "THE SQUIRE'S GRANDSON," "MINCE-PIE ISLAND," ETC.

CHAPTER I.
IN THE COLONY.

FAMOUS examples have been given to us of the depth and strength of fraternal affection by both Scriptural and classic history. Fiction, too, on a basis of fact, has made its contributions, and actual personal experience has provided instances almost without number. There is something grand and supremely unselfish in the love of brother for brother, of sister for sister. The strong tie of blood relationship is supplanted by a stronger tie in the heart, mind, and affections. The one brother's interest and pleasure is the other's care and concern, and while the younger leans upon the elder with all the force of unassailable confidence, the elder turns to his junior and asks counsel as freely as he gives it. The love is one that is born in the nursery, and is developed in the school-room, and it is one that begins to put forth all its power and strength in the fulness and bloom of manhood.

And yet there is a Friend that sticketh closer than a brother. True, of course, but what does the statement prove? It always seems to me to be an argument in favour of the force of brotherly love; for while pointing directly to the strength of friendship* in its highest human form, it points indirectly to what it takes as a specimen of devoted alliance, namely, the closeness of the affection between brother and brother.

I do not think it will be a waste of time if we subject that alliance to one of the most powerful of moral tests—the touchstone of self-denial.

About five years ago, at the respective ages of twenty-one and nineteen, two brothers, Edmund and Henry Jervis, left England to seek their fortunes in one of the British colonies. Openings offered themselves, and with that promptness of decision which marks the man who is determined to get on, they resolved without delay to fill them. The elder brother, soon after landing, entered the Colonial Civil Service; the younger obtained a clerkship in a merchant's office, a speedy realisation of hopes which gladdened the hearts of all they had left behind. The parting from parents, family, and friends, had been a hard trial for warm and sensitive affections. It had necessarily more deeply affected those staying behind than those going away, for the latter were brothers strong in each other's love, strong in the knowledge that they themselves were not being separated, strong in the sympathetic feeling that their sorrow on leaving home was an equally divided sorrow. Fortified by all the virtues of manliness and hopefulness, they bade good-bye with comparative cheerfulness and buoyancy of heart. Those they loved parted from them with all good wishes, and with as slight a depression of spirits as it was possible to exhibit, and away they went to their distant destination, reaching it in safety after many weeks.

Hopes were fulfilled shortly after landing, and, as I have stated before, Edmund Jervis became a civil servant, and Henry a merchant's clerk. They only who have travelled to a distant colony, and have experienced a separation—destined probably to be long—from friends and relations in the "old country," know the intensity of the pleasure in writing the first letter home. Home is present to their minds exactly as it was when they left it. It has hardly been possible for time to introduce its many changes, so the letter and the familiar writing will find themselves at home at once, even though they travel thousands of miles.

Then, in due course, comes the pleasure of receiving the first letter from England, with a batch of newspapers, and perhaps a book or two, and this delightful excitement over—prolonged by reading neither letters nor papers hurriedly—there comes the gradual settling down to the manners of the new life, and the looking forward to the next mail. The old grief on parting is wearing itself away, the feeling of strangeness in a strange land is diminishing, and the duties of the day are performed with interest and with zeal.

For five years Edmund and Henry worked within a few hundred yards of each other in the chief town of the colony, their separations being few in number and of short duration. Henry was now and then called away up country, and now and then sent on business to a little sea-port, but his absences never exceeded three weeks, and, of course, the brothers always spent their vacations together.

They did not make very many friends, not because they found no one with whom to be friendly, but chiefly because it was necessary to live quietly and economically. However, they were all in all to each other, and only could enjoy in each other's company the unceasing pleasure of "home talks." Their frequent attendances at church, and the possession of good musical capabilities, soon brought them into contact with their vicar and his family, and gradually they made a few friends amongst the members of the amateur choir.

* The Hebrew word signifying husband is three or four times translated "friend" in the Old Testament.

The vicar possessed one daughter, a bright, intelligent, happy-minded girl, and to her Edmund and Henry were particularly attractive, as they had so recently left the "old country." She herself had not been long in the colony, for she had stayed with an uncle and aunt to finish her education, and then had enjoyed a year's gaiety in London and various parts of the country. She brought away with her all her patriotic love, all her affection for England and things English, and though delighted to be once more with her parents, found a difficulty in accommodating herself to the ways, manners, and appearance of a strange land. She showed no signs, however, of anti-colonialism; she wearied nobody with silly regrets, nor was she guilty of childishly abusing new persons and new things; but it was impossible not to have a few English longings now and then, and impossible not to take especial delight in the society of the last new-comer.

To Kate Stafford the two brothers seemed by far the most charming of recent arrivals, and there always was the certainty of a most pleasant evening whenever they were asked to dinner. Their father's house at home lay but a few miles from a rectory in which Kate had often stayed when in England. They knew every tree and ditch for miles around, and Kate herself was familiar with the majority of those rural objects of interest. Edmund, moreover, had a botanical turn, and when Kate discovered this she discovered a common interest, one which a thousand conversations could not possibly exhaust. If she had had her own way, therefore, the two brothers would have been asked to dinner every day in the week. They did come usually once a week, and occasionally spent Sunday evening at the vicarage.

"A parting in all its nervous sadness and bitterness."—p. 44.

Kate, from her goodness of disposition, her beauty, and her cheerful sprightliness, was very generally admired in the colonial metropolis; and when persons came to see how happy she always seemed in the society of Edmund and Henry Jervis, it was supposed that one or both of them had made a conquest.

Friends of the vicar privately asked each other, "Which does she prefer?" and other persons wondered if the younger would give way to the elder, should it happen that both were smitten.

There was not the slightest approach to love-making, however, on the part of either brother. Such a word as love never entered into either's mind, at least, had not entered up to the present moment. That both admired her was undeniable, their admiration arising from their enjoyment of her thorough Englishness, her patriotic affection for "home," and her irrepressible cheerfulness and good-humour. It should be added, also, that there was a likeness in her to their own sister, not so much in face, as in tastes, manners, and modes of expression, and it was impossible not to become attached to her in the course of a long acquaintance. The brothers and Miss Stafford were thrown often together in consequence of the very great liking the vicar and his wife had taken to their new friends, and when Edmund and Henry were casting about for a place wherein to spend their first holidays, the vicar said, "Suppose you join us at the place where we ourselves are going?" The matter was settled at once: a junction was effected at the seaside, and a most pleasant vacation was spent.

The stipendiary magistrate at the seaside place was a nephew of Mr. Stafford, and it was not long before he was introduced to Edmund and Henry Jervis. He shortly became very intimate with them, and they were frequently at his house enjoying his good piano and his fine collection of classical music. Three or four evenings before the vacation closed Edmund was alone with him, Henry being with the vicar at a large cattle "station," forty or fifty miles up the country. Captain Stafford noticed, or fancied he noticed, a very marked liking in Henry Jervis for his cousin Kate, and though entirely free from the least symptom of vulgar inquisitiveness, he was anxious to ask Edmund one or two questions. He led up to the subject very cautiously and circuitously, and altogether failed, by an indirect method, to extract anything from Edmund. He then went straight to the mark.

"I don't want to say anything impertinent, Mr. Jervis," he observed, "but it has struck me once or twice that a slight attachment, so slight that it may possibly end in nothing, has sprung up between your brother and my fair cousin. Please answer me by silence if you think proper, as I have not the least wish to be impertinently inquisitive, I assure you, and pray accept an apology if——"

"No apology needed at all, Captain Stafford," replied Edmund. "I have no doubt my brother admires your cousin to the same extent that I admire her myself, for she is a charming English girl, clever and attractive in many ways; but the sort of attachment you mean is quite out of the question, I am afraid."

"You are afraid?"

"Well, yes; for, to tell you the truth, it would give me the greatest pleasure in life to see my brother in love with a girl worthy of him—that is to say in love with—but——oh, no, there cannot be an attachment, I fancy!"

Captain Stafford asked no more questions. It struck him that Edmund was slightly embarrassed—as, indeed, he was—and that to press him on the subject would be to act inquisitively. So he said no more. Of course he thought a little, and not unnaturally, perhaps, fancied that possibly it was Edmund who was attached to the fair cousin. He was quite wrong, however. But I will not anticipate.

The following evening he was alone with Henry Jervis, and having really his cousin's interests at heart, and thinking it not altogether unlikely she had lost a portion of her affections to one of the brothers, determined to address to Henry much the same observations that he had addressed to Edmund.

"I am nearly positive there cannot be the least fraction of the sort of attachment you mean, Captain Stafford. I most sincerely wish it was in Edmund's power to fall in love with your cousin; but I believe it is not, and I fancy it never will be. She is a most lovable and amiable girl; but were she an angel even, I don't think Edmund would feel able to fall in love with her."

"You puzzle me."

"I puzzle you I dare say, and why? Because I cannot tell you all. In plain English because I cannot tell a secret. The subject is one I don't like to discuss, because it brings to my mind the one secret which I do not share with my brother. We hide nothing from each other: our letters and purses are common property, our interests likewise, and our aspirations; but I fancy Edmund has a secret which, for the best of reasons, he does not tell to me, and I fancy he thinks I have a secret which, for the best of reasons, I don't reveal."

"And each thinks he guesses the other's secret?"

"Exactly so."

"Well, I hope my cousin has not lost her heart to either of you."

"I most devoutly hope she has not!"

That night the brothers told each other that Captain Stafford had asked a question touching his cousin Kate, and each repeated to the other as much of the conversation as he felt able. One or two comments only were made; but both Edmund and Henry lay awake thinking for some time. Not a word more, however, was said upon the subject.

CHAPTER II.

SEPARATED.

THE five years seemed to pass with wonderful rapidity. Constant occupation, undisturbed by those little worries and troubles which seem to add minutes to hours and hours to days, kept the brothers' minds in healthful activity. Promotion added to their zeal, and the good opinion of superiors and equals made them happy.

The hoisting of a flag once a month on the high tower of the General Post Office was always a moment of excitement, for it announced that the mail steamer had been telegraphed, and that home letters were near at hand. Though many were the months that had passed, and many the letters that had been delivered, the wonder and curiosity produced by the arrival of the mail had in no degree grown less. Envelopes were opened with undiminished pleasure and eagerness; good news was gratefully received, and what seemed to be bad was made the best of.

The last mail brought news of an exciting nature—nothing less, in fact, than a summons home. But the summons did not come to both brothers: it came to Henry only, and its effects would necessarily be a separation. The request to return to England was as gratifying and flattering as it was unexpected, for it came from the head of the firm under which Henry was serving, and meant not only increase of pay, but promotion, and a high clerkship in the London office. Henry's first impulse on reading the senior partner's letter was to say nothing to Edmund on the subject, and to write a reply expressing the deepest gratitude and a desire to retain his present position. The idea of separation was intolerable. He could not entertain it, and the proffered promotion brought little pleasure, for there was so small a prospect of any for Edmund.

Concealment of the news, however, was impossible; for, by the same mail, Edmund received a letter from his father, in which he stated that the head of Henry's firm had just called upon him, and told him of his intention to promote Henry to a clerkship in London; so one brother knew as much as the other, and the letter that went by the outgoing mail contained Henry's acceptance of the offer.

The younger brother showed far more regret at the impending separation than the elder. Edmund's principal feeling was one of unselfish delight at Henry's great success. A manly, strong-minded fellow, he would not allow thoughts of a parting to unnerve and distress him, and no matter how unnerved and distressed he might very naturally have been, he would have made no exhibition of weakness to his brother. What he did exhibit was strength, for he felt it. He was no dissembler, no actor.

Henry's grief was plain to all; but being so constantly in the company of a manlier nature and a more determined will, he soon overcame it. He drew strength from his brother, and allowed himself freely to enjoy the bright prospect of well-earned good fortune.

His presence in London was not desired immediately. It was not necessary to start by the very first ship leaving for England; but Edmund urged him not to delay, so he took passage in the Belle Sauvage, which was to sail eight weeks after the receipt of his master's letter.

It is needless to say that the Staffords were very sorry to lose him, and that Mrs. Stafford and Kate at once entered into a conspiracy to make his cabin as comfortable as possible; and it is needless to add that his return was looked forward to with intensest pleasure at home.

"I am glad it is not Edmund who is summoned home," observed their father, "for Henry's grief at being left behind would be insupportable; but Edmund will bear the parting well."

There was not a little excitement in preparing for the voyage home, and in becoming acquainted with the Belle Sauvage, and with some of the passengers occasionally met on board. Henry's mind consequently was diverted; and, drawing strength from his brother's cheerfulness and buoyancy of spirits, he began to feel pleasure in contemplating the prospect of a trip by sea.

"Perhaps it would be wrong to say," he observed to Kate one day, "that home is where Edmund is, seeing that I have the best of parents in England; so I will not say that, but will congratulate myself on having two homes."

"A very sensible view to take," replied Kate. "Well, we will take care of your brother, and try to make your colonial home as happy for him as possible."

Sailing ships are not famous for punctuality in their times of starting. They are advertised to leave on the 10th of a month perhaps, and when the 9th comes, it is found there is still much cargo to be stowed away, or that something unexpected must be done which cannot be finished in time. So the date must be changed, and the last goodbye postponed. The Belle Sauvage, however, her agents and captain, bore the best of names, and as she was advertised for the 21st, Henry knew she would sail at latest on the morning of the 22nd; so when Edmund said it would not be necessary to go on board to-night, Henry at once expressed a wish to be on the safe side.

"I had rather go on board to night, Ned," he said; "for it is not at all impossible we may start soon after midnight. All my traps are in the cabin and hold, and I think I should like to walk down to the station at once."

So, having bidden farewell to all friends, they made for the station, and reached the good ship between nine and ten o'clock.

"Shall we be off to-night, Captain, do you think?"

"Not a doubt of it. The pilot is on board, and the tug alongside, so I think another hour will see us on our way home."

The captain's prophecy came true, and at a quarter to eleven o'clock passengers' friends were requested to leave the ship, and as the harbour clock chimed a quarter past a start was made. The last hour was a trying one for the two brothers; and friends, guessing this would be the case, had discreetly refrained from accompanying them on board; so they had the time to themselves, and there was no one present to disturb the sacredness and impressiveness of "last words."

Eight weeks of preparation for a parting had not been without some effect. They had served, in fact, to break in the two brothers, to school them, and to nerve them for the separation. But they could not beat down and deaden all the breathing, living, pulsating warmth of feeling that ran through and animated two deeply affectionate natures. The parting was a parting in all its nervous sadness and bitterness; but it was bravely faced and carried through.

"Write by the mail, that I may find a letter when I arrive."

"I will. Go and see Bessie the day after you land."

One more shake of the hand, and Edmund stepped on shore. A signal from the pilot, and the vessel was off.

* * * * * *

I think we may accept it as true that Nemo mortalium omnibus horis sapit, and may take Dr. Johnson as an illustration at that particular moment when he described a ship as "a prison, with the chance of being drowned."

There are few greater pleasures than travelling by sea; and while it is impossible to manufacture much affection for a railway carriage or a coach, it is wholly impossible to resist loving the good ship that is bearing you along. She is interesting from stem to stern, from keel to masthead. Her obedience to orders is really affecting, and her cleverness in bad weather and high seas is something you are bound to admire. Her exquisite beauty under full sail you cannot appreciate while on board, but if you see another vessel passing by with all canvas set, you can guess what is the majestic and imposing beauty of your own ship. Then, who shall fail to grow fond of his own snug little cabin, which a passenger can adorn prettily, if a man of purse and taste? Indeed, a cabin is something to become attached to, no matter how small and bare it may be. Sea voyaging has its drawbacks and uncomfortablenesses, of course, whereof grumblers invariably make the most; but it has pleasures without number, which it does not require a Mark Tapley to find out.

Henry Jervis, having found his sea-legs, set to work to enjoy himself, and to sweeten the bitterness of a parting which he felt he could never forget. He arose early that he might enjoy the surpassing beauty of a fine morning at sea; jumped into the deck-tub and had a good bath; paced the deck with the chief mate; washed and dressed for breakfast; devoured coffee, dry toast, and grilled bones; played at ship quoits; projected a weekly newspaper, and called it the Binnacle Chronicle; set penny readings and lectures agoing; got together a choir for the Sunday services; learned the art of taking observations; followed the ship's course on the chart; fished for small sharks, and shot huge albatrosses; watched the signalling to passing vessels; listened to the bubbling and hissing water around innumerable little icebergs; lowered the captain's boat in a calm, and exercised himself with rowing; climbed the rigging, and had to pay footing; sighted the two lights at the Lizard point, and then—then found himself at home! Eighty-four days gone as though they had been eighty-four hours! Eighty-four pleasant, health-giving, enjoyable, interesting days, spent in "a prison, with a chance of being drowned!"

There was no such fun as this for Edmund Jervis. He returned to his lodgings with a heart heavy as lead, but with a stout and stalwart determination to bear up bravely, and to give his brother no gloomy account of himself by next week's outgoing mail. Such resolution as his could not possibly end in defeat. He worked himself into his old buoyancy of spirits, strove to shake off the inevitable feeling of loneliness that naturally clouded over him, and profited on every opportunity by the unceasing kindness of the Staffords.

In due time, that is to say, in about eighteen weeks, the mail brought a letter from Henry. In it was a full and lively account of the voyage, of the arrival at home, of parents, family, friends, and relations, with a few lines touching his new London office, and the duties of his new appointment. There was also a postscript, which ran thus :—

"I could not possibly see Bessie the day after I landed, because she was visiting in the North. She returned yesterday, however, and I at once drove over to see her. She is exactly the Bessie of early days, with the exception of the more womanly look which the lapse of five years would naturally give her. It has given her greater beauty, to my thinking, and rendered solid, dignified, and substantial all that before was girlish. She sent her best love, and promised to write."

Edmund read and re-read the postscript, and when the day's duties were over, took Bessie's letter into the fields, and read it as he walked along.

CHAPTER III.

BESSIE AND KATE.

Henry Jervis was granted three weeks' holiday, and at the end of that time he entered upon his duties in the City. For some little while he found himself in what De Quincey called the "nation" of London without a single friend to visit. Metropolitan friends he had, but they were now at the seaside or in Scotland, so he was able to live in such repose and quietness as London streets will allow.

To his great surprise, he received a letter one morning, stating that his old friend Dr. Goodwin, a physician of eminence in the Midland counties, and father of the Bessie who has once or twice been alluded to, had resolved to move to London, and that he might be expected in a month's time. The doctor had grown wealthy in his profession, and being now too old for long country journeys, had determined to settle in London, and to content himself with just as few patients as might choose to consult him. He would be sure of the old pulses he had felt in Warwickshire, of the familiar tongues he had inspected in Staffordshire, and of the honoured chests he had stethoscoped in Shropshire, so practice would not wholly desert him. His eldest son would step into his Midland shoes, and the big fees would still remain in the family.

Henry Jervis was not more surprised than delighted.

"With Bessie and the Goodwins in London I shall indeed be well stocked with friends! The abundance of quality will more than atone for the smallness of quantity."

The prospect of enjoying the company of such dear and revered old friends drove Henry's spirits to almost their highest altitude, and by day and night he congratulated himself on the coming good fortune. He was altogether in a happy state now, for Edmund wrote very cheerfully from the colonial home, announcing excellence of health, increase of pay, and possible promotion to a higher appointment. He also mentioned that Mr. Stafford had been made an archdeacon, and that Kate had come into a small fortune through the death of a godmother.

So Henry Jervis could hardly help being in good spirits ; but he knew the spirits could never reach quite their highest altitude until he went to Edmund or Edmund came to him.

Very dear and revered old friends, as I have said before, were the Goodwins. Edmund and Henry had known them all their lives. The good doctor had paid them their very first compliment, for he had said first of one and then of the other that he was the finest baby in the Midland counties. Brought up within a quarter of a mile of Bessie, the two brothers had constantly played with and teased her, and through cloud and sunshine, storm and calm, had gallantly loved her. Their pocket-money was lavishly spent upon her ; their rocking-horse gave her her first lessons in riding, their donkey continued her education, and their pony finished it. From school she received numerous letters, and when she went to school herself the letters were supplemented by copies of magazines and newspapers. So Edmund, Henry, and Bessie were almost brothers and sister, and as they grew up they seemed to grow fonder of one another. We can easily imagine, then, what general grief there was when duty called the two brothers from England, and when it became probable that many years must pass ere happy intercourse could be renewed. They survived the parting, however, and found their spirits again in time, and now Henry was in England, and destined to be almost as near his old playfellow as when all lived in a Midland county.

The time soon came for the arrival of the Doctor in London ; and the evening after he reached his new home Henry found himself once more a guest.

"Old times come again, Harry," said the doctor, "and we only want Edmund to throw us back half a dozen years."

"Let us hope that old patients will produce that effect," replied Henry.

"They are not unlikely ; for two hours after breakfast this morning I was looking at a familiar Salopian tongue, and to-morrow a fine Staffordshire chest is to submit itself to my ear."

Thrown again with Bessie, and now grown up, what more natural than that Henry should fall in love with her? Perhaps he always was in love with her ; undoubtedly he always was boyishly. Boyish affection, however, is very springy ; its saltatory powers rival those of the grasshopper, and of that "incisive" insect of which Mr. Disraeli talked to the electors of Bucks a few years ago. It can jump almost any distance. It spurns intermediate stages, and leaps from almost childish regard to very deep manly affection. It was very natural indeed that Henry should deeply love Bessie.

XUM

Lovable she was in every way. A pure, refined and cultivated mind was hers. A disposition almost angelic in its perfect sweetness was hers. She was amiable, religious, unaffected, sincere. As for her personal appearance, that was in every respect in her favour. She was of middle height, hazel-eyed, fair-haired, beautifully proportioned, stylish, and plump. A musical voice she had, and musical tastes of the highest order. So, altogether, there was ample excuse for Henry Jervis's admiration of her.

But did Henry suffer himself to love her? He did not—at least, if he did permit himself, he was hardly aware of the fact. He knew what his admiration meant, and flattered himself he had self so completely under control as to be able to turn it this way or that, to curb and to check it, with but the slightest motion. But there were times when an invisible whisperer told him that admiration meant LOVE, and then he drew the reins very tightly indeed, put on the drag, and came to a standstill at the earliest moment possible.

And what of Bessie? She was sweet Bessie Goodwin still, the same that she always was—perfect as a sister, perfect as a friend, exactly as a big girl what she was as a little one—always bright, cheerful, and affectionate, always a pattern of goodness, high-mindedness, and love. She could not change her manner towards Henry. Whether she loved him matrimonially or not, she must of necessity love him—she must show how thoroughly she enjoyed his company, how great and unchangeable was her regard.

She had not seemed one whit more attached to Henry than to Edmund all the days that they were together, and were Edmund returning to England, Bessie would be one of his heartiest welcomers. If she had a preference, she had never shown it, and the brothers had long believed themselves on a footing of perfect equality in her esteem.

But why did not Henry allow himself to feel and to tell all his love? Because he had a secret belief—shall I say fear?—that Edmund deeply loved Bessie. Here was the one secret to which Henry made allusion when speaking to Captain Stafford.

Each brother believed the other in love with Bessie, and in the sincerity of his fraternal affection each tried hard to gain the mastery over his heart.

When Edmund heard that his brother was returning to England, he at once reflected that he was virtually returning to Bessie; and when Henry received news of his promotion, her name was the first in his mind. Henry came home with a firm and resolute determination not to attempt to "cut out" his brother, and for some time he was to Bessie the intimate friend he had always been—that, and nothing more. But after Dr. Goodwin had been a month in London Henry felt the ground of his determination slip from his feet, and he knew that he was in love. He knew, therefore, that if he gave his affections free play, he must of necessity cut out Edmund.

This act of unfraternal conduct must on no account be committed.

Without a day's hesitation he gave up his old lodgings in town, and removed to Staines, and so put some little distance between himself and dear Bessie. He was not acting cruelly towards her, he believed, as he felt sure that, were Edmund in England, she would feel and show just the same love for the elder as for the younger brother.

On the morning of the day on which he removed to Staines his sister received a letter from Edmund, in which were the following sentences:—

"Tell me, by return of mail, all you know respecting Harry and Bessie. Write fully, and be very explicit. Is it plain that they are in love with one another? I believe Bessie has loved us equally for years, and am quite certain she has excited in Harry as much affection as she has excited in me. Now and then, perhaps, I have allowed myself to believe that I had one little fraction more of her heart than Harry, and that, consequently, I could make her one little atom happier than he. But doubtless I was deluding myself. Now, please sit down at once and tell me everything. I can trust you, dearest Carrie, to write the whole truth, and nothing but it."

Caroline Jervis did sit down at once, and that which she wrote was the whole truth, and nothing but it. She mentioned her brother's hasty removal to Staines, the infrequency of his visits to Dr. Goodwin, and ended with, "And I am quite certain that Harry and Bessie are most deeply attached to each other." She entered fully into the matter, described the minds and thoughts of Harry and Bessie so far as she was able to read them, and told all her impressions in the plainest language she could command.

Carrie posted the letter and went her ways. There was nothing more to be done. She could and did write by subsequent mails, but there was nothing new to tell on the matter: things remained as they were. Henry and Bessie met once or twice a fortnight, and there was no alteration, she was certain, in the strength of their attachment.

But Henry was not happy. He worked hard and well, and gave his employers unqualified satisfaction. Business affairs seemed to prosper with him, and the outside world could not but think him one of the most fortunate of men; still he was not happy, and his letters to his sister were short, and in many respects different from what they used to be.

And what of Edmund?

In six weeks' time, or rather less, Carrie's letter reached him. He read and re-read it, and went his ways. He lay awake the whole night digesting its contents, and when he went to work in the morning his face wore no haggard and fatigued expression, but rather the expression of a determined man whose mind had first been exercised and then strung up to a point of iron resolution. He was not a man to act precipitately, but when once his mind was made up, his course of action was as plainly marked out as the foundations of a house.

Harry loved Bessie, and Harry must marry her. He himself must give her up. As one brother must lose, he was undeniably the one to suffer loss, because the loss must be less to the brother at a distance than to the one within sight of her face. Moreover, it had been ascertained that Bessie loved Harry. Who, then, could think of separating them by selfish or other action?

"I believe the voice of preference has spoken," Edmund said to himself; "far be it from me to let it speak to no purpose."

He answered Carrie's letter, thanked her for the whole truth she had spoken in it, and told her various little items of news about himself and the Staffords. He also sent Henry a letter, writing in a most cheerful strain, and detailing a dozen little matters of interest. Then he went his ways again, and made himself happy at the vicarage and at two or three other houses where he was always a most welcome guest.

A month passed by, and the time came round again for sending despatches home. Edmund had something to say to his mother, something to his sister, and then he sat down to give Henry the latest news.

"My Dear Harry,—The plot thickens, as the newspapers say, and I fancy there will be a tremendous explosion at the vicarage before long. Dear Kate and I have dared to grow inextricably attached to each other. The Archdeacon says he cannot possibly separate us, and what, therefore, remains to be done? I hope we shall find a solution of the difficulty before next mail. Till then, and in greatest haste, Ever your affectionate brother,

"Ned."

It would seem that the difficulty was solved ere the departure of the next mail, for by it Henry received a newspaper in which the following paragraph was marked:—

"Marriage of Miss Stafford.—The cathedral was crowded in every part yesterday morning to witness the nuptials of Miss Katharine Hester Stafford with Mr. Edmund Richard Jervis, of the Colonial Secretary's Office. The service was performed with deep feeling and solemnity by the Lord Bishop of the diocese, assisted by the Very Rev. the Dean, the beautiful bride being given away by the Venerable Archdeacon Stafford, her father. After the wedding breakfast, which was given at St. Peter's Vicarage, Mr. and Mrs. Edmund Jervis left for Port Donnerville, where they will spend the honeymoon."

The above paragraph tells its own tale, and may fitly end mine. By way of postscript I may add, however, that Edmund was not the only Jervis married within the year.

HUGH'S HEROISM.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "SHAG AND DOLL."

CHAPTER I.

CASTDEAN was a quiet, old-fashioned country town. Life there flowed on smoothly and peacefully, without bustle or excitement. Few changes took place; even the building of a new house was a rare event; and everything seemed to remain just as it had done for years and years.

The inhabitants boasted of the antiquity of their town, and pointed out with pride the remains of the old city walls, which had formerly closed it in all round, but of which the traces had gradually vanished on two sides, as the place grew and overstepped its original bounds.

On the other side, however, the walls still remained, half crumbled away in some parts; and in others forming a broad pleasant walk for the townspeople, covered as they were by a thick carpet of turf, the growth of centuries; and affording, by their elevation, a more extended view over the sunny fields and meadows surrounding the town than could easily be obtained elsewhere; for it was in a flat though fertile district that Eastdean lay.

There were four principal streets, called Northgate, Southgate, Eastgate, and Westgate; doubtless, because in former days they had led to the old city gates. But these had long since totally disappeared; though the wide open gutters running down each side of the streets still remained; whilst the grass, springing up in the crevices between the stones with which they were paved, bore evidence to the fact that, whatever might have been the case in former times, Eastdean had ceased to be a place of much traffic or commerce.

At the end of Southgate Street, close upon the town walls, which, opening just there, allowed a good view out into the country beyond, stood the residence of Mr. Lester, solicitor, as the small brass plate upon the door announced.

It was a good roomy, old-fashioned house, only numbering two stories, but making up in length what it wanted in height. A large garden stretched out at the back and side, upon which most of the sitting-rooms opened, with French windows; and in which grew plenty of shady trees, and sweet-smelling flowers, and abundance of fruit.

Children's voices might often be heard there, filling the air with sounds of merriment; and two little roguish faces might often be seen peeping through the railings of the gate which led from the garden into the street.

XUM

Bright boyish faces they were, with clustering curly hair and dimpled cheeks; whilst, so alike were the two, that one saw at a glance they were twins; for the one seemed but the second half of the other. If one laughed, the other was sure to laugh as well; if one cried, the other cried in sympathy; if one was idle over lessons, the other seemed to fancy it a desertion of the common cause to be industrious; if one was punished, the other never could rest until he, too, had committed some offence, and received a like chastisement.

The six years of their little lives had been happy, peaceful ones, as far as they were concerned; their childish troubles, when they did come, being always lightened by being borne together. And if Mrs. Lester would sometimes wish that they would not always encourage one another in mischief, as they did—for two heads plotting and planning were more difficult to circumvent than a single one—still she could not but feel a true motherly pride and delight as she looked upon the bright loving little pair.

The other members of Mr. Lester's family consisted of two girls: Margaret, who was about fourteen, and Kate, who was two years younger.

But one consequence of this difference of age was, that the two girls seemed to feel they had nothing in common with the two boys. They were too old to join in their games; were becoming too much of young ladies to tolerate their romping boisterous ways; and appearing to fancy that their part was to repress, if possible, and keep in order those turbulent spirits, they set about it in such a way as to stir up every latent feeling of rebellion in the little untamed natures; so that there were frequent skirmishes between the two sets of allies.

The girls went to school by day, whilst Hugh and Bertie did lessons, or were supposed to do them, with their mother; but out of school-time there were many leisure hours, when that famous old garden formed the favourite place of resort for all four. There, in the hot summer afternoons, Margaret would take her book; Kate, who usually followed her lead in everything, doing the same, and, finding a comfortable seat under the shade of a spreading walnut tree, they would soon be absorbed in the interest of their stories.

On this particular afternoon in June they were so seated, when after a while they became conscious of a shower of fine dust falling around them. They brushed it off their pages, and took no notice for a time, until the dust grew into small lumps of earth, which came rattling down upon them, occasionally intermixed with a little gravel. As long as they could, they bore it, knowing well enough from whence it came, and therefore preserving a dignified silence, thinking to tire out their tormentors.

But at length Margaret could stand it no longer. Looking impatiently up into the tree, she saw there two pairs of bright eyes, twinkling with fun, and two little faces brimming over with mischief.

"Hugh and Bertie, come down!" she exclaimed. "You've no business to be up there; and it's very provoking of you to be so tiresome. Can't you go and play somewhere else, and leave us in peace? I'm sure the garden 's big enough."

"Then why can't you go and sit somewhere else?" boldly demanded Hugh, who did not treat his elder sister with the respect to which she thought herself entitled.

"Because this is my favourite seat."

"And so this is ours," replied two little voices in chorus. "This is such a splendid old tree to climb!"

"I can't think what you always want to be climbing trees for! Why can't you be content to play on the ground?" said Margaret, a little irritably.

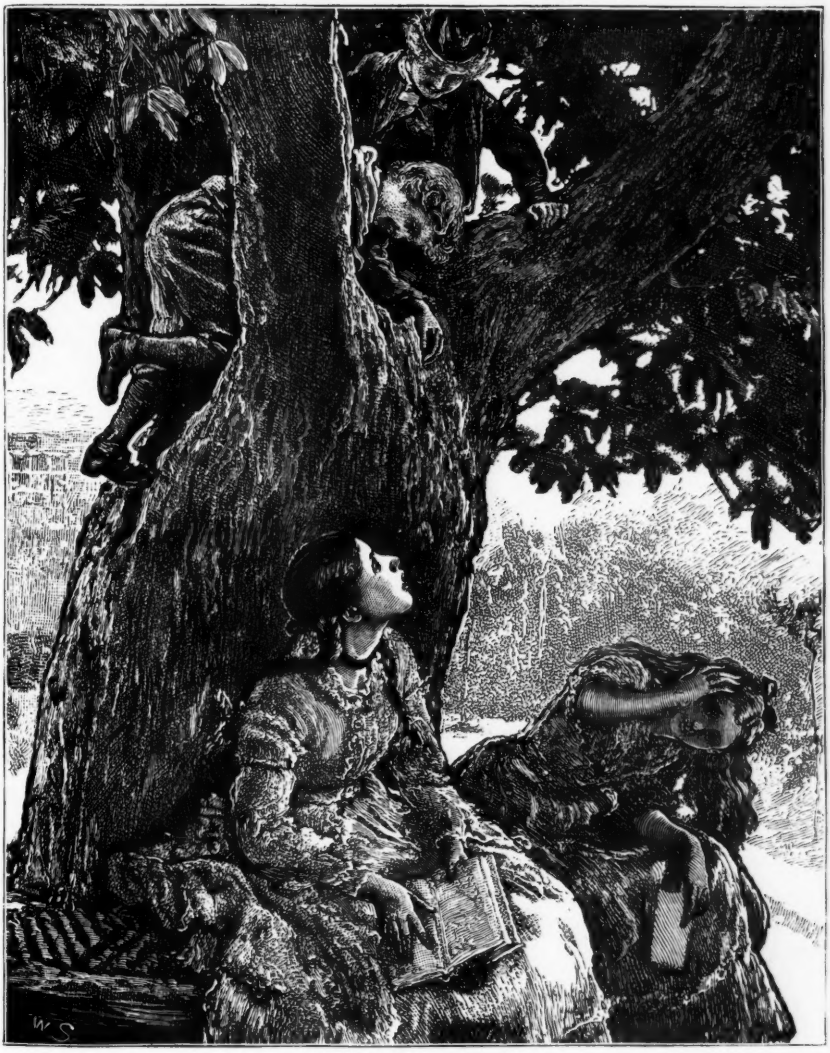
"Because it's much more jolly to scramble up here, where you can't come," and another little shower of earth was allowed to descend upon Margaret's upturned face.

As a natural consequence, some dust got into her eyes.

Smarting from the effects, she exclaimed, "Hugh and Bertie, you shan't stop up there any longer. Come down this instant! You are the naughtiest boys I ever saw!"

"We can't come yet," returned one of the voices overhead; "for we haven't finished raining. Papa said the ground was very dry, so we're giving it a shower. We've still got some cabbage-leaves full of rain, and we must send it all down."

After a little more altercation, Margaret, seeing the hopelessness of the case, desisted from further argument; and, turning to her sister, said, "Come, Kate, let us go somewhere else. It's no good expecting reason from these absurd boys."



And, accordingly, the two girls went off in search of another retreat.

CHAPTER II.

The next morning, as they sat at breakfast in the dining-room—the only sitting-room which looked out into the street—Hugh perceived the postman approaching the house.

"There he is!" he exclaimed; which was the signal for both boys to scramble down from their chairs, and race to the front door, to take the letters from his hands.

The great thing was to see who would get to him first. Hugh was the happy one this time; but he immediately handed one of the letters he had received to Bertie, reserving the other for himself. Then they rushed back to the dining-room with their spoil, exacting, as their custom was, a kiss in payment, from the happy individual to whom the letter was addressed, who, of course, was nearly always either papa or mamma. But this morning, they little guessed what would be the result of the missive they brought in so joyously!

(Drawn by WILLIAM SMALL.)

"Hugh and Bertie, come down!"—p. 48.

Eastdean, as we have said, was not a rising place, and therefore did not afford very much scope for a stirring lawyer. But Mr. Lester was not a stirring man; and, having some private means of his own, had been content to go on in a quiet manner, doing such business as came in his way, and paying little heed to the fact that his clients were gradually becoming less and less numerous.

And so things had gone on; the only difference being that, as the income arising from the profession seemed yearly to diminish, so Mrs. Lester found it yearly necessary to make little retrenchments in the expenses; to be more and more careful and economical.

Therefore, they could little afford to bear the tidings which the letter brought in that morning, of the loss of a considerable portion of their property — news which the paper of that day confirmed.

It was a great and sudden blow, seeming to paralyse all Mr. Lester's energies; and sending Mrs. Lester to sit down over abstruse accounts and calculations as to whether they could still, by exercising the most rigid economy, continue to live in the home which had been theirs all their married life, or whether they must turn out and begin afresh.

The conclusion at which she arrived was that, perhaps by dismissing two of the servants and only retaining one, putting down the little pony-carriage, and curtailing every unnecessary expense, they might possibly manage to hold on. At least, they could try it for a time. That was a present relief; but the perpetual daily struggle of endeavouring to make each pound last almost twice as long as it had done before, was a burden to be taken up in the future, and one that must chiefly press upon her shoulders.

So the house for the next few days was pervaded by a sober, subdued atmosphere, which the little boys perceived and felt, although too young to understand its cause.

Then came the postman again; and Hugh and Bertie had their usual scramble over the letter; though not quite so heartily as formerly, the present gloomy state of things having apparently some connection with postmen and letters.

But this one contained news which Mrs. Lester at once communicated to the whole party.

"Uncle Henry and Aunt Mary have arrived at last!" she said, looking towards the children. "They landed safely at Southampton yesterday, and are coming straight on to us, as it was arranged. So they will be here this evening, most likely."

"Hurrah!" shouted Hugh and Bertie, delighted at the prospect of visitors, and of seeing the Indian captain of whom they had heard so much.

Lessons had to be dispensed with that morning, as Mrs. Lester was too much engaged in making preparations for her visitors to have any time to bestow upon the little boys. So they had a fine time in the garden, where they climbed trees to their heart's content, and visited their pets—rabbits, toads, even caterpillars and spiders, it all came alike to them, their fondness for dumb creatures extending even to those less attractive kinds, and investing them with a sort of beauty in their eyes.

And meantime their talk was about uncle Henry, whom they had never yet seen, as he and their aunt had gone out to India before they were born.

He was a great hero in their eyes, for he was a soldier, and had been in battles; and the wildest speculations as to his appearance were made by his little nephews. They evidently expected to see somebody very different from the ordinary race of men, and therefore were a little disappointed when, about six o'clock, on hearing a cab draw up at the gate, they rushed out, and found a lady and gentleman in no way remarkable alighting from it.

They stood hand in hand, absorbed in the contemplation of Captain Norham, whilst greetings with the other members of the family were going on; but, to tell the sober truth, they found he was just an ordinary-looking gentleman, with dark moustache and beard, tall, slight figure, and military air; not maimed or disfigured in any way. Their hero had fallen a little in their estimation. Who was to know that he ever had been in the wars!

The few days of the uncle and aunt's visit soon slipped away, during which time the two boys, little knowing what was in store for them, gave themselves up to the enjoyment of the present.

The little fellows had gone to bed one night, after a delightful day, in which they had all been for a pic-nic to the ruins of an old abbey near, and had run about and tired themselves so completely, that their heads were no sooner on the pillow than they fell fast asleep. So sound were their slumbers, that they were quite unconscious of their mother paying them a visit later in the evening, when all the grown-up party had come up to their rooms.

The two curly heads lay side by side, whilst each little brother had thrown an arm round the other, and in that position had fallen asleep. A pretty picture they made, those two young unclouded faces, with a slight flush upon their cheeks, and a half smile playing around their lips, as if the last thoughts that night had been pleasant happy ones.

As Mrs. Lester stood gazing upon them, every now and then stooping down to press a kiss upon the soft rounded cheeks, her eyes filled with tears; but she tried to force them back, though there was a longing wistful look upon her face, as if she would gladly have caught them up and folded them in her arms had they not been buried in slumber so profound and so peaceful.

Perhaps her look lingered longer upon Bertie; but it fell very lovingly upon both. They slept on, however, unconscious of it all; going over, in their dreams, the joys and delights of the past day.

At length the mother turned away, and, opening the door of their little room, which was a dressing-room leading out of her own, she closed the door behind her, although she generally left it open. But to-night she must have some conversation with her husband, and the little fellows were to be the subject of it.

"I suppose we must decide at once whether we will accept or refuse Henry's offer?" was her first remark to Mr. Lester.

"Yes; because they will be leaving so soon. It is a very kind offer," returned Mr. Lester, "and a most advantageous one for Bertie. Henry promises, if we let him have the boy, to give him a thorough education, to bring him up exactly as he would his own son, and that means something very different from what we could do for him now with our straitened means."

"Yes, that is true," sorrowfully assented Mrs. Lester, feeling bitterly the meaning of that term "straitened means."

"But," she continued, "that isn't everything that we have to consider. There are the home ties and affections, and he is such a loving little fellow."

"But Mary will not let the boy want for love. If she had had any children of her own she would have been certain to have spoilt them. And Bertie seems quite to have won her heart: she has said, again and again, what a very engaging little fellow he is."

"So they both are," murmured Mrs. Lester.

"Yes; but they naturally choose Bertie, because he is their god-child; and as his is a less determined nature than Hugh's, they think perhaps he will be more tractable and easily managed."

Captain and Mrs. Norham had now returned to reside in England, the former having quitted the army; and the latter, whose one disappointment in life was the having no children of her own, had so completely lost her heart to their little god-son, that when her husband proposed that, for the sake of helping the Lesters in their present reverses, no less than for her own sake—as it would be so great a source of interest to her—they should take the boy to bring up as their own, if the parents would consent to it, she was delighted with the idea, and spared no arguments to induce her sister to agree to it.

Before Mr. and Mrs. Lester went to sleep that night, the little fellow's doom was decided upon; the parents believing they were consulting the boy's interests in accepting the generous offer.

CHAPTER III.

MRS. LESTER looked pale the next morning at breakfast time, and a very close observer might have detected traces of tears in her heavy eyelids; but her face wore its accustomed quiet smile, and her voice was as calm as usual, as she busied herself in attending to the wants and comforts of her visitors, scarcely allowing herself to glance at the two bright boyish faces, seated side by side, on her left hand, eating up their portion of porridge with the greatest relish, and keeping their eager eyes upon the window, that they might watch for the postman, for they would not have missed that scamper to the hall-door for anything; it made such a nice change, and rendered it less difficult to sit still till the end of breakfast time.

There was a letter for Captain Norham this morning.

"I find we must leave you a day earlier than we intended," he said, addressing Mrs. Lester, whilst he handed the letter to his wife. "I am summoned to London on business matters that cannot wait; so I hope it won't make much difference to you if we go this afternoon or evening, instead of to-morrow morning."

"We shall be very sorry to lose you so soon," was poor Mrs. Lester's reply, in a low voice. Then, turning to the children, she added, "If you have done, darlings, you may go out and play in the garden and stay there until I call you in."

So the parting was to come even sooner than had been expected.

She had stipulated that the boys should hear the news first from herself; but she put off the evil moment as long as possible. "Let them be happy whilst they can," she said to herself; but when the early dinner was over, she felt the dreaded task could be delayed no longer.

After having broken the news to the little brothers, she went on, addressing Bertie, who, as well as Hugh, seemed struck dumb by the announcement.

"You'll like seeing London, and all the grand things there, and the sights uncle is sure to take you to, won't you, darling?"

"If Hughie came too; I don't want them without him; I don't care for anything without him. Oh, mamma, let me stay here with you and Hughie; please—please do!" and the little arms were flung tightly round the mother's neck, whilst a sob escaped from the child.

"I can't, my darling; I must let you go. But you'll soon come back and see us again; if not before, at least at Christmas; and then you'll have so much to tell Hugh about London, that I'm afraid he'll be wanting to go too."

"No I shan't! and I hate uncle Henry!" exclaimed Hugh, passionately, his little face having darkened as he stood looking on, whilst Bertie and his mother clung to one another in a tearful embrace. "I hate him! I wish he'd never come here!"

"Hush, hush, Hugh! you mustn't speak like that, my boy. You are too young, perhaps, to understand, though I have been trying to explain to you, how very very kind a thing it is of Uncle Henry and Aunt Mary—so kind, that we can never love them enough; and Bertie, I know, will soon feel as if he had two mothers."

"But he doesn't want two. It would be very greedy of him if he did, when one is enough for other people."

But they could not yet realise all the pain the separation would bring with it; and before the party drove off in the cab that was to take them to the station, certain pleasant visions of wonderful things to be seen and done in London had been opened before Bertie—things of which he might soon learn to write and tell his brother—whilst he held in his hand a half-a-crown given him by his uncle, which he at once made up his mind should all be laid out at the grandest shop in London upon some magnificent present for Hugh.

But the latter had steadily refused a like gift when offered him by Captain Norham; had sternly shaken his head, and resolutely put his hands in his pockets, looking upon it as a sort of bribe, and scorning to accept it.

He would not even say "good-bye" to his uncle; but when at length they tore Bertie from his arms —and they had to use actual force, so tightly were the two clinging together—he rushed away, and flinging himself down on the grass in a distant corner of the garden, gave way to a burst of grief so deep and violent, it seemed as if his little heart would almost break.

At night, after he was tucked up in his little bed —for the first time alone—his mother came and sat beside him, trying to soothe and comfort him by reminding him that Christmas would soon come round. But she herself was thinking sadly all the time of her other little one, away from both mother and brother, wondering how it was faring with him, and feeling, with Hugh, that though they might try to persuade themselves Christmas was near, many long weeks and months must in reality intervene before they would have their little Bertie again with them, and then it would be only for a time.

Hugh, after she had left him, sobbed himself to sleep; and when she came in again that night, as she had done on the previous one, she found a solitary little figure, with tear-stained cheeks and sorrowfully drooping mouth, lying where last night had been two bright smiling faces.

After that he took possession of the side of the bed which had always been Bertie's, lying so close to the edge that his mother asked the reason of it.

"I like to lie where he used to lie, and put my head just where he put his," was the reply.

"But why go so very close to the edge, when you can have all the bed?"

"Because," he answered, with a burst of tears, "I used to be so greedy when he was here, and take up such a lot of room; and one night I gave him a kick, because he said I was just like Juno—that's Mr. Hill's big dog, you know, who takes up all the mat, and won't let Carlo have any share of it. But oh, mamma, I wouldn't do that now! I'd let him have all the bed, and go and lie underneath if he wished it, if he'd only come back. Will you tell him how sorry I am when you write?"

"The better way would be to write yourself, wouldn't it, dear?"

"But I can't yet, mamma; I'm such a dunce; I never can remember how to make the letters."

"But you would soon learn if you tried hard, and gave your mind to it."

"Do you think I could?" asked Hugh, brightening. "I should so like to write him a letter; he'd be so pleased, wouldn't he?'

"Yes, indeed he would."

"Then I'll try, mamma. I won't hide to-morrow when lesson time comes, and I won't be always looking out of window instead of at my copy-book; and I won't dig the pen into the paper to see what a great splutter of ink it will make; but I'll try and be attentive, though it's very difficult, mamma."

"But you'll feel rewarded, darling, when you have got over the first beginnings."

"How soon do you think I shall be able to write—in a day or two? I know how to make two or three letters already—o and e and i."

The next morning Hugh kept his resolution, and came with an earnest business-like look to his lessons. But the little fat fingers were awkward and unmanageable, and soon got themselves covered with ink, and ached with trying to hold the pen as tightly as he thought necessary. Moreover, the letters came any shape but the right, seeming as if they were dancing all over the paper, defying him, and laughing at his stupidity.

It was such very hard work, and he did so hate sitting there making strokes that seemed to have no meaning in them, that nothing but his love for his brother, and great desire to please him, could have held him chained to his seat so long; but when it all appeared to be in vain, and he was no nearer being able to write a letter to Bertie than when he began, big tears of disappointment rose in his eyes, dropping upon his copy-book, and making the state of things there worse than it was already.

"Never mind, darling," said his mother, encouragingly; "you'll get on better to-morrow, I've no doubt; for it will seem easier to you every day, if you go on trying. And now I think it is time to go out in the garden again."

"I can't play at anything without Bertie, mamma! I don't know how to play by myself; and I want him so—oh, mamma, I want him so badly! why did you let him go away?" and there was a touch of reproach in the sorrowful tones as the last few words were uttered.

Mrs. Lester gave no reply, but pressed a silent kiss upon the child's forehead.

"Mamma, why did you send him away?" he repeated. "If it was because he was naughty, you should have sent me, for it was always my fault when we got into mischief. I always proposed it, and he only did the things because I wanted him to. He never was naughty, mamma; and if you'd only let him come back we'd both be so good!"

"My darling, it wasn't on that account; it wasn't for any naughtiness we let him go."

"Then what was it, mamma? Couldn't you have prevented Uncle Henry's taking him? I'd have fought him for you, mamma, if I'd thought that."

"No, darling, it wasn't that," replied Mrs. Lester, smiling at her little champion's warlike attitude, though at the same time tears were standing in her eyes. "It is because we have lately lost a great deal of money, and are very much poorer than we were, and so should have found it difficult, and indeed impossible, to give our little boys all we should have liked and intended. But now we know Bertie will have all we could wish for him; and we shall be able to do more for our other little son."

"Then it's because we are poor, mamma?"

"Yes, darling."

"And you haven't enough to get us new clothes?"

"Scarcely, dear. At least we shall all have to be careful; and so of course it will make a great difference having only one little boy to supply with boots and knickerbockers instead of two."

"Oh, mamma, I'd go without boots and knickerbockers if Bertie might stay at home; I would indeed; I shouldn't mind a bit!"

Many such talks had the mother and little son during the first few sad days after Bertie's departure. And Hugh kept all the resolutions he then made, watching and inspecting the state of his clothes with a solicitude that brought a smile into his parents' faces, as they saw him sometimes seated on the ground examining with a grave face the knees of his knickerbockers in hopes of finding them still in good condition. "For," he said to himself, "perhaps when mamma and papa find how little it costs to keep a boy, and how seldom he wants new clothes, they'll see they can afford to have Bertie back again."

But as the dreary days went by, and his longing for his little playfellow grew more and more intense, a sort of aggrieved feeling took possession of him; for he was too young to understand all the reasons for giving up the little brother, and of course was unable to perceive that his parents' pain must be greater even than his. Therefore he felt indignant and angry somehow, though scarcely knowing how or on whom to vent the feeling. So it slumbered for a while, and then broke out like a little volcano.

CHAPTER IV.

One afternoon Margaret and Kate were in their mother's room, trying on some new dresses which had been bought and placed in the dressmaker's hands before the morning on which that fatal letter had arrived, but which, owing to Miss Smith's unpunctuality, had not been sent home until this day.

They were in the midst of a consultation as to whether there was any need of alteration, when Hugh suddenly rushed in, and flung himself into his mother's arms in a burst of grief.

"Mamma, mamma!" he sobbed, "Toadie's dead; I found him out in the garden in the corner where he always used to live, and he's quite dead, mamma, quite dead! What will Bertie say? He was so fond of him; and I believe Toadie died of grief because he'd gone away!" and, opening his little pocket-handkerchief, he displayed to view the body of his little brother's favourite lying cold and stiff.

Margaret and Kate started back with exclamations of horror.

"How can you bring that nasty thing into the house! It's bad enough to see you pick it up out of doors, but to bring it into a bed-room!"

"Why shouldn't I? and you shan't call Toadie a nasty thing. He's a great deal prettier than either of you, and I love him ever so much more too!" exclaimed Hugh, passionately, their words and tones jarring upon him in his grief, until he scarcely knew what he said.

"Hush, hush, Hugh!" came from Mrs. Lester; but it was disregarded by the boy, who, looking up indignantly and angrily at his sisters, suddenly perceived their gay attire.

With the tears still standing in great drops upon his cheeks, he ceased his sobs for the moment, and broke off with the words, "What's that you've got on?"

"Our new frocks that have just come home," returned Kate.

"New frocks! Mamma, have they been having new frocks?"

"Yes, dear."

"Then you are unkind, greedy things!" he went on, impetuously, turning to the girls with flashing eyes. "Spending mamma's money when she hasn't got enough to buy clothes for Bertie, and so has to send him away, and yet you go and have lots of finery. It's a great shame, and you're very unkind, and I don't believe you care for Bertie a bit, or you'd go about in rags so that he might stop at home!"

Mrs. Lester had said "Hush, Hugh!" more than once, but he did not even hear her, as he stood there pouring out his angry words, with his cheek flushed crimson by the intensity of the feelings working in his mind.

"You don't understand anything about it," was all the answer Margaret vouchsafed, as she turned from him with a dignified air.

That contempt of his grief, that coldness and indifference, proved just the drop too much in the little heart already overcharged with sorrow and indignation; and when Margaret, suddenly stooping, picked up the handkerchief which he had let fall to the ground, and, before he could stop her, flung the toad out of window, his feelings proved too much for him. All self-control was gone, and, with upraised fist, he threw himself upon her, dealing blow after blow, as he cried in passionate tones, "How dare you touch our toad! How dare you go and throw it out of window! You're very cruel and unkind, and you don't love Bertie a bit, or you wouldn't treat his toad like that! And I don't love you a bit, and I never shall!"

"Everything seemed to grow dark about him."—p. 56.

His mother's hand, laid upon his shoulder, checked him, and helped to bring him to his senses.

"Hugh, I am ashamed of you. How can you think of behaving in such a manner to your sister!"

His head drooped, but still he murmured, "She'd no business to touch our Toadie."

"Perhaps she needn't have thrown it out of window; but, my boy, nothing could excuse your behaving as you did. Leave the room now; go and think it over until you feel sorry for it, and then come back and say so, and beg Margaret's pardon."

Hugh rushed away, bursting with grief and angry feelings. No tears came, but deep sobs heaved his breast, as he ran down-stairs and out into the garden, to search underneath his mother's bed-room window for the body of his little brother's plaything and favourite.

He found it at last; and, picking it up, made off with it into a retired part of the garden, where, plunging in amongst the laurel-bushes, he threw himself down on the ground, still sobbing, and stroking the cold inanimate body of the creature, which, if repulsive in the eyes of others, was beautiful in his, as having once belonged to Bertie.

After a time he rose, and taking up a stout pointed stick lying near, he began to dig a hole with it, scooping away the earth until there was room in it for Toadie, when he laid him gently in his little grave, and covered him over with the loose earth.

That done, he again sank down on the ground, and buried his little face in his hands.

He had been naughty, and was conscious of it; but he still felt angry and resentful towards his sister. He wanted his mother's forgiveness, but he felt he could not yet go and ask for Margaret's pardon.

How sorely he longed at that moment for the little brother who would have come to him and shared the disgrace with him, and, throwing his arms around him would have said, "If you'll go and tell Margaret you are sorry, I'll go with you, and then you won't mind so much. Let us do it at once Hughie, and then our play will be nicer afterwards."

But now he seemed to have no one to help him; and very miserable he felt.

After he had sat there for a time, however, he heard his mother's voice calling him. He rose to go to her, hanging his head, for he knew how naughty he had been, and half expected some punishment was in store for him.

But Mrs. Lester could feel for and with her little boy; and as she seated herself under the walnut-tree, and took him on her lap, her face was so tender yet sorrowful, that the proud little heart was subdued, and he sobbed out, "I'm very sorry, mamma; indeed, I'm very sorry!"

Such convulsive sobs shook the child's frame, that Mrs. Lester longed to soothe him by saying they would forget all that had happened; but she felt this was the time for pointing out to him how wrongly he had acted, and therefore she replied, "I knew you would be sorry, darling, for it was so very very naughty to behave as you did!"

"But, mamma, I loved Toadie so, because Bertie did; and it was very unkind of Margaret; don't you think it was?"

"I don't think she meant it, dear; she didn't know you would take it so much to heart. So you must go, my boy, and make friends with her again."

"But I'm still angry with her, so how can I go and say I'm sorry? I'm sorry to have vexed you, mamma; but I don't feel as if I loved her a bit."

"It grieves me very much, Hugh, to hear you say so. There should be nothing but love in a little boy's heart."

"I love you, mamma, and Bertie."

"But I'm afraid you don't love Him who gave you mamma and Bertie, or you would not like to vex Him. When you think of His kindness in giving you such a sweet little brother, can you help longing to please Him in return?"

"I do love Him, mamma," whispered the child.

"Then, darling, have you forgotten what I have so often told you, that His little followers must be like Him; must be meek, and gentle, and loving?"

"I'll try," again whispered Hugh.

"Ask Him to help you, my boy; for you cannot do it of yourself. And you must ask Him to forgive you too; for you have grieved Him very much, Hughie."

Again the little face was buried in her shoulder, as the little fellow sobbed out his sorrow.

When next he spoke, it was to say, "It seems so much harder to be good without Bertie; I'm so miserable without him."

"And yet, dear, you are still at home, and have still got mamma and papa with you, and so are better off in that way than poor Bertie, for he is away from all. And yet Aunt Mary says he is so good; not naughty and passionate directly anything is done he doesn't like."

Mrs. Lester little guessed the effect her words would produce. She had spoken them hoping to make Hugh see how much was still left to him which ought to make him happy and contented; but they acted differently.

At that moment they were interrupted by a servant, who came to inform her mistress that there were visitors in the drawing-room awaiting her.

Consequently she was obliged to go to the house, leaving Hugh, who remained for a while after her departure lying upon the grass, with a thoughtful look upon his young face. He was sorry for his conduct now; the tender little heart was melted, and he began to long for a reconciliation with his sister.

So he got up to go in search of her, and found her in her own little garden, watering her flowers.

He made such an humble apology, and looked such a lovable little fellow with that penitent, sorrowful expression in his face, that Margaret gave him a warmer kiss than usual, and even went the length of saying that she was sorry for what she had done.

He remained watching her for a few moments, until the watering can was emptied, and then offered to go and fill it. Margaret was glad to be saved the trouble; and Hugh ran off, feeling his heart already lighter.

When he came back to her, he further proposed pulling up the weeds that he saw springing up. His sister graciously thanked him, saying she should be very glad, as it was a thing she always disliked doing; and taking up her book she sat down on a shady seat near, to keep an eye upon his operations.

But she soon forgot him, and read on, until she suddenly found him standing before her with one ripe strawberry lying upon a leaf in his hand.

"For you, Margaret. I've picked it for you. It's the only one in my garden," said the boy.

"But don't you want it yourself?"

"No, I've brought it for you. Isn't it a beauty?"

"Yes, it's very nice and ripe. Thank you for it; but I think you ought to have had it yourself."

"And I do love you, Margaret; I was naughty and angry when I said I didn't just now."

And then Hugh ran off, whilst Margaret went on with her reading, after saying to herself, "He's not such a bad little fellow after all."

But she did not know how costly in the boy's eyes had been that little peace-offering of his; nor how he had cherished and watched over that one strawberry, which was to have been eaten by no one but Bertie, and which he had intended sending up to London, after he had consulted his mamma about it. But now he said to himself, he would give that up to show Margaret that he loved her; for he had nothing else to offer except a few marbles, and he knew she would not care for those.

CHAPTER V.

Hugh's mind now reverted to Bertie, and the picture his mamma's few words had conjured up. His little brother was more unhappy than himself, for he was away from them all! and he began to wonder however he should bear it if he were to be sent away from his mother.

How Bertie must want some one to comfort him! and how he longed to go and do it! Besides, his brother must need some one to defend him from Uncle Henry, for very likely he treated his captive unkindly sometimes; and Bertie had always come to him for protection in difficulties, because he was stronger and bigger.

"I must go to him," he said to himself.

He would have liked to have got into his perch in the walnut-tree to think the matter over, as that was a place favourable to meditation; but he would not do that, lest his knickerbockers should suffer. So he flung himself down on the soft turf, lying on his back, with his legs elevated until his little feet rested upon the rustic bench, whilst he pulled some leaves and daisies to pieces with the fingers that never could keep still for very long, meanwhile turning over in his mind what could be done about Bertie. That he must not be left in his lonely unprotected state was certain.

His mamma had been in the habit of sometimes telling them tales from history to amuse them, whilst she sat at her work, and one day had related the story of the imprisonment of Francis I., King of France, by Charles V. How he had been kept languishing in confinement at Madrid; how his devoted sister Margaret had come all the way from France to visit him; and how he had, at length, obtained his freedom only by consenting that his two little sons should take his place, as hostages.

He had always thought how glad he was that Francis was not his father; for it seemed so unkind of him to let his two little children be sent away from their home to be kept in Spain, when he himself could not bear being there. But now it seemed to him that Bertie was something—not altogether, of course, but something—like those little boys.

He had been sent away from home, not to prison exactly, it was true; but in one way he was even worse off than they were, for he was alone.

But if he could be with him it would be more bearable for him. Then he would go to him; he would do like Margaret did, and visit his brother.

He had arrived at that conclusion when he was called in to tea, which was earlier than usual that afternoon.

Directly the meal was over, Hugh slipped out of the house, prepared to put his plan into execution.

He knew the London road, having often walked or driven along it; so, of course he said to himself, he had nothing to do but to follow it, and he would get there all right. That was plain enough.

Moreover, he had a good long evening before him; and even if he should not get there that night, he had some money in his pocket to pay for anything that he might want—the twopence he had received on Saturday, and had kept to be used in some way for Bertie, and another penny which his papa had given him the day before for pulling up weeds in the garden.

That would surely take him a long way; and when that was gone, he could do like boys he had read of in stories, and beg his way. He wouldn't mind doing that for Bertie's sake; and he felt little doubt of meeting with some kind old woman, like those in books, who, touched by his story, would help him, and bring him to his brother.

And then, how astonished and delighted Bertie would be to see him! and how nice it would be to give each other a good hug once more!

The thought quickened his steps, and made him forget everything save the joy of again seeing Bertie.

His path led through fields and lanes for about two miles, until the first village on the road was reached; and after that he supposed he must keep to the highway. But he knew his way perfectly as far as the village, as it had always been a favourite walk of the children's.

And so the little feet went briskly forward, the young face glowing with excitement and the newly-kindled hope, and the whole figure expanding with a sense of independence and importance.

At length he had nearly reached Ford. He was crossing the last field but one, when, looking round, he suddenly perceived, in the further corner, several cows of formidable appearance, with great horns and nerce faces.

Now, it must be owned that Hugh was something of a coward where cows were concerned; and, therefore, on discovering his neighbours, he quickened his pace, devoutly hoping that he should be able to reach the gate without their noticing him. But to his horror he saw one or two of them raise their heads, take a good look at him, and advance towards him.

His heart beat fast, as he walked still more quickly, having been told that he ought never to run under such circumstances. But when, on again looking round, he saw one of his enemies tossing his head, and coming after him in a threatening manner, it was all up with him. Every vestige of self-control was gone, and, with screams of affright, he made a rush for the gate, running as he had never run in his life before.

The gate was a five-barred one, which generally stood a little open, so that people could pass through; but now, the cows being in the field, it was fastened, and poor Hugh saw at a glance that he must climb it.

He was fond of climbing in a general way, but not when pursued by cows. However, there was no other course.

With his little limbs trembling and quaking with fright, he clambered up as best he could, all power seeming to be almost gone from him, as he fancied he heard the cow close upon him.

If he could only get to the other side all would be well; the cows could not climb the gate after him. But unfortunately, in his haste and agitation, he caught his foot in the top bar, and fell head-foremost to the ground.

Everything seemed to grow dark about him; cows, fields, and gates, all vanished from his memory, as he lay unconscious upon the hard earth, with the blood slowly trickling from a cut in his forehead.

CHAPTER VI.

Bertie, meantime, was pining for home, and all the dear ones there; but more especially for his mother and brother.

All the sights and grand doings of London awoke but a languid interest in him, because Hugh was not there to share it with him.

He had never been away from him before; never played a game, and scarcely thought a thought, without his brother; and now to be cast upon his own resources seemed very, very lonely. His longing for his little brother and playfellow was so intense, that all the kindness and love his aunt lavished upon him could not satisfy him. He moped and drooped; became more and more gentle and passive and affectionate to those around him, but his cheek lost its roundness, and his eye its brightness; whilst the sound of his voice in merry laughter, which had so charmed the ears of Mrs. Norham in the old garden at Eastdean, was never heard about the house. A sort of wistful half-sad smile was the best he could produce in return for his aunt's efforts to amuse him.

Captain Norham had taken him to the Zoological Gardens, and certainly that would have been delightful if Hugh had been there. But when he saw two young leopards playing together, half fighting, half caressing one another, he thought how he should like to be rolling with Hugh on the lawn at home, or down the steep grassy slopes of the town walls, where they used to get such bumps and bruises, and laugh till they could laugh no more. And his eyes filled with tears, as he watched the two young animals tumbling over one another, knocking each other down, and then picking themselves up again.

Some of the best toy-shops were visited, and he was allowed to choose what he would like for himself.

His choice fell upon the things he thought Hugh would like best; and when he found himself the possessor of a splendid set of soldiers, with cannon that went upon wheels; and besides that, a drum that was most gorgeous-looking, and could be strapped round him as if he were a regular drummer-boy, he could scarcely believe that these magnificent things, so far above anything he had ever called his own, were for him, and he thanked his uncle and aunt warmly.

But even at that moment he gave a little half-stifled sigh at the remembrance of the merry games at home, when a stick or a stone, a penny whip, or a few marbles, had been enough to satisfy the little hearts that were so rich and happy in each other's love.

The only consolation was that all these things should be Hugh's some day: he would take care of them for him until he saw him again at Christmas.

And the same with all the dainties at table—the cake, or preserved fruits, or sweet biscuits, of which they were both so fond. Unnoticed, as he thought, he would slip them into his pockets instead of eating them, and then take them up-stairs, to stow away in his little box for Hugh, not remembering that they might get stale and unfit to eat before they again met, but only feeling that he could not enjoy anything unless Hugh could share in it.

"I'm beginning to be afraid our experiment will not succeed," remarked Mrs. Norham to her husband, one evening after the child had gone to bed. "I'm afraid the little fellow will never learn to be happy here."

"Oh, time will work wonders," returned the

"Two little figures knelt at the mother's lap."—p. 60.

captain. "He hasn't been here long enough to get accustomed to the change; but he is such an affectionate boy that you will soon win his heart, and then he will be happy."

"I wish it might be so; for I have grown so fond of him that I could not bear to part with him. He is the dearest sweetest little fellow I ever knew. But now I see how bound up he is in Hugh, I begin to fear we have all made a mistake in separating the two."

But to return to Eastdean. When Hugh's bedtime arrived he was called, as usual. Finding he did not come at the summons, though it was repeated again and again, search was made for him, it being supposed that he was hiding somewhere for mischief. But when every corner had been explored, some alarm began to be felt, and Mrs. Lester could not rest until she had dispatched one in one direction, another in another, to look for the child.

But all returned unsuccessful, and had to go forth again to make further inquiries. Soon nearly all Eastdean had heard the news of the child's being missing, and many were the kind hearts that came forward to offer to aid in the search, for almost every one in that small place knew and had a kindly feeling for the merry loving little brothers. They had been sorry to miss Bertie's sunny face, but now, to lose Hugh as well!——

And so, with hearts that grew more anxious as the minutes went by and no traces of him were found, the search was pursued, until a little straw hat was seen by some one floating on the river. It was drawn in, and Mr. Lester gave a groan as they brought it to him.

"Take care your mother doesn't hear a word of this!" he said, turning to Margaret, who had followed him a little way down the lane, outside the garden gate. "Go back, and keep this from her. It's very like his," he murmured, "but still there are plenty of children who have straw hats very similar. It cannot be my little Hugh's! I will not believe or think it!" and he turned away to hunt in another direction.

Margaret returned to the house to keep guard over her mother, lest that dreadful suspicion respecting the hat should reach her ears. And so they sat on in the drawing-room, where Mr. Lester had begged his wife to remain; though she could not long keep her seat, but rose and paced the room in her anxiety, whilst Kate sat on the floor in the window, sobbing.

Margaret, roused out of her usual selfishness into taking thought for others, tried to appear calm, and to speak hopeful words; but as her thoughts dwelt upon the occurrences of that afternoon, on Hugh's penitence for his burst of temper, and the loving reconciliation which had followed, her heart ached, and she hated herself for having been the cause, as she now saw she had been, though, perhaps, not intentionally, of the little fellow's trouble. And as she again seemed to see him standing before her, holding out his gift of the one strawberry, she said to herself, "Oh, if anything happens to Hugh—if he's drowned—what shall I do! I shall never, never forgive myself for having been so impatient with him whenever he did anything I didn't like. I wonder he loves me at all! and yet he said he did. Oh, how glad I am he said he did! though I don't deserve it. But if he comes back, I will never be so unkind again; I will try always to be patient and loving to him."

The room grew dark, but still they did not speak of lighting up, preferring to try and ignore how time was passing, and how late it was really getting. Besides, in this dim light, they could not so well read the anxiety upon each other's faces.

Meanwhile Hugh, after lying long unconscious, had at length opened his eyes, and, looking around him, had not been able to make out for a long time where he was, or how he had come there.

Twilight was already beginning to give place to night; but it was still warm and pleasant, and the child lay still for a while, feeling too tired to care to move, or rouse himself out of that dreamy state.

But at length he suddenly heard a cow lowing very near to him. With a violent start he sprang to his feet, and then, uttering a cry of pain, sank down on the ground again.

He saw that he was on the right side of the gate—that his enemies the cows were safely shut off from him; but still it was not pleasant to see the fiercest looking of them gazing at him through the bars. It sent an uncomfortable feeling through him, and made him wish to put a greater distance between them.

So once more he got up, and tried to walk; but the pain it cost him was so great that he could not bear it, and, sinking down again on the ground, he buried his face in his hands and sobbed aloud.

He felt very forlorn and desolate in his present situation; besides, how was he to get to London if he could not walk a step? and what would become of him if he had to spend the night out in that field?

It was already growing dark, and he was so tired! and those cows might perhaps get through some gap in the hedge and find him out. All the romance of the great things he was going to do for Bertie had vanished; his heroism was gone; he could only for the present look upon the actual state of things, and heartily wished himself back in his little bed at home, with his mother stooping over him to kiss him. And as he thought of her, a misgiving for the first time shot through his heart, that perhaps she might not approve of the course he had taken.

It made him sob all the more, as his longing for her increased with the growing pain and darkness; and when, feeling his forehead uncomfortable, he put up his hand to it, and found traces of blood upon it, he began to wonder what he could have done to himself, and whether he should die, left out there all night, and never see his mamma, or Bertie, or his papa, or any of them again.

He thought at this moment of Margaret and Kate with softened feelings, and sorrowfully remembered the scene of the afternoon.

"What a naughty boy I was! and now perhaps I shall never see her again to ask her once more to forgive me! But I'm glad I gave her that strawberry!"

Such were the sad musings of the tender little heart.

At last it occurred to him that it was so dark it must be long past bed-time, and he had not said his evening prayers. He could not say them at his mamma's lap to-night, and he sobbed at the thought; but he got upon his knees, and clasping his little hands together, and shutting up his eyes, he went reverently through his usual simple petitions. And then he further asked that "he might be brought home again somehow—that somebody might come to look for him."

For a few moments the sense of loneliness was gone, as he felt his Father in heaven was near him, watching over him. And again he added, "Please make me and Bertie good boys, and let us both come home again to mamma."

He did not feel so afraid of the cows now, but he still sat murmuring, "Oh, mamma, mamma!" when a sound suddenly broke upon his ears, which sent a thrill of delight through him. It was his father's voice.

"Papa, papa, I'm here!" he screamed, joyfully; and the next moment, to his infinite relief, he was lifted from the ground, and folded in his father's arms.

Mr. Lester was accompanied by one of his neighbours, and in turns they carried the boy back to his home and his anxious mother.

On the way Hugh told his story to his father, confiding to him his plan of going to London to Bertie. But when he heard what alarm and anxiety he had caused his mother and all of them, he was very penitent; and when, on reaching the house, Mrs. Lester took him in her arms, unable to speak for the deep feelings of thankfulness which filled her heart to overflowing, he sobbed out, "Please forgive me, mamma, I'm very sorry; do, please forgive me!"

"Forgive you, my darling!" was all she could say, as she folded the boy in a long close embrace, which told better than words could have done how completely joy at his recovery had swallowed up all other feelings.

But his pale looks, the cut on his forehead, and the injured foot, aroused her fears, and made her send off for the doctor to examine into the state of his hurts, whilst she herself put him to bed, Hugh meanwhile trying to reassure her by saying, "I'm not much hurt, mamma; you needn't be afraid, for now I'm at home again I feel all right."

The tears stood in her eyes as she heard of Hugh's scheme and self-devotion on his brother's behalf.

"But," she said, after a while, "had you no thought for mamma, and what she would feel to find both her little boys gone from her, not even knowing where you were, or what had become of you?"

Hugh humbly owned that he had not thought of that—that he had been too full of Bertie just then.

"But, oh, mamma, I did so long for you when I was sitting out all that time in the field alone, and it was getting dark. I wanted you so badly!"

And the mother once more pressed him to her, feeling she could not utter a word of blame for his thoughtlessness, when it had arisen from such deep love for his brother.

The doctor came, and pronounced the wound on the forehead to be of no serious consequence; but the foot was badly sprained by the twist it had received in falling from the gate.

So for a few days the boy had to be a prisoner to the sofa, except when his father carried him out in the garden, and laid him down under the walnut-tree, where his mamma sat working or reading, but always ready to put down work or book to talk to her little son.

Margaret and Kate, too, were kinder than formerly. Those few miserable hours of suspense, during which the search for Hugh was going on, and they thought that perhaps they might never see him again, were not forgotten by them. And when their mother, seizing upon a favourable moment, had dwelt upon the boy's unselfish love and devotion, an uncomfortable sense of their own selfishness had fastened upon them. For they were forced to own to themselves that because the little fellows, in their boyish love of fun and mischief, had often interrupted them in their more quiet pursuits, they had grown annoyed with them, and got into the habit of looking upon them as "plagues," as they expressed it. And so they had repelled and kept them at a distance, instead of sometimes putting aside their own likings and interests to enter into theirs, by doing which they would have drawn out towards themselves a larger measure of the love that dwelt in those two warm little hearts.

They began to see all this now, and to be sorry for it. So, instead of saying to each other, as they had often done, "Mamma completely spoils the boys," they were now too glad to have Hugh back safe and sound, to grudge him the affection lavished upon him.

"We'll try and never be cross or impatient with them again, won't we?" said Margaret, as they were preparing for bed that evening.

"Yes," echoed Kate, "we'll try; for it was so miserable that night we thought we had lost Hugh, to remember all the unkind things I had said to him when he provoked me."

CHAPTER VII.

HUGH'S restless nature would not allow of his long keeping still, and accordingly, as the sprained foot could not yet be used, he took to hopping about on the other, thereby making his mamma nervous, lest, by putting so much strain upon it, he should sprain that one too. But she kept her fears to herself, for she knew how irksome it must be for him to remain long quiet in one place. Therefore he hopped out at breakfast-time to meet the postman, and came back with a letter in his hand.

"Only one, mamma," he said, as he handed it to her, unconscious that that one letter contained a world of joy for him.

Mrs. Lester's eyes grew so wondrously soft and bright as she glanced over it, that even Hugh noticed the change, and cried, "What is it, mamma?"

"You'll never guess. Bertie is coming home!"

"Bertie coming home!" Hugh gave a scream of intensest joy, and, scrambling down from his chair, hid his face in her lap as he sobbed aloud, the sudden and exquisite bliss of that moment making his heart feel so full that he could scarcely bear it. But when he lifted his face, it shone and beamed and sparkled all over with the great happiness, as he hastily said, "Tell me again, please, mamma; tell me when Bertie is coming. Will he be here soon?"

"Yes, darling, to-day."

"Oh, aren't you glad? Papa, aren't you glad? Margaret and Kate, isn't it jolly?" and in the fulness of his joy the little fellow hopped all round, giving to each in turn one of his rough bear-like hugs.

"But, my dear, what is the reason of this sudden change?" inquired Mr. Lester, addressing his wife.

"Henry, you know, has been unwell for several days, and now it proves to be an attack of rheumatic fever. That is generally a long tedious affair, and Mary says she shall be so much taken up with attending to Henry that she should be obliged to leave Bertie to himself more than would be good for him. Besides, she says, he had not been looking well lately; she fears he is pining for home, and not so happy as she wishes to see him, and therefore a little change would do him good. Mr. Brown had just called in to say he was coming down to Eastdean to-day, and offered to take anything, if she wished, to us; and so she decided upon sending Bertie with him. We shall hear again from her to-morrow, she says."

"Hurrah!" shouted Hugh, "Bertie is coming home. Mamma, I can't eat any more breakfast, so may I go out in the garden at once, because I shall have so much to do to make all nice for him?"

Consent being given, the little fellow hopped off, filling the air with his shouts and joyful hurrahs, and scarcely knowing how to contain all the feelings of gladness that were filling his heart.

"Mamma, I think I shall burst with happiness!" he exclaimed, as he caught sight of her an hour afterwards looking out upon him from the drawing-room window with a sweet smile of content upon her face. "I never felt like it in all my life before, and I don't know how to bear it. Oh, to think of having Bertie back again! Hurrah! hurrah!" and he repeated the last word with every conceivable change of voice and tone, shouting it out till the air rang with it, and filling with joyous sounds the old garden which had been silent so long.

And when at length the two little fellows were locked in each other's arms, they felt such deep, pure, intense gladness, as is seldom experienced in this world; perhaps because there are so few who know how to love with such freedom from all taint of selfishness.

No words could describe Bertie's joy and deep delight at being once more at home. So strange and sweet it seemed that it made him almost quiet and subdued—a contrast to Hugh in his boisterous merriment. But no one who felt the lingering clinging clasp of his little arms around their neck, or looked into his open blue eyes, which expressed such depths of peace and content, could doubt that his happiness and joy were as great as they could possibly be.

Tears dimmed the mother's eyes as she watched the pair going about the garden together once more, their arms round each other's necks, and their lips every now and then stretched out to give or receive a kiss.

How fast their little tongues went! How much they had to tell one another! How restless their joy made them! and how unreal it all seemed every now and then! so unreal that they were obliged to give a mutual hug, and go rolling over and over on the turf to make sure that it was not a dream.

Their happiness was without a shadow or cloud: for they were together once more, and that was enough for them. Childlike, they did not cast a thought to partings that would be sure to come in the future, but gave themselves up to the enjoyment of the present moment, and their bliss was perfect.

Then came the unpacking of Bertie's box. One after another the beautiful gifts he had received in London were brought out, each one calling forth a rapturous burst of admiration from Hugh, who had never seen anything so splendid in all Eastdean.

"For you," said Bertie, briefly, as he placed one after another of his toys in Hugh's arms: "all for you."

"But, Bertie, you won't have any left for yourself!" exclaimed the other.

"I don't want any. I've got you now, you dear old Hughie, and you are better than all the toys in London!" and for the fiftieth time the little brothers threw their arms around each other, and this time so tightly that they half strangled one another.

At last, from the bottom of the box was produced a paper bag. Bertie seized upon it, explaining that it contained "all sorts of good things which I saved for you from dessert; but, Hugh, I think, if you don't mind, I'll give it to Margaret and Kate, because you've got the other things, and I've nothing else to give them."

"Yes, give it all to them," said Hugh, pushing the bag from him, after he had first looked in, and perceived various tempting biscuits with pink and white sugar on the top, chocolate drops of different shapes and sizes, and other things for which he had a special weakness. "Give it all to them. And d'you know, Bertie, they are a great deal kinder than they used to be, and I think we won't tease them any more like we used to."

Once more two little figures knelt at the mother's lap to say their evening prayers, when a special clause of thanksgiving was put in by both, that "God had let them be together again;" and once more two little curly heads nestled side by side on the pillow when Mrs. Lester came to pay her nightly visit.

The children were sound asleep, with happy smiles round their lips; and again the mother lingered long, as she had done the last time they lay there together.

Then she had committed her darlings to His keeping, who would, she knew, watch over and shield them, whether she were present or absent; but now she bowed her head in thanksgiving, that once more she had them both beside her.

Soon came another letter from Mrs. Norham, saying that the doctors pronounced London too cold for Captain Norham after India; and were of opinion that he ought, on recovering from his present attack, to go abroad, and winter in the south of France.

So they had come to the conclusion that it would be best to leave Bertie with his mother, though they would not relinquish their claim to consider him as their own little boy, and to be allowed to bear all the expenses of his bringing up, as they had intended. But they would not separate him from his home again; and, perhaps, when they came back from abroad, they might spend part of the summer at Eastdean, if there was a house to be found for them, and there enjoy seeing the two little brothers both together.

And now again the happy days and weeks sped on, during which there were many merry games of play in the garden; many rollings down and scramblings up the steep grassy slopes of the old town walls; until at length winter began to draw on, and the two busy little minds became full of anticipations of Christmas joys and pleasures.

A few days before Christmas there was a glorious snow-storm, which came down softly and silently, clothing all Nature in its mantle of spotless beauty, and lying so thickly upon the boughs of the old apple-trees in the garden, that they seemed to bend beneath its weight.

On the following morning the two boys rushed out of doors directly they were dressed, to enjoy the delights of snow-balling, and came in to breakfast with glowing cheeks and beaming eyes, ready to do full justice to the fare set before them. Then post-time brought a letter from Uncle Henry, with ten shillings for each of them, as well as for Margaret and Kate, with which to buy a Chrismas present for themselves.

Many eager consultations did the two have together on the important question of how to dispose of so much wealth; their little faces even grew grave and anxious over the difficulty of deciding on such weighty matters. One thing they had soon determined upon: to put their money together, and buy a present for everybody. But it was the choosing these presents was the great difficulty, especially as they declined taking any one into their confidence.

Endless whisperings and secret councils were held between the two, the result of which was a parcel placed beside each plate on Christmas morning, done up in paper, and labelled, "Mamma, from Hugh and Bertie," "Papa," &c., in the flourishing hand of the good-natured shopman, to whom they had imparted the perplexing fact that they did not know how to address their presents themselves, now they had bought them.

Christmas Day was a very happy time to the two little boys. Their gifts gave universal satisfaction, and they themselves received no "end of them," to use their own expression; whilst the delights of sliding and snow-balling lasted several days, as a frost set in and the snow lay long upon the ground.

Bertie never forgot Aunt Mary and all her kindness to him; whilst Hugh, having forgiven Uncle Henry for all his imaginary offences, the two brothers mutually looked forward to the summer, when Captain and Mrs. Norham were again to pay them a visit; and the latter, on their arrival, found a very warm welcome from two bright eager little boys, who, if possible, were more than ever devoted to one another. And henceforth there was no talk of separating the two.

THE THREEFOLD MESSAGE OF THE ORACLE.

BY THE REV. S. J. STONE, M.A., AUTHOR OF "THE KNIGHT OF INTERCESSION," ETC.

WE say the world is very small,
And, in the chances that befall,
That all are found akin to all:

That every alien, though he roam
Far o'er the hills or o'er the foam,
Some trace or token finds of home:

A sudden word, a simple sign,
And, lo! the land becomes divine,
The sad, sour grapes seem Eshcoline!

The spirit soars as it hath won,
Beyond the cloud-rack drear and dun,
Glimpse of a lost or doubted sun!

And yet the world is very wide,
And men with men walk side by side
Whom leagues of distance yet divide;

And many a heart throbs close to heart,
And sighs and tears together start,
In souls whom depths abysmal part;

And with unsated sympathies
Men look each other in the eyes,
Longing to know, yet never wise.

There is some secret all must keep,
O'er which in solitude they weep,
Nor breathe it when they wake or sleep.

It chanced upon that sacred Eve
Whereon our hearts are wont to weave
With those high truths our souls believe

Such earthly thoughts, in hopes and fears,
In joys or woes, as on our ears
The sweet or melancholy years

Utter in echo from their tomb,
When forms and faces fill the room
Which long have passed into the gloom,

When old delight and old despair
With ghostly presence crowd the air,
And whisper 'mid our praise or prayer—

It chanced on such an Eve, that three
At night beneath the same roof-tree
Their vigil kept in company.

Well-known, and dear as known, were they,
Each man to each: life's parted way
Drew ever to one point this day:

For never fell the holy-tide
But brought together, side by side,
Whom the long months had parted wide.

Glad was their commune, free and full:
The flowers of talk they stooped to cull
Were not too bright and not too dull

For sober calm and kindly jest;
They spoke as men who knew the best
Of mingled energy and rest;

They spake as thinkers speak who know
The tides of time, the ebb and flow
Of the great sea which to and fro

Bears on its breast the nation's ark:
Who for its sake the courses mark
As each for his own slender bark.

Within their eyes keen was the light
As thus they spake: but as the night
Grew from the afternoon, and bright

Glowed on their faces and the room
The Yule-tide fire—dark winter's bloom—
Then did a tenderer light illume

Friend's face from friend's face, and they drew Closer, as now they spread to view
The ever old and ever new.

Then each for each, one charmèd hour,
Drew forth with resurrection power
Long-perished fruit, long-withered flower,

To precious taste and sight again;
Fuller the joy, and sweet the pain,
As the dead past resumed her reign.

And each man loved his brother well,
And hoped one mournful inner knell
Only on his own hearing fell.

For yet was each man all alone!
And to his secret heart, unknown,
Each made his solitary moan.

Each made, for comfort or in care,
His lamentation, half in prayer
And half in a resigned despair;

Conscious of an abiding pain,
Each mourned. One cried, "In vain, in vain!"
One murmured ever and again,

"Never:" the other's soul was riven
With that lament beneath all Heaven
Forlornest, bitterest, "Unforgiven."

He cried "In vain!" with secret sigh,
Before whose gaze in years gone by—
When, in world-blindness, hope was high

And fears were few—imperial Fame
Had held to view a glorious name:
And now, for all men's praise, in shame

He saw himself an athlete wan
Who still a race unended ran,
Yet knew he was a beaten man.

"Never!" mourned he, before whose eyes
Sweet love, ere death had made him wise,
Had opened earthly paradise.

O blessed ignorance! bright morn
Of fair vain hope! O day forlorn,
When wisdom out of death was born!

"Never to see her sweet eyes shine!
To hear her whisper 'I am thine,'
To feel her gentle hands in mine!"

The third—whose cry might most appal,
Wailed at his own soul's funeral—
He was the noblest of them all.

Yet had he sinned in days long dead,
And evermore by board and bed
That sin did rear its living head,

And uttered, as each day began,
As each day closed, its secret ban
Ever, "Thou art a cursed man!"

So rose the three, at length, to part,
And each from each with loving art
Concealed the wound of his own heart;

And, smiling calmly while it bled,
Each to his own drear future sped
Uncounselled and uncomforted.

And each one thought, "The world is old,
Her heart and mine are growing cold,
The death-mists gather fold in fold.

"They dull the joy and dim the truth
Which showed so bravely in our youth,
With chills of failure, loss, and ruth.

"The world and I will soon be dead;
This night of cheer I droop my head
Uncounselled and uncomforted."

Nay; 'twas not so, by Christ's dear grace!
He had His poets in the place,
Whose angels see the Father's face.

The three beneath the starry light,
O'er the crisp snow-track glittering bright,
Passed out a space into the night:

Then parted by the village school,
Where in that hour, by antique rule,
The children sang a song of Yule.

And, ere the parting, on their ears
The strain, unmarked in other years,
Brought the true music of the spheres:

The music of that spheric song
First uttered by the seraph throng,
Which all the ages shall prolong:

The one true music of the Morn,
Waking from night a world forlorn
With God's evangel—"CHRIST IS BORN."

Set to this oracle the strain,
As once upon the Eastern plain,
Flowed softly with its one refrain:

The one refrain of happy yore,
The one refrain for evermore,
To these its holy burden bore.

Waken, waken, Christians all,
Let your incense musical
Greet the morn;
Father, mother, grave and mild,
Children of the Holy Child,
Youth and maiden, glad and gay,
Let your carol crown the day—
CHRIST IS BORN!

Sing as it was sung of yore,
Both the love and glory tell
Of the morn.
Now console and now adore,
Singing Peace for evermore,
Hymning the Emanuel—
So, the chords shall sink and swell!
CHRIST IS BORN!

Unto Adam's sons forlorn,
Sick and weary, sad and worn,
Sing Nowell!
If upon this morning only,
Let the laden and the lonely
Lose the burden and the pain,
Listening your sweet refrain—
CHRIST IS BORN!

Unto God and man Nowell!
Sang the seraph sentinel
Of the morn;
Chanting "Peace," to mortals given,
Chanting "Glory," high in heaven:
Pax in terrâ, and, for aye,
In excelsis Gloria:
CHRIST IS BORN!

Yea, the song shall sink and swell,
Echoing on the oracle
Of the morn!
Carol! to the deepest woe
Let the tender tidings go;
Carol! to the utmost skies
Let the mighty music rise—
CHRIST IS BORN!

They did but hear the old refrain;
But as it sank and swelled again,
It smote their hearts with sudden pain—

The sudden pain of one surprised,
The sudden pain of love despised,
Now in a moment seen and prized.

With such a voice, "Behold! 'tis true;
Have I not spoken, and to you?
And hear ye this as tidings new?"

With pain, and yet with sudden hope,
Which grew in light, and power, and scope,
Till very Heaven began to ope;

Till each one, parting, homeward sped
As one with blessing on his head,
So counselled and so comforted:

Till this one cried, "'Tis not in vain!
There is the crown for toil and pain
In His exceeding glorious gain!"

And one, "I smile despair to scorn!
She sleeps but till the day be born,
Her feet are lying toward the morn!"

And he, the saddest, "Even so,
His love came down, and came so low,
He will not leave me to my woe!"

And each one thought, "The world is young,
And her true life hath found a tongue
In song, the sweetest ever sung.

"Her heart and mine, once dimmed and sad,
Divine apocalypse have had,
And are with hope immortal glad.

"Nor death is ours, nor life forlorn;
Our eyes await the living morn
That shall not tarry—CHRIST IS BORN!"

CHRIST IS BORN!

Words by the Rev. S. J. Stone, M.A. Music by John Stainer, M.A., Mus. D.

* For succeeding verses see page 63.